response to questions by the court that he was not in charge of the yard, but was loading trucks. He was then asked, "But you were in charge of getting that out?" to which he replied in the affirmative but in response to a question then asked by counsel, "You mean you were in charge of—," he said, "Getting the trucks loaded" He stated that he had nothing to do with employing men for any work, but that Isherwood volunteered to make the delivery in question, though he had not driven the truck before that time—that he was a baker. Dissieux, a witness for the defendant, who at the time of the accident was manager of appellant's yard, testified that he and the yard foreman did the hiring of drivers, and that Baldwin had at no time had anything to do with employing labor; that no conversation had ever occurred in which the matter of Baldwin employing men was mentioned. He stated that when regular drivers were not present to take out a load it was always held until a driver came in, but that they did not pick up someone else to make delivery. Isherwood testified that he had helped around the yard before, but had never driven one of the trucks out; that he was "just bumming around there." This testimony leaves no substantial conflict in the evidence, which establishes the fact that Baldwin had no actual authority to employ truck drivers under any circumstances, or to do anything further than load the trucks. He had never before secured the services of Isherwood to drive a truck, and in doing so upon this occasion acted entirely outside of the scope of his authority as an employee of the defendant company.

In Gates v. Daley, 54 Cal. App. 654, 202 Pac. 467, wherein the employee was himself the regular driver, and entrusted to another the performance of his own duties, this court said:

> "The cases in which masters have been held liable for the negligence of assistants to their regularly employed servants, laying aside those instances in which the servants have engaged the assistants under an express authority conferred by the masters, seem to be divided into two classes: First, those cases in which the assistants committed the acts of negligence in the presence, and, therefore, impliedly, under the direction, of the servants; second, those in which the assistants, although being negligent while working out of the presence of the servants, were engaged in the rendition of services which they had been accustomed to perform at the servants' request for considerable periods of time, thus giving rise to the view that the servants enjoyed an implied authority to engage them."

We do not think the facts of the instant case bring it within the purview of either of these classes. Baldwin's duty was to load the trucks; drivers constituting another set of employees were hired to make deliveries when loaded. In so far as Isherwood may have helped in the loading, he assisted Baldwin, but when he volunteered to do the driving he assumed the duties of employees of a distinctly different capacity. The latter are so segregated as to be required by law to procure licenses from state authorities before they shall operate automobiles upon the public thoroughfares.

The general principle is announced in many cases from other states that one employed by a servant to assist in the performance of his master's business is not an employee of the latter, for whose negligence the master will be liable, unless the servant had authority, either express or implied, to employ the help. As was said in Thyssen v. Davenport I. & C. S. Co., 134 Iowa, 749, 112 N. W. 177, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 572, 576:

> "But, generally speaking, we think the rule of these authorities is not grounded upon the thought that one who assists a servant becomes thereby a servant of such servant's master, except it be in cases where we may find express or implied authority in the servant to employ or permit the assistance so rendered. In the absence of such authority, the one safe and logical ground upon which to rest the liability of a master for the negligence of a volunteer assistant of his servant is the negligence of the servant in inviting or permitting a stranger to perform or assist in the performance of the work which was intrusted to his own hand."

Board of Trade Bldg. Corp. v. Cralle, 109 Va. 246, 63 S. E. 995, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 297, 132 Am. St. Rep. 917, is much in point. The building corporation employed two operators to run the elevators in its seven-story building, but when the plaintiff entered, desiring to go to an upper floor, the operators were in other parts of the building. One Zachary, who was in the company's employ to oil and care for the elevators and do general work as "hall boy," called upon another man who was present, but not employed by the company, instructing him how to manage the elevator, and asked him to take the plaintiff up. No one was authorized to employ elevator operators except the machinist and engineer in charge of the building, and no one except the regular operators was authorized to run the elevators. Plaintiff was injured and brought suit for damages. The Supreme Court of Virginia, in reversing a judgment against the company, said:

> "The uncontradicted evidence shows that Zachary, the 'hall boy,' had no express authority to employ any one to operate the elevators. It being no part of his duty to operate them or to see that they were operated, it would seem clear that he had no implied power to employ another to do work he was not employed to do, and for the doing of which he was in no way responsible.
> "In the case of Taylor v. Baltimore & Ohio R. Co., 108 Va. 817, 62 S. E. 798, 2 Va. App. 650, * * * which involved the question of whether or not the railroad company was liable for injuries suffered by the plaintiff, who had been requested by the conductor in charge of a freight train of the railroad company to assist him in unloading freight as he was late and his men were out of place, it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, because the conductor had no authority to create the relation of master and servant between the railroad company and the plaintiff, as well as because he had no intention of creating such relation in requesting the plaintiff to assist him in his work."

The positive evidence in the case at bar is all to the effect that Baldwin was not authorized to move the trucks when loaded, nor to employ the services of others for that purpose; and it therefore necessarily follows that he had no implied authority to employ another to do work which he was not employed to do, and for the doing of which he was in no way responsible.

The judgment is reversed.

WHEELOCK v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SAN DIEGO COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 4687.)

1. Divorce 🔑165(5) — Filing motion to set aside decree with clerk insufficient.

Mere filing of motion with clerk of court to set aside final divorce decree within six months thereafter, without calling court's attention to it or giving adverse party notice thereof until service of supporting affidavit and notice of motion subsequently filed, is not application contemplated by Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

2. Divorce 🔑165(4)—Motion to set aside decree for fraud in procuring movant's application for its entry held too late.

Motion, filed more than six months after entry of final divorce decree in favor of movant, to set it aside on ground that she was defrauded in moving for its entry, held too late, though regarded as invoking court's inherent power to set aside judgments procured through fraud, irrespective of Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

Application by George M. Wheelock for writ of prohibition directed to the Superior Court in and for San Diego County, S. M. Marsh, Judge. Writ granted.

Harold C. Morton, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Stickney & Stickney, of San Diego, for respondents.

WORKS, J. Petitioner was defendant in a divorce action pending before respondent court, in which an interlocutory decree of divorce was entered in favor of the plaintiff, Mary Katherine Wheelock, on April 8, 1922, and in which, on Mrs. Wheelock's motion, a final decree was entered on June 14, 1923. On December 14, 1923, which it will be observed was exactly six months after the date of entry of the final decree, Mrs. Wheelock filed in the office of the clerk of respondent court, under the title of the divorce action, a certain paper which was headed "Motion." This paper began thus:

> "Comes now the plaintiff * * * and moves the above entitled court for an order setting aside and vacating the final decree of divorce heretofore entered in the above entitled cause on the 14th day of June, 1923, separating the parties hereto, on the following grounds and for the following reasons and particulars, to wit"—the grounds of the motion then being set forth.

In brief, they were that the parties to the action had resumed their marital relations on or about June 9, 1922, and had continued those relations up to the date of entry of the final decree of divorce; that on June 9, 1922, they entered into an agreement to remarry after the granting of a final decree in the action; that they both believed that the entry of a final decree was a necessary prerequisite to a valid remarriage; that Mrs. Wheelock made her application for a final decree solely because of that belief; and that on the entry of the final decree Wheelock abandoned her and refused to comply with his agreement to remarry her. The motion was neither called to the attention of respondent court, nor was petitioner in this proceeding ever given notice of it, nor did he have notice of it, except at the time and in the manner below to be stated. The motion was accompanied by no affidavits, and referred to none, but on December 19, 1923, an affidavit of Mrs. Wheelock in apparent support of it was filed in the office of the clerk of respondent court, and on January 10, 1924, several affidavits of other persons were also filed by her. None of these affidavits was ever served on petitioner, except that the affidavit of Mrs. Wheelock was served as hereinafter stated.

On January 23, 1924, a notice of motion, dated January 14, 1924, was served on petitioner, notifying him that on January 28, 1924, Mrs. Wheelock would call up for hearing the motion theretofore filed by her, and stating the purport of the motion. It was also said in the notice that the motion would be made upon the affidavit of Mrs. Wheelock and that a copy of the motion and a copy of that affidavit were attached to the notice. On January 28, 1924, in open court, Mrs. Wheelock made a motion to vacate and set aside the final decree, and petitioner then objected to respondent court hearing or considering the motion on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to hear or consider it, more than six months then having elapsed after the entry of the final decree. Notwithstanding the objection, the court proceeded with a hearing of the motion, and thereupon petitioner presented to this court his petition in this proceeding, alleging that respondent court, unless restrained from doing so, would enter its order vacating the final decree. The alternative writ issued and the proceeding is now before us upon the question whether the writ shall be made peremptory.

[1] Section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a party may be relieved "from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect; provided, that application therefor be made within a reasonable time, but in no case exceeding six months after such judgment, order, or proceeding was taken." If Mrs. Wheelock's motion to set aside the final decree of divorce be deemed to have been made under this section, it came too late. The mere filing of a motion with the clerk of the court was not the "application" contemplated by the section. No application was actually made until when, on January 28, 1924, one month and two weeks after the six months' period following the entry of the final decree, Mrs. Wheelock made her motion in open court. "As a motion for relief, predicated upon the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the motion having been made more than six months after the date of the judgment, the court should have refused to entertain it. People v. Ah Sam, 41 Cal. 645; Spencer v. Branham, 109 Cal. 337, 41 Pac. 1095; Estate of Eikerenkotter, 126 Cal. 54, 58 Pac. 370. It is not sufficient that notice shall be given within the six months that a motion will be made after the six months. The motion itself must be made, and the action of the court requested on it within the six months." In re Morehouse, 176 Cal. 634, 169 Pac. 365.

[2] If the motion which was finally made to respondent court be regarded as one invoking the inherent power of a court to set aside orders and judgments procured through fraud, irrespective of the provisions of section 473, although we do not decide that it may be so regarded, the law is equally plain that it was unseasonably late. This point is mentioned because of certain language in the opinion of the Supreme Court in Ex-Mission L. & W. Co. v. Flash, 97 Cal. 610, 631, 32 Pac. 600. Waiving the question whether Mrs. Wheelock's motion was of the kind mentioned in that case, and conceding for the sake of argument that it was, the fact that it was not made in time is established by many decisions of the Supreme Court, although the expression in Ex-Mission L. & W. Co. v. Flash impels toward the contrary view. In a comparatively early case such a motion as the one now under consideration was regarded as coming strictly within the terms of section 473, but as the decision had to do with a case of fraud, we deem it not unworthy of note here. The court said:

> "The application must be made within six months, even though the 'mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect' has been caused or brought about by fraud practiced by the party in whose favor the judgment or proceeding was taken. After that period, the question of 'mistake,' etc. (whatever the remedy in equity), cannot be tried by affidavit." Wharton v. Harlan, 68 Cal. 422, 9 Pac. 727.

The language just quoted draws attention to a peculiar condition evident in the present case. The fraud claimed here was not committed by the "party in whose favor the judgment or proceeding was taken," but by the other party against that party. The final decree of divorce was in favor of Mrs. Wheelock. It is she who claims to have been defrauded into moving for the entry of the decree. This circumstance does not affect the principle now involved, except to show that there is not here present any question whatever of a fraud upon the court granting the decree, and it is for that purpose that it is mentioned. It has frequently been, in instances in which a fraud was practiced upon the court itself, that the power has been invoked to set aside judgments or orders, without reference to the provisions of section 473. We return to the decisions. In a case in which a judgment had been set aside on motion made several years after its rendition, and not made pursuant to the terms of section 473, it was said that "what is a reasonable time within which a motion may be made to set aside a judgment, not void upon its face, must depend somewhat upon the circumstances of each particular case, and it is not definitely determined further than that it will not extend beyond the limit fixed by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure" People v. Temple, 103 Cal. 447, 37 Pac. 414. The Supreme Court said in an opinion dealing with a motion not made under section 473:

> "After the expiration of six months from its rendition, a judgment can only be set aside upon motion in cases where it is upon its face absolutely void for want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter or of the person of the defendant." People v. Dodge, 104 Cal. 487, 38 Pac. 203.

"In the case before us," a case of fraud by one of the parties against the other, "the application was undoubtedly made under section 473, but that fact alone should not deprive respondent of his relief outside this section, if the showing entitles him to it. We think, however, the rule is, and should be, that where the judgment does not show on its face that it is void, and the motion is not made under and within the time prescribed by that section, the party should be remitted to his equitable action." Young v. Fink, 119 Cal. 107, 50 Pac. 1060. We refrain from further quotation, but cite several other cases bearing more or less directly upon the point under discussion. Dyerville Mfg. Co. v. Heller, 102 Cal. 615, 36 Pac. 928; May v. Hatcher, 130 Cal. 627, 63 Pac. 33; Canadian & A. M. & T. Co. v. Clarita L. & I. Co., 140 Cal. 672, 74 Pac. 301.

We do not follow respondents in the several specific arguments which are advanced in their brief. The general views which we have expressed afford an answer to every point made.

A peremptory writ of prohibition will issue as prayed for.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 26, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 21, 1924. As Modified on Rehearing June 25, 1924.)

1. Trusts 🔑44(1)—Finding that husband held property conveyed before marriage in trust for wife supported by evidence.

Evidence held to support finding that husband held in trust for his wife property conveyed by her before marriage.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Decision by trial court on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Decision by trial court on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed upon appeal.

3. Trusts 🔑42—Declarations of alleged trustee held admissible.

In action to have trust declared in land, statements of defendant, made subsequent to transfers to him, were admissible, though not having direct reference to language or acts of parties at time transaction was consummated; there being other evidence of existence of a trust.

4. Husband and wife 🔑258—No lien created on account of money expended by husband upon separate property of wife held in trust.

Where husband before marriage obtained possession of wife's property and became trustee of her separate estate, no lien was created on account of money expended by husband on such property of wife; his expenditures at most but creating a demand enforceable against owner.

Appeal from Superior Court of Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Action by Pearl Ellen McRae against Robert H. McRae and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James E. Fenton, of Los Angeles, and S. T. Jeffreys, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. Two suits in equity were filed by the respondent against appellant on the 19th day of July, 1921, one involving certain furniture and other personal property, and the other an interest in a contract for the purchase from defendant Los Angeles Investment Company of lot 208 of St. Vincent College tract, in the city of Los Angeles, which respondent assigned and transferred to appellant on February 25, 1918, each praying that a decree be entered declaring that appellant held said property in trust for the use and benefit of respondent, and that he be required to reconvey the same, with the rents, issues, and profits thereof, to respondent; also for an order restraining any transfer pending final judgment. Said suits were consolidated and tried together, and the court below entered a decree in favor of the plaintiff, from which defendant Robert H. McRae appeals.

The complaints recite that prior to the transfers plaintiff and defendant became engaged to marry, and that their relations were confidential; that the plaintiff was not versed in business matters, whereas the defendant was a shrewd, intelligent, and experienced business man, and that plaintiff at all of said times reposed absolute confidence in the defendant and trusted him implicitly, relying upon the truth and wisdom of all representations made by him in business transactions between them. She alleged that when they became engaged she possessed certain personal property which she had procured from one concern upon a so-called "lease contract," which in fact was a conditional sale, and a piece of real property which she had agreed in writing to purchase from the defendant investment company, and that she had paid installments upon each of these contracts. She further averred that after their engagement defendant persuaded plaintiff to assign and transfer to him all her interests in said contracts and properties, and that she did so assign and transfer them to defendant, but with the express understanding and agreement that defendant would retransfer the same to her at any time thereafter if she should so desire and request. It is alleged that defendant, by his dominating influence over plaintiff, and because of their confidential relations, caused her to make such transfers, though he did so fraudulently and with intent to deprive her of her property, and that on October 13, 1920, he repudiated his agreement to return the same, and denied the existence of the trust, but that at all the times previously to this latter date he had admitted that he held the legal title and possession of said property for her use and benefit, and promised to reassign the same whenever she might desire and so request. The parties were married on April 18, 1918, and plaintiff alleges that on many occasions prior to and after their marriage she demanded of defendant that he return the property to her, but that defendant continuously put her off, and finally refused to do so.

The defendant admitted the transfers to him, but denied that he ever promised to reassign or retransfer the property to plaintiff, and alleges that prior to February 25, 1918, he had advanced various sums of money to plaintiff, aggregating more than the value of plaintiff's interest in said property, and that in consideration thereof the plaintiff caused the officers of the investment company to prepare an assignment of her interest in the real property to defendant, and an acceptance and agreement on his part to pay the balance due said company, which were signed by the respective parties, and that plaintiff personally wrote and signed the transfer of said personal property to defendant "for value received."

Plaintiff alleged that at the time of said marriage she had money which she thereafter expended for the upkeep of the household, and that the defendant collected rents from said property amounting to $1,338.60, out of which he had paid $940 on account of installments due under the terms of the contract of purchase; that she made all the payments due on the personal property, except $110, which the defendant advanced to her and thereafter collected from another party to whom he rented the furniture.

The defendant denied that the plaintiff had money at the time of their marriage, as alleged, or that she paid household expenses. He alleged that he paid all of the installments of purchase price, and that he was the owner of said property, for a full and adequate consideration, but denied that he paid more than a small amount, if anything, out of the rentals. The defendant alleged and testified that he purchased the property from plaintiff at the plaintiff's cash valuation, and that he satisfied the indebtedness against all of the real and personal property in question.

The trial court found from the evidence adduced that at the time of the transfers of said properties the parties were engaged to marry each other, and that their relations were confidential; that at defendant's request, and without consideration, the plaintiff transferred the properties to defendant, as alleged in the complaint, through fraud and selfish design of the defendant, that all payments made on account of purchase price after said marriage and before September 1, 1920, were made from funds of the community, but that such payments did not exceed the amount of rents collected. It was further found that defendant received as rentals for the use of said properties $1,490, and that he advanced to the plaintiff $781.40; that the plaintiff is the owner of said properties, and of the rents collected by defendant, and that the latter holds possession thereof in trust for the use and benefit of the plaintiff. Judgment was rendered accordingly, canceling the assignments and awarding the properties to plaintiff.

This appeal is from the judgments and orders denying motions for new trial in both cases, and as grounds thereof it is maintained that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings and judgment that appellant agreed to hold the property in trust for respondent, that the trial court erred in admitting the testimony of witnesses relative to declarations made by appellant subsequently to the transfers, and, lastly, that the evidence shows that subsequent to the marriage of the parties the realty and furniture became community property.

[1, 2] There is abundance of testimony by the plaintiff, both on direct and cross examination, to the effect that when she became engaged to marry the appellant they conversed about his wide experience in business affairs; that she had been a school teacher and was practically without such experience; that the appellant on many occasions urged that he be permitted to care for her affairs, and that she put the properties in his name for that purpose. She testified that she replied that she preferred to manage her own affairs, but that appellant assured her that it was to her interest to make the transfers, and that so long as they were to be married he could relieve her of the burden and would always have her best interests in view; that he would hold the properties in trust for her, and that at any time she should desire that he return them he would do so; that "he wouldn't think of doing anything against me at all, and he would, any time I wanted the house, return it to me, he certainly would do it, but he felt he could transact the business and take care of my affairs better than he thought I would be able to." She further testified that she trusted him implicitly, and that she finally made the assignments, but that, because of their confidential relations and her belief in his integrity and honest intentions, she did not have any agreement in writing as to the purposes of the transfers. Other witnesses testified that in the autumn of 1919 the appellant stated that he intended to retransfer the properties to respondent, but that he had delayed so doing because he feared that she would leave him as soon as she obtained her property, and that he was "getting old and he was not going to be turned out in the cold and have to start life anew and build up a new home." One witness testified that appellant was told by the witness' husband that the only fair thing to do would be to return the home to Mrs. McRae, to which appellant replied, "I have always intended to give the property back to her, but that is the only way I have of holding her." Appellant testified that he did not make such statements, and denied any conversation or arrangement as described by respondent, which created a conflict of evidence necessitating a decision by the trial court as to the credibility of witnesses, and when this question is so determined it will not be disturbed upon appeal. Rolland v. Porterfield, 183 Cal. 466, 191 Pac. 913; Wall v. Wall, 183 Cal. 431, 191 Pac. 687.

[3] It is next contended that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence the testimony of respondent's witnesses which purported to quote statements made by appellant in 1919. It is insisted that his statements made subsequent to the assignments could not be related unless having direct reference to language or acts of the parties at the time the transaction was consummated. Appellant cites as authority for his position Sherman v. Sandell, 106 Cal. 373, 39 Pac. 797; Tillaux v. Tillaux, 115 Cal. 663, 47 Pac. 691; Smith v. Mason, 122 Cal. 426, 55 Pac. 143; Sheehan v. Sullivan, 126 Cal. 189, 58 Pac. 543, and Cooney v. Glynn, 157 Cal. 583, 108 Pac. 506. Sheehan v. Sullivan is authority for the rule that such statements may be introduced in corroboration of plaintiff's evidence, but it was there held that, since there was no evidence of the existence of a trust, they could not be used for the purpose of establishing one. In Cooney v. Glynn, supra, it was said that the offered statements in that case related to what was said and done at the time of executing the deed, but it is not held that such statements as here presented would be inadmissible. Sherman v. Sandell, supra, and Tillaux v. Tillaux, supra, each decided that the conveyance in question was absolute, without any agreement of trust being made at the time of the execution thereof, and that subsequent oral declarations of the parties could not create a trust where none formerly existed.

Taylor v. Morris, 163 Cal. 717, 722, 127 Pac. 66, 68, is pertinent, and is decisive of the case before us. We quote from the opinion in that case:

> "It is conceded, as it must be, that there is evidence to establish that plaintiff was trustee for her mother of the Villa property, but it is asserted that the deeds by which her mother conveyed title to her were absolute in form, that the stipulation of the parties in this action acknowledges her absolute title and that, therefore, the evidence to establish the trust in contradiction of the deed and of the stipulation was inadmissible. To this proposition the familiar sections of the Code and the familiar decisions under them, forbidding the attempt to vary the language of written contracts by parol are cited. But appellant mistakes the scope of the rule. The statute of frauds is never permitted to become a shield for fraud, and fraud at once arises upon the repudiation by the trustee of any trust, even if that trust rests in parol. When [a trust] rests in parol, either parol evidence must be received to establish the trust, or the faithless trustee will always prevail. Certainly no elaboration of so plain a proposition is necessary, and it should be sufficient to refer to such cases as Butler v. Hyland, 89 Cal. 575, 26 Pac. 1108; Hayne v. Hermann, 97 Cal. 261, 32 Pac. 171; Odell v. Moss, 130 Cal. 352, 62 Pac. 555; Becker v. Schwerdle, 141 Cal. 391, 74 Pac. 1029; Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 104 Pac. 308; Cooney v. Glynn, 157 Cal. 589, 108 Pac. 506; Lauricella v. Lauricella, 161 Cal. 61, 118 Pac. 430. * * * The statements of Mrs. Taylor were not promises. They were admissions and acknowledgments of a trust relationship resting in parol, which trust relationship was created and existed contemporaneously with the acquisition by her of the Villa property and the purchase by her of the Flower street flats. So, while it is true, that a constructive trust cannot be created by a naked promise of the grantee after conveyance made to him, it is equally true that his declarations showing the existence of a trust at the time he accepted the conveyance, afford strong evidence against him in the establishment of the trust. * * * The difficulty with appellant's contention is that the claim against her does not arise under an implied trust but under a positive, voluntary trust resting in parol, and it is of course well settled that the statute of limitations does not run against such a trust until repudiation of it by the trustee, with knowledge of this repudiation brought home to the beneficiaries. Only after this repudiation and knowledge does the four years' statute of limitation apply. Odell v. Moss, 130 Cal. 352, 62 Pac. 555; Norton v. Bassett, 154 Cal. 415, 129 Am. St. Rep. 162, 97 Pac. 894."

Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. 186, is also applicable in that facts quite similar to those related by the plaintiff's witnesses in this case were held to establish a constructive trust.

[4] Having obtained title and possession of respondent's properties acquired by her before marriage, appellant became the trustee of her separate estate. As was said in Carlson v. Carlson, 10 Cal. App. 300, 303, 101 Pac. 923, 925:

> "Labor or expenditures incurred in the improvement of the property have no operation upon the direction of the title. They, at most, but create a demand which, under certain circumstances, may be enforced as a claim against the owner. Noe v. Card, 14 Cal. 606. In the absence of any specific agreement, no lien would be created on account of money expended by a husband upon the separate property of the wife. Peck v. Brummagin, 31 Cal. 450, 89 Am. Dec. 195. The law will not infer from such expenditures alone an agreement either to change the character of the property or an intent to charge the same with a lien. It must rather be presumed that it was the intention of the husband to advance the money paid for the benefit of the wife's estate, and that it was intended to accrue to her interest. Flournoy v. Flournoy, 86 Cal. 294, 21 Am. St. Rep. 39, 24 Pac. 1012. There is no finding of any fact, nor is there anything in the record tending to rebut the presumption, that the payment by the husband was to accrue to plaintiff's interest."

As was said in Lewis v. Johns, 24 Cal. 98, 85 Am. Dec. 49,

> "The husband cannot, by any independent act of his, acquire an interest in the separate estate of the wife. * * * That the husband cannot, by his management, supervision, or labor, acquire any interest in the estate itself, is conceded, and by parity of reason he cannot acquire any interest in the increase, for that is hers also, and upon the same terms—the latter being a corollary of the former proposition. There is no magic in the touch or manipulation of the husband by force of which separate is transformed into common property."

These authorities preclude appellant's claim that subsequent to the marriage the realty and furniture became community property.

Appellant also pleaded the statute of limitations, but this question was covered by the opinion of the Supreme Court in Taylor v. Morris, supra, and requires no further discussion.

The judgments are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GIROTTI. (Cr. 777.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 22, 1924.)

1. Criminal law 🔑396(2), 1169(1)—Introduction of affidavit made in other prosecution held not to render complaint attached thereto admissible in liquor prosecution, and admission was prejudicial.

In a liquor prosecution, where defendant introduced an affidavit made by state's witness for purpose of impeaching his testimony, which affidavit was attached to complaint in another action, admission in evidence of complaint was error, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1854, where affidavit and complaint were not parts of same instrument, and respective statements contained therein were made by different persons, and were not "on the same subject," and the error was prejudicial.

2. Criminal law 🔑763, 764(6)—Instruction that evidence given in support of alibi should be scrutinized differently than that given in support of any other issue error.

In a liquor prosecution, where defendant made out substantial case of alibi, court erred in instructing jury that they were to scrutinize testimony offered in support of alibi with care, since it was for the jury to pass upon weight of testimony given in support thereof under same rules of evidence applicable to other questions of fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

J. P. Girotti was convicted of selling intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Reversed.

Edward Bickmore and Frank C. Hale, both of Merced, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. By separate counts in the information the defendant was charged with two unlawful sales of intoxicating liquor—one alleged to have been made on the 18th and the other on the 22d of October, 1923. He was convicted of both offenses, and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] L. R. King, a private detective employed by the district attorney, testified that he purchased whisky from defendant as charged in both counts; that on the 22d he arrived at defendant's store at Merced Falls about 5 or 5:30 o'clock in the evening, not later than 5:30; that it was "just before sundown." The court takes judicial notice of the fact that the sun set at 5:18 on that day. King testified that on his arrival at defendant's store that evening he saw defendant there and purchased liquor from him as stated. C. A. Carter, a detective employed by the district attorney of Mariposa county, testified that he accompanied King to defendant's place of business on the 22d of October and witnessed the sale of liquor by the defendant to King; that they arrived at defendant's store about 5 o'clock in the evening, possibly as late as 5:30. For the purpose of impeaching the witness King, the defendant introduced an affidavit made by King on the 25th of October, 1923, in which he stated that the aforesaid purchases of intoxicating liquor on the 18th and the 22d of October were made by him from one Joe Artiense. This affidavit was attached to the complaint in an action entitled "United States v. Joe Artiense, Joe Girotti, W. A. Gibbons, John Doe, and Richard Roe," filed in the superior court of Merced county on the 26th of October, 1923. The complaint alleged that the use of the buildings occupied by defendant constituted a nuisance by reason of the storage and sale of intoxicating liquors therein, and prayed for a judgment abating such nuisance. The complaint was signed and verified by the district attorney on the day it was filed. The affidavit is not referred to in the complaint or made a part thereof. On the theory that the complaint and the affidavit attached thereto constituted a single document, and that, because the defendant had introduced a part thereof, the prosecution had the right to introduce the remainder, the court permitted the district attorney, over defendant's objection, to introduce in evidence and read to the jury the whole of the complaint. The complaint alleges, among other things, that "on or about the 26th day of September, 1923, * * * a written notice, signed by the district attorney of Merced county, Cal., of the existence of the nuisance was served upon J.

W. Gibbons; that on or about the 24th day of October, 1923, Joe Girotti was charged in the justice court No. 2 township, Merced county, with the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor in the building and on the property described in this complaint, and, upon being duly arraigned on said charge, said Joe Girotti * * * entered a plea of guilty"; that "said defendants, Joe Artiense, Joe Girotti, W. A. Gibbons, and J. W. Gibbons used, occupied, and conducted said building as and for a place of keeping, storing, selling, bartering, and dispensing intoxicating liquor, in violation of the * * * 'National Prohibition Act.'"

Section 1854 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

> "When part of an act, declaration, conversation, or writing is given in evidence by one party, the whole on the same subject may be inquired into by the other."

The very terms of this section show that the complaint was not admissible in evidence. The affidavit and the complaint were not parts of the same instrument. The respective statements contained therein were made by different persons. They were not "on the same subject"; those of the affidavit relate to sales alleged to have been made on the 18th and the 22d of October, those of the complaint relate to the unlawful possession of liquor and the maintenance of a place where liquors are unlawfully kept and sold. The statements in the complaint are purely hearsay as evidence, however sufficient they may be as a pleading. The admission of the complaint was in violation of the rule that one crime cannot be established by proof of the commission of an independent crime. Its admission was so wide a departure from the rules of evidence and so prejudicial to the rights of the defendant that it cannot be covered by the constitutional mantle of harmless error.

[2] The evidence shows that Merced is 26 miles distant from Merced Falls. Carl Andre testified: That he was a clerk in the employ of the Merced Produce Company, at Merced. That on the 22d of October, 1923, in the afternoon, he sold groceries to defendant of the value of more than $200. That he last saw him on that day between 5 and 5:30 o'clock in the evening. That "I had been putting up his order at all times and this afternoon it was late, as usual, when he gave it to me and our last delivery goes out at 5 o'clock and we were waiting for our truck to pull out of there, so he could back in and load up. I know I walked from the back of the store just as our truck started to pull out, and he was standing out in front, and I told him to come back and get loaded up and he could go on home. * * * He was loading it on a Dort truck." The sales tag made by the witness at the time of the sale, dated October 22, 1923, was admitted in evidence. S. H. Reuter, bookkeeper for Merced Produce Company, testified: "My hours in the afternoons there at the Merced Produce is from 4:30 to 6, and it was after that time he [defendant] was in to see me," October 22, 1923. The defendant testified that he left Merced about 5:30 in the evening, and that it took him an hour and three-quarters to reach Merced Falls. He denied that he made either sale charged in the information. If the testimony of Andre and Reuter is to be believed, then the defendant made out a substantial case of alibi. The court instructed the jury as follows:

> "The effect of an alibi, when established, is like that of any other conclusive fact presented in a case, showing, as it does, that the party asserting it could not have been present at the time of the commission of the crime alleged in the indictment, and therefore did not participate in it, when credited, a defense of the most conclusive and satisfactory character.
> "The fact, however, which experience has shown, that an alibi as a defense is capable of being and has been occasionally successfully fabricated, that even when wholly false its detection may be matter of very great difficulty, and that the temptation to resort to this as a spurious defense may be very great, especially in cases of importance—these are considerations attendant upon this defense which call for some special suggestions upon the part of the court.
> "These are that, while you are not to hesitate at giving this as a defense full weight—that conclusive effect to which, when established, it is justly entitled, either as entirely satisfying you of the innocence of the defendant or as creating the reasonable doubt which entitles the defendant to an acquittal—still, you are to scrutinize the testimony offered in the support of an alibi with care, that you may be satisfied that a fabricated defense is not being imposed upon you."

A similar instruction was considered in People v. Lee Gam, 69 Cal. 552, 554, 11 Pac. 183, 184, where the court said:

> "Taking the charge as a whole, and giving it an unstrained interpretation, it does not appear that the jury were instructed upon the weight of evidence."

In People v. Levine, 85 Cal. 39, 42, 24 Pac. 632, it is said:

> "The defense of alibi is, in our judgment, not one requiring that the evidence given in support of it should be scrutinized otherwise or differently from that given in support of any other issue in a cause."

In People v. Lattimore, 86 Cal. 403, 405, 24 Pac. 1091, 1092, it is said:

> "If trial courts will cease to give this particular form of instruction, the ends of justice will be equally as well subserved, and the administration of the laws less embarrassed."

In People v. Roberts, 122 Cal. 377, 378, 55 Pac. 137, 138, the trial court had instructed the jury that, "when satisfactorily proven," an alibi is a good defense. The Supreme Court said:

> "When a jury is told that any particular fact must be established to their satisfaction, such statement can only mean that such fact must be established at least by a preponderance of evidence; yet there is no such burden cast upon a defendant charged with a crime, except in certain particular instances which are in no sense presented here. * * * It is thus apparent that the alibi, to be efficacious to a defendant, need not be 'satisfactorily proven,' and need not be established to the satisfaction of the jury."

In People v. Smith, 189 Cal. 31, 37, 207 Pac. 518, 521, an instruction substantially identical with that in the instant case was under consideration. The court said:

> "In People v. Roberts, 122 Cal. 377, 65 Pac. 137, a similar instruction was held to be reversible error, upon the grounds that they constitute a charge upon the weight of the evidence, and that they cast the burden of proof upon the defendant."

If the jurors are to "be satisfied that a fabricated defense is not being imposed upon" them, the burden is cast upon the defendant to satisfy them that such defense is not fabricated; that is, that it is true. The instruction not only casts an unwarranted burden upon the defendant, but casts suspicion upon his defense and the evidence produced in support thereof. It is essentially an argument against the defendant, legitimate if made by the district attorney, but an invasion of the province of the jury when made by the court. The giving of the instruction has been condoned in a number of cases where the rights of the defendants did not appear to have been prejudiced thereby. Where a defendant presents substantial proof of an alibi, the jury should be left free to pass upon the weight thereof, under the rules of evidence applicable to other questions of fact; and, if unsubstantial proof is produced, the jury may be trusted to reject it. The instruction should never be given.

The judgment and the order are reversed.

1. Appeal and error 🔑649—Insertion in transcript after filing of notice of appeal, without notice to respondent, held not to invalidate proceedings.

Where appeal was duly taken under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, and transcript filed, after notice, with approval of trial court, etc., insertion therein of notice of appeal inadvertently omitted and its recertification, without notice to respondent, did not invalidate proceedings.

2. Appeal and error 🔑640—Motion to affirm judgment on technical ground, after transcript certified and filed in appellate court, denied.

Motion to affirm judgment, after appeal was taken and transcript had been certified and filed in appellate court, on ground of irregularities in inserting notice of appeal in transcript must be denied.

3. New trial 🔑163(1) — Document held order granting motion for new trial.

Document, properly entitled and signed by trial judge and filed in open court, stating that motion for new trial was granted for insufficiency of evidence, and that "for these reasons I am constrained to grant defendant's motion for a new trial herein, and it is so ordered," held order for new trial, under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, though it was referred to as "opinion" in clerk's minute entry.

ST. SURE, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court amending nunc pro tunc a previous order granting a new trial.

[1, 2] After the transcript certified by the clerk and by the trial judge, had been filed in this court, respondent made herein a motion for affirmance of the judgment upon technical grounds. It appears that appeal was taken in due time (section 953a, Code Civ. Proc.), transcript prepared and filed, and notice given of presentation of transcript to the trial judge, for approval. The trial judge approved the transcript on January 3. Thereafter appellant discovered that through inadvertence notice of appeal had been omitted from the transcript, and without further notice to respondent, appellant inserted in the transcript the notice of appeal, and procured from the trial judge and clerk new certifications, dated January 9. Respondent complains that failure to give due notice of such recertification invalidated the whole procedure. We fail to see wherein any substantial right of respondent was affected. The transcript, recertified, was, with the exception of the inclusion of the notice of appeal, the same. Admittedly, appeal had been properly taken. The omission of the notice of appeal, even though the transcript had been filed, might have been thereafter, in the interests of justice, supplied upon suggestion in this court of diminution of record. Furthermore, the motion to affirm, coming as it does after the transcript had been certified by the trial judge, and filed in this court, must be denied and the appeal considered upon its merits. Revert v. Hesse, 184 Cal. 295, 193 Pac. 943; White v. Hendley, 35 Cal. App. 267, 270, 169 Pac. 710.

As to the merits, the record shows that Judge John Hunt, presiding in department 5 of the superior court, granted a motion for a new trial. The clerk of the court entered a minute order thereof as follows:

> "The motion for a new trial having been heretofore submitted to the court for decision, and the court having fully considered the same, it is ordered that the said motion be, and the same is, hereby granted. 'Opinion filed.'"

While an appeal was pending, respondent herein applied to the superior court for an order amending nunc pro tunc the original order above quoted. The motion was regularly heard and granted by the lower court, and an amendatory order entered as follows:

> "The motion for a new trial having been heretofore submitted to the court for decision, and the court having fully considered the same, it is ordered that the said motion be, and the same is hereby granted upon the grounds of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, and that the verdict is against law."

This entry was based upon an order made by Honorable Franklin A. Griffin, the then presiding judge of department 5, which reads, in part, as follows:

> "It appearing from the records of this court that on the fourth day of November, 1919, Honorable John Hunt, then and there a judge of this court, granted the defendant's motion for a new trial upon the grounds that the verdict is against law, and of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; and it appearing that the clerk of the court omitted to recite in said minute order that the defendant's motion for a new trial was granted upon said grounds, including that of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, it is ordered," etc.

[3] In the original minute order mention is made of an "opinion filed." This "opinion," correctly entitled, is signed by the trial judge. It bears the same date as the entry of the original minute order made by the clerk. It was "filed in open court." Its context shows conclusively that the motion for a new trial was granted upon the grounds of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, and that the verdict was against law.

An examination of this so-called "opinion" convinces us that it rises to the dignity of a written order signed and filed by the trial judge; while it contains language giving the reasons of the trial judge for making the order, with which reasons we are not concerned (Unger v. San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Rys. et al., 61 Cal. App. 125, 214 Pac. 510, 515), it shows indubitably that the motion for a new trial was granted upon the grounds above stated, and concludes with the words "for these reasons I am constrained to grant defendant's motion for a new trial herein, and it is so ordered." Section 657, Code of Civil Procedure, provides when a new trial may be granted, and further provides that "when a new trial is granted upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, the order shall so specify. It is clear that Judge Hunt so specified in the order made by him, and it follows that the contemporaneous minute entry made by the clerk was erroneous.

[4] Courts have inherent power over their records, and may at all times correct mere clerical errors made by the clerk in entering the order in the minutes, so that it may truly state what was the order of the court, by setting forth all its terms. As was said in Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 478, 486, 26 Pac. 1074 (23 Am. St. Rep. 491), the right of a court of general jurisdiction to amend or correct its records so that they shall speak the truth, is too well recognized to need any argument. Such errors or defects may be corrected at any time by the court on its own motion, or on motion of either party. Brush v. Pacific Electric Railway Co., 58 Cal. App. 501, 208 Pac. 997. The order amending nunc pro tunc the previous order granting the motion for a new trial was properly made, and is therefore affirmed.

1. Appeal and error 🔑659(3) — Method of correcting omission in record of statement of reason for granting new trial held proper.

Pending appeal by plaintiff, it was proper for defendant to apply to appellate court on suggestion of diminution of record to have incorporated in transcript an order of superior court amending nunc pro tunc previous order granting new trial, which failed to specify new trial was granted for insufficiency of evidence, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 657.

2. Appeal and error 🔑979(2)—Order granting new trial for insufficiency of evidence not disturbed, except for abuse of discretion.

Order granting new trial for insufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict will not be disturbed on appeal except for abuse of discretion, and such abuse is not shown by fact that there was no conflict of evidence, as probative force thereof was for trial court on hearing on the motion.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by the Gulf Mail Steamship Company against the W. A. Hammond Steamship Company. From an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 227 Pac. 938.

H. W. Glensor and Aitken, Glensor, Clewe & Van Dine, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Nathan H. Frank and Irving H. Frank, both of San Francisco (Keith Ferguson, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

ST. SURE, J. This is an action wherein plaintiff sought to recover damages for an alleged breach of a purported contract for the purchase of a $^{62}/_{64}$ interest in the steamship Centralia. The cause was tried before a jury, which gave plaintiff a verdict for $25,000. The superior court thereafter made its order granting defendant's motion for a new trial.

[1] Pending appeal, defendant made application to this court, upon suggestion of diminution of record, to have incorporated in the transcript an order of the superior court amending nunc pro tunc a previous order granting a new trial. Such procedure is proper. Biaggi v. Ramont et al., 189 Cal. 675, 677, 209 Pac. 892. The original order stated merely that a new trial was granted, without specifying the grounds, as required by section 657, Code of Civil Procedure. Upon motion, the trial court amended the original order to conform to the truth, incorporating therein the statement that the new trial was granted "upon the grounds of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, and that the verdict is against law." We have this day, in Gulf Mail Steamship Co. v. W. A. Hammond Steamship Company, numbered 4891, 227 Pac. 938, affirmed such action of the trial court, and the motion for diminution of the record is therefore granted. We are then to determine this appeal upon the corrected record.

The cause was submitted to the jury upon evidence offered by plaintiff, defendant contenting itself with cross-examination. The record relates that on April 24, 1917, the defendant, by its president, W. A. Hammond, addressed and delivered a letter to one Paul Hartman, which reads:

> "Mr. Paul Hartman, 112 Market Street, San Francisco—Dear Sir: Confirming our verbal understanding, we offer to sell you the steamer Centralia on the following terms:
> "Price: We will deliver to you $^{62}/_{64}$ interest of the steamer on the basis of $85,000 net to us for the entire ship. Payment to be made of $5,000 within one week from date, to bind this contract, and $25,000 additional within 30 days' time. Further payments to be made of $3,000 per month until balance is paid up. The deferred payments to bear interest of 6 per cent. per annum.
> "You to pay for all stores on inventory at time of delivery based on market prices.
> "You also to keep the vessel insured in our favor to cover balance due at all times. You are also to assume the wireless contract and take up unexpired insurance at time of delivery. We will allow inspection of vessel during the next 30 days, dry-docking to be at your expense.
> "In the event this sale is consummated we will make delivery on June 1, 1917, or as soon thereafter as practicable, depending upon her position. We would not, of course, take her off the coast before the date above named, and delay would be due to her absence on lumber business between California and northern ports.
> "This offer is good for reply not later than the first day of May, 1917.
> "Yours truly,
> "W. A. Hammond Company, Inc.,
> "W. A. Hammond."

Thereafter, on May 1, 1917, Paul Hartman, together with H. W. Glensor, plaintiff's attorney and secretary, called at the office of Stanley Pedder, attorney and secretary for defendant company. Glensor said to Pedder: "We have come to buy the ship * * * to close up for the Centralia, under this document" (referring to above quoted letter). Pedder looked at the letter and said: "This was signed W. A. Hammond, Inc., by mistake. * * * The W. A. Hammond Steamship Company is the real owner of the vessel; they are buying her under a contract from the Pollards, under contract of sale, that is, they own an equitable interest in the vessel." Glensor replied: "Yes, I understand," and Pedder then said that the Hammond Steamship Company was buying the vessel under a contract of sale, the same as the Hammond Steamship Company were going to give Glensor's principal. Whereupon Glensor asked Pedder his interpretation of the clause in the letter of April 24, relating to the inspection of the vessel, which was not made clear, but Pedder remarked that he thought that the vessel should be put in a seaworthy condition when delivered, and that he would so advise his principal. Other subjects were discussed relative to the proposed sale, among which was the equipment, and Glensor said: "Well, suppose we do this, suppose we put a clause in the contract when it is drawn up, that the first time the vessel comes into San Francisco * * * Give us permission to go aboard and take an inventory of the deck and engine room supplies and equipment, and, whatever that inventory discloses, so will the ship be turned over to us when you finally deliver under your agreement." To which Pedder replied: "That is all right."

Further conversation followed about the effect of deferred payments, and how they were to be made, which ended by the proposal of Pedder that as it was obvious they could not draw up the contract that day, that they should let the whole matter go over until a time agreed upon, and in the meantime Glensor and he would get together and draw up a contract, and when Hammond came back they would close negotiations and work out all the details, to which Glensor said: "That is all right, except this; this is our last day under the option to pay you the $5,000, and what will we do about it?" Whereupon it was agreed that the money be placed in escrow, to be delivered to the defendant when the written contract was completed, to which proposal Glensor assented. Thereupon the check of Paul Hartman, uncertified and unindorsed, was placed in the bank in accordance with the following agreement indorsed on the reverse side of the letter:

> "It is hereby understood and agreed that the payment of $5,000 mentioned in the within option, to be paid on or before the 1st day of May, 1917, may be deposited in escrow with the Anglo London Paris National Bank, to be paid over to the W. A. Hammond Steamship Company upon completion of a contract between the said Steamship Company and the Gulf Mail Steamship Company, if the contract is not completed by the 4th instant.
> "W. A. Hammond Steamship Company,
> "By Stanley Pedder, Secretary."

The check was deposited with the instruction to the bank that, if a contract to sell and buy the steamship Centralia, executed by defendant as seller, and plaintiff as buyer, should be deposited with it by May 4, 1917, then the check was to be delivered to defendant, but to be returned to plaintiff if not delivered before May 4, 1917. It further appears from the testimony of Hartman that he and Glensor were requesting that the oil contract in the name of Pollard Steamship Company and certain tankage be included in the agreement of sale which was to be drawn up, and that was one of the reasons why the contract could not be signed at the first meeting of May 1, 1917. The meeting of May 1 was adjourned to the next day for the purpose of preparing a draft of the contract, and Pedder said: "We will draw up a form of contract, leaving the points which I do not understand, that is, regarding the oil contract and the equipment and supplies, open for negotiations between the parties when Mr. Hartman returns." To which Glensor replied: "That is reasonable." Pedder then remarked that there were to be no more "comebacks" about the equipment and oil contracts after the parties finally ascertained what equipment would be on the vessel on arrival in port, and the oil contract question was settled, and received the reply from either Glensor or Hartman, "That is understood." On May 2 the parties took up the draft of a contract, Pedder having dictated one, which was discussed with Glensor, and on which Glensor made pencil changes after taking it to his office; the oil contract, equipment, tankage, and insurance premiums were again discussed, and the meeting was finally concluded by the remark of Pedder: "Suppose we leave those clauses and let them settle it between themselves at the time the contract is finally executed, because it is more a matter for the parties to decide on those things than it is for you and I." Glensor replied: "All right, I agree with you Mr. Pedder, there is no use you and I wrangling here over the price and value of the ship's stores and those things, because when Mr. Hammond comes back he can take up with Mr. Hartman direct * * * then we can put the clauses in the contract accordingly." On May 3, Glensor talked with Pedder on the telephone and arranged that the meeting set for May 4 be continued to May 7, and that the option be extended. There is some discrepancy as to the date, but it was May 7 that the meeting was to take place, and May 8 to which the option was extended. On May 7 Glensor called Pedder on the telephone, and was advised that the parties would not negotiate further. Glensor, however, came to Pedder's office in the afternoon, with Hartman and Smith of the Gulf Mail Steamship Company. Glensor opened the conversation with a suggestion regarding the oil contract, and was informed by Mr. Pedder that inasmuch as the proposition for the sale of the vessel had been left open for negotiation to agree on a contract if possible, and as his people were not disposed to agree on the matters under discussion, they would not enter into a contract. Proof as to plaintiff's damages was admitted in evidence.

Upon these facts the case was submitted to the jury, with the result above mentioned. Appellant contends that "nowhere in the case does any question of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the evidence arise"; and that the questions presented for decision are wholly questions of law. Adverting to the declarations made by the trial court in its order granting the motion for a new trial, appellant argues that the trial judge "made the original order because of his views of the law, and not because of his views on the evidence." The high lights of the trial judge's order, indicating his views, are as follows:

> "In this case the jury were, in substance, instructed that, in order to constitute a contract, there must be a 'meeting of the minds,' and that, where a proposal is made, and only a qualified acceptance thereof results, such qualified acceptance is, in law, deemed a new proposal, and could be revoked at any time before its acceptance. These conditions were not, in my opinion, sustained by the evidence introduced on behalf of plaintiff. * * *
> "* * * It appears that it was the undoubted intention of the parties herein to reduce their agreement to writing, and have it mutually signed by both parties thereto, and the jury were charged accordingly. * * *
> "* * * The alleged contract herein violated the provisions of the statute of frauds. * * *
> "* * * The amount of damages awarded in this case, even assuming the plaintiff is entitled to recover, was, in my opinion, grossly excessive. While I do not think that the jury, in arriving at their verdict, were influenced by passion or prejudice, it is clear that their verdict was not sustained by the evidence.
> "For these reasons I am constrained to grant the defendant's motion for a new trial herein, and it is so ordered.
> "It is my practice whenever a new trial is granted by the court in a jury case, upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence, to justify a verdict, to apply to the presiding judge." etc.

In a decision this day rendered in a companion case we have held that a document containing such language, properly entitled and signed, and filed in open court by the trial judge. constituted an order granting a motion for a new trial, upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict. A further consideration of the matter convinces us that this view is correct. Just what questions of fact or of law this record presents we do not propose to discuss, as we are satisfied that there must be a retrial of the case in the superior court.

[2] Nor do we wish to be understood as adopting any of the views expressed by the trial judge in the order granting a new trial, nor as hinting or squinting at an expression of opinion upon any branch of this case, excepting the single point herein decided; and, coming directly to that, it should only be necessary to mention the well-settled and familiar rule which says that insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict is a ground for new trial, appealing peculiarly to the discretion of the trial court, and its order granting same shall not be disturbed upon appeal in the absence of a showing of abuse of discretion. Section 535, 2 Cal. Jur.

Appellant stresses the point that the evidence at the trial was undisputed; that "none of this testimony was contradicted or rebutted; * * * that the defendant introduced no evidence whatever." In answer, we will say that a reading of the record convinces us that the trial court was justified in its action granting a new trial. Paraphrasing language used by Mr. Justice Lennon in a case wherein the facts were somewhat similar (Meinberg v. Jordan, 29 Cal. App. 760, 762, 157 Pac. 1005, 1007), we say further, in reply, conceding, as appellant contends, that there is no conflict in the evidence, nevertheless the probative force and effect of the evidence was ultimately for the determination of the trial court upon the hearing of a motion for a new trial. This rule is also stated in Otten v. Spreckels, 24 Cal. App. 251, 257, 141 Pac. 224, 226, wherein it was said that "the rule (elementary and commonly familiar in our system of jurisprudence) is that the plaintiff in a civil action must establish his cause by a preponderance of proof; but, although many witnesses may testify directly in favor of his position, and no adversary testimony directly adduced, it is still with the jury in the first instance and finally with the court, where a new trial is asked on the ground stated, to say whether such testimony, when subjected to the legal tests whereby the probative value of evidence is to be judged, measures up to the requirement of the law as to the degree of proof essential to the support of an issue of fact."

No abuse of discretion is disclosed by the record and the order granting a new trial is, therefore, affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

NORMART v. SAFER et al. (Civ. 2704.)

1. Partnership 🔑258(2)—Administrator of deceased partner held entitled to defend action in claim and delivery on surviving partner's failure to act.

In claim and delivery by third person for property constituting partnership assets, administrator of deceased partner had right to appear and defend in behalf of decedent's estate, despite Code Civ. Proc. § 1585, where surving partner had taken position that there were no partnership assets, and allowed a default to be taken against him as he thereby waived his right to possession.

2. Principal and agent 🔑103(9)—Contract held not to authorize one to sell crop until owners agreed to sale.

A contract authorizing one joint owner's father-in-law to sell crop for specified sum, with a penalty if owners failed to live up to agreement, held not to authorize him to consummate a sale, unless, after finding person able to purchase for stipulated price, owners ratified or consented to such sale.

3. Joint adventures 🔑4(1)—Party given management held authorized to sell crops.

Where agreement between adjoining owners to pool their lands and crops gave one of them the management and supervision of the enterprise, and required him to account for all moneys expended and "all moneys received," he had an implied right to sell the crops.

4. Replevin 🔑69(1)—Court authorized to take into account all circumstances in determining bona fides of sale, though fraud not pleaded.

In claim and delivery against one joint owner, based on a sale of property by person acting under alleged authority, notwithstanding no issue of fraud was tendered by answer, court was authorized, in determining credibility of witnesses, and weight to be given testimony, and whether sale was bona fide or mere pretext to secure advantage of defendant, to take into account all circumstances characterizing carrying out thereof.

5. Principal and agent 🔑190(3)—Implied finding that sale of property was made to defraud one owner sustained.

Evidence held to sustain trial court's implied finding that a sale of property by father-in-law of one joint owner under alleged authority was fraudulent and carried out by alleged agent, his son-in-law, and the buyer, with intent of wrongfully depriving remaining owner of his just rights in the property.

6. Replevin 🔑70—Plaintiff's action fails, if he does not establish his ownership upon which claim of possession based.

Where plaintiff's claim of right to possession of property was founded solely upon his alleged ownership thereof, upon his failure to establish such ownership his action failed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by P. M. Normart against John Safer and J. D. McNary, administrator of the estate of Norton K. Crosby, deceased, substituted as defendant in place of Norton K. Crosby, deceased. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

N. Lindsay South, of Fresno, and Atran & Sheets, of Colusa, for appellant.

Alva A. King and Thomas Rutledge, both of Colusa, for respondents.

HART, J. This action is in claim and delivery. The complaint, which was filed on the 22d day of September, 1922, alleges that the plaintiff was at all times mentioned therein the owner and entitled to the possession of four tons of Thompson Seedless and Sultana raisins, and three tons of grapes of the same varieties, and also a crop of almonds, all of which were and are of the value of $3,000; that within "one year last past," in the county of Colusa, without the consent of plaintiff, the defendants Crosby and Safer took and detained said personal property from the possession of plaintiff; that plaintiff, prior to the commencement of this action, demanded of defendants possession of said personal property; that the latter have failed and refused and still fail and refuse to do so; and that they "still wrongfully withhold and detain such personal property, to the plaintiff's damage in the sum of $3,000."

The prayer is for the delivery of the possession of said property to plaintiff, or, in case said delivery cannot be had, that he have and recover judgment for the sum of $3,000, the value thereof, etc. The defendant Safer failed to answer the complaint or otherwise make an appearance in the action within the time prescribed by law, and his default in that behalf was duly entered.

By leave of the court first had and obtained the defendant McNary, as administrator of the estate of the defendant Crosby, deceased, the latter having died subsequently to the commencement of this action, to wit, on September 30, 1921, filed an answer to the complaint. After stating that said Crosby died after the commencement of this action, and that later said J. D. McNary was duly appointed administrator of the estate of said deceased, and under an order of the court substituted as party defendant in the place and stead of said deceased, the answer denies positively or on information and belief all the allegations of the complaint, with the exception of that contained in paragraph 2 thereof. Paragraph 2 alleges that the personal property mentioned therein is of the aggregate value of $3,000. The answer states that, on the 23d day of September, 1921, the plaintiff wrongfully and fraudulently took the property described in the complaint from the possession of said Norton K. Crosby under a claim of ownership; that the sheriff of Colusa county, under a provisional process issuing in this action and founded upon an affidavit and undertaking filed herein by the plaintiff and pursuant thereto, did, on the 22d day of September, 1921, take said personal property from the possession of the said defendant, and thereafter delivered all of said property to the plaintiff; that, as administrator of the estate of said Crosby, deceased, the defendant, McNary, is entitled to the return and delivery to him of the possession of the whole of said property. The prayer of the answer is for a judgment that said property be delivered to said McNary, as administrator, etc., or that he as such administrator be awarded judgment for the sum of $3,000, the value thereof, in case such delivery cannot be had.

The findings are in accord with the denials and averments of the answer, it being specifically found, as the complaint alleges and the answer admits, that the property described in the complaint was, at the time of the commencement of this action, of the value of $3,000. The court further found that said Crosby at the time of his death was a resident of Colusa county and died in said county subsequent to the date of the filing of the complaint herein; that said J. D. McNary, at a date subsequent to the death of said Crosby, was, by proceedings duly had in the superior court in and for said county, regularly appointed administrator of the estate of said Crosby, deceased; that he thereafter duly qualified as such administrator; that letters of administration of said estate were by said court duly issued to him; and that said McNary has ever since been such administrator.

The judgment is for the delivery of said property to the defendant McNary, or, if the same cannot be so delivered, for the sum of $3,000, the value thereof.

This appeal is by the plaintiff from said judgment, and is supported by a record made up according to the alternative method.

It appears that on and prior to the 31st day of January, 1921, H. Panosian, Norton K. Crosby (the deceased above referred to), and John Safer were the owners of a 160-acre tract of land which is situated near the town of Arbuckle in Colusa county, in the following proportions in severalty: Panosian 40 acres, Crosby 80 acres and Safer 40 acres; that these several parcels of land, to the extent of 70 acres in the aggregate, were improved and devoted to the growing of raisin grapes and almonds; that, on the 31st day of January, 1921, the three parties named entered into an agreement in writing, which, in substance, provided: That said parties, for the purpose of farming and developing said property and growing thereon grapes and almonds, and "in consideration of the mutual advantage to be derived from the association of said parties for said purpose," agreed to pool their several interests in said land and the crops thereon growing, and manage and work the same jointly and as one enterprise; that, to this end, the said Crosby, who then resided on his parcel of said 160 acres, was to be given and have personal supervision and management of all said property, and devote all the time necessary to the proper management "of said farming enterprise," with full power to purchase whatever equipment, machinery, supplies, etc., he might find essential to the carrying on of the same "in a first-class manner"; that said Crosby was to improve the unimproved 90 acres of the 160-acre tract, "under the same terms and as may hereafter be agreed upon between the parties"; that the expense required to operate or carry on "said enterprise" was to be borne by Crosby in the proportion of one-half thereof and Safer and Panosian each one-fourth thereof, and the profits derived from the enterprise were to go to said parties in the same proportions respectively; that Crosby was to receive, in addition to his one-half of the profits, the sum of $600 as compensation for "his personal management and supervision of said enterprise." It was further provided in said agreement that "this lease," as it is termed in said written agreement, was, by the terms of said agreement, to terminate on January 31, 1922, unless continued in force, and this was to be done, if it was the desire to continue it on the same terms, by an indorsement to that effect on the writing itself and subscribed by the said parties.

Crosby, in pursuance of the terms of said agreement, assumed and took active management of the properties, and continued so to manage them until there arose between the parties the misunderstanding regarding the sale of the raisins and almonds which led to the institution of this action by the plaintiff, and as to which misunderstanding the facts will now be stated.

Panosian was the father-in-law of Safer, and these two resided and remained in Fresno, while Crosby was engaged in managing "the enterprise." Shortly after the said agreement was made Panosian sold or transferred his one-fourth interest in the fruit crops growing upon the land to his son-in-law, Safer.

On the 11th day of August, 1921, the following document was signed by Crosby and Safer, which was received in evidence and marked Exhibit A:

> "We have given authority to A. Panosian to sell the crop of 160-acre ranch known as Stanton's Place, and consisting of 20 acres of vineyard and 40 acres in almonds, for the sum of $500, with privileges of using all trays and boxes on said place in curing the crop, with understanding that all trays and boxes are to be collected and stacked at their places, after curing said crop.
> "If we fail to live up to our agreement, we agree to pay A. Panosian $400."

On the same day (August 11, 1921) Panosian, so the plaintiff and Safer testified, sold the entire crop grown on said lands to the plaintiff for the sum of $500, and Panosian and the plaintiff signed a writing in the city of Fresno, of date August 11, 1921, the same having been prepared by Attorney South of said city and one of the attorneys for the plaintiff herein, purporting to evidence such sale. This writing was received in evidence and designated plaintiff's Exhibit B. Panosian and the plaintiff testified that the latter paid for said crops in two several amounts on two different occasions. A short time thereafter—how long a period thereafter is not made definitely to appear—the plaintiff, accompanied by Safer and a "hired man" went to the land, and the plaintiff exhibited his agreement of sale to Crosby, and informed him that he (plaintiff) had purchased the entire crops of grapes and almonds and the raisins which had already been cured for $500 from Panosian; that he had paid the latter said sum, and demanded possession of said crops and raisins. Crosby declined to deliver possession, declaring that he had already sold the crops and the raisins to a firm known as Guggenheim & Co. After some controversy over the matter, the plaintiff, leaving Safer and his "hired man" in charge of the crops, with instructions to maintain possession thereof for him, returned to Fresno. The facts will be further considered as we proceed with the discussion of the points urged by the plaintiff.

The grounds of the attack upon the judgment are these: (1) That the legal effect of the written agreement by the terms of which Crosby, Panosian, and Safer associated themselves together in the prosecution of the business of growing and selling the fruit products of the land described in said writing was to create the relation of partnership between said parties; that therefore Safer, being the sole surviving partner of Crosby, deceased, is, by virtue of the terms of section 1585 of the Code of Civil Procedure, entitled to the sole and exclusive possession of the personal property in controversy for the purpose of settling the business of the partnership; that, per consequence, defendant McNary, as administrator of the estate of Crosby, deceased, is not entitled to such possession until the business affairs of the partnership have been fully adjusted and settled; (2) that Exhibit B, executed by Crosby and Safer, vested in Panosian the unqualified authority to sell the corps for a definitely stipulated sum, and that the sale of the crops to plaintiff by Panosian under the authority so conferred for the sum specified in the writing was and is binding on Crosby and Safer; (3) that the findings vital to the judgment do not derive sufficient support from the evidence. In other words, the contention as to the last stated point is that the evidence, without conflict, shows that Panosian was authorized to sell the crops, did sell them, and that the interests of Crosby and Safer therein were thereby divested.

1. The point that the effect of the written agreement between Crosby, Panosian, and Safer, whereby they associated themselves together to carry on, as a joint enterprise their several or independently owned interests in the business of growing grapes and almonds on the land described in the complaint, was to establish a partnership relation between them, constitutes the subject of an extended discussion pro and con in the briefs of the respective counsel. While it is doubtful whether the said parties by said agreement intended to establish the partnership relation, still it must be conceded that the agreement bears some of the characteristics of a partnership, and yet, viewed by the light of the evidence in the case, it might well be said to amount to a joint adventure. But, in view of the situation as to the transactions eventuating in this litigation as disclosed by the record, the question whether the agreement involved the creation of a partnership or a joint adventure or a mere association by the parties for the purpose of rendering to each other mutual assistance in the growing, harvesting, and marketing of their respective crops, is of no particular consequence in the decision of this case. We will, however, for the purpose only of considering the point that Safer and not the defendant McNary, as administrator, etc., was entitled to take possession of the property in dispute, assume that the effect of the agreement was to create a partnership between the parties. Section 1585 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads as follows:

> "When a partnership exists between the decedent, at the time of his death, and any other person, surviving partner has the right to continue in possession of the partnershp, and to settle its business, but the interest of the decedent in the partnership must be included in the inventory, and be appraised as other property. The surviving partner must settle the affairs of the partnership without delay, and account with the executor or administrator, and pay over such balances as may from time to time be payable to him, in right of the decedent. Upon the application of the executor or administrator, the court, or a judge thereof, may, whenever it appears necessary, order the surviving partner to render an account, and in case of neglect or refusal may, after notice, compel it by attachment; and the executor or administrator may maintain against him any action which the decedent could have maintained."

this, the executor or administrator may proceed to compel him to do so by the proceeding outlined in said section. In the present case Safer, the alleged surviving partner, not only failed to exercise his right to continue in possession of the partnership, but, in effect, took the position from the time this controversy arose that there were no partnership assets. He failed to perform the duty which the above section required of him, and by his conduct prior to the commencement of this action, and by his testimony in this case clearly indicated that he had no intention of taking charge of the alleged partnership business for the purpose of settling it. While we have found no express provision of law specifically providing that, in case the surviving partner fails to exercise his right to continue in possession of the partnership for the purpose of settling its business, the executor or administrator of the estate of the deceased partner may, as such, take possession of the latter's interest in the partnership, we think it is clear upon principle that it would be his duty to do so under such circumstances. Indeed, if this were not true, the interests of the deceased partner in the partnership might be wasted, or otherwise (perhaps through the fraud of the surviving partner) be lost to the estate. The right of the administrator of the estate of the deceased in this case to appear and defend in behalf of the estate of the deceased in this action seems to be so clear that further discussion of the proposition is unnecessary. The fact is, Safer waived his right to continue in possession of the property as the surviving partner, if in truth he ever had any such possession, and, indeed, allowed a default to be taken against him in this action in favor of the plaintiff herein, which indubitably shows that he did not intend to continue in possession of the partnership, if such it was, but, on the contrary, intended in every way to aid in securing a determination that the personal property involved herein was not at any time after the alleged sale thereof to plaintiff any part of the so-called partnership assets.

[2] 2. The contention that by Exhibit A above quoted herein Safer and Crosby conferred upon Panosian the unqualified authority and right to negotiate the sale of the crops from the lands referred to for the sum of $500 is not sustained by a reasonable construction of the language of the writing itself. It will be observed that the last clause of said writing reads: "If we fail to live up to our agreement, we agree to pay A. Panosian $400." It is clear from this language that Panosian's authority was intended to be limited by the writing to the finding of a purchaser of the property and not to the negotiation of the sale thereof to said purchaser, except upon the consent of Crosby and Safer. In other words, the last paragraph seems to be absolutely clear upon the proposition that Panosian was not authorized to consummate a sale of the property, unless after finding a person willing, ready, and able to purchase the same at the stipulated price, Crosby and Safer prior to the consummation of the sale ratified or consented thereto. The writing might well be said to confer upon Panosian the authority to offer any person desiring to purchase the fruit an option to make such purchase, which option was subject to the right of Crosby and Safer or either of them to accept or reject the proposition to sell. It is also clear that the trial court was justified in finding, as impliedly it did, from said paragraph in Exhibit A and the actions and conduct of the parties as disclosed by the evidence that the sale was not to be consummated by Panosian, unless both Crosby and Safer previously consented thereto.

[3] The above construction, we may assume from the findings, accords with that given it by the trial court. As seen, it was shown that Crosby, upon being told by plaintiff and Safer that Panosian had sold the fruit to the former, declared that he would not confirm or ratify the sale; that Panosian had no authority to make an outright sale of the fruit; that he (Crosby) had sold the fruit to Guggenheim & Co. Testimony to this effect was given by a number of witnesses, including a representative of Guggenheim & Co., all of whom stated that the conversation occurred in their presence between the deceased and Safer and the plaintiff. That Crosby had the right to sell the property is implied from the language of the agreement to the effect that he was, at the end of the term of the agreement, to render a full and correct account "of all moneys expended and of all moneys received as a result of said enterprise."

[4, 5] But, even if it were necessary to concede that the construction thus given the writing is erroneous, still we are satisfied that this court cannot disturb the implied finding that the purported sale of the property to the plaintiff did not involve a bona fide transaction. In other words, we think the implied finding that no actual sale was made by Panosian to the plaintiff is supported by all the circumstances of the case, or, at any rate, the evidence tending to support such finding is such as to preclude this court from declaring that the decision of the court upon that question is erroneous.

The defendant McNary does not specifically allege in his answer that the alleged sale involved a fraudulent transaction or was one which was falsely represented by Panosian, Safer, and the plaintiff to have been consummated for the purpose of defrauding Crosby out of his just rights in the property. In other words, fraud was not set up by the defendant McNary for the purpose of vitiating the effect of said writing, assuming that such effect was to vest in Panosian the right to consummate a sale of the crops for the sum stated therein. This probably was due to the fact that said defendant's counsel construed said writing as we have herein construed it, and so regarded it as not having given authority to Panosian to sell the property except upon the express consent of both Crosby and Safer. However this all may be, the court below, notwithstanding that the issue of fraud as to the alleged sale was not tendered by the answer, was authorized, for the purpose of determining the credibility of the witnesses or the weight to be attached to the testimony of the plaintiff, Safer, and Panosian as to said transaction, and whether the same was bona fide or involved a mere pretext in order to secure advantage of Crosby, to take into account all the circumstances characterizing the carrying out thereof. And it is to be presumed, in support of the judgment, that the court below rejected as untrue or as unworthy of belief the testimony of Panosian, Safer, and the plaintiff appearing to show that the purported sale was in fact a bona fide transaction, or, to state the proposition in a more direct and positive form, that the implication from the decision is that said court concluded and found, from the circumstances disclosed at the trial of the case, that the transaction involving the purported sale was fraudulent and carried out by said parties with the purpose and intent wrongfully of depriving Crosby of his just rights in the property in dispute. The circumstances may briefly be recited: That the plaintiff made the alleged purchase without having any personal knowledge of the condition of the crops; that he paid $500 for property which admittedly was of the value of $3,000; that Panosian and Safer, the former the father-in-law of the latter, and who once owned a one-fourth interest in the crops, but which he transferred to his son-in-law, immediately upon the execution of Exhibit A together proceeded to look for and shortly found in the person of the plaintiff an alleged purchaser of the crops; that immediately upon said alleged purchase being effected the plaintiff appointed and constituted Safer as his agent, with authority to sell the crops for him (plaintiff); that within a few days thereafter Safer sold the crops to Rosenberg & Co., for a sum slightly in excess of $3,000; that, on arriving on the land with plaintiff after the purported sale to the latter, Safer apprised Crosby of the alleged sale, saying to him (as a number of disinterested witnesses who heard the conversation testified) that he (Safer) had sold the grapes, raisins, and nuts to plaintiff for the sum of $500; that, so the plaintiff testified, neither he nor Safer then tendered or offered to pay Crosby any money for his interest in the property, but that Safer, although admitting he had previously received the full amount of the alleged purchase price, offered to give Crosby his (Safer's) note for the former's share of said amount, which Crosby refused to accept. Other circumstances tending to stigmatize the transaction culminating in the alleged sale of the property to plaintiff as spurious or wholly without foundation in fact might be referred to herein but the circumstances already adverted to as characterizing the transaction are such as to compel the conclusion that it would amount to an unauthorized invasion of the province of the trial court, as the arbiter of the questions of fact, for a court of review to declare that the implied finding that no sale of the grapes, etc., to plaintiff was actually made by Panosian or any other person was not warranted. Indeed, upon the presumption, which this court must indulge, that the trial court disbelieved and rejected as unworthy of belief the testimony of Panosian, plaintiff, and Safer to the effect that there was a bona fide sale of the property, no other witnesses having given testimony as to the alleged sale, the record must be viewed by this court as practically containing or disclosing no testimony showing or tending to show a sale of the crops by Panosian to plaintiff. But we may even proceed a step further and say that, upon their face, the circumstances above recited herein strongly tend to show that the whole scheme of Panosian and Safer, with the aid of the plaintiff, was to perpetrate a fraud upon Crosby, and so deprive him of his just proportion of the actual value of the crops.

There is, it is true, evidence tending to the conclusion that Crosby was willing to sell the crops for the sum of $500. The fact that he joined in the execution of the writing authorizing Panosian to find a buyer at the figure named may well be so construed. Again, it was made to appear that about three months prior to the execution of said writing Crosby addressed to Panosian a letter in which he stated that the grapes and nuts were not in a healthy condition or had been damaged by the frost, and, in effect, suggested that they should be sold for whatever they could get for them. It is significant, though, that, when Safer told Crosby that the crops had been sold to the plaintiff, Crosby declared that he would not deliver possession thereof to the plaintiff, unless he was paid the sum of $500 in cash. From this statement it may be inferred that Crosby might have understood the proposition involved in the purported authorization to Panosian to sell the crops to be that he was to receive for his share, if the crops were sold under said authorization, the sum of $500. But, be that as it may, even with all the testimony referred to as indicating Crosby's willingness to sell the crops for the sum of $500, it was still for the court to determine from all the evidence the truth or the real character of the transactions culminating in this controversy, or, as above stated, to determine whether the testimony of Panosian, Safer, and the plaintiff was to be given any credence, and to disbelieve their testimony, as presumptively it did. See Richey v. Butler, 40 Cal. App. 314, 318, 180 Pac. 652.

[6] The purpose of the action of claim and delivery, like the common-law writ of replevin, is to try the right to the possession of personal property or chattels, and therefore, where a party claims the possession of movables, and resorts to the action in claim and delivery to establish his claim, it is incumbent on him to prove that he is entitled to the immediate possession of the chattels or personal property, whatever may be the source of such claimed right. If in this he fails, so must his action fail. In the present case, the plaintiff's claimed right to the possession of the property in controversy is founded solely upon his alleged ownership thereof. He failed, according to the trial court's decision, to establish his ownership of said property, and with such failure necessarily his claim of right to the possession of the property also failed. With the decision of the trial court, for the reasons above explained, we are without just authority to interfere.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MOCK DON YUEN. (Cr. 768.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 4, 1924.)

1. Criminal law ⚷730(13)—Reference on cross-examination to defendant's prior conviction held not prejudicial.

In prosecution for unlawful possession of a preparation of cocaine, prosecuting attorney's inadvertent reference to defendant's prior conviction for same offense was not prejudicial under Pen. Code, § 1025, where court admonished jury to disregard it, and charge of previous conviction had been read to jury and frequently alluded to before defendant admitted same.

2. Poisons ⚷9—Evidence of unlawful possession of cocaine held sufficient.

In prosecution for unlawful possession of preparation of cocaine, evidence held to sustain conviction.

3. Constitutional law ⚷62—Criminal law ⚷1201—Statute providing that second conviction for unlawful possession of narcotics should constitute a felony held not unconstitutional.

St. 1921, p. 978, providing by section 7 that a second conviction for unlawful possession of narcotics shall constitute a felony, is not unconstitutional as a delegation of legislative power to prosecutor to make any given subsequent offense a felony or a misdemeanor by charging or failing to charge the previous conviction.

Mock Don Yuen was convicted of unlawful possession of a preparation of cocaine, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Hugh H. Sydenham and Ralph W. Smith, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. By information filed in the trial court on the 15th day of June, 1923, the defendant was accused of the unlawful possession of a preparation of cocaine on the 7th day of June, 1923. The information further charged that on the 27th day of June, 1923, the defendant was convicted of the crime of the unlawful possession of a preparation of cocaine. The defendant entered a plea of not guilty and denied the prior conviction. During the impanelment of the jury that part of the information which charged the prior conviction was read in the presence of the prospective jurors and frequent reference thereto was made by the district attorney and the court, to all of which counsel for defendant objected. When reference was first made to the prior conviction, during the impanelment of the jury, counsel for defendant said: "We will withdraw our former plea, and we will plead guilty to the former conviction." The court replied: "Then he will have to be rearraigned. He has already been arraigned and entered a plea of not guilty to the former conviction." Throughout the impanelment of the jury counsel for defendant continued to object to any reference to the prior conviction, but made no move to withdraw the denial thereof or to have the defendant admit the same. After the jury was impaneled the clerk proceeded to read the information. It seems then to have been discovered for the first time that the prior conviction was charged in the information to have been had at a time subsequent to the filing thereof. The district attorney thereupon asked leave to amend the information by changing the date of the prior conviction from June 27, 1923, to June 27, 1922. Counsel for defendant said: "I understand that conforms to the files." The information was amended accordingly. Counsel for defendant said: "Now, we will plead guilty, since it has been corrected," evidently meaning that the defendant would admit the prior conviction. The court answered: "The defendant is the only one that can enter the plea of guilty." A little later the court asked counsel if the defendant desired to withdraw his denial of the prior conviction and admit the same. Counsel replied: "We want to stand as not saying one word. We haven't a word to say; we are in the hands of the court." The district attorney then made his opening statement to the jury, in which he stated that the prosecution expected to prove the alleged prior conviction. Council for defendant objected to the statement and assigned it as "prejudicial error." Finally defendant withdrew his denial of the prior conviction and admitted it. Thereafter the district attorney referred to the prior conviction in a question asked the defendant on cross-examination. The court sustained defendant's objection to the question and instructed the jury "to disregard any statement about any prior or previous conviction." The defendant was convicted and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] It is first contended that the foregoing references by the district attorney and the court to the prior conviction constitute prejudicial error. The foregoing statement is a sufficient answer to the contention. Section 1025 of the Penal Code provides that when a defendant is charged "with having suffered a previous conviction," and pleads not guilty, but "answers that he has suffered the previous conviction, the charge of the previous conviction must not be read to the jury, nor alluded to on the trial." Up to the time that defendant admitted the prior conviction it was proper to allude to the charge thereof and to read it to the jury. In view of the fact that the charge of the previous conviction had been read to the jury and frequently alluded to before the defendant admitted the same, the district attorney's later reference thereto in his cross-examination of defendant, which was probably inadvertent, could not have prejudiced the defendant's rights, especially after the court's admonition to the jury to disregard it.

[2] It is urged that "there is no evidence to sustain the charge of possession" of cocaine. The testimony not only shows positively that defendant had cocaine in his possession at the time charged, but that at that time he stated to the arresting officers "that he only had a little bit, but he had it for his own use."

[3] Section 7 of the act under which defendant was prosecuted provides that upon his first conviction of the unlawful possession of forbidden narcotic drugs a defendant shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and that "for the second and each subsequent offense of which said person so convicted shall be found guilty, said person shall be deemed guilty of a felony." Stats. 1921, p. 978. Appellant contends that, since a second or subsequent offense cannot be punished as a felony unless the indictment or information charges a previous conviction, the statute is unconstitutional as a delegation of legislative power to prosecutors to make any given subsequent offense a felony or a misdemeanor by charging or failing to charge the previous conviction. It would be equally as logical to contend that section 666 and 667 of the Penal Code and all other statutes imposing greater penalties for second offenses are unconstitutional attempts to delegate legislative power. The contention is so patently untenable as to merit no further discussion.

The defendant was given a fair trial and no error appears in the record. If his case was prejudiced by reading the charge of his previous conviction to the jury and by references thereto made by the district attorney and the court, the defendant has only himself to blame therefor, as stated.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

FORREST v. BURT. (Civ. 4873.)

1. Master and servant 🔑43—Directed verdict on issue of breach of contract warranted.

In action for breach of oral contract of employment, evidence held to warrant directed verdict for defendant.

2. Chattel mortgages 🔑34—Bill of sale held taken as security for repayment of moneys advanced.

Bill of sale held taken by buyer to secure repayment of moneys advanced to seller, though word "security" was not used, so that buyer was entitled to hold property until settlement of account and repayment of amounts advanced.

3. Chattel mortgages 🔑300—Seller held not entitled to sue at law for breach of contract to reconvey property.

One executing bill of sale to secure repayment of moneys advanced, held entitled to sue in equity for accounting, but not at law for damages for breach of contract to reconvey.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Mortimer Smith, Judge.

Action by George M. Forrest against J. S. Burt. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Franklin P. Bull, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Olin L. Berry, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover a judgment for money. The defendant answered, and a trial was had before the trial court sitting with a jury. The plaintiff pleaded his claim in three counts. In the first count he pleaded that he sold and delivered to the defendant the goods, wares, and merchandise known as "Quality Electric Motor Co.," for the agreed sum of $8,500. In the second count he pleaded the sale of the same property for the reasonable value of $8,500. In the third count he pleaded the facts, and in doing so he charged that on the 6th day of October, 1921, he executed to the defendant a bill of sale of the property, "and defendant was to carry on said business and build up the trade for plaintiff, and allow plaintiff to work in said business, receiving for his wages the sum of twenty dollars ($20) per week until the business warranted plaintiff drawing or receiving more for his services, and to then reconvey to plaintiff said business"; that plaintiff has duly performed, etc.; that defendant has, since the 22d day of June, 1922, refused to allow plaintiff to work in said business, and has refused to reconvey to plaintiff the property; that the reasonable value of the property is $8,500; that the reasonable value of the good will of the business is $2,500; that after being deprived of a place to work, the plaintiff accepted other employment at a lower wage, and has been damaged in the sum of $1,000; that plaintiff has been damaged in the further sum of $12,000, and that plaintiff prays judgment for $12,000.

On the trial of the case the plaintiff abandoned the first count and second count, and after both parties had introduced their evidence, the trial court instructed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant. In ruling, the trial court used this language:

> "I will speak plainly to you; as far as the complaint is concerned, and as far as the testimony of this plaintiff himself is concerned, he testified this property was assigned; he transferred it to the defendant, Burt, as security for what was given him and money advanced to the business, and to be retained by him until such time as that business would be sufficient to pay Burt back, at which time the business was to revert to Forrest. Under that consideration and stipulation he made the bill of sale. As to damage by way of employment, you have failed to prove damage. You have not brought a single witness to show he has been damaged. In fact, he has been benefited to the extent of $25 a week. In my opinion you have sought the wrong remedy. You should have brought an action in accounting. This is an action for breach of contract."

An examination of the record discloses that the trial court did not err in directing the verdict, and that the reasons assigned by the trial court for so directing the verdict were in all respects sound.

On the 6th day of October, 1921, the plaintiff was the undisputed owner of the Quality Electric Motor Company, a business then being conducted at 198 Twelfth street, Oakland. The plaintiff had theretofore received numerous loans from the defendant. The exact amount had never been ascertained and the balance remaining unpaid was, and is, in dispute. However, as we understand the record, the plaintiff concedes that there was $1,500 remaining unpaid, and some more moneys besides. The defendant claims that at said time there was a much larger sum owing and unpaid. Besides these moneys, on October 6, 1921, the plaintiff owed for merchandise, purchased but not paid for, the further sum of $700, which was falling due in installments nearly every day. In addition to these financial obligations there was an outstanding unsettled liability of the plaintiff for the support of a child by a former marriage. The plaintiff testified that he had on said date a balance of 75 cents in the bank and did not possess any other means. On or about the date that the bill of sale was executed the plaintiff and defendant had a talk regarding the execution of the paper. A part of that talk was had in the presence of Mr. Coffman, who afterwards wrote out the paper. As to the exact language used by the parties, the witnesses do not relate the incident in the same language, but the variance is slight. In reply to questions propounded by his own counsel, the plaintiff stated that the conversation between him and the defendant, which led to the making of the bill of sale, commenced with a talk regarding the possibilities of litigation arising against the plaintiff on his liability to support his child. The defendant knew of the circumstances, and after he had put a considerable amount of money in the business, he stated to the plaintiff that Mrs. Chase, the plaintiff's former wife, was liable to come up here and take the business away from the plaintiff. The defendant thereupon suggested that the plaintiff had better make out the bill of sale, and he did so. But in this behalf the plaintiff testified:

> "I did not sell this property to him. It was not transferred to him as security; there was nothing said about security.
> "The Court: Q. It was transferred to keep the authorities away from you on account of your not supporting the child? A. It was done by J. S. Burt's advice.
> "Mr. Bull: Mr. Burt was afraid this property would be attached? A. Yes, and the money he had in there would be lost."

On cross-examination the witness testified:

> "I discussed the question of attachment and possible process against this business in the presence of Mr. Burt and Mr. Coffman. * * * I did not have any fear at all of Mrs. Chase causing any trouble, but Mr. Burt did. At that time Mr. Burt had advanced me $1,500 or more. He was uneasy. To allay his uneasiness, I consented that the bill of sale be made. He told me if I gave him the bill of sale he would build up the business for me and put in any amount that was required to run it. It was not security on my part because I did not fear. When I made this arrangement I knew that Mr. Burt was going to continue to put money into the business. * * * I had known him since 1912, and he had that much faith in my ability to make good. It was done for pure friendship from him to me. It was no partnership of any kind or nature. There was nothing said about loss in the business. As the business grew up he was to take out of the profits the money he had advanced. He was not to draw anything out of the business until he was paid. I was to repay him. * * * In other words, I put in the property I had, my time, and experience as a mechanic against the money he put up. I drew out enough to live on and that is all."

On the other hand, Mr. Burt testified that, fearing attachments, he declined to make further advances unless he obtained security. That the kind of security was discussed and it was debated whether the defendant should take a bill of sale or a chattel mortgage. It was deemed advisable to take a chattel mortgage because a chattel mortgage could be used as security to protect future advances. After the 6th day of October, 1921, the plaintiff commenced to act under the terms of the bill of sale and drew out $20 per week, and continued so to act until the 22d day of June, 1922. During that period of time Mr. Burt made further advances. The exact amount of those advances had not, prior to the trial, been ascertained, and during the trial the respective parties did not purport to settle the account. As we understand the record, it shows that additional advances to the amount of $15,000 or $16,000 were made. In the latter part of June, 1922, the plaintiff and defendant commenced to discuss the advisability of taking a different location for the business. The location selected was a building on the opposite side of the street. The moving of the plant had commenced. Before the moving was completed, the plaintiff left. The circumstances of his leaving and for the period of time, etc., were testified to by him as follows:

"I left when the majority of stuff was moved. I left when there was nothing there but the office and the heavy machinery to be moved. About a month and a half before that I told Mr. Burt I was going to take my wife out to the Yosemite and her mother was going along, and some of our friends were going along, and we would be right back. I did not tell Mr. Burt and Mr. Hutchinson that I was going away for two weeks. I went away Friday night and was back Monday. Mr. Burt came to my house. After I came back I went to the shop about three days afterwards. I don't remember who I saw. After I came back Mr. Burt came down to my house. He asked me—he thought I made a big mistake—first he told me he had a good man in my place and he needed my services no longer. He didn't tell me who the man was. I went either that night or the next night. I went there to see him about the things I had there in that office. That is the time he demanded of me $22,000. I was not away two weeks. The reason I went away was that I had had the flu, and previous to that I had been working so hard and late at night that my health was not any too good, and my wife's health was not any too good either. So I decided to take her up to the Yosemite for a little rest. I thought the trip away from the shop would do me good."

Aside from the foregoing there is no other testimony by the plaintiff concerning discharge or prevention. An employee in the shop, Mr. Hutchinson, testified that, on the date that the plaintiff left, the plaintiff stated to him "that conditions were not such that he was looking for, and he said he was going to leave. I asked him how he thought Mr. Burt would take it and he said he did not care."

[1] We do not find any testimony in the record that the appellant was, by the terms of the oral agreement, to be kept in employment during any particular length of time. The testimony which we have quoted above shows that the appellant quit the employment of his own volition, and that he was not discharged; that after he quit, another man was put in his place, and when the appellant learned of that fact he made no objection whatsoever, but went to the office to get his things. Furthermore, the entire record shows that the quitting or discharging did not create a damage. As the trial court remarked in granting the directed verdict, the appellant gave up $20 a week to accept employment at a wage varying from $48 to $50 a week. He was benefited rather than injured. However, in passing, it should be observed that, as we view the record, $20 was not by the parties to be considered as a wage. It was by them deemed to be an advance by the trustee to the trustor. True, the appellant was to devote his time to managing the shop. All his time and energy was to be devoted to the building up of the business. In that manner the time would be shortened within which the business would be turned back to him, discharged of its debts. To make that time as short as possible, the parties agreed upon the sum of $20 per week as an advance, well knowing at the time that the value of the appellant's services to the business might readily exceed $50 a week. But in connection with the employment theory, the appellant introduced no evidence showing the reasonable value of his wages in the shop, and, therefore, neither the trial court nor this court can ascertain whether he was damaged or not damaged.

[2, 3] As to the main branch of the case, it is patent that the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant was that the bill of sale was, in legal effect, taken as security to secure the repayment of moneys advanced. The fact that the word security was not used by the parties, as the appellant claims, is not determinative of that fact. Having received the plaintiff's property, to secure the repayment to him of advances made to the plaintiff, the defendant was entitled to hold the said property until his account had been settled, and the amount of the advances ascertained and repaid to him. As stated above, an accounting has never been had. While the plaintiff is entitled to maintain an action in equity for an accounting, he is not entitled to maintain an action at law. 2 Perry on Trusts, § 843; 39 Cyc. 469.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

Habeas corpus ⟹102—Writ discharged and petitioner remanded, where evidence was sufficient to justify commitment.

Where evidence as to whether one accused of selling securities without procuring license, in violation of Codes & Gen. Laws 1917–21, Act 1700, § 5, prior to St. 1923, p. 90, § 2, requiring agents of brokers to procure licenses (Codes & Gen. Laws 1917–21, p. 1448, § 2, subd. 8), acted as broker's agent, was sufficient, though unsatisfactory and confusing, to justify commitment, writ of habeas corpus will be discharged and accused remanded.

Application by Harry P. Cox for writ of habeas corpus directed to the Sheriff of Alameda County. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Arnold C. Lackenbach, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Ezra W. Decoto, Dist. Atty., Earle Warren, Asst. Dist. Atty., and Carlisle C. Crosby, Deputy Dist. Atty., all of Oakland, and Clifford J. MacMillan, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Petition for writ of habeas corpus.

The application recites that petitioner is imprisoned and restrained of his liberty by the sheriff of Alameda county, and that such restraint and imprisonment are illegal, the alleged illegality consisting in this, to wit, that on the 6th day of March petitioner was charged by a complaint filed in the police court of Alameda county with having unlawfully and feloniously engaged in the business of selling, offering for sale, and negotiating for the sale of stocks issued by others without first having obtained from the commissioner of corporations of the state of California a broker's license, in violation of the Corporate Securities Act; that said petitioner was preliminarily examined in the police court upon said charge and was held to answer to the superior court in Alameda county.

It is claimed that the evidence adduced at the preliminary hearing fails to show that petitioner was guilty of the charge or any other public offense.

Under certain provisions of the Corporate Securities Act which were designed to prevent fraud in the sale of securities, a broker is required to procure a license in order to conduct his business, and his failure so to do is made a felony. Codes and General Laws 1917–21, p. 1450. The information filed by the district attorney is based upon a violation of this provision, and it charges that the petitioner on the 16th day of November, 1922, willfully and feloniously acted as a broker and agent in the negotiation and sale of an irrigation district bond and also certain shares of the common capital stock in the California Ink Company without first having obtained a permit from the commissioner of corporations. Petitioner had prior to the commission of the alleged offense been a duly licensed broker, but his license had been revoked for having transacted business in the name of a company with which he had severed his connection. Cox v. Daugherty (Cal. App.) 222 Pac. 178. No claim is made that persons dealing with petitioner were in any manner defrauded by his acts, the charge being merely that he sold the securities mentioned without having first procured a license. Petitioner admits having made the sales, but claims he did so as the agent of a broker, and that this being so, he in no manner violated the provisions of the act in question.

The Corporate Securities Act, with reference to agents, reads as follows:

> "The word 'agent' as used in this act means and includes every person or company employed or appointed by * * * a broker who shall, within this state, either as an employee or otherwise, for a compensation, sell, offer for sale, negotiate for the sale of, or take subscriptions for any security of any company of its own issue offered for sale by it."

Section 2, subd. 8, Gen. Laws, p. 1448.

It seems to be conceded that at the time the alleged offense was committed and at all times prior to April, 1923 (St. 1923, p. 90, § 2), when this act was changed so as to require agents to procure a license, an employee or agent of a broker was not required to procure one in order to sell securities.

The sole question here presented is whether or not there is any evidence tending to show that Cox did act as an agent for one T. R. Jump, a broker, when he sold the bond and stock in question. The evidence at the preliminary examination in the police court shows that petitioner had conducted several distinct transactions in the sale of securities. We have read the evidence, and while it is not of a satisfactory character, we cannot say that it is insufficient to convict, or that the petitioner has been committed upon a criminal charge without reasonable or probable cause. There was some evidence as to whether petitioner acted as an agent of Jump in his transactions, and while this evidence is somewhat confusing we are of the opinion that on the whole it is sufficient to justify the action of the committing magistrate in holding the petitioner to answer the charge against him. In re James, 47 Cal. App. 207, 190 Pac. 466.

This being so, the writ is discharged and the petitioner remanded.

ALAMEDA COUNTY WATER DIST. et al. v. SPRING VALLEY WATER CO. et al.
(Civ. 4670.)

1. Arbitration and award ⚷21—Dismissal of suit according to arbitration agreement held proper.

In suit for an injunction, where an agreement between the parties in nature of a common-law submission to arbitration provided for dismissal in case a settlement was reached by the arbitrators, the court lost control over the case and had no authority to enter judgment on the arbitrators' reaching an agreement, and dismissal of the suit was proper.

2. Appeal and error ⚷866(1)—On dismissal of suit following award of arbitrators, appellate court has no power to modify award on appeal.

Where a common-law submission to arbitration provided for dismissal of suit on making of an award, the court lost jurisdiction, except to order a dismissal of suit when award was made, and the appellate court had no power on appeal from judgment of dismissal to modify the award, since it formed no part of the judgment rendered.

3. Arbitration and award ⚷76—Award may be corrected in equity.

If arbitrators, whose award was to be final, in violation of an arbitration agreement, encroached upon the rights of parties to a suit, the aggrieved parties have a remedy in equity to correct the award.

4. Arbitration and award ⚷18—Agreement by parties to arbitrate not to be treated as a stipulation to dismiss.

Where parties to a suit entered an agreement for a common-law submission to arbitration, and withdrew the suit from the jurisdiction of the court, which had only authority to order a dismissal on the arbitrators' reaching an award, the agreement could not be treated as a stipulation to dismiss, which, under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 2, would require the signature of the parties' attorneys.

5. Arbitration and award ⚷82(5) — Award held to determine rights of individual owners who had sued by representative.

In a suit by a water district against a corporation to enjoin interference with a stream of water, brought by the district on behalf of all individual landowners as their representative, and acquiesced in by them for several years, an award of arbitrators, pursuant to agreement of the water district and defendant, determined the rights of the individual landowners.

Suit by the Alameda County Water District and others against the Spring Valley Water Company and others. From an order and judgment dismissing the suit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Clark, Nichols & Eltse, of Berkeley, for appellants.

McCutchen, Olney, Mannon & Greene, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. By this action plaintiffs sought to enjoin the defendant, Spring Valley Water Company, from obstructing, extracting, arresting, or diverting any of the waters of Alameda creek, which flow on the surface of the bed of said creek or which flow or percolate underneath the surface thereof. Subsequent to the filing of the complaint, and before issue was joined, an arbitration agreement was entered into between the plaintiff Alameda county water district and the defendant Spring Valley Water Company, which provided for a settlement of the controversy between the parties by the members of the state water commission and upon settlement thereof that the action be dismissed. An award of settlement was made by the arbitrators, and thereafter, on motion of said defendant Spring Valley Water Company, said action was by the trial court dismissed. Its judgment of dismissal was entered accordingly, from which order and judgment of dismissal all of the plaintiffs have appealed.

Plaintiff Alameda county water district is a public water district organized under the act of the Legislature approved June 10, 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 1049), said district comprising approximately 44,000 acres in Alameda county, situate in the region surrounding Niles, where Alameda creek has its origin, and westerly and southerly thereof to San Francisco bay, a portion of which is usually designated as the "Niles Cone." The remaining plaintiffs are landowners within the district.

It appears from the allegations of the complaint that beneath the surface of the lands in question there are various strata of gravel through which the waters flowing in Alameda creek percolate and supply the territory with water through this underground drainage, and that in years of drought practically all of the waters of Alameda creek seep into this underlying gravel strata. It is further alleged in the complaint that the defendant water company, at the time the action was brought, was constructing a storage reservoir on Calaveras creek, a tributary of Alameda creek, by means of which it planned to increase the diversion from Alameda creek which it had previously been making. The action sought to enjoin the construction of said Calaveras dam and any increase of the diversion from Alameda creek or its tributaries, for the reason, as said complaint alleges, that said dam and an increased diversion would tend to decrease the supply of water to the various lands underlaid by the gravel strata to which reference has heretofore been made, and that the flood waters of the creek which do not percolate into the gravel deposit upon the lowlands situated within the district large quantities of silt, and that said silt reclaims the lowlands, rendering them capable of cultivation and useful for agricultural purposes; and that the diversion of the flood waters will irreparably damage the lands affected by the overflow.

Before the cause was brought to an issue the Alameda county water district and the Spring Valley Water Company entered into said agreement wherein, after reciting the objects to be attained, it was stated that said parties were unable to decide upon the terms of settlement of the controversy by reason of the lack of physical data necessary for a fair consideration of the question and had therefore agreed that for a period of three years, the state water commission should gather the necessary data and upon the completion of that time, or sooner in case it should obtain sufficient data, said water commission should proceed, in conference with the parties, to fix and determine the terms and conditions in accordance with the character of the particular season upon which such storage and additional diversion might be made, the object being to reach a settlement whereby in the most economical and practical manner it should be made possible without further litigation to conserve and put to beneficial use the waters of Alameda creek and its tributaries which were not being used, and at the same time prevent any damage being done to the lands underlaid by the water-bearing strata, supplied in whole or in part from Alameda creek, or if was not possible to prevent such damage entirely to compensate the owners of said land to the extent to which such damage was not prevented; the making of such compensation by the water company, if it be provided for by such settlement, to be a condition of the exercise by said water company of any rights or privileges accorded to it by such settlement. Said agreement further provided:

> "The settlement so fixed and determined by the state water commission shall be final and conclusive upon the parties hereto, but the water company shall not be deemed to waive any existing rights which it may have acquired against particular landowners or particular lands within the water district (the water district, however, not conceding that any such rights or claims are binding upon it), and the settlement awarded by the state water commission shall be subject to such particular rights so far as such rights may exist."

The agreement then provided the manner of releasing the water to flow down Alameda creek for the purpose of ascertaining the water levels of the lands in question. It was also agreed that no further proceedings be taken until the said water commission should make findings and award or until before expiration of the three-year period the commission should report that it was unable to make such settlement, and in case such settlement be had such action should thereupon be dismissed; also that if there be a failure to obtain such settlement the right to proceed with such action should revive to the plaintiff therein and the intervening lapse of time "shall not affect any right, cause of action or defense which any party thereto may have, or which any party on whose behalf such action is brought may have."

Pursuant to the terms of said agreement the members of said state water commission undertook the work of assembling the physical data necessary to a determination of the matter in controversy and placed their engineer in charge of said work. This work was commenced in 1916 and the three-year period included the years, 1916–1917, 1917–1918, and 1918–1919, a report being made after each season to the interested parties, the final report being made under date of June 3, 1920. After the submission of the final report the parties were asked to comment upon said report and to submit their suggestions as to a proper solution of the problem. Several conferences followed between the parties and their attorneys at which discussion was had of said report and also of the written suggestions and comments submitted by the respective parties. The last conference was held on October 21, 1920, and the last written comments and suggestions were submitted on November 19, 1920.

On December 28, 1920, the said arbitrators rendered an elaborate report of its investigations in which it adopted the findings of its engineer under whose direction the data necessary for such final determination was assembled. Said arbitrators, among other things, found that there were 36,800 acres of land within said water district affected by said percolating waters and that said water company had acquired by conveyances certain water rights in and to 6,080 acres of land in said district riparian to said Alameda creek. After determining the amount of water which was held to be the quantity of flow of said creek which percolated into the gravel strata underlying the lands in said district, said arbitrators deducted from said quantity 16½ per cent. determining that the amount so reduced was the amount which should be allowed to go down the creek and flow into the gravel strata underlying all of the lands in said district, including the lands owned by persons, the predecessors in interest of whom had made said grants of said riparian rights in favor of the Spring Valley Water Company. Thereafter, to wit, on October 20, 1921, said water company gave notice of motion to dismiss said action on the ground that the arbitrators had made their findings and award in accordance with said agreement. Said motion came on for hearing on November 4, 1921. Said plaintiffs objected to the entire proceeding upon several grounds and in support of said objections filed and submitted two affidavits, the substance of which was to the effect that said water district had not waived its right to attack, object to or defend against said award; that said arbitrators had not complied with the terms of and had in fact exceeded their powers under said arbitration agreement by attempting to deduct said 16½ per cent. of water from the total quantity of water they otherwise would have permitted to flow down said Alameda creek through said district; that the determination of what was in fact done under said alleged settlement by arbitration would require the introduction of much evidence and that said matter could not be fairly determined until an answer was filed and a trial of the action had. Said motion was submitted, and on the 14th day of December, 1921, was by the court granted and judgment of dismissal accordingly entered on December 16, 1921, from which said order and judgment of dismissal this appeal has been taken.

[1] Appellants make five points on appeal, the first being that the trial court did not lose jurisdiction by reason of the mere submission of said cause to arbitration, particularly where it expressly stated in said arbitration contract that the arbitration called for shall be made before a dismissal occurs. In this respect appellants contend that if the award was made by said arbitrators jurisdiction was still retained by the court to require defendant to plead to the complaint, and that therefore the right was reserved in appellants to attack said award and to offer evidence for that purpose.

In answer to this contention the respondent states that it makes no claim that the action was discontinued or made subject to dismissal by the mere fact of the submission to arbitration, but that it does claim that when the award was made the action was then subject to dismissal both because the controversy had been concluded by the award and there was nothing left to be determined by the action and because the parties had agreed in such case that it should be dismissed. In support of this position the respondent has cited the case of Draghicevich v. Vulicevich, 76 Cal. 378, 18 Pac. 406, the ruling in which they claim is decisive of the question here involved.

In view of the context of the arbitration agreement we are satisfied that the respondent's position is sound and that the procedure adopted by the trial court in the dismissal of the action was correct. In Draghicevich v. Vulicevich, supra, the matters in dispute were before trial submitted to arbitration by the parties and an award made. Later, but still before trial, a stipulation was filed setting forth the fact of the arbitration and award. Nevertheless, the court proceeded to try the case and gave judgment. On appeal the judgment was reversed and the court below was directed to dismiss the action, the Supreme Court saying that—

> "The submission of the cause to arbitrators operated as a discontinuance of the action, and that after such discontinuance the proceedings of the court were without jurisdiction."

In the instant case the parties agreed by their arbitration agreement that no further proceedings should be taken in the action, except that defendant should file its answer, until a settlement was made by the arbitrators and that upon such settlement being made it should become "final and conclusive upon the parties," and that, "in case such settlement be had, such action shall thereupon be dismissed." The alternative was also provided for in said arbitration agreement in that it stated that—

> "In case there be a failure to obtain such settlement then the right to proceed with such action shall revive to plaintiffs therein."

A settlement by said arbitrators was made, and such settlement concluded the action and rendered unnecessary any trial or the determination of any issues of fact. The right of the defendant to have the action dismissed therefore became absolute under the law as well as under the terms of said arbitration agreement.

It is evident from the terms of said agreement that there was no intention of the parties to bring themselves within an arbitration provided for by the Code. Sections 1283 et seq. Code Civ. Proc. In fact no such contention is made by appellants. Their agreement was in the nature of a common-law submission to arbitration, a voluntary withdrawal of the case from the jurisdiction, by which the court lost all control over the case and had no authority to enter judgment, providing the settlement was reached by said arbitrators, which, as we have already seen, was accomplished. Heslep v. City of San Francisco, 4 Cal. 1; Gunter v. Sanchez, 1 Cal. 45; McNulty v. Solley, 95 N. Y. 242; Bowen v. Lazalere, 44 Mo. 383; Buel v. Dewey, 22 How. Prac. [N. Y.] 342.

The cases cited by appellants do not in our opinion lay down any different rule. In the case of Laflin v. Chicago, etc., R. Co. (C. C.) 34 Fed. 859, the court distinguished between an actual submission and an executory arbitration agreement and held that there was no discontinuance where no arbitrators are chosen and nothing is done by the parties under the agreement. That is not the case here. The submission was had and an award made, and the agreement to dismiss was an additional reason for granting the motion. 18 Corp. Jur. 1179; Toupin v. Gargnier, 12 Ill. 79. The case of Callanan v. Port Huron, etc., R. Co., 61 Mich. 15, 27 N. W. 718, contemplates a stay not followed by proceedings or an award, the court saying that "it may easily happen that the time for bringing a new suit has passed, and action by the referees may be prevented by failure or refusal of either party to proceed before them," and that "there are strong reasons of justice against regarding a reference, not followed by an award, as in any case going further than becoming the basis of an application to stay proceedings, rather than operating as an absolute stay." This again is not the case here. There was an award and a conformity with the agreement and following the rule laid down in Draghicevich v. Vulicevich, supra, the case was dismissed. We therefore see no error in the court's ruling.

[2] The second and third points made by appellants relate to that part of the award which provides that said Spring Valley Water Company, on account of its ownership of said riparian rights in the lands within the district, may reduce the quantity of the flow of water down said Alameda creek to the extent of 16½ per cent. In this respect it is contended that the award was not what the parties contracted for; that it shows upon its face that said arbitrators exceeded their authority to the prejudice of the landowners of the district and of the district itself, for the reason that the terms of said arbitration agreement expressly negatived the power of the arbitrators to determine any issues between the Spring Valley Water Company and the owners of the land along the creek resulting from prior deeds and agreements and that therefore it was error for the court to dispose of the case by motion, particularly in view of the objections of plaintiffs, who denied that the award conformed to the contract of arbitration and who reserved the right, as they claim, to attack the award on every legal ground. While the respondent does not concede that the award of the arbitrators which provides for a reduction of the flow of the quantity of said water down said creek was in excess of the authority of the said arbitrators, it does contend that in the event this court should conclude that such action of the arbitrators in making such reduction complained of was erroneous and open to review by the courts, the award as a whole is not involved and should be allowed to stand, amended only by the elimination of the objectionable provisions, and in this regard respondent in its brief says:

> "This deduction, as we have said, is not of importance either to the landowners of the district or to the water company. This appears plainly from the fact that in order to bring the matter to an end we have repeatedly offered in vain, and have offered in this brief, to consent to an amendment of the award by the elimination of the deduction, provided only that the water district would then acquiesce in the award."

And in respondent's reply brief it also states:

> "We would also call attention to the fact that respondent has repeatedly offered to waive the 16½ per cent. deduction but without avail."

In view of the fact, as above pointed out, that this was a common-law submission to arbitration and that upon the making of the award the court lost jurisdiction to hear and determine the merits of the controversy or of the award, except to order a dismissal of the action, and the trial court having followed that course, the only judgment rendered by it was one of dismissal. The merits of the award were not considered, and the award itself was neither adopted nor rejected. That being so, it follows that this court would not have power on appeal to order a modification of the award, for the simple reason that the award forms no part of the judgment rendered in the action. We are therefore of the opinion that respondent's suggestion of the modified award cannot be adopted.

[3] If, however, as appellants contend, said arbitrators in violation of the terms of said arbitration agreement "stepped outside of any authorization conferred upon them and undertook to defeat the rights of the landowners within the district by cutting down the natural supply of water to said lands when they were supposed to substitute a quantity equivalent to such natural supply," they are given ample remedy in equity to correct said award so as to eliminate the objectionable portions thereof concerning the reduction by said arbitrators of the flow of said water and which, as before stated, respondent is willing should be done. Utah Const. Co. v. Western Pacific R. R. Co., 174

Cal. 156, 160, 162 Pac. 631. In the case of Muldrow v. Norris, 2 Cal. 74, 56 Am. Dec. 313, it is stated that a court of equity may interfere to correct accident or mistake appearing on the face of the record and that it makes no difference whether the mistake is one of fact or law. The court pursued the subject further upon a rehearing in which the court said that—

> "It is proper for courts to distinguish between those portions [of the award] which are good and those which are not, where the award is not attacked on the ground of fraud, and the subject-matter is in its nature divisible."

It is plain, we think, that, if appellants desired to correct the alleged error of law on the face of the award, resort might be had to a court of equity. Respondent, as above stated, is willing to stipulate that the objectionable parts of the award be eliminated providing the remaining portions of the award, which is the product of three years' labor, may not be disturbed.

[4] There is no merit in the fourth point made by appellants to the effect that if the agreement be treated as a stipulation to dismiss it is ineffective for the reason that it was signed by the parties and not by the attorneys for the parties. Subdivision 2, § 581, Code Civ. Proc. It is obvious that said document was not a stipulation to dismiss made under the Code sections cited, but was an agreement to arbitrate, and the dismissal consequently followed as a natural result of the court's loss of jurisdiction upon the settlement being made by the arbitrators.

[5] Appellants' final contention is that the individual plaintiffs are not shown to have used the district as the trustee of an express trust and the award could not, as to them, determine their rights, they not having signed the agreement. It is apparent, we think, that the individual plaintiffs were not only parties to the arbitration agreement in a moral sense, but likewise in a legal one. The action was one avowedly brought, according to the allegations of the complaint, on behalf of all landowners, by the district as the representative of said landowners. While the water district was the party to the arbitration agreement in settlement of the action, the individual plaintiffs, represented by the same counsel, acquiesced in this for several years. The motion to dismiss was made on the ground that plaintiff Alameda county water district, for and on behalf of itself and its coplaintiffs, agreed in writing with the defendant that the controversy should be submitted for investigation and settlement and that upon the terms of such settlement being prescribed said action should be dismissed; that the terms of the settlement were prescribed and laid down, but that the plaintiffs nevertheless neglected and refused to dismiss said action. No denial was made as to the allegation that by the agreement the individual plaintiffs were not represented by the water district and the court after submission of the cause granted said motion. We think that the facts justified the court's action. Other details appear which might operate as an estoppel to the individual owners, but a discussion of them would, we think, serve no useful purpose.

PEOPLE v. REVLEY et al.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 2, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 31, 1924.)

1. False pretenses 🔑23—Unnecessary to show accused was present when money was obtained by false pretenses.

Under Pen. Code, § 971, abrogating the distinction between accessory before the fact and principal, in a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, the fact that defendant was not present at the time the money was procured did not exonerate him from liability, it being unnecessary to show that he participated at the exact moment of the offense.

2. False pretenses 🔑49(1) — Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of accomplice in obtaining money by false pretenses.

In prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of an accomplice.

3. False pretenses 🔑49(1)—Proof of all false representations alleged not necessary.

Conviction for obtaining money by false pretenses does not depend upon every fact alleged in information, but it is sufficient if one material false representation by defendant is shown which was relied upon by his victim and induced him to part with his money.

4. False pretenses 🔑38—Variance as to kind of stock immaterial.

In prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, where the information alleged defendants agreed to give the defrauded person stock for money and shares in H. No. 3 oil well, and that the person gave them money, a variance between the information and proof that the certificate of stock in question was H. No. 4, in view of the fact that the information contained no allegation of accomplishment of fraud as to the certificate of stock, was immaterial.

5. False pretenses 🔑52—Instruction on issue of conspiracy not error.

In a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, an instruction that conspiracy of codefendants may be proved by direct or circumstantial evidence or by both, held not erroneous.

6. Criminal law 🔑369(12)—Evidence tending to prove offense charged admissible, though proving conspiracy.

Although, under Pen. Code, § 182, conspiracy to commit a crime is a criminal offense, in prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses, evidence tending to prove the offense was not inadmissible because it also tended to prove a conspiracy.

7. Criminal law 🔑369(2)—Evidence pertinent to proof of offense charged admissible, although showing another offense not related thereto.

Although, under Pen. Code, § 182, conspiracy to commit a crime is a criminal offense, if evidence be pertinent to the proof of an offense charged, it is admissible, although showing an offense not related to that charged.

8. Criminal law 🔑1166½(12)—Statement as to coming together of defendants held not reversible error.

In prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, a statement of the judge that witnesses testified that both defendants came together subsequently, covered by an immediate statement by a deputy district attorney in charge of the prosecution that there was no testimony that defendants came together subsequently in the house of the defrauded person, followed by a statement of the judge that it did not have to be in her house, if error, was immaterial, and not sufficient to warrant a reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

D. Gordon Revley and another were convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court. All concur, except Houser, Justice pro tem., not participating.

Buel R. Wood, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment of conviction of the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The information, in effect, charged that the defendants, with intent then and there to cheat and defraud one Olive A. Stowell, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously pretend and represent to the said Olive A. Stowell that the defendants were the authorized agents of and for the J. E. Barrett Company of San Francisco, and that the defendants were purchasing oil stock for and on account, and as agents, of the said J. E. Barrett Company, which said company was represented as being an established and responsible brokerage house, and that the said company, through the defendants, was acquiring a corner and controlling interest in certain oil stocks owned by the said Olive A. Stowell, to wit, certain shares in the Hamilton No. 3 oil well of the Hamilton Oil Syndicate; that the defendants did then and there pretend and represent to the said Olive A. Stowell that if she would give to defendants 12 shares of such capital stock owned by her, and the further sum of $350, the defendants would, through and on account of the said J. E. Barrett Company, give to the said Olive A. Stowell certain shares of stock of the Southern California Edison Company of the par value of $3,000; that the said Olive A. Stowell then and there believed the said false and fraudulent pretensions and representations, and relied thereon and was deceived thereby, and was then and there and thereby induced, by reason of the said false and fraudulent pretenses and representations, to pay over and deliver to the said defendants the sum of $350; and that each of the said representations was, and all of them were, false and untrue.

The record herein discloses that, for the purpose of defrauding complaining witness and others, defendant Mitchell assumed the fictitious name of A. L. Atkins, and that defendant Revley assumed the fictitious name of L. D. Bradley; that they obtained certain business cards and buy orders from an imaginary brokerage house in San Francisco, designated as J. E. Barrett Company, together with a letter purporting to have been written by said company and which letter authorized Atkins to act as agent and representative of said Barrett Company; that defendant Revley stated to defendant Mitchell that a Mr. Barrett was in the market for Hamilton No. 4 stock, and requested Mitchell to call upon complaining witness and others who held stock in the company referred to, and ascertain if they desired to dispose of their stock; that defendant Mitchell, using the name of Atkins, and at the request of defendant Revley, called on complaining witness and stated to her that he represented J. E. Barrett Company of San Francisco; that he was buying stock for that company, and asked complaining witness if she owned any stock in Hamilton No. 3, and what she had paid for it; to which complaining witness replied that she had paid $200 per share for her stock; that defendant Mitchell then stated to complaining witness that his company would pay her $200 a share for the stock, to which she answered that she would not sell until she had conferred with the company. Defendant Mitchell later informed defendant Revley that complaining witness would sell her Hamilton oil stock. Later, defendant Revley called at the house of complaining witness and stated to her that Mr. Atkins (Mitchell) was unable to keep his appointment with her on account of illness, and that he (Revley) had come to see if she would sell her stock. At this time a daughter of complaining witness was informed by defendant Revley that complaining witness had "$2,400 worth of worthless stock," and that he was empowered, as agent of the Barrett Company, to offer her par for it; that the reason they could pay par for the stock was that two wealthy Germans in San Francisco, who owned stock in the Hamilton Company, had decided that they wanted to get their money out and were willing to pay par value for the stock, even though they could buy it cheaper; that the Barrett Company did not pay money for stock like this, but turned over bonds or other stock in exchange; that he had offered complaining witness three Edison Company bonds, worth $1,000 each, for her stock in the Hamilton Company, and she was to pay the difference in cash; that the bonds would be delivered about a week later. Defendant Revley then took complaining witness to the bank and she gave him $350, for which Revley gave her a receipt. When they returned from the bank a Mrs. Arfuedson was at the home of complaining witness. Mrs. Arfuedson told complaining witness that defendants wished to buy her stock and had come to see if she was going to sell it; that defendants were expected to come to her home for the purpose of making the trade. Subsequently, both defendants called at Mrs. Arfuedson's home and were shortly thereafter placed under arrest. Complaining witness testified that she relied upon the representations of defendants as to the Southern California Edison Company stock, and that the fact that defendants had stated to her that they represented the Barrett Company of San Francisco induced her to enter into the transaction. After defendants were arrested, they voluntarily admitted that they were not from San Francisco; that no such concern as the J. E. Barrett Company existed; that the Mr. Barrett whom they represented was a man whose acquaintance they had made at the Alexandria Hotel, and that he had sent them out to buy this stock. They also admitted that they had used fictitious names because they knew it was a "phoney" deal and for that reason did not want their true names to be used. Defendants also stated that the $350 obtained from complaining witness had been used for their own personal benefit. After the arrest of defendants, a letter was taken from the person of defendant Mitchell, which purported to be on the letter head of "J. E. Barrett Company, San Francisco," addressed "To Whom It may Concern," and introducing A. L. Atkins (Mitchell) as a special representative of the J. E. Barrett Company and authorizing Atkins to deal generally for said company in the purchase and exchange of "notes, securities, etc." For the purpose of identifying Atkins, his signature appeared on the margin of the letter. There were also taken from each of the defendants blank copies of "buy orders," also purporting to be on the stationery of "J. E. Barrett Company, San Francisco," as follows:

> "Buy for me * * * the above-named securities on my behalf. Delivery guaranteed in * * * days. [Signed] ——."

[1] Appellants' first contention is that defendant Mitchell neither aided nor abetted defendant Revley in procuring the $350 from Mrs. Stowell; nor was he present at the time it was procured—from which it is argued that the conviction of defendant Mitchell was unlawful. The evidence, however, as heretofore outlined, warrants the conclusion that, at least as between the two defendants, a general plan of action had been agreed upon by which, through fraudulent means, they would obtain money from many different persons including Mrs. Stowell. The mere fact that defendant Mitchell was not present at the time Mrs. Stowell gave the $350 to defendant Revley does not necessarily exonerate defendant Mitchell from criminal liability. It was unnecessary to show his personal participation in the offense at the exact moment of its commission. Section 971 of the Penal Code covers just such a state of facts as is here presented, in that it provides that "the distinction between an accessory before the fact and a principal, and between principals in the first and second degree, in cases of felony, is abrogated; and all persons concerned in the commission of a felony, whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, or aid and abet in its commission, though not present, shall hereafter be prosecuted, tried, and punished as principals, and no other facts need be alleged in any indictment or information against such an accessory than are required in an indictment or information against his principal." And to the same effect, see the following cases: People v. Nolan, 144 Cal. 75, 77 Pac. 774; People v. Lewis, 9 Cal. App. 279, 98 Pac. 1078; People v. Billings, 34 Cal. App. 549, 168 Pac. 396; People v. Ah Gee, 37 Cal. App. 1, 174 Pac. 371; People v. Sartori, 43 Cal. App. 304, 184 Pac. 879; also section 31, Penal Code.

[2] Naturally, it would be impossible to reproduce word for word the agreement or understanding which existed between the two defendants, respecting the proposed commission of the crime. Such agreements are usually made in secret conference, with no intention of broadcasting even the ultimate conclusion. The existence of such understandings must be shown by circumstances, and by acts, conduct, and such admissions of the parties as may be obtainable. In the instant case, if sufficient facts were adduced from which the inference of defendant Mitchell's guilt as an aider or abettor, with criminal intent, is either irresistible, or which convinced the jury of his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, the demands of the law were met and he cannot complain of the verdict against him on that account. The evidence showed that defendants met and made certain arrangements previous to calling upon the complaining witness; that they assumed fictitious names for the purpose of negotiating the transaction; that the J. E. Barrett Company which defendants claimed to represent was known to them to be wholly fictitious; that defendants had upon their persons at the time of their arrest certain paraphernalia consisting of cards, buy orders, and a spurious letter purporting to authorize defendant Mitchell, under the name of A. L. Atkins, to represent the said J. E. Barrett Company, and to accept on behalf of that company bonds or other securities; that defendants obtained from Mrs. Stowell $350; that defendants were together at the home of Mrs. Arfuedson for the purpose of making a similar deal with her; that after the arrest of defendants they admitted the nonexistence of the J. E. Barrett Company; that their names were not what they had pretended them to be, but were respectively Mitchell and Revley; and that they knew the transaction with Mrs. Stowell was not as represented to her by them. Assuming that the jury believed the evidence, it is inconceivable that a different result than conviction of the defendants could have been reached.

[3, 4] The next point for reversal relied upon by appellants is that a fatal variance exists between the allegations contained in the information and the proof in that in the information defendants are charged with attempting to obtain Mrs. Stowell's holdings in Hamilton No. 3, while the evidence shows that it was a certificate of stock in Hamilton No. 4 which was the object of the felonious attempt. One of the objections, however, to appellants' argument in that regard is that defendants are not charged with an attempt to commit a criminal offense, but rather that they did in fact commit one, consisting not in the larceny of either a certificate of stock in Hamilton No. 4 or a certificate of stock in Hamilton No. 3, but in the sum of $350 lawful money of the United States. The plan to get possession of the certificate, while possibly part and parcel of the main scheme, was but incidental to the much more important feature to defendants of acquiring possession of the money. The success of establishing the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses does not depend upon the proof of every fact alleged in the information, but it is sufficient if one material false representation by the defendant is shown to have been made, which was relied upon by the victim and induced him to part with his property. People v. Ward, 5 Cal. App. 36, 89 Pac. 874; People v. Meadows, 22 Cal. App. 311, 134 Pac. 337; People v. Griesheimer, 176 Cal. 44, 167 Pac. 521.

The question relating to whether the certificate of stock owned by Mrs. Stowell was Hamilton No. 4 or was Hamilton No. 3 had nothing to do with any alleged misrepresentations made by the defendants to Mrs. Stowell. It is apparent that it would have been impracticable, if not impossible, to have misled Mrs. Stowell as to whether she owned shares of stock in Hamilton No. 4 or in Hamilton No. 3. That matter concerned the description of part of the property which it was alleged that defendants were attempting to feloniously obtain from Mrs. Stowell; and in view of the fact that the information contains no allegation of the accomplishment of the fraud as to the certificate of stock, whether of Hamilton No. 4 or Hamilton No. 3, or of any other certificate of stock, the variance, if it may be so designated, is not of great importance. Whether or not the proposition advanced by defendants, or by either of them, to Mrs. Stowell was that she trade her certificate of stock in Hamilton No. 4 or her certificate of stock in Hamilton No. 3 for Southern California Edison Company stock or bonds, and pay to defendants a certain sum of money representing the difference in the assumed respective values of the two commodities, was not the gist of the offense charged. The real point was whether, by means of certain alleged misrepresentations made by defendants to Mrs. Stowell, she was induced to and did part with the sum of $350; and the evidence strongly supports the conclusion reached by the jury that such was the case. The fact that a mistake was made in the information in the description of a part of the property of the complaining witness which defendants schemed to procure, cannot avail them in their efforts to escape criminal liability for obtaining, by false pretenses, another part of the property which was properly described. Had the subject-matter of the transaction related to live stock and money, instead of stock of a corporation and money, and had the information contained the allegation that defendants attempted to feloniously obtain three sheep and $100 from the victim, but succeeded in getting only the $100, and had the evidence on the trial shown that it was not three sheep, but that it was three goats and $100 which defendants were seeking to thus acquire, but that the $100 was all that was actually obtained by defendants—it would approach a straining at a shadow to hold that the variance was of such great consequence that defendants' rights were materially injured or prejudiced thereby.

The protection which the law affords to those accused of the commission of criminal offenses is not intended to be enlarged by the invocation of mere legal technicalities which do not sound in the violation of some substantial right; and we are unable to perceive that there was any infringement upon any of the rights of either of the defendants, by virtue of the matter of which complaint is made.

[5] It is next contended that the trial court erred in giving to the jury the following instruction:

> "It is not necessary, in order to prove a conspiracy, to show a meeting and actual agreement of the conspirators to commit a crime. The fact that a conspiracy was formed may be inferred from all circumstances tending to show the common intent.
> "The existence of such a conspiracy may be proved in the same way as any other fact may be proved, either by direct testimony of the fact or by circumstantial evidence, or by both direct and circumstantial evidence."

As heretofore pointed out, the evidence justifies the assumption by the court, for the purpose of instructing the jury, of the possibility that the defendants were operating under a common design of accomplishing a purpose of a criminal nature. There were many other instructions given to the jury bearing upon the subject of conspiracy, and while, perhaps, the subject is not completely covered thereby, certainly the essentials thereof applicable to the evidence were fairly presented. The instruction of which appellants complain is but a small portion of the entire body of instructions which deal with the subject of conspiracy. It merely directs attention in a general way to what may be considered by the jury in determining whether or not a conspiracy existed. No authorities are presented which suggest the impropriety of the criticized instruction. On the other hand, there are many authorities which in principle uphold it, among which may be cited People v. Donnolly, 143 Cal. 398, 77 Pac. 177; People v. Eldridge, 147 Cal. 782, 82 Pac. 442; People v. Lawrence, 143 Cal. 148, 76 Pac. 893, 68 L. R. A. 193.

[6] But it is urged that the instruction is erroneous in that, under the terms of section 182 of the Penal Code, a conspiracy to commit a crime is made a criminal offense; and from which it is argued that the fact that such conspiracy existed could be shown only in an action brought under that section; and specifically, that evidence of its existence could not be introduced in an action against a defendant charged with the offense of obtaining money by false pretenses, for the reason that evidence as to the existence of a conspiracy necessarily involves facts showing the commission of a crime, different from that with which defendant was charged in the information, and upon which he was being tried. The authorities are not harmonious as to whether or not, in circumstances such as are here presented, a merger is effected as to the offense of conspiracy to commit a crime, and the completed act contemplated by the conspiracy; nor is it deemed necessary to a decision of the point involved that consideration be given to the question of possible merger of the two offenses.

[7] Even where no relationship exists as between two offenses, if the offered evidence be pertinent to the proof of the offense charged, it is admissible. People v. Sanders, 114 Cal. 230, 46 Pac. 153; People v. Argentos, 156 Cal. 725, 106 Pac. 65; People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 341, 83 Pac. 43; People v. Ebanks, 117 Cal. 663, 49 Pac. 1049, 40 L. R. A. 269; People v. Walters, 98 Cal. 141, 32 Pac. 864; People v. McPherson, 6 Cal. App. 270, 91 Pac. 1098; People v. Rowland, 12 Cal. App. 19, 106 Pac. 428; People v. Tomalty, 14 Cal. App. 234, 111 Pac. 513; People v. Kizer, 22 Cal. App. 15, 183 Pac. 516, 521, 134 Pac. 346; People v. Klopfer (Cal. App.) 214 Pac. 878.

Viewed in the light that there was no merger of the two offenses, while the evidence may have tended to prove the crime of conspiracy, it also tended to prove that the defendants were guilty of the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses; and in such circumstances, as is said in the case of People v. Sanders, 114 Cal. 230, 46 Pac. 157, "the law will not thwart justice by excluding that evidence, simply because it involves the commission of another crime." If it may be considered that the consummation of the act which the conspiracy was initiated to perform constituted a merger of the crime of conspiracy with the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses, so that the defendants, if guilty of the commission of any offense were guilty of but the offense included within the completed act, and consequently that no prosecution could be predicated upon the crime of conspiracy, it would necessarily follow that no error was committed in the reception of evidence relating to the alleged conspiracy, nor in the giving of instructions to the jury relating thereto.

[8] Appellants also specify prejudicial error in that at the trial, in a discussion among the judge and counsel for the respective parties, the judge said: "I cannot agree with you. The complaining witness testified that they both (defendants) came on the same errand, and both came together subsequently." It is claimed that anything occurring after the completed misrepresentation was no part of the "corpus delicti," nor any "part of the res gestæ of the pretense here complained of." A review of the testimony immediately preceding the making of the remark to which objection is made shows that it related to admissions and confessions of guilt made by both the defendants. The relevancy of the remark to the testimony of the witness is not readily apparent, but may be considered as a response to a part of the arguments of counsel for defendants in urging his objection to the admissibility of the evidence. That part of the remark of the court which referred to the fact that defendants "came together subsequently," was covered by the immediate statement made by the deputy district attorney who was in charge of the prosecution, wherein he said, "there is no testimony they came together subsequently in her house," which was at once followed by the judge stating, "it don't have to be in her house." Considering the entire matter, we think the error (even assuming it to be such) is of no great importance, and certainly not grave enough to warrant a reversal of the case on that account.

No prejudicial error appearing in the record, it is ordered that the judgment and the order denying the motion for new trial be and the same are affirmed.

STANDARD LIVESTOCK CO. v. BANK OF CALIFORNIA, NATIONAL ASS'N.

1. Banks and banking 🔑259—National bank cannot lease land.

Although a national bank has right to take conveyance of land to secure a pre-existing debt, land so obtained may not be retained as an investment, and a lease of land by bank is wholly invalid, under Rev. St. U. S. §§ 5133, 5137 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 9658, 9674).

2. Banks and banking 🔑258—National banks can exercise only powers expressly granted and incidental powers.

National banks can rightfully exercise only powers expressly granted by Rev. St. U. S. § 5133 et seq. (U. S. Comp. St. § 9658 et seq.), or such incidental powers as are necessary to carry on national bank business.

3. Banks and banking 🔑261(3)—Ultra vires contract cannot be enforced against national bank.

Ultra vires contract cannot be enforced against a national bank, such as warranty of quiet enjoyment in lease of land held as security by bank.

4. Mortgages 🔑497(1)—Effect of judgment of foreclosure of mortgage on lessee.

Where mortgagees commenced foreclosure proceedings and made owner and lessee parties defendant, and owner filed answer and cross-complaint against lessee, and lessee appeared and answered and pleaded lease but did not set any value thereon nor make any attempt to have court ascertain damages for being disturbed in quiet enjoyment of premises, a subsequent action by lessee to recover damages for disturbance of quiet enjoyment was barred, lessee having right to litigate in foreclosure proceedings its claim against surplus fund, and it was immaterial that in a subsequent action special damages are prayed for.

5. Action 🔑57(1)—One may not voluntarily split action.

One may not voluntarily split his cause of action or so divide it as to make it subject to two or more actions, and this is true though claimant is involuntarily summoned into court and commanded to set forth his claim.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

6. Frauds, statute of 🔑116(5)—Assistant cashier must have written authority to bind bank by signing lease.

Assistant cashier of a bank had no authority to bind bank by making lease in his own name as lessor in absence of written authority, and bank cannot be held as undisclosed principal in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1967, 1971, 1973.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by the Standard Livestock Company against the Bank of California, National Association. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed in District Court of Appeals and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Thomas, Thomas & McCowen, of Ukiah, and Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco (W. P. Thomas and Hale McCowen, both of Ukiah, and Frank D. Madison and Marshall P. Madison, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Preston & Duncan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. For some years prior to August 9, 1917, L. B. McMurtry owned the Ridgewood ranch, located between Willitts and Ukiah, in Mendocino county. Prior to that date the owner had become financially involved. He owed the First Federal Trust Company, on notes past due secured by mortgage on the ranch, over $85,600. At the same time he owed the Bank of California $52,500 on unsecured notes. Other creditors existed and were pressing their claims. On the date last mentioned McMurtry executed to William R. Pentz a grant, bargain, and sale deed conveying to Pentz the entire title. At the same time Pentz executed a defeasance reciting that the deed was made as security for McMurtry's indebtedness to the bank and agreeing that the property should be reconveyed upon the payment of the indebtedness. Pentz was one of the assistant cashiers of the bank, and, it may be added, he was the brother-in-law of McMurtry. McMurtry received the defeasance but did not record it. The deed to Pentz was duly recorded. After these things had occurred, B. P. Noonan and McMurtry discussed the making of a lease under the terms of which the entire ranch would be leased to Noonan, except that McMurtry would reserve hunting and fishing privileges, the right to remove tanbark, and also 30 acres on which stood the farmhouse occupied by McMurtry and his family. Before the lease was ready to be signed, Noonan was informed of the deed to Pentz and was told by McMurtry that the lease could be drawn in Pentz's name and that Pentz would execute it. Accordingly the lease was so drawn. It was dated November 1, 1917, and by its terms it purported to lease the lands from December 1, 1917, to June 1, 1923. The rent provided therein was $5,000 per annum payable in semiannual installments. Plaintiff paid the first two installments to Pentz and both were immediately turned over to McMurtry. Plaintiff never paid any other installment of rent. No paper purporting to be an authority of agency to Pentz to execute a lease was executed by any person, natural or artificial. The lease as drawn up was presented to Pentz by McMurtry and was signed at his request. At the same time Pentz signed a consent to the assignment of the lease by Noonan to the plaintiff. On June 29, 1918, Noonan loaned McMurtry $10,000 and McMurtry agreed that said amount might be credited as rent on the lease. A paper to that effect was drawn up to be signed by Pentz, but Pentz refused to sign it. Nevertheless, the money was loaned to McMurtry. Respondent was in possession at all times after December 1, 1917. In November, 1918, McMurtry having failed to pay either principal or interest upon the notes held by the First Federal Trust Company of San Francisco, an action in foreclosure was commenced by that company and the action resulted in a judgment in favor of the mortgagee. In that action the plaintiff made McMurtry, his wife, Pentz, Noonan, Standard Livestock Company, and others defendants. Pentz and the Bank of California appeared and answered and filed a cross-complaint. Noonan and the Standard Livestock Company appeared and filed an answer, and also an answer to the cross-complaint. After the court had entered its judgment a sale was had. After the sale and after certain objections had been heard and disposed of by the Supreme Court (Sullivan v. Superior Court, 185 Cal. 133, 195 Pac. 1061), a writ of assistance issued and the Standard Livestock Company was, by the sheriff, physically put off the premises. Claiming that the Bank of California was the undisclosed principal of Pentz, and that the plaintiff had been evicted in violation of its covenant of quiet enjoyment, and that by reason of said eviction the plaintiff had been damaged, the plaintiff commenced this suit to recover damages against the Bank of California. A trial was had in the lower court before the court sitting with a jury; the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff; judgment was entered accordingly; and from that judgment the defendant has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. In view of the conclusions which we have reached, we do not find it necessary to discuss every point made by the appellant. The verdict of the jury implies that the jury found that the lease was executed by the defendant. That implied finding has no competent evidence in the record to support it.

As stated above, the record contained no evidence of a written authorization from any person, natural or artificial, authorizing Pentz to act as his agent and execute the lease. On its face the lease purports to be the lease of Pentz as lessor; however, it is the claim of the respondent that Pentz acted as the agent of an undisclosed principal, the Bank of California. Counsel do not cite authorities, and we know of none, that Pentz, by virtue of his office as assistant cashier, had authority to bind his principal, the appellant, by making a lease of the appellant's lands in his own name or in appellant's name. 14a C. J. 440. It will be conceded that in many cases a person is entitled to prove that another is an undisclosed principal. However, in every case that proof cannot be made in exactly the same way. In some cases there is "indispensable" evidence which it is necessary to produce in order to prove the fact.

"The law makes certain evidence necessary to the validity of particular acts, or the proof of particular facts." Section 1967, Code Civ. Proc.

"No estate or interest in real property, other than for leases for a term not exceeding one year, * * * can be created * * * otherwise than by operation of law, or a conveyance or other instrument in writing, subscribed by the party creating * * * the same, or by his lawful agent thereunto authorized by writing." Code Civ. Proc. § 1971.

"In the following cases the agreement is invalid, unless the same or some note or memorandum thereof be in writing, and subscribed by the party charged, or by his agent. Evidence, therefore, of the agreement, cannot be received without the writing or secondary evidence of its contents: * * * (5) An agreement for the leasing for a longer period than one year * * *; and such agreement, if made by an agent of the party sought to be charged, is invalid, unless the authority of the agent is in writing, subscribed by the party sought to be charged." Code Civ. Proc. § 1973.

The foregoing rules were of particular importance in the instant case. If it had not been that the law prescribed the particular kind of proof necessary to show the agency, if any, of Pentz, there was testimony offered which could have been used to support the contention of the plaintiff, and there was testimony offered which could have been used to support the contention that Pentz was acting as the agent of McMurtry. But none of that evidence was in writing signed by the party to be charged, and therefore it did not meet the calls of the statute. The statute of frauds above quoted was enacted for the purpose of removing from contest in the courts those very questions.

[1] Still claiming that the lease was not its contract, the appellant claims that as it is a national bank it had no power under the provisions of the National Bank Act and the decisions of the federal courts, to make, and that it did not make or execute, the lease; and in this connection the appellant claims that the rules defining and limiting its powers are to be found in the federal statutes as construed by the federal courts. To this point the respondent replies that even a national bank may accept a conveyance of land to secure an existing indebtedness. To that reply the appellant answers that, admitting for the sake of argument that Pentz, acting for the bank, received the deed as a mortgage to secure the bank for the moneys already loaned, that then and in that event the lease was invalid whichever way one looks at it. If the conveyance is treated as a mortgage, manifestly a mortgagee, not in possession, may not execute a lease. And, although the appellant had a right to take a conveyance to secure a pre-existing debt, nevertheless lands so obtained may not be retained as an investment because the National Bank Act provides:

> "But no such association shall hold the possession of any real estate under mortgage, or the title and possession of any real estate purchased to secure any debts due to it, for a longer period than five years." Rev. Stats., § 5137 (Comp. St. § 9674).

Notwithstanding the above provision, the deed from McMurtry to Pentz was dated August 9, 1917, and the lease was dated November 1, 1917, and by its terms it did not expire until June 1, 1923—nearly a year after the time would have expired during which the bank was legally entitled to hold the title. If the bank could so transcend the provisions of the statute for the period of ten months, it could do the same thing for ten years, or any other period of time. In reply to this proposition it may be said that, conceding the lease was not valid for the full period of time for which it was written, that it would be a valid lease to August 9, 1922. But such a contention is not sound. Such a lease is not merely voidable, but is wholly void and of no legal effect. Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace Car Co., 139 U. S. 24, 59, 60, 11 Sup. Ct. 478, 35 L. Ed. 55. Being void, it is clear that the lease could not be valid for any length of time whatsoever.

[2] Moreover, conceding that the bank would have the right to take title to the land for the purpose of protecting itself against loss, nevertheless, in so taking and holding the title, the bank was not entitled to enter into any speculative contract. These contentions are supported by the provisions of the Revised Statutes and by the decisions hereinafter referred to. The Revised Statutes, § 5133 et seq. (U. S. Comp. St. § 9658 et seq.), constitute the measure of the authority of national banks, and such banks cannot rightfully exercise any powers except those expressly granted, or such incidental powers as are necessary to carry on the national bank business. Logan County Bank v. Townsend, 139 U. S. 67, 73, 11 Sup. Ct. 496, 35 L. Ed. 107; California Bank v. Kennedy, 167 U. S. 362, 366, 17 Sup. Ct. 831, 42 L. Ed. 198. It is not even contended that the Revised Statutes contain a clause authorizing a national bank to purchase land to secure itself from loss or otherwise, and thereafter execute a lease to the land and insert in the lease a covenant for quiet enjoyment as against the acts of those holding the paramount title. It is patent therefore that the bank did not have the express power. It will not be disputed that the bank had every necessary incidental power to carry on a national bank business; but, it is hardly open to argument that the power to enter into a contract containing the covenant in question is not necessary to the transaction of a national bank business. It is patent that it is not necessary. National banks have been in existence in nearly every county in nearly every state in the union for many years. The transactions of those banks have included the bulk of the business transacted in America. In preparing this case, although the attorneys on each side have been most industrious and have prepared most extensive and comprehensive briefs, neither counsel has been able to find a single case where a national bank had entered into such a contract. Not being contented with the search made by counsel, this court has made an independent search and has not been able to locate a single case on the subject. We think that the absence of authorities, itself, lends much support to the proposition that the exercise of the alleged power in question is not necessary to the transaction of a national bank business. As was said by Mr. Dillon:

> "Any fair reasonable doubt concerning the existence of the power is resolved by the courts against the corporation, and the power is denied."

The reason for the restrictions on the powers of national banks was stated in National Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621, 25 L. Ed. 188. At page 626 the court said:

> "The object of the restrictions was obviously threefold. It was to keep the capital of the banks flowing in the daily channels of commerce; to deter them from embarking in hazardous real estate speculations; and to prevent the accumulation of large masses of such property in their hands, to be held, as it were, in mortmain. The intent, not the letter, of the statute constitutes the law."

The restrictions were again stated, the reasons were again given, and the right and duty on the part of the bank to plead, as a defense, its want of authority, were again repeated and summarized in California Bank v. Kennedy, 167 U. S. 362, 17 Sup. Ct. 831, 42 L. Ed. 198. At page 367 (17 Sup. Ct. 833) the court said:

"Whatever divergence of opinion may arise on this question from conflicting adjudications in some of the state courts, in this court it is settled in favor of the right of the corporation to plead its want of power, that is to say, to assert the nullity of an act which is an ultra vires act. The cases of Thomas v. Railroad Company, 101 U. S. 71; Pennsylvania Railroad v. St. Louis, Alton, etc., Railroad, 118 U. S. 290; Oregon Railway & Navigation Co. v. Oregonian Railway Co., 130 U. S. 1; Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, etc., Railway v. Keokuk & Hamilton Bridge Co., 131 U. S. 371; Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Car Co., 139 U. S. 24; St. Louis, etc., Railroad v. Terre Haute & Indianapolis Railroad, 145 U. S. 393; Union Pacific Railway v. Chicago, etc., Railway, 163 U. S. 564, and McCormick v. Market Nat. Bank, 165 U. S. 538, recognize as sound doctrine that the powers of corporations are such only as are conferred upon them by statute, and that, to quote from the opinion of the court in Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace Car Co., 139 U. S. 24, 59 to 60:

" 'A contract of a corporation, which is ultra vires, in the proper sense, that is to say, outside the object of its creation as defined in the law of its organization, and therefore beyond the powers conferred upon it by the legislature, is not voidable only, but wholly void, and of no legal effect. The objection to the contract is, not merely that the corporation ought not to have made it, but that it could not make it. The contract cannot be ratified by either party, because it could not have been authorized by either. No performance on either side can give the unlawful contract any validity, or be the foundation of any right of action upon it.'

"This language was also cited and expressly approved in Jacksonville, etc., Railway v. Hooper, 160 U. S. 514, 524, 530.

"As said in McCormick v. Market National Bank, 165 U. S. 538, 549:

" 'The doctrine of ultra vires, by which a contract made by a corporation beyond the scope of its corporate powers is unlawful and void and will not support an action, rests, as this court has often recognized and affirmed, upon three distinct grounds: The obligation of any one contracting with a corporation to take notice of the legal limits of its powers; the interest of the stockholders not to be subject to risks which they have never undertaken; and, above all, the interest of the public that the corporation shall not transcend the powers conferred upon it by law. [Pearce v. Madison & Indianapolis Railroad, 21 How. 441; Pittsburgh, Chicago, etc., Railway v. Keokuk & Hamilton Bridge Co., 131 U. S. 371, 384; Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace Car Co., 139 U. S. 24, 48.]'

"The doctrine thus enunciated is likewise that which obtains in England. [Ashbury Railway Carriage & Iron Co. v. Riche, L. R. 7 H. L. 653; Attorney General v. Great Eastern Railway Company, 5 App. Cas. 473; Baroness Wenlock v. The River Dee Company, 10 App. Cas. 354; Trevor v. Whitworth, 12 App. Cas. 409; Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper (1892) App. Cas. 125; Mann v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways (1893) App. Cas. 69.]"

As showing how strictly the federal courts have ruled the questions concerning attempts on the part of national banks to exceed the powers conferred upon them, and as showing that the contract in the instant case was void, we call attention to the following additional cases:

In Burrows v. Niblack, 84 Fed. 111, 28 C. C. A. 130, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit was called upon to consider a transaction in which the Chemical National Bank of Chicago attempted to purchase 100 shares of its capital stock from one of its stockholders. There was no claim that the stockholder owed the bank or that the purchase was made to protect the bank against a pre-existing debt. The trial court held that the purchase was invalid and that the receiver of the bank should have judgment for the moneys paid on the purchase. The Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment.

In the case entitled Edward P. Allis Co. v. Standard Nat. Bank (C. C.) 110 Fed. 47, the court was called uopn to determine the liability of the defendant bank growing out of a contract made by the bank to save itself from loss on a pre-existing debt. The debtor became insolvent. To protect itself the defendant entered into a purported contract under which it attempted to join with others in operating a sawmill that had formerly been operated by the debtor. Instead of collecting the debt of $15,000, it sunk $36,601 more, and the plaintiff claimed the right to recover yet other moneys. The court held that the defendant bank, even under the facts stated, had no power to carry out the terms of such a contract.

In the case of Cooper v. Hill, 94 Fed. 582, 36 C. C. A. 402, the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Eighth Circuit had under consideration the act of a board of directors of a national bank in handling loans made to a mining company. The bank had loaned the company moneys and had thereafter obtained judgment in the sum of $4,500. The bank caused one of its directors, who was also cashier, to take and hold title to the mining claims. Thereafter the directors caused the accumulated waters to be pumped out of the mine and the mine to be thus placed in salable condition. Other facts stated by the court are:

"The unfortunate part of this case is that they did not stop here. When the shaft had been cleared of water and the machinery had been put in operation, when the property was in proper condition for examination and for sale, and when no purchaser was found, they proceeded to expend $18,864.82 more in prospecting for paying ore upon property in which none has ever been discovered. It was not only beyond their authority as officers of the bank, but ultra vires of the bank itself, to carry on ordinary mining, manufacturing, or trading business—much more, to expend its money in such a speculative venture as prospecting for ore where none of value ever had been found."

In the case of First National Bank v. Converse, 200 U. S. 425, 26 Sup. Ct. 306, 50 L. Ed. 537, the court was considering these facts: In May, 1884, the Northwestern Manufacturing & Car Company was a corporation engaged in the manufacturing business at Stillwater, Minn. At the date mentioned the car company owed a large amount of debts which it was unable to pay, among which was a sum due to the First National Bank of Ottawa. In the financial distress that followed, the creditors, including the bank, formed the Minnesota Thresher Manufacturing Company and the bank took stock therein, exchanging its claim against the car company therefor. Later the thresher company became insolvent and the suit was brought to collect a stockholder's liability. The thresher company inserted in its articles of incorporation that it was to purchase and hold the stock of the Northwestern Manufacturing & Car Company and that it was to manufacture and sell steam engines. The court held that the business of the thresher company was speculative, and then the court says:

> "To concede that a national bank has ordinarily the right to take stock in another corporation as collateral for a present loan or as security for a pre-existing debt, does not imply that because a national bank has lent money to a corporation it may become an organizer and take stock in a new and speculative venture; in other words, do the very thing which the previous decisions of this court have held cannot be done."

In Merchants' National Bank v. Wehrmann, 202 U. S. 295, 26 Sup. Ct. 613, 50 L. Ed. 1036, the court was considering these facts: A partnership had been formed to purchase, improve, divide in lots, and sell a leasehold. The partnership was formed under the laws of Ohio and included 40 shares, each of which was represented by a transferable certificate. The bank, to secure a pre-existing debt, took nine of the shares as security and afterwards became the owner of them in satisfaction of the debt. In the trial court it was found that the partners must contribute to pay the debts of the firm, and some of them being solvent the bank was charged with the full share of a solvent partner. The Supreme Court of Ohio held this to be wrong, but decided that the bank was liable for nine-fortieths of the debts. The Supreme Court of the United States considered the analogy between a corporation and the partnership and then, commencing at page 300 (26 Sup. Ct. 614), the court says:

> "But to take a share by transfer on the books means to become a member of the concern. The person who appears on the books of the corporation as the stockholder is the stockholder as between him and the corporation, and his rights with regard to the corporate property are incident to his position as such. [National Bank v. Case, 99 U. S. 628, 631; Pullman v. Upton, 96 U. S. 328.] This does not matter, or matters less, in the case of a corporation, for the reasons which we have stated. But when a similar transfer is made of a share in a partnership it means that the transferee at once becomes a member of the firm and goes into its business with an unlimited personal liability, in short, does precisely what a national bank has no authority to do. This the Supreme Court of Ohio rightly held beyond the powers of the bank. [U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5136, 5137.] It is true that it has been held that a pledgee may escape liability if it appears on the certificate and books that he is only a pledgee. [Pauly v. State Loan & Trust Co., 165 U. S. 606; Robinson v. Southern National Bank, 180 U. S. 295; Rankin v. Fidelity Trust Co., 189 U. S. 242, 249.] No doubt the security might be realized without the pledgee ever becoming a member of the firm. It is not necessary in this case to say that shares like the present could not be accepted as security in any form by a national bank. But such a bank cannot accept an absolute transfer of them to itself. It recently has been decided that a national bank cannot take stock in a new speculative corporation, with the common double liability, in satisfaction of a debt. [First National Bank of Ottawa v. Converse, 200 U. S. 425.] A fortiori, it cannot take shares in a partnership to the same end." (Italics ours.)

The Revised Statutes provide that a national bank shall not "transact any business, except such as is incidental and preliminary to its organization, until it has been authorized by the controller of the currency to commence the business of banking." Before receiving such authorization from the controller, the Market National Bank of Chicago attempted to lease premises for its banking business. In an action brought to recover rent under that purported contract it was held that no recovery could be had. McCormick v. Market Bank, 165 U. S. 538, 17 Sup. Ct. 433, 41 L. Ed. 817.

[3] It is quite impossible, after reading the foregoing cases, to form any other conclusion than this, that a national bank may not exercise any powers except those expressly granted or such incidental powers as are necessary to carry on the national bank business; that the Supreme Court of the United States has the power to examine into that question whenever it is presented; that the scope of such examination by that court extends to an examination not only of the contracts or purported contracts but of the statutes both state and federal which in any way enter into and form a part of the purported contract; that when from such an examination it appears that the national bank has entered into a contract in excess of its delegated powers and which in truth and in fact is speculative, that is, carries "an unlimited personal liability," that then and in that event the Supreme Court of the United States will decline to uphold a judgment enforcing any liability against the bank. We think this lease must be so classified.

The appellant in its answer pleaded in bar the judgment in the foreclosure proceedings hereinabove referred to. Thereafter on the trial of the case the issue as to the effect of said judgment was fully litigated. At this time the appellant claims that the verdict of the jury was against the law and the evidence because the judgment in the foreclosure proceeding was an absolute bar. The effect of that judgment was before the Supreme Court and that court fully expressed itself on the subject in Sullivan v. Superior Court, 185 Cal. 133, 195 Pac. 1061. In that decision, among other things, the court said:

> "No provision was made by this decree to protect the leasehold of the Standard Livestock Company, or for the application of any of the proceeds of the sale to its interest in the premises. The decree, however, directs if there remain any balance after applying the proceeds as therein specifically directed, the same 'be returned into court to abide the further order thereof.' * * *
> "It seems to us that the main issue in this proceeding, namely, the right of the purchaser at this sale to possession of the entire interest and estate in these premises on receipt of his deed, freed from the leasehold or other subsequent interests, is not open to dispute. The decree was allowed to become final without appeal, motion for new trial, or other attempt to avoid or modify it. The owners of the leasehold were parties to the action. Their interest was declared subject and subordinate to plaintiff's mortgage. The entire interests covered by the mortgage and lease were subject to sale and ordered sold and foreclosed in satisfaction of plaintiff's claim. No provision was made for making this sale subject to the leasehold interest, and the court could no more have subordinated the rights of plaintiff to that of the lessees in making this sale than it could to the rights of the subordinate lienholders under subsequent mortgages. Each, in the order of preference of his claim, was entitled to redeem but no redemption was made. As to all lien claimants other than the plaintiff, the leasehold was decreed to be prior and superior, and the lessees should have been entitled to take precedence to these in the distribution of the surplus proceeds of the sale after plaintiff's demand had been satisfied. * * *
> "We are satisfied that petitioner is entitled to possession of the premises freed from the claims of this lease.
> "No judgment of court in ejectment or unlawful detainer could give him any clearer right to possession than he has under this judgment and sale. This is not a case where the rights of parties in possession who are not bound by the record in the foreclosure action are involved, and where an independent title or right of possession is claimed. Here the rights of the contenders for possession have been fully adjudicated and it only remains to put the plain provisions of such adjudication into execution." (Italics ours.)

But the respondent contends all of that language is obiter.

With this contention we do not agree. We think it was of the very essence of the mandamus proceeding that the Supreme Court should have ascertained whether the appellant had any rights that had not been litigated. In so ascertaining the Supreme Court used the language quoted. We have examined that language most carefully and do not find that the Supreme Court used a word as obiter. However, be that as it may, we still think that the language used was sound and that this court should follow it whether the language is obiter or otherwise. In 15 Cal. Jur. 136, § 189, it is said:

> "In the latter case (a judgment pleaded in bar) a final adverse judgment on the merits operates and is pleadable as a complete bar to the second action, regardless of what may or may not have been presented in support or defense of the claim in the prior action."

In Crew v. Pratt, 119 Cal. 139, at page 149, 51 Pac. 38, 42, the court said:

> "It may be stated as a general proposition, that a judgment is conclusive, not only as to the subject matter in controversy in the action upon which it is based, but also in all other actions involving the same question, and upon all matters involved in the issues which might have been litigated and decided in the case; the presumption being that all such issues were really met and decided."

The rule applies to matters both in respect to those of claim and those of defense. Estate of Bell, 153 Cal. 331, 340, 95 Pac. 372. In a case very similar in some respects to this case, the whole subject received careful consideration by the Supreme Court of New York. Pakas v. Hollingshead, 184 N. Y. 211. 77 N. E. 40, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1042, 1045, 112 Am. St. Rep. 601, 6 Ann. Cas. 60.

[4] As stated above, when the Federal Trust Company commenced the action in foreclosure it made Pentz and the Bank of California, and Noonan, and the Standard Livestock Company, parties defendant. When Pentz and the Bank of California appeared, they filed an answer and cross-complaint and made Noonan and the Standard Livestock Company cross-defendants. Thereafter Noonan and the Standard Livestock Company appeared and answered the cross-complaint. They pleaded the lease in hæc verba, but they did not in their pleading set any value thereon, nor did they make any attempt to have the trial court, in the foreclosure proceeding, ascertain their damages and cause their claim to be paid out of the surplus moneys after the foreclosure sale had been held. In Sullivan v. Superior Court, supra, the Supreme Court points out that fact and rests its decision thereon. When this plaintiff was made a party in the foreclosure proceeding, it was entitled to come forward and make its claim for damages for being disturbed in its quiet enjoyment of the premises. In 27 Cyc. 1767 it is said:

> "The surplus proceeds of a foreclosure sale, after satisfying the mortgage debt, represent the equity of redemption and are constructively real property and belong to * * * the owner of an interest, title, or estate in the premises distinct from but superior to that of the mortgagor. * * *"

The respondent says that it does not claim that it had a lien and therefore that it had no standing in the foreclosure proceeding to ask the trial court to make its claim secondary to that only of the Federal Trust Company. But it was not necessary that it should have a lien. It was sufficient to give it a proper status that it was "the owner of an interest, title, or estate in the premises" distinct from, but superior to, that of the Bank of California. Williams v. Pratt, 10 Cal. App. 625, 103 Pac. 151, rules the principle. In that case the trustees, after exercising the powers of sale under a trust deed, had a surplus of moneys in their hands. The question before the court was as to who was entitled to share therein. The appellant, Raymond, contended that by reason of certain payments she had made on an executory contract of purchase that she was entitled to share in the fund. The trial court made no finding on her claim. For that reason the judgment was reversed to enable the trial court to ascertain and protect the amount of her claim. Reed Orchard Co. v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. App. 648, 128 Pac. 9, 18, also rules the principle. Condemnation proceedings were commenced against the Reed Orchard Company, Komano, and others. Komano did not, in his pleading, set forth the value of his alleged leasehold interest. In its verdict the jury did not ascertain or determine the value of said interest. Later Komano applied for a writ of supersedeas to protect his alleged rights. At page 661 (128 Pac. 16) the court said:

> "It would also seem clear that the defendants had the burden of alleging and proving their interests and the value thereof, and that only the defendant meeting that burden should be permitted in this proceeding to question the disposition of the fund. The People's Savings Bank and Komano having been regularly served with summons, and having failed to appear and urge any claim to whatever fund might be awarded, should not be indulged now to stay this public improvement on the ground that the jury did not find the value of an interest which was not alleged to have any value and did not award these defendants money which in the lower court they declined to claim. If the owner of a mortgage or of a leasehold interest can lie by in this way until after judgment and successfully interpose such an objection, it it is manifest that fraud is likely to be encouraged thereby at the expense of the public welfare."

Several cases have been decided in New York which are directly in point. Clarkson v. Skidmore, 46 N. Y. 297, is probably the leading case. Larkin v. Misland, 100 N. Y. 212, 3 N. E. 79, is particularly in point. The defendant Agnes Misland complained regarding the report of a referee who did not report her rights in the surplus fund. On the hearing of the matter the lessee did not make any proof of the value of her leasehold interest. The court held that the special term was justified in ruling that the lessee had shown no loss by the extinction of her estate which should be compensated out of the surplus. In the case of Title Guarantee & Trust Co. v. Twenty-First Street & Fifth Avenue Corporation, 110 Misc. Rep. 126, 180 N. Y. Supp. 358, the court said:

> "Furthermore, where the breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment is due to the foreclosure of a mortgage on the property, a tenant is entitled to recover substantial damages, measured by the value of the unexpired term, less rents reserved, and to look for reimbursement to the surplus moneys which may be realized on the foreclosure sale."

In the case of Dorb v. Modern Folding Co. (Co. Ct.) 183 N. Y. Supp. 639, 640, the court said:

> "The rule of damages in proceedings of this kind is clearly set forth by Judge Rapallo in the case of Clarkson v. Skidmore, 46 N. Y. 297. It was decided in this case that the measure of damages is the value of the use of the premises for the remainder of the term, less the rents reserved. The right of the lessee to the fund is paramount to the right of the owner of the equity of redemption. She is therefore entitled to a first lien upon the surplus fund."

No case to the contrary has been cited to us, and we know of none. We think it is clear, therefore, that the respondent was entitled to litigate in the foreclosure proceedings its claim against the surplus fund, and having failed to do so that it may not now complain.

[5] The fact that it does not seek general damages in this case, but merely special damages, does not better its condition. To hold otherwise would be in effect to hold that the respondent is entitled at will to split its cause of action. In the case at bar it is not even claimed that there was more than one breach of the covenant of quiet enjoyment. For that one breach the respondent was entitled to maintain one action and not several. 1 C. J. 1111, § 285; Herriter v. Porter, 23 Cal. 385, 387. Its cause of action ripened and the respondent was entitled to sue thereon immediately after the foreclosure proceeding had been commenced and the respondent had been made a party thereto. McGary v. Hastings, 39 Cal. 360, 367, 2 Am. Rep. 456; McAlester v. Landers, 70 Cal. 79, 83, 11 Pac. 505; McCormick v. Marcy, 165 Cal. 386, 389, 132 Pac. 449; Agoure v. Lewis, 15 Cal. App.

71, 73, 113 Pac. 882; Sullivan v. Superior Court, supra. It will not be contended seriously that when a person has a cause of action he may voluntarily split it or so divide it as to make it the subject of two or more actions. 1 C. J. 1106 and 1111. The rule remains the same, even though such a claimant is involuntarily summoned into court and commanded to set forth his claim.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

PER CURIAM. [6] The application for a transfer and hearing by this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal is denied. We are satisfied with the conclusion reached by the district court upon the first question discussed in its opinion, namely, that the defendant bank cannot be held liable as an undisclosed principal upon the covenants of warranty in the lease executed by Pentz, in the absence of any written authority therefor. This conclusion is determinative of the case and renders unnecessary a consideration of the other questions discussed in that opinion. For this reason we neither approve nor disapprove what is said in that opinion upon the other two points discussed therein.

PEOPLE v. LAMB. (Crim. No. 751.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 13, 1924.)

1. Criminal law 🔑747—Function of jury to determine weight of conflicting testimony.

It is the province of the jury to determine the weight of conflicting testimony.

2. Criminal law 🔑1159(2)—Appellate court cannot disturb verdict based on evidence sufficient to sustain it.

If there is testimony, which, if believed by the jury, is sufficient to sustain its verdict, the appellate court cannot disturb that verdict, though there were more witnesses for defendant than against him.

3. Criminal law 🔑739(2)—Defensive testimony held for jury's consideration.

Testimony, showing an alibi and testimony as to accused's good character, was addressed to the jury for its determination.

4. Intoxicating liquors 🔑236(11)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for violation of Wright Act.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for violation of Wright Act.

5. Intoxicating liquors 🔑242—Judgment sentencing accused to jail without option to pay fine for first violation of Wright Act held authorized; "or."

Under Wright Act, which adopts penal provisions of Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138¼ et seq.), the court may impose for first offense either a fine or imprisonment, in view of section 29 of Volstead Act, providing for the imposition of a fine not exceeding a certain maximum, "or" imprisonment, etc., so that for a first offense a straight jail sentence without option of paying a fine was authorized; "or" meaning one or the other of two propositions (citing Words and Phrases, First Series, "Or.")

6. Criminal law 🔑1159(1)—Acquittal of two charges not considered in determining guilt of third charge.

The fact that accused, informed against for three violations of the Wright Act, was acquitted as to two charges, could not be considered by the appellate court in determining whether he was guilty of the offense of which the jury found him guilty.

7. Criminal law 🔑992—Jury's recommendation of mercy held no part of verdict.

Jury's recommendation of mercy held no part of verdict, and not to limit court's power to impose jail sentence for violation of Wright Act.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Manuel C. Lamb was convicted of a violation of the Wright Act, and he appeals from the judgment of conviction and from an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Mark L. Burns, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant was tried and convicted of the offense of violating what is commonly known as the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79) of the state of California. His motion for a new trial being denied, the defendant appeals therefrom and also from the judgment of conviction. It appears from the transcript that three separate and distinct informations were filed against the defendant charging him with three separate and distinct violations of the act above mentioned. The informations were numbered respectively 8056, 8060, and 8083. By stipulation made in open court, when the cases were called for trial, all three cases were tried at the same time and upon the testimony introduced at one trial. The defendant was acquitted of the offenses charged under the informations numbered 8056 and 8083, but was convicted of the offense charged in the information numbered 8060.

[1, 2] Two points are made for reversal: First, that the verdict is not supported by the evidence; second, that the court had no jurisdiction to pronounce judgment of imprisonment in the county jail. In support of the appellant's contention that the judgment is not supported by the evidence, or rather that the judgment is against the evidence, our attention is called to the testimony of the witnesses introduced on the part of the defendant, and no reference is made whatever to the evidence introduced by the prosecution. It is argued at length that the weight of the evidence is strongly in favor of the defendant; that this court should set aside the verdict and direct a new trial. It is not sufficient to warrant the reversal of a judgment by an appellate court that the verdict is against the testimony introduced by the defendant, nor is it a question whether an appellate court, if sitting in such a capacity as to enable it to weigh the testimony, would conclude that the verdict should have been in favor of the defendant. If upon an inspection of the transcript it appears that there is sufficient testimony, which if believed by the jury, to sustain a verdict, then and in that case an appellate court must adopt the verdict of the jury as being correct. It is exclusively the province of the jury, where the testimony is conflicting, to weigh and determine the same. It is never a question of whether more witnesses testified for one side or the other. The jury may believe witnesses who testified for the prosecution and disbelieve the testimony of three or four times that number who may testify for the defense. If the testimony of witnesses for the prosecution, if believed by the jury, is sufficient to make out a case and sustain a verdict, the fact that three or four times that number have testified oppositely is of no consequence. This is practically what we find to have occurred in the case at bar.

[3-5] The witnesses C. W. Horstmeyer and A. B. Silvius testified that they went to the defendant's residence at 328 S. street at about 9:30 p. m., June 18, 1923; that upon arriving at said place the witness Silvius got out of the automobile in which the two witnesses were riding and went to the store kept by the defendant next door to his residence; that the defendant came out of the store, went up the stairs into his residence; was there a short period of time, and came back with a bottle of wine and handed it to the witness Horstmeyer, who then and there paid the defendant the sum of $1; that the bottle of wine was in a paper sack; that the following conversation took place when the defendant came to the automobile, with the wine, in which the defendant Horstmeyer was sitting. The witness asked: "What is the damages?" The defendant replied: "$1." The witness Horstmeyer then said: "It is getting kind of hard to buy wine." The defendant replied: "Yes, I have had a chance to sell quite a few bottles to-day, but they are after them and I am pretty scared." The defendant then further said: "As long as there is a grapevine growing in California I am going to have my wine." The defendant, also, had a small bottle and a glass, and said: "Well, here, have a drink on me" and he gave the witnesses Silvius and Horstmeyer each a drink. The bottle of wine was then marked and kept until the trial, and introduced as People's Exhibit No. 1. The witness, A. J. Affleck, to whom the exhibit in question was delivered for analysis, testified that it contained 13.59 per cent. alcohol by volume. The sale in question was shown to have taken place in the city and county of Sacramento. Upon this testimony the jury had a right to base its verdict, if it believed that the witnesses referred to were telling the truth. The transcript shows that a number of witnesses testified that the defendant was not in the place in question at the time of the sale, but that he was in attendance upon some moving picture show. A number of witnesses also testified to the previous good character of the defendant. These were all matters to be addressed to the jury and for the jury to decide. If the jury believed the two witnesses for the prosecution who testified to the sale and purchase of the wine, then it necessarily followed that the testimony of the witnesses for the defense should be laid aside. Both alleged states of facts could not be true. This is always the case when the defense of an alibi is tendered for consideration by the jury. The jury, by its verdict, has found that the witnesses who testified to the sale told the truth, and this court is bound by that determination. The second contention made by the appellant is that the court erred in the imposition of a jail sentence, instead of a sentence in the alternative; that is, that the defendant is entitled, as a matter of right, to escape a jail sentence by the payment of a fine. To support this position reliance is had upon the case of In re Frankovitch, 190 Cal. 440, 213 Pac. 39, the syllabus of which case, in 65 Cal. Dec. 150, reads as follows:

> "A judgment upon conviction of selling liquor in violation of the Wright Act that the defendant pay a fine of $500 or be confined in the city jail for the period of six months upon failure to pay the fine, is one imposing a sentence of imprisonment for six months, but gives the defendant the opportunity of escaping such punishment by the payment of the fine. * * *"

This is very far from holding that the act in question gives any such privilege to the defendant as is contended for in this case. An examination of the opinion in the Frankovitch Case shows further that the court uses no language which could possibly be construed to support the appellant's contention. The words there used are as follows:

> "The Volstead Act provides that for the first offense the person who sells liquor shall be fined not more than a thousand dollars, or suffer imprisonment not exceeding six months. It is claimed that this provision adopted by our Wright Act, does not justify the alternative judgment imposed upon Frankovitch, because such judgment, in effect, provides for imprisonment for the nonpayment of the fine. On the other hand, we think the judgment, properly construed, is one imposing a sentence of imprisonment for six months, but gives the party convicted the opportunity of escaping such punishment by the payment of a fine. Having failed to pay the fine he is in no position to complain of the imprisonment."

The first paragraph of section 29 of the act of October, 1919, commonly known as the Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½p), reads as follows:

> "Any person who manufactures or sells liquor in violation of this title shall for a first offense be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not exceeding six months, and for a second or subsequent offense shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $2,000 and be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than five years."

A reading of this subdivision shows clearly that for the first offense either one or the other of two penalties may be imposed, to wit, a fine of not more than $1,000, or, instead of a fine, imprisonment not exceeding six months, but, when the defendant is convicted of a second offense, then and in that case the court has no election in the imposition of a fine or imprisonment, but must both fine and imprison.

As defined by Webster, the word "or" is said to be a co-ordinating particle that marks an alternative generally corresponding to either as either this or that. In other words, it means one or the other of two propositions. A number of definitions and illustrations of the word "or" may be found in volume 6 of Words and Phrases, beginning with page 5002. These definitions are so numerous that quotation thereof would be unduly burdensome, but all go to the effect of defining the word as above given, where the use appears to be the same as in the statute now under consideration. In the Penal Code of this state the word "or" is quite frequently used in giving an election to the court imposing sentence as to whether it will simply require the payment of a fine or prescribe imprisonment in the county jail. Section 19 of the Penal Code relating to misdemeanors is a good illustration of this point. That section reads:

> "Except in cases where a different punishment is prescribed by this Code, every offense declared to be a misdemeanor is punishable by imprisonment in a county jail not exceeding six months, or by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by both."

[6, 7] The words, "or by both," do not in any wise limit the discretion vested in the trial court to punish the convicted person by either a fine or by the imposition of a jail sentence. We think that no one would seriously contend that any such construction could be given to section 19 of the Penal Code. For all practical purposes, excluding the words, "or by both," it reads to the same effect as the Volstead Act, which, by reason of the Wright Act has become a part of the penal statutes of this state. If the interpretation heretofore given to the Penal Code of the state of California that, when the Code provides for either a fine or imprisonment, the election of which punishment shall be imposed is vested in the trial court, we do not see how it can be consistently argued that the election of which punishment the defendant will suffer is vested in the defendant and taken away from the trial court by language which is to all intents and purposes identical with that used in various sections of the Penal Code. The Volstead Act does not read that for a first offense a defendant shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 and in the event that he does not pay such fine he shall be imprisoned for a period not exceeding six months. It explicitly and plainly states and specifies that a person convicted of the offense referred to in the paragraph of the Volstead Act which we have quoted shall be punished in one of two ways, and the determination of the way is left to the court pronouncing the judgment. The defendant in this case, as we have stated, was acquitted as to two charges and convicted upon one. The fact that he was acquitted as to two charges cannot be considered by this court in determining whether he was or was not guilty of the offense of which the jury found him guilty. We find no merit in the contention made by appellant that because the jury recommended mercy the court should not have imposed a jail sentence. Such recommendation is no part of the verdict.

We think the order denying appellant's motion for a new trial herein and the judgment pronounced upon the defendant should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

1. Criminal law 🔑369(6)—Rule prohibiting proof of other similar crimes held applicable in prosecution for sale of liquor.

The general rule prohibiting proof of other similar crimes applies in a prosecution for a particular sale of intoxicating liquor.

2. Intoxicating liquors 🔑131—In prosecution for sale, state not required to prove intent.

In a prosecution for a particular sale of intoxicating liquor, the state was not required to prove the issue of intent.

3. Criminal law 🔑1169(11)—Admission of evidence of sale other than one charged held error but not to result in miscarriage of justice.

Evidence of sale of intoxicating liquor other than the one charged held inadmissible, but not to result in miscarriage of justice, where proof of another sale on the same occasion remained unchallenged, the court limited the testimony to the question of intent, and defendant's admissions on cross-examination showed habit of keeping intoxicating liquor.

4. Intoxicating liquors 🔑242—Sentence to imprisonment without option of paying fine held not beyond court's jurisdiction.

In prosecution for sale of intoxicating liquor, trial court's sentence of accused to imprisonment in county jail for term of six months without option of payment of a fine held not beyond court's jurisdiction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Mary Pagni was convicted of selling intoxicating liquor, and she appeals from the judgment of conviction and the order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Merlin W. Stewart and Clifford A. Russell, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was charged with a single unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor, alleged to have been made in April, 1923. She was convicted, and this appeal is from the judgment of conviction and the order denying her motion for a new trial.

Allen B. Silvius, a detective employed by the grand jury during April, 1923, testified that in the early evening of April 21st he went to defendant's residence and asked for wine; that defendant said she was afraid to sell any wine, but gave the witness a drink, for which she made no charge, and "said to come back a little later"; that he returned at about 11 o'clock the same evening and asked her for a bottle of wine; that she then gave him a bottle of wine, for which he paid her $1; and that he turned the bottle of wine over to the chief of police. The bottle of wine was admitted in evidence. A chemist testified that the wine contained 11.95 per cent. of alcohol by volume.

H. A. Rodness, a police officer of Sacramento, testified that on the 28th of February, 1923, he and a "lady operative" went to defendant's residence. His examination then proceeded as follows:

> "Q. And did you see Mrs. Pagni at that time? A. We did.
> "Q. Have any conversation with her? A. We did.
> "Q. And what was that conversation? * * * A. Went there with a lady friend the first time, at 10:30, and we went in there and knocked on the door, and the first thing she says, she says: 'What do you want?' I says: 'We want some drinks,' and she asked what I wanted, and I said I wanted wine. She dished us each out a glass of wine, and I gave her a dollar for the two glasses of wine.
> "Mr. Stewart: Well, Mr. Henderson, what is the purpose of that?
> "Mr. Henderson: We are introducing this testimony * * * to show intent to violate the law.
> "The Court: To show an intent to make a sale?
> "Mr. Henderson: To show an intent to make a sale. * * *
> "Mr. Stewart: For the sake of the record, I make the objection that it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.
> "The Court: Objection will be overruled. * * * The evidence of this sale is not admissible to prove that the defendant made the sale as charged in the indictment, but, if there is evidence introduced that satisfies you that she did make the sale alleged in the information, then this evidence may be considered by you in ascertaining or determining the intent of the defendant in making the sale."

The district attorney then proceeded, without objection, to prove that on the same occasion the defendant treated the police officer and his lady friend to wine, and that he purchased a bottle of wine from defendant. This bottle of wine was admitted in evidence, and the testimony shows that it contained 13½ per cent. of alcohol. Counsel for defendant objected to the admission in evidence of the bottle of wine, and the objection was overruled. The defendant testified on direct examination as follows:

> "Q. I will ask you, Mrs. Pagni, if you know Allen B. Silvius? A. No, I don't know him.
> "Q. Referring to People's Exhibit 1, I will ask you if you, on the 21st day of August, sold this to Mr. Silvius, for the sum of $1? A. I didn't sold it to him; this is mine, but not the other one. * * * I paid the fine already for that. * * *
> "Q. I will ask you, Mrs. Pagni, if, on the 28th day of February, 1923, you sold this bottle to Mr. Rodness? A. I sold to the lady that he was with him, because she was my friend all the time."

On cross-examination she testified:

"Q. Referring to People's Exhibit 1, Mrs. Pagni, did you say that you did not sell that to Mr. Silvius? A. No; I had no such a quality as the wine in my house. My wine were black.

"Q. Your wine is black? A. I had it, just a half gallon, that the policeman took away from me.

"Q. Now, you have been accustomed to having wine upon your premises, Mrs. Pagni, haven't you? A. Some time I go from washing in another person's house, and they give me, sometimes, a gallon of wine, for my own use. * * *

"Q. Now, this second bottle, People's Exhibit 2, Mrs. Pagni, you say you did sell that bottle to a woman with Officer Rodness because she was a friend of yours? A. The first bottle, I mean to say.

"Q. Well, which one is the first?

"Mr. Stewart: Well, if the court please, I want it understood that the first bottle merely goes to the intent. * * *

"Q. Then, People's Exhibit 2 was the bottle that you sold to Mr. Rodness and the woman that was with him? A. Yes, some time, if she will bring me a bottle of brandy, * * * the sort I would not wash my hand in, rather than I would give that bottle of wine to her. And the man that he was with that lady, he threw up a dollar on the table for me. Then I went away. I told him I didn't want any money whatever."

[1-3] Appellant contends that the court erred in admitting evidence of other sales than the one charged. In a prosecution for a particular sale of intoxicating liquor, the general rule prohibiting the proof of other crimes, though of a similar character, governs. People v. Smith (Cal. App.) 221 Pac. 405; People v. Amort, 60 Cal. App. 29, 212 Pac. 50; People v. Morales, 45 Cal. App. 553, 188 Pac. 58; People v. Clark, 28 Cal. App. 670, 153 Pac. 719; People v. Dial, 28 Cal. App. 704, 153 Pac. 970. These decisions are in accord with the great weight of authority in other jurisdictions, although there are decisions to the contrary. There are exceptions to the general rule, as in prosecutions for other crimes, but this case does not fall within any of the exceptions. (For numerous cases bearing upon the general rule and the exceptions thereto see First and Second Decennial Digests, Criminal Law, §§ 369[6], 371[10] and 372[2], and note, 18 Ann. Cas. 846.)

Rodness testified, without objection, that he purchased two glasses of wine from defendant on the 28th of February. After a conversation between counsel for defendant and the district attorney, the former entered an objection "for the sake of the record," but at no time moved to strike out the testimony. Thereafter, without objection, Rodness testified that on the same visit he purchased a bottle of wine from defendant. The defendant objected to the admission of the bottle of wine in evidence, but did not move to strike out the proof of the sale thereof. Since the proof of the sale to Rodness of the two glasses of wine remained unchallenged in the record, it is not probable that the jury was further influenced by the proof of an additional sale to the same person at the same time. The court limited the testimony of Rodness to the question of intent, an issue which the prosecution was not required to prove in this case. If the jury obeyed this instruction, the defendant was not prejudiced by the proof of other sales. The danger to be apprehended from the proof of other offenses is that the jury may draw unwarranted inferences therefrom.

The admissions volunteered by the defendant while under cross-examination were probably more damaging to her case than the proof of other sales. The jury would have been justified in inferring therefrom that she was in the habit of keeping intoxicating liquors at her residence. It may be further noted that while Silvius testified that he purchased wine from defendant on the 21st of April, her denial is that she sold him wine on the 21st of August. This difference in dates may be due to an error in the reporter's transcript, but no suggestion has been made to that effect. It seems clear that proof of other sales was not material to any issue in this case, but the defendant should have made seasonable objection thereto, or, if there was no opportunity to object, she should have made a motion to strike out the objectionable testimony. In view of the whole record, it cannot be said that the errors complained of have resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

[4] The court sentenced the defendant to imprisonment in the county jail for a term of six months. It is contended "that the trial court exceeded its jurisdiction in meting out a sentence of imprisonment alone; * * * that the sentence should be in the alternative; that in addition to the jail sentence * * * she should be given the right to escape this sentence by the payment of a fine," citing In re Frankovitch, 190 Cal. 440, 213 Pac. 39. The contention has been held untenable by this court in the case of People v. Lamb, 227 Pac. 969, filed May 13, 1924.

PEOPLE v. MATTOS. (Cr. 753.)

1. Intoxicating liquors 🔑226—Evidence whether accused had license to conduct grocery store immaterial.

Where it was shown, in a prosecution for selling intoxicating liquor at a grocery store, that defendant himself sold the liquor and owned the store, testimony as to whether he had a license to conduct the grocery store was immaterial.

2. Criminal law 🔑1169(1)—Admission of testimony on question of license of grocery store where liquor was sold held not to require reversal.

In a prosecution for a sale of intoxicating wine to witness, in front of accused's grocery store, the erroneous admission of evidence as to whether accused had a license to conduct the store held not a miscarriage of justice, because such testimony did not prove anything bearing on the alleged sale.

3. Criminal law 🔑1036(1), 1038(1), 1044, 1055—Accused held not entitled to complain of irrelevant testimony for want of objection, motion, or exception below.

Where accused did not object to irrelevant testimony at the trial, nor move to strike it out, and did not except to the argument of the district attorney based thereon, or request an instruction to disregard such testimony, held, that he could not object on appeal.

4. Intoxicating liquors 🔑224, 236(5)—Possession not prima facie evidence of keeping for sale.

It is not the law that the possession of liquors is prima facie evidence that the liquor was kept to be sold, etc., and that the burden of proof is upon accused to prove he lawfully acquired, possessed, and used such liquor; the Wright Act having adopted only the penalties of the Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138¼ et seq.), and instruction to that effect was improper, especially where the prosecution presented merely a question of sale.

5. Criminal law 🔑1172(6)—Erroneous instruction as to possession as prima facie held not to result in miscarriage of justice.

In a prosecution for a sale of intoxicating liquor, an erroneous instruction that possession was prima facie evidence that the liquor was kept for the purpose of being sold, etc., and that the burden was upon the possessor to prove lawful acquisition, possession, and use could not result in a miscarriage of justice because inapplicable.

6. Intoxicating liquors 🔑242—Sentence to term in jail without option of paying fine held not erroneous.

In a prosecution for sale of intoxicating liquor, sentence of accused to a term in the county jail without option of paying fine held not erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Ed Mattos was convicted of selling intoxicating liquor, and he appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Clifford A. Russell, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant was convicted of the offense of selling intoxicating liquor contrary to the laws of the state of California, upon an information charging the commission of such offense at a certain building or house situated at 2030 Third street in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, state of California. The defendant's motion for a new trial being denied, the defendant appeals from the order denying his motion for a new trial and a judgment entered upon the verdict finding him guilty of the offense charged in the information just referred to. Three points are assigned by the appellant as grounds for reversal herein: First, that the court erred in the admission of testimony; second, that the court erred in its instructions given to the jury; and, third, that the court erred in pronouncing judgment of imprisonment in the county jail, in that the appellant should have been given the right to escape a jail sentence by the payment of a fine.

The testimony in behalf of the people is to the effect that the witness Lohman, accompanied by a man by the name of Reynolds, on the evening of the 28th day of July, 1923, went to the place of business owned and kept by the defendant, to wit, a grocery store, and upon arriving at said place found the defendant in front of his store; that the witness Lohman then and there asked the defendant to sell him two bottles of wine; that the defendant went around in back of the building to some place not known by the witness Lohman, and shortly returned with two bottles of wine for which the witness paid the defendant $2. The man Reynolds, who accompanied the witness Lohman, was not called at the trial. These bottles of wine were taken by the witness Lohman, who thereafter, accompanied by Reynolds, went to a dance. It appears that before going to the dance they went out on the Natomas boulevard and cached or secreted one bottle of wine, the other bottle they proceeded to drink. After the dance they returned to where one of the bottles of wine had been cached, as just stated, procured the same, but were thereupon apprehended by one of the police officers of the city of Sacramento. The witness Lohman testified to the matters hereinbefore stated. The bottle was analyzed, was found to contain a prohibited quantity of alcohol, and was admitted as one of the exhibits in the case. The defendant endeavored to meet the case made out by people by introducing testimony tending to show that he was not at his place of business on the evening of July 28, 1923, at the time designated by the witness Lohman as about the hour when he made the purchase of the two bottles of wine. The witness Lohman also testified that he knew the defendant, and had previously seen him at the grocery store conducted by the defendant.

[1-3] Upon cross-examination of the defendant the court, over his objection, permitted the prosecution to interrogate the defendant as to whether he had or had not a license for the conducting of any business at 2030 Third street, which premises are also known as 231 U street. To these interrogatories the defendant answered that he had a license for the sale of ice cream, candies, and cigars. After these questions had been propounded and the answers given by the defendant that he had obtained such license, the district attorney then asked the defendant if the license, above referred to, was in his own name, and the defendant answered that it was issued in the name of a man by the name of Smith to whom he had intended to sell the place, but to whom the place was not sold. This testimony was referred to by the district attorney upon his argument to the jury, and the admission of such testimony and the argument of the district attorney founded thereupon is urged as such prejudicial error as has resulted in a miscarriage of justice and requires a reversal of the judgment herein. It having been shown that the purchase of the wine was made in front of the grocery store owned by the defendant himself, and not by any agent or employee of his, and that the defendant owned the premises, it became utterly immaterial as to whether the defendant did or did not have a license. Had it been shown that the sale was made by some employee of the defendant, and it was sought to hold the defendant as principal, then the question of license and the ownership of the store and the conducting of the business would have been material, and inquiries tending to elicit such testimony would have been both relevant and material. As the case was presented, the guilt of the defendant in no wise depended upon whether he did or did not have a license. The objection urged by the defendant to such testimony should have been sustained. Did the failure of the court to sustain the defendant's objection to such testimony constitute reversible error? We think not. For the reasons which we have just stated above, i. e., that the guilt of the defendant did or did not in any wise depend upon whether he had a license or whether he owned or conducted the store, it was simply a mere question of making the sale, as stated by the witness Lohman. Whether the defendant had a license did not in any wise tend to show either the guilt or innocence of the defendant or whether he did or did not make a sale of the two bottles of wine as alleged in the information. For these reasons we cannot see that any miscarriage of justice resulted therefrom, because the testimony did not tend to prove anything bearing upon the alleged sale of the two bottles of wine. When we come to the real pith of the question and the vice of the alleged inadmissibility of the testimony, we find that no objection was made thereto by the defendant. The questions and answers which brought out the fact that the license was issued in the name of some one designated as Smith were not objected to, and the argument of the district attorney based thereon was not objected to, nor was the court requested to charge the jury in relation thereto, nor was any motion made to strike out the testimony that the license referred to was issued to a man by the name of Smith. Not having been objected to in the court below, no motion having been made to strike out the improper testimony, no exception being taken to the argument of the district attorney founded thereupon, and no request being made to the trial court to instruct the jury to disregard the same, we think it is now too late to raise the question upon appeal.

> "After February 1, 1920, the possession of liquors by any person not legally permitted under this title to possess liquor shall be prima facie evidence that such liquor is kept for the purpose of being sold, bartered, exchanged, given away, furnished or otherwise disposed of in violation of the provisions of this title, and the burden of proof shall be upon the possessor in any action concerning the same to prove that such liquor was lawfully acquired, possessed and used."

This instruction should not have been given. The act of the Legislature commonly known as the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79) adopted only the penalties of the act of Congress commonly known as the Volstead law (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138¼ et seq.). The instruction above given is to all intents and purposes a literal wording of one of the sections of the Volstead Act in relation to procedure in federal courts. It was not adopted into our system of procedure by the Wright Act, and is not a correct statement of the law of this state. The case at bar presents simply a question of sale and not of unlawful possession. However, this instruction was entirely outside the record, and, even though erroneous, it had no application to any fact tendered for the consideration of the jury, and could not have been considered by them or applied to any of the facts in the case in arriving at a verdict, and for this reason could in no wise have been instrumental in bringing about a miscarriage of justice.

[6] As to the third assignment of error, to wit, the sentence of the defendant to a term in the county jail, the question presented is identical with that considered in the case of People v. Lamb, 227 Pac. 969, heretofore decided by this court, opinion filed May 13, 1924. For the reasons therein stated, the objection of the appellant on such ground must be held untenable.

Finding no legal cause for reversal herein, the order of the trial court denying defendant's motion for a new trial and the judgment pronounced in this cause will be and the same are hereby affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; WEYAND, Justice pro tem.

PEOPLE v. SILVA et al. (Cr. 762.)

1. Indictment and information 🔑110(31)—Indictment charging unlawful sale in language of statute held sufficient.

An indictment charging the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor substantially in the language of the statute held sufficient within Pen. Code, §§ 950–952.

2. Criminal law 🔑370—When evidence of sales other than one charged is admissible.

Generally, proof of other sales is not admissible in support of a charge of a specific sale of liquor; but, where the sale charged was made by an employee of a defendant, evidence of other sales is admissible as tending to show knowledge and consent of the employer and his authorization.

3. Criminal law 🔑695(1)—Admission of evidence of sales other than one charged held not erroneous, where objection was general and not by defendant entitled to object.

In a joint prosecution against proprietor and bartender for selling intoxicating liquor, based on sale by bartender, admission of evidence of other sales held not error, where the objections were general and no separate objection was made in behalf of bartender nor request made that the consideration of such evidence be limited to proprietor's complicity.

4. Criminal law 🔑1169(1)—Admission of conversation between state witness and accused's agent held not error.

In a prosecution for selling intoxicating liquor, admission of evidence that defendant's "lookout" refused to sell a state witness a "bottle" held not reversible error, being of little importance.

5. Criminal law 🔑417(13)—Statement of accused's employee to another employee in course of employment held admissible against employer.

In a prosecution for selling intoxicating liquor, evidence that defendant's bartender directed another employee to act as lookout held properly admitted as tending to show manner in which business was conducted, in connection with positive testimony that witness knew such employee was defendant's lookout, especially where defendant was present.

6. Witnesses 🔑246(1)—Trial judge should exercise great caution in examining witness.

The trial judge should exercise great caution in examining a witness to avoid throwing weight of his influence to the one side or the other.

7. Criminal law 🔑660—Privilege and duty of attorney to object to improper question by judge.

It is not only the privilege but the duty of an attorney to make a seasonable objection for his client to any improper question asked by the judge.

8. Intoxicating liquors 🔑132—Nonpenal provision of Volstead Act not adopted by Wright Act.

Volstead Act, § 33 (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½t), prescribing a rule of evidence, was not adopted by the Wright Act, which adopted only the penal provisions of the Volstead Act, and instruction in language thereof should not have been given.

9. Criminal law 🔑1172(1)—Giving of instruction predicated on nonpenal provision of Volstead Act held not prejudicial error.

In a prosecution for unlawful sale of liquor, giving of instruction predicated on Volstead Act, § 33 (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½t), as to possession as prima facie evidence of unlawful possession, which instruction was not authorized by the Wright Act held not prejudicial error, where defendant's possession could not have been lawful.

10. Criminal law 🔑304(20)—Court will take judicial notice of alcoholic contents of jackass brandy.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, the court will take judicial notice of the alcoholic contents of jackass brandy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

M. J. Silva and another were convicted of the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor, and each appeals from the judgment of conviction against him and the order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Clifford A. Russell, of Sacramento, and L. M. Shelley, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendants were jointly charged with an unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor. They were jointly tried and were convicted. This appeal is from the judgments of conviction and the orders denying their motions for new trials.

[4] The indictment charges that the defendants sold "a certain amount of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes, and not for sacramental or medicinal purposes, the said intoxicating liquor then and there containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume." The defendants demurred to the indictment on the grounds that it does not substantially conform to the requirements of sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code, that it does not state a public offense, and "that more than one offense is charged." Appellants contend that the indictment is defective in that the defendants "were entitled to know what class or kind or amount of intoxicating liquor they were charged with selling." The indictment substantially follows the language of the statute and is sufficient. Matter of Application of Anixter, 166 Cal. 762, 138 Pac. 353; People v. Johnson (Cal. App.) 218 Pac. 449; People v. Bassetti, 58 Cal. App. 390, 208 Pac. 696; Massey v. United States (C. C. A.) 281 Fed. 293; Booth v. United States, 197 Fed. 283, 116 C. C. A. 645.

At the time of and prior to the alleged sale, the defendant Silva was the proprietor of the Waldorf Club, where he dispensed soft drinks and cigars. Defendant Luxton was one of his bartenders. The witness Harry White was another bartender employed by defendant. George Dahm, a detective employed by the district attorney, testified that on the 31st of October, 1923, at about 10:30 o'clock p. m., he purchased from Luxton, at Silva's bar, a drink of whisky each for himself and White, paying 50 cents for the two drinks, and that the liquor was served in "a regular whisky glass." It was of this sale that the defendants were convicted. Silva testified that he was "standing at least 15, 20 or 15, feet from" Dahm at the time the drinks were served. and that there was no "jackass brandy or whisky served to Dahm or Harry White" on that occasion. Luxton testified that he did not serve them with jackass brandy, and White testified that they were not served with whisky, but that he and Dahm each had a bottle of near-beer on the occasion referred to by Dahm. Dahm testified that at that time Luxton said to White. "You are playing the part of the Indian to-night," meaning the "part of a lookout, to give the signal"; that the witness knew personally that White was "one of the lookouts there and gives signals"; and that the witness went back a second time and asked White for "a bottle, and he says: 'No, * * * I will not sell a bottle to you or even to my own brother.'" N. C. Kazar, another detective, testified that on the same evening, at about 10:30 p. m., he visited the Waldorf Club in company with another person; that Luxton was behind the bar and Silva about 20 feet away from him, at the end of the bar; that "we went in and asked him (Luxton) for a drink of whisky, and they said, 'Nothing doing,' the federal agents were out; they wasn't selling anything at all"; that the witness "was told that they wasn't serving any, on account of the federal agents. That was part of it, between themselves"; that on the 27th of October, 1923, he visited the Waldorf Club and saw there a large number of members of a fraternal order, of which Silva was secretary, drinking from whisky glasses; that the witness on that occasion asked Luxton for a drink of whisky and "got a drink of jackass" for which he paid 25 cents. Luxton testified that he did not sell jackass brandy to Kazar.

[2] It is argued that it was error to admit proof of the sale of jackass brandy to Kazar on the 27th of October. The general rule is that proof of other sales is not admissible in support of a charge of a specific sale; but where the evidence discloses that the sale charged was made by an employee of a defendant, evidence of other sales is admissible as tending to show the knowledge and consent of the employer and that he had authorized his employee to make unlawful sales. In Smith v. State, 5 Okl. Cr. 67, 113 Pac. 204, it is said:

> "Where the state charges and relies upon a particular sale, the general rule is that proof of other sales, for the purpose of establishing the particular sale charged, is not admissible."

In Tucker v. State, 7 Okl. Cr. 634, 124 Pac. 1134, 125 Pac. 1089, the defendant was convicted of an unlawful sale made by his wife. It was held that proof of other sales was admissible to show that the wife was acting for the defendant in making the sale.

In Bundy v. State, 16 Okl. Cr. 481, 184 Pac. 795, the defendant was convicted of an unlawful sale made by an employee. It was held that evidence of other unlawful sales was admissible to show that the sale charged was made with defendant's knowledge and consent.

In Thompson v. State, 189 Ind. 182, 125 N. E. 641, an employer and his employee were jointly charged with a specific sale made by the latter. The court said that, if the defendants had been tried separately, it would have been reversible error to admit proof of other sales in the trial of the employee, but that such evidence would have been admissible against the employer to show his complicity in the sale which was made by the employee.

In State v. Stamper, 159 Mo. App. 382, 141 S. W. 432, a druggist was prosecuted for a sale made by his clerk. It was held that proof of other sales by the clerk was properly allowed as tending to show the druggist's tacit consent to the making of unlawful sales by the clerk.

[3] The objections made to the proof of other sales were general as to both defendants, and no separate objection was made in behalf of defendant Luxton, nor was any request made that the consideration of such evidence be limited to the question of Silva's complicity in the offense charged. Under such circumstances, the admission of the evidence was not error.

[4, 5] It is contended that it was error to admit proof of the foregoing conversations between witnesses for the prosecution and Luxton and White. Admittedly, Luxton and White were Silva's bartenders, and therefore his agents in the conduct of his business. The statement of White that he would not sell "a bottle" to Dahm was of little, if any, importance. Luxton's statement to White to the effect that the latter was to act as lookout was in the nature of a direction as to White's duties for the night and was made in the course of Luxton's employment and, presumably, in the performance of his duties. It was not a narration by an agent of a past transaction, but was a part of the transaction itself. The statement was admissible as tending to show the manner in which Silva's business was conducted. Taken in connection with the positive testimony of Dahm that White was employed as a lookout, the testimony tends to show that Silva knew that illicit sales were being made, because a lookout is not usually employed in the conduct of a legitimate business. It must also be kept in mind that Silva, according to his own testimony, was at that time but 15 or 20 feet distant from Luxton. Silva was about 20 feet away when Kazar asked Luxton for whisky and "was told that they wasn't serving any, on account of the federal agents." It is even uncertain from the evidence whether Silva did not participate in the conversation with Kazar.

[6, 7] It is contended that the court committed prejudicial error in questioning the witness White. The defendants interposed no objections to any of the questions asked by the court, and it does not appear from the record that the defendants' rights were prejudiced by any of such questions. Of course, the trial judge should exercise great caution in the examination of witnesses, lest by the nature or form of the questions asked he throw the weight of his influence to the one side or the other. It may be further said that it is not only the privilege but the duty of the attorney for a party to make seasonable objection to any improper question asked by the judge.

[10] It is contended that the court erred in permitting Dahm and Kazar to testify as to the character of the liquors which they purchased without requiring proof that they knew the taste of such liquors. Yet, at page 55 of the transcript there appears Dahm's positive testimony that he was familiar with the taste of beer, wine, and whisky, and on page 59 appears the testimony of Kazar to the same effect. Kazar asked for whisky and "got a drink of jackass." It is now argued that there is no evidence to show the alcoholic contents of jackass brandy, and that courts cannot take judicial notice thereof. The courts do take judicial notice of "the true signification of all English words and phrases." Code Civ. Proc. § 1875. If there is any person at this late day who does not know that jackass brandy is a distilled liquor containing a high percentage of alcohol, he must have lived far from the haunts of the bootlegger and outside the zone of circulation of the daily press.

Other grounds urged for a reversal are manifestly without merit.

The judgments and the orders are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PETROVICH. (Cr. 743.)

1. Intoxicating liquors 🔑233(2)—Evidence of possession after sale charged held admissible to corroborate evidence of sale.

Where, in a prosecution for illegal sale of wine contrary to Wright Act, testimony of the sale on the date alleged was introduced, testimony, thereafter introduced, that accused 10 days after the alleged sale had large quantities of wine on his premises, which fact he admitted as well as that he paid the fine on account of the possession of such wine, held properly admitted in corroboration of the testimony as to the sale.

2. Criminal law 🔑807(1)—Instruction held properly refused as being argumentative.

In a prosecution for selling wine contrary to Wright Act, proposed instruction held properly refused as being argumentative.

3. Criminal law ⚷807(1)—Neither state nor accused entitled to argument from court in form of instruction.

Neither the people nor accused is entitled to an argument from the court in the form of an instruction.

4. Criminal law ⚷829(1)—Refusal to give instruction proposed held not prejudicial where correct portions thereof were given.

Refusal to give proposed instruction held not prejudicial where the correct portions thereof were given.

5. Intoxicating liquors ⚷242—Judgment sentencing accused to jail without option to pay fine for first violation of Wright Act held authorized.

Judgment sentencing accused to jail without option to pay fine for first violation of Wright Act held authorized.

6. Criminal law ⚷1169(2)—In prosecution for selling wine, admission of evidence showing visitors at accused's home held not prejudicial.

In a prosecution for sale of wine in violation of Wright Act, where accused on direct examination admitted many people visited his home because he had roomers and a family and because his son was sick, reception of evidence in rebuttal showing merely that he had had additional visitors could not be prejudicial.

7. Criminal law ⚷1186(4)—Erroneous admission of testimony of officer as to his observations of accused's home before sale charged held not sufficiently prejudicial to warrant reversal.

In a prosecution for selling wine contrary to Wright Act, testimony of police officer that a few days before the alleged sale he stood across the street from accused's home to ascertain whom accused was selling to, and that he saw a man come out of accused's home with a package wrapped in a newspaper, should have been excluded as immaterial; but its admission held not sufficiently prejudicial to warrant reversal in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, as whether the man had a bottle of wine was conjectural.

8. Criminal law ⚷1171(6)—Reference to accused's foreign lineage and indisposition to conform to American laws and customs held not to warrant reversal.

Reference by counsel to jury to accused's foreign lineage and the indisposition of foreigners to conform to American customs and laws, though improper and subject to be excluded, held not to result in miscarriage of justice so as to require reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

J. R. Petrovich was convicted of a liquor offense in violation of the Wright Act, and he appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Clifford A. Russell, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant was tried and convicted on an information charging him with having on or about the 3d day of July, 1923, in the county of Sacramento, state of California, unlawfully sold two bottles of wine contrary to the provisions of what is commonly known as the Wright Act of the state of California (St. 1921, p. 79). The defendant's motion for a new trial being denied, he prosecutes this appeal therefrom and also from the judgment of conviction in said cause.

As grounds for reversal the defendant alleges improper admission of testimony, erroneous instructions, and illegality of sentence.

The testimony introduced by the people is to the effect that the two bottles of wine were sold by the defendant, at the time stated, at his place of residence, to wit, 500 Q street in the city of Sacramento. It appears that the witness Horstmeyer, a police officer of the city of Sacramento, who was acquainted with the premises and had visited the same prior to the 3d day of July, 1923, went to the defendant's residence at about the hour of 9 p. m. on the day in question and personally solicited of the defendant the purchase of two bottles of wine. The witness and the defendant went into the dining room of the defendant's residence and some conversation was had as to the kind of wine desired by the purchaser, whether he wanted sweet or dry wine. The witness replied that he wanted a bottle of each. He also testified that the defendant went into another part of the building and returned with two quart bottles, delivered them to the witness, and the witness paid the defendant the sum of $2 for the two bottles of wine. These bottles of wine were subsequently analyzed and found to contain a much greater quantity of alcohol than that allowed in the Volstead Law (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138¼ et seq.). The two bottles of wine in question were properly identified and admitted in evidence. After this evidence had been introduced the prosecution placed upon the stand a witness by the name of E. J. Cox, also a member of the police department of the city of Sacramento. This witness testified that he went to the premises of the defendant on or about the 13th day of July with a warrant of arrest for the defendant and also with a search warrant authorizing him to make a search of the premises known as 500 Q street and then occupied by the defendant; that upon making a search of the premises he found and seized forty-five bottles of wine, five demijohns of wine, and three barrels of wine. All of the wine seized, excepting one or two bottles, was found in the basement of the premises occupied by the defendant.

The defendant denied the sale of the wine and in explanation, or as an attempt to refute the testimony of the witness Cox as to the possession of the large quantity of wine, introduced in evidence a permit to make 200 gallons of grape juice. The defendant further in his testimony admitted the possession of the wine, part of which he described as claret and part as white wine, and also that one of the barrels of wine had fermented and become vinegar. The defendant also, upon cross-examination, without any objection being interposed, testified that he had paid a fine of $200 on account of the illegal possession of the wine in question.

[1-3] It is strongly urged by the appellant that the testimony as to the possession of a considerable quantity of wine herein referred to 10 days after the date of the alleged sale, was not only erroneous but was seriously prejudicial. In behalf of this contention we are cited to a number of cases, notably People v. Smith, 221 Pac. 405, and People v. Amort, 60 Cal. App. 29, 212 Pac. 50, where it is held that upon a prosecution for an unlawful sale of liquor, evidence of other sales is inadmissible. So far as this case is concerned, we do not need to either limit or expand the principle there announced or question the correctness thereof for the simple reason that those cases are inapplicable to the issue here presented. This case involves the question of possession and is more nearly allied with the principle of law enunciated in many cases showing preparation and readiness to commit crime. While our attention has not been called to any cases in this state having to do with this question, it is by no means new. Other courts in considerable numbers have admitted such testimony.

In 33 Cor. Jur. 752, a general rule is stated as follows:

> "On a trial for keeping liquor for unlawful sale, maintaining a liquor nuisance, carrying on the business of liquor dealer, or other like offense in violation of the liquor laws, evidence as to defendant's ownership or possession of intoxicating liquors, or of appliances or apparatus used in the manufacturing or selling of such liquors, at or within a reasonable time before or after the alleged offense, is ordinarily admissible, unless it refers to a time after the beginning of the prosecution, although it has been held that evidence of possession after the alleged offense is not admissible to prove possession at that time. Unless such evidence is too remote in time to be admissible, the disparity in time between it and the time of the alleged offense affects only its weight or probative value. In a prosecution for an illegal sale or disposition of liquor evidence of ownership or possession is admissible only in corroboration of other evidence as to the fact of a sale, and hence is incompetent and irrelevant, for the purpose of showing whether or not an unlawful sale or disposition was made, unless it is introduced in connection with other evidence of such sale or disposition."

Only one case is referred to in the notes to the text just quoted holding that such testimony is inadmissible. It will be noted that in the case at bar, testimony as to the actual sale was first introduced and then, under the rule stated, testimony as to possession may be admitted for the purpose of corroborating the evidence as to the sale.

In the case of State v. Legendre, 89 Vt. 526, 96 Atl. 9, the Supreme Court of the state of Vermont held as follows:

> "In a prosecution for the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors, the evidence of the search of defendant's shop made by the officers thirteen days after the alleged unlawful sale, and of the whisky and empty bottles then found there, was admissible, as tending to show that intoxicating liquor had been kept there for illegal traffic, and as connecting defendant in ownership with the whisky sold at the time alleged"—citing in support of these statements Commonwealth v. Van Stone, 97 Mass. 548.

In Reub v. State, 93 Tex. Cr. R. 345, 247 S. W. 867, testimony of prosecuting officers that they went to the premises of the defendant and found intoxicating liquor was admissible. The court said:

> "We have frequently held that testimony of the manufacture by the accused of intoxicating liquor is admissible and has probative force when the charge against him is the selling of intoxicants."

The defendant in that case was charged and convicted of the offense of unlawful selling of intoxicating liquor.

In Holmes v. State, 12 Ga. App. 359, 77 S. E. 187, the court stated two propositions of law relative to the discovery of liquor in the possession of the defendant after the date of the alleged sale. The first is:

> "That the mere possession of liquor in any quantity or at any place was not a circumstance from which the jury might infer that the possessor had already been guilty of selling it."
> Secondly: "That it was competent to introduce in evidence the bottles of whisky found in the house of the accused where the alleged sale had taken place. This evidence of itself alone was worth little, but taken in connection with the testimony as to the sale, it might have some corroborative value."

In the case of Smith v. State, 12 Ga. App. 482, 77 S. E. 651, the Supreme Court of Georgia held that—

> "On the trial of one charged with the sale of intoxicating liquor, evidence that on the premises where the sale was alleged to have been made were found numerous empty bottles which had contained whisky, and other bottles and jugs which did contain whisky, was admissible in corroboration of the testimony in behalf of the state that a sale had been made."

Again, in the case of Craig v. State, 9 Ga. App. 233, 70 S. E. 974, the court held that—

> "On the trial of one charged with illegally selling whisky, it is not error to admit evidence that the house where the accused lived was searched by an officer subsequently to the day on which the alleged sale was made, and that bottles of whisky and empty bottles which had contained whisky were found therein. * * * The fact that the direct evidence was of a sale some months previous to the search of the house where the accused lived would only affect the weight or probative value of the circumstances that whisky and empty whisky bottles were found in the house. * * *"

A number of cases are there cited in support of such ruling.

In Wooten v. State, 17 Ga. App. 333, 86 S. E. 740, the same court again held that evidence of a large quantity of whisky discovered in a trunk belonging to the defendant was admissible upon a trial for the illegal sale of whisky.

In State v. Boynton, 155 N. C. 456, 71 S. E. 341, the Supreme Court of North Carolina held that—

> "In a prosecution for the illicit sale of whisky, evidence that prior to the sale charged defendant had whisky in his possession at different places in the city, and that at the places under his control whisky was being sold and drunk, and that persons who had been in his places of business had seen whisky and beer therein, is admissible to show that defendant had whisky on hand in prohibited territory and was prepared to make the illegal sale charged by the indictment."

Practically to the same effect is the case of De Graff v. State, 2 Okl. Cr. 519, 103 Pac. 538, where testimony was admitted showing that whisky and beer glasses, corks and bottles that looked like whisky and beer bottles were seen in the place and that in the back yard and on the same lot prohibited liquors were found.

In the case of Myers v. State, 52 Tex. Cr. R. 558, 108 S. W. 392, the Supreme Court of Texas held that—

> "Evidence of contemporaneous possession of whisky or other intoxicants by accused is admissible, where he is being prosecuted for a sale of intoxicating liquors. * * *"

But also held that testimony of possession of such liquors one to six weeks after the alleged sale was not so contemporaneous as to render such evidence admissible.

The same court, in Black v. State, 68 Tex. Cr. R. 151, 151 S. W. 1053, held in a prosecution for the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor evidence was admissible to show that the defendants had access to a quantity of whisky at the time of the alleged sale.

Also, in the case of McCuen v. State, 75 Tex. Cr. R. 108, 170 S. W. 738, it was held by the same court that whisky found on the person of the defendant on the second day after the alleged sale was admissible as a circumstance to show that the defendant had made the sale as charged.

In the case of Patton v. State, 66 Tex. Cr. R. 259, 145 S. W. 1189, the Supreme Court of Texas held that evidence was admissible on a trial for selling whisky to show that a large quantity of whisky had been received by the defendant.

A number of courts have held that evidence of the receipt of liquor prior to the date of the alleged sale to be admissible following the rule announced in the Texas case just cited.

In the instant case the defendant admitted the possession of wine. The mere fact that the wine was illegally in the possession of the defendant, and established his guilt of having intoxicating liquors in his possession unlawfully, constituted no reason why the testimony should not be admitted as corroborative evidence of the testimony as to the illegal sale charged in the information.

[4] The defendant also urges that the court committed prejudicial error in refusing to give the following instructions:

> "You are instructed that all presumptions of law are in favor of the innocence of persons accused of the commission of crime, and every person so accused is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is shown, and until his guilt is established by the evidence in the trial of the case, to your entire satisfaction and beyond all reasonable doubt.
> "The law is tender and careful of the lives and liberties of our people, and, in order to justify you in rendering a verdict, the effect of which may deprive a citizen of his life or liberty, every material fact necessary to establish the guilt of the defendant of the offense charged against him, whereby he may lose his life or liberty, must be established by those who are intrusted with the duty of prosecuting him, to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt. The law does not place upon the shoulders of a defendant in a criminal action the burden of proving that he is innocent of the offense charged, but it does impose upon the prosecution the necessity of proving his guilt so thoroughly and conclusively as to satisfy the minds of the jury that he is guilty to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, else he should be acquitted."

All the correct portions of said proposed instruction were included in other instructions given by the court. As proposed by the defendant, the instruction is argumentative in form and the court very properly refused to give the same. The law is too well settled that neither the people nor the defendant is entitled to an argument from the court in the form of an instruction to require any citation of authorities.

[5] We have heretofore, in the recent case of People v. Lamb, 227 Pac. 969, considered and disposed of the objection that the court has no jurisdiction to impose a jail sentence for a first offense in selling liquor. We there held such objection untenable. Further consideration of that question is therefore unnecessary.

[6, 7] During the course of the trial the witness Horstmeyer was allowed to testify as follows:

> "I went to the defendant's place on the night of the 30th of June. Q. And what did you see that night in reference to people going into the house, Mr. Horstmeyer?"

To this question the defendant objected that it was immaterial and not proper rebuttal. The objection was overruled, and the witness answered:

> "I stood across the street for the purpose of trying to find out whom he would sell wine to."

Mr. Russell, counsel for the defendant, made objection to that question as being a voluntary statement and the opinion and conclusion of the witness and asked that it be stricken out. The court denied the motion at this time, stating:

> "Proceed to finish your answer, and then I will rule. A. I stood across the street in the darkness of the shadow of a tree there, and I saw a car pull up; it was an Essex car; it pulled up, not directly in front of the house, but a little past the front of his house, and three young fellows got out, and two went in and one on the front stairs, and went right—
> "Mr. Henderson (interposing): And were they carrying anything when they went in, Mr. Horstmeyer, that you noticed? A. Not anything; no.
> "Mr. Russell: Now, then, just a minute, if the court please. May I refer back to the previous question?
> "Counsel for the people interrupted: I desire to make a motion.
> "The Court: Yes.
> "Mr. Russell: Now, your honor, I desire to move to strike out the first portion of the witness' answer to the previous question in reference to his conclusion and his observation 'I stood there across the street for the purpose of observing'—May I have the exact wording, Mr. Reporter, please?
> "Mr. Henderson: I will submit, if your honor please, that it is not any conclusion; that was just his object in standing there. He stood there, and he knows why he stood there.
> "The Court: The motion to strike out will be denied.
> "Mr. Russell: I move to strike out the entire answer, and those portions of it in reference to his standing there, as being not responsive to the question.
> "The Court: Motion is denied.
> "Mr. Henderson: All right.
> "Q. You say these young men that got out of the Essex car didn't have anything in their hands when they went in. A. Nothing; their hands were free.
> "Q. Did you see anything in their hands when they came out of the house, Mr. Horstmeyer? A. In one of them—in one of the young men's hand, he had a package, wrapped up in newspaper."

On direct examination the defendant testified that he had a great many visitors. One of his answers was:

> "Well, I got some roomers, and my family, and always I had visitors; you know, that time, my boy is sick in bed, you know, we have about 50 visitor every day."

[8] From this it follows that the mere fact of showing visitors additionally upon rebuttal could in no sense be prejudicial. That the testimony we have here set out should have been practically all excluded by the court is beyond question. The reasons for the witness standing there and the reasons which actuated him had nothing to do with the guilt or innocence of the defendant. Of course, it is apparent that the prosecution desired the inference to be drawn from the fact that one of the young men emerged from the residence with a package wrapped in a newspaper, that the defendant had then and there sold a bottle of wine; but as that was simply a matter of conjecture, we do not think it sufficiently prejudicial, in view of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, to warrant a reversal. We think the same is true in relation to the reference made by counsel for the people in his address to the jury concerning the foreign lineage of the defendant, and the indisposition of such persons to conform to American customs and laws. Such remarks are improper and should have been excluded by the court, but, though improper, did not, in our opinion, result in a miscarriage of justice, and furnish no grounds for a reversal of the judgment.

We think the order denying the motion for a new trial and the judgment entered herein should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS

In the Matter of the Application of Lynn F. SEILER for a Writ of Habeas Corpus. (Cr. 2660.) (Supreme Court of California. June 28, 1924.) In Bank. Application for writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the sheriff of Los Angeles county, to secure release of petitioner from custody on a commitment for contempt of court. Writ granted. Charles D. Wallace, of Long Beach, for petitioner. Edward T. Bishop, County Counsel, and Roy W. Dowds, Deputy County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, amici curiæ, in support of petition. Asa Keyes, Dist. Atty., and A. H. Van Cott, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent. P. E. Keeler, Spicer, Meacham & Mason, Knight, Lane & Goddard, McWhinney & Clock, and Doyle, Clark & Thomas, all of Long Beach, amici curiæ.

LENNON, J. This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus to secure the release of petitioner from detention made upon an order of commitment of the superior court of the county of Los Angeles for contempt of said court. Petitioner was regularly served with a subpœna duces tecum issued in an action pending before the superior court of Los Angeles county, department 28 thereof, purporting to sit in the city of Long Beach, pursuant to an order made by the judge of said department directing the issuance of said subpœna. Petitioner failed and refused to respond to such subpœna and was thereafter brought before the court upon an attachment. Petitioner was for such refusal adjudged guilty of contempt by said court and sentenced to pay a fine, and in default of the payment of such fine was remanded to the custody of the sheriff. An identical case in point of law and fact was presented to the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, and there the court, in an opinion rendered by Mr. Justice Houser, decided adversely to the respondent's contentions made therein. In the Matter of the Application of William G. Brady for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, 224 Pac. 252. Every point presented here was considered there, and no other or different argument is made here than was made there. We are satisfied with the conclusion reached in the Brady Case, and are in substantial accord with the reasoning generally upon which that conclusion is based. Upon the authority of that case, it is ordered that the petitioner herein be and he is hereby discharged from custody.

In the Matter of Frank GOMA, on Habeas Corpus. In the Matter of the Application of Jose REYES for a Writ of Habeas Corpus. (Cr. Nos. 1069, 1083.) (District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 4, 1924.) Applications for writs of habeas corpus to require the release of petitioners, imprisoned upon a charge of violating Stats. 1923, p. 695. Petitioners remanded. Two original applications for writs of habeas corpus, made to the District Court of Appeal for the Second Appellate District, Division 2. Scott McReynolds, of Ventura, for petitioner Goma. Edward Henderson, Dist. Atty., and James C. Hollingsworth, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Ventura, for respondent in Goma matter. L. A. Enos and John R. Stowe, both of San Luis Obispo, for petitioner Reyes. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent in Reyes matter.

WORKS, J. Each of the petitioners in the above-entitled proceedings is imprisoned upon a charge of having violated the provisions of a statute (Stats. 1923, p. 695) forbidding the possession by unnaturalized foreign-born persons of firearms of a certain character and description. Petitioners contend that the act is unconstitutional on various grounds, but its constitutionality has recently been upheld by a decision of the Supreme Court, which passes upon every question presented by them. See

In re Rameriz, 226 Pac. 914, decided by the Supreme Court May 29, 1924, where the provisions of the statute in question are more particularly set forth. In each of these proceedings, the writ is discharged, and the petitioner is remanded.

Ex parte Charles PRENOSIL, alias, on Habeas Corpus. (Cr. 1162) (District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 3, 1924.) Application for writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, to secure release of petitioner from custody on a charge of violating chapter 339, Statutes of 1923, section 2. Petitioner remanded. Albert Picard, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., Leo R. Friedman, Dep. Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent. R. M. J. Armstrong, of San Francisco, for sheriff of city and county of San Francisco.

TYLER, P. J. Application for writ of habeas corpus. The petitioner was prosecuted for the violation of the provisions of chapter 339, Statutes 1923, which is an act to control and regulate the possession, sale, and use of pistols, revolvers, and other firearms capable of being concealed upon the person. He was held to answer by one of the judges of the police court of the city and county of San Francisco upon this charge. Thereafter an information was filed by the district attorney under which petitioner was accused of the crime of felony, to wit, violation of section 2 of said act, and he claims that he is unlawfully and illegally imprisoned, for the reason that the act is unconstitutional and void, as it makes the possession of a firearm on the part of an alien a felony, while an infraction of the law by a citizen is only made a misdemeanor by the express terms of the act. This precise question has been passed upon by our Supreme Court in the Matter of the Application of Rameriz (Crim. No. 2636) 226 Pac. 914, decision filed May 29, 1924. Under the authority of that case, the writ herein is discharged, and the petitioner remanded.

OCEAN ACCIDENT & GUARANTEE CORPORATION, LIMITED, OF LONDON, ENGLAND v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (L. A. 7963.)

Rehearing Denied Aug. 14, 1924.)

1. Insurance ⊶435—Employer's policy construed to cover death of employee tunneling for sewer.

Workmen's compensation policy issued to contractor held to cover death of employee engaged in tunneling for a sewer, in view of St. 1917, pp. 831, 857.

2. Insurance ⊶146(3)—Construction of ambiguous contract against insurer.

Under Civ. Code, § 1654, where provisions of an insurance contract are not free from uncertainty, they must be construed most strongly against insurer who framed it and caused the uncertainty to exist.

In Bank.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Angela Sevillano Teso and others, claimants, for the death of Manuel Gejo Teso, her husband, opposed by E. J. O'Donnell, employer, and the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, Limited, of London, England, insurer. Order of the Industrial Accident Commission granting an award, and insurer brings certiorari. Affirmed.

George H. Moore, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, and R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an application by the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, Limited, for a writ of review of a certain record and award of the Industrial Accident Commission, whereby Angela Sevillano Teso, Maria del Los Angeles Gejo, Antonio Gejo, Jose Gejo and Alfonso Gejo, the widow and children of one Manuel Gejo Teso, deceased, were allowed an award against the petitioner herein as the insurer of one E. J. O'Donnell, who was the employer of said Manuel Gejo Teso at the time the latter suffered the injuries which resulted in his death. There is no dispute between the parties to this proceeding over the amount of said award or over the fact that Manuel Gejo Teso met his death while in the employ of said O'Donnell and in the course of his employment; the only question presented being as to whether the petitioner herein was liable as the insurer of said O'Donnell for the amount of said award under the terms of its policy.

The petitioner herein sets forth:

> "That there is no dispute in the evidence that on or about March 20, 1922, one Manuel Gejo Teso, while employed as a laborer by the defendant E. J. O'Donnell, was engaged in the work of digging a tunnel for a sewer in West Sixth street in the city of Los Angeles, California, and that while the said deceased was actually engaged in said labor in said tunnel, and while standing in water in said tunnel he took hold of an electric bulb or electric wire used by said employer in lighting said tunnel, and in so doing was electrocuted and met his death."

The petition herein also sets forth in full the insurance policy issued by the petitioner to said O'Donnell, and in force at the time of the death of his said employee. The respondents have embodied the record of the proceedings before the Industrial Accident Commission in their return and have also presented a demurrer to the sufficiency of the petition. The record does not vary materially from the averments of the petition. The insurance policy insures the said employer against liability for injuries sustained by his employees in the course of certain specified employments, which are set forth in certain "Declarations" therein under the head of "Classification of Operations." The policy also contains the provision that:

> "This agreement shall apply to such injuries so sustained by reason of the business operations described in said declarations which, for the purpose of this insurance, shall include all operations necessary, incident or appurtenant

⊶For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes thereto or connected therewith, whether such operations are conducted at the work places defined and described in said declarations or elsewhere in connection with or in relation to such work places."

The policy also contains the provisions that:

> "The premium is based upon the entire remuneration earned, during the policy period, by all employees of this employer engaged in the business operations described in said declarations, together with all operations necessary, incident or appurtenant thereto; excepting, however, the remuneration of the president, any vice president, secretary, or treasurer of this employer, if a corporation, but including the remuneration of any one or more of such designated officers who are actually performing such duties as are ordinarily undertaken by a superintendent, foreman or workman. If any operations as above defined are undertaken by this employer, but are not described or rated in said declarations, this employer agrees to pay the premium thereon, at the time of the final adjustment of the premium in accordance with condition C hereof, at the rates and in compliance with the rules of the Manual of Rates in use by the company upon the date of the issue of this policy."

Under the general title of "Declarations" and under the special heading therein of "Classification of Operations" in said policy appears the following statement of the operations with respect to which the employer is insured, viz.:

> "1 (a) Ditch digging—no sewer or canal building or excavation for water or gas mains—no blasting.
> "Waterworks—laying of mains and surface or house connections (no tunneling or blasting).
> "Gasworks—laying of mains and connections (no tunneling or blasting).

[1] It is the contention "of the petitioner herein that the foregoing Declarations" as to the employments and character of work covered by the terms and limitations of the policy in question expressly deny its benefits to the insured, and hence to his employee, when the occupation in which the latter was engaged when injured was that of tunneling for a sewer as averred in the petition herein and shown by the respondents' return. The respondents, on the other hand, contend that the descriptions in the "Declarations" above quoted, as to the classes of occupations in which the insured may engage are to be read and construed in the light of the other provisions of the policy above set forth, in which it is provided that "if any operations as above defined are undertaken by this employer but are not described or rated in said declarations, this employer agrees to pay the premium thereon at the time of the final adjustment of the premium in accordance with condition C hereof"; and that the classifications above mentioned are not to be held as limiting the list of operations in which the insured may engage, but only as fixing a premium rate applicable to the particular operations described therein; and that, even though the insured was engaged in tunneling for a sewer at the time of the injury to his employee, and was thus doing work outside of the terms and limitations expressed in said classifications, the effect of these was not to take him or his employee outside of the protection of the policy, but was only to require him to pay a different or higher premium than that provided for the particular employments specified in said "Declarations."

When the policy in question is read as a whole, and particularly when the portions thereof above quoted are read together, it will be seen that there is much persuasiveness in this view as to the proper interpretation to be placed upon this policy, since if the scope of the insurer's liability is to be confined to the employments named in the "Declarations," or even to those incident thereto, the language of the foregoing clause, providing for an adjustment of premiums for other employments not named in the declarations nor incident thereto, becomes meaningless. This court evidently took this view as to the proper interpretation of these two clauses in a similar policy when read together in the case of Worswick v. Industrial Accident Commission, 181 Cal. 550, 185 Pac. 953, wherein in construing a similar clause in the policy there under review and designated therein as "clause F," and which was substantially identical with clause A in the present policy, this court said:

> "The clear intention of the whole paragraph, clause or condition designated 'F' was to so enlarge the coverage of the policy as to include any change in or extension of the business described in the policy, provided always that such enlargement should not in any event be held to include work expressly specified as excepted."

In the case last above cited the court pointed out that the operations of the insured employer, out of which the application for an award in that case arose, were expressly specified as excepted by a proviso in clause F itself and were for that reason not within the coverage of that particular policy. There is no such proviso or limitation in clause A of the present policy, but the petitioner herein contends that such express exception and limitation is to be found within the language of the "Classifications" clause in said policy, which, as we have seen, reads as follows:

"1 (a) Ditch digging—no sewer or canal building or excavation for water or gas mains—no blasting.

"(6225)

"(6321)

It is the contention of the respondents herein, however, that the clauses in the foregoing "Classification of Operations," apparently exempting sewer or canal building or excavation for water or gas mains and also tunneling and blasting from such classification, was not intended to have that meaning or effect, but that these exceptions were merely intended to differentiate these operations from "ditch digging" or "waterworks" or "gas works" as to the rate of premium to be paid by the insured; or, in other words, to protect the insurer against any claim of the insured that the specified premium paid by him for coverage while engaged in "ditch digging" would suffice for coverage while building sewers or canals or making excavations for water or gas mains, or for blasting, in connection with any of the operations, or that the specified premium paid for coverage while laying mains and connections for waterworks or gasworks should suffice for coverage for the more dangerous operations of tunneling or blasting, if carried on during these occupations. A critical examination of this "Classification of Operations" shows plainly on its face that such and such only was the purpose of the several apparent "exceptions" embraced therein. For example, the first of these classifications specifies "ditch digging," but exempts from this classification "sewer or canal building or excavation for water or gas mains." It was evidently not intended to thereby exclude "excavations for water or gas mains" from coverage by this policy since the next two clauses in said classification expressly permit and embrace the laying of mains and connections for water and gasworks.

[2] In view of these facts, the utmost that can reasonably be claimed by the petitioner herein is that these classifications are uncertain as to just what operations were intended to be included within or excluded from their provisions, and this being so, under section 1654 of the Civil Code, the policy is to be construed most strongly against the insurer who drew the policy and caused the uncertainty to exist. Maryland Casualty Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 178 Cal. 491, 173 Pac. 993. There is also some evidence in the record before us relating to a contemporaneous interpretation placed upon the coverage of this policy by the action of the parties to it. It seems that upon two occasions prior to the casualty which gave rise to this proceeding workmen of the insured, while engaged upon this particular job, had received minor injuries which, while not serious enough in their nature to come before the Industrial Accident Commission, were sufficiently serious to require medical attention, and that in each of these cases the injured employees had been sent to the official physician of the insurer for treatment and had received such treatment, which facts were reported by the insured to the representatives of the insurer. The record also discloses that the employer was a general contractor and as such had been carrying insurance with this petitioner for several years prior to that in which the injury to his deceased employee occurred, and during which time he was engaged in such various occupations as digging ditches, bricking up stream boilers, laying concrete floors and sidewalks, cleaning tanks, repairing elevators, etc., and during which various employments his pay rolls were periodically inspected by his insurer and his premium rates fixed and paid according to the classification in general use by all companies carrying workmen's compensation insurance, wherein the amount of premium is based upon the hazard of the particular occupation.

This evidence is in harmony with the interpretation which the respondents herein would have us place upon this insurance policy read as a whole, and which we think should be placed thereon. It is also in harmony with the provisions of section 29 of the Workmen's Compensation Act as revised and amended in 1917 (Stats. 1917, pp. 831, 857), which requires that every employer coming within the terms of said act shall secure the payment of compensation to his employees by insuring and keeping insured against liability, either in one or more of the insurance carriers duly authorized to write compensation insurance in this state, or by securing from the commission a certificate of consent to self-insure, under penalties for failure so to do. Reading this insurance policy as a whole, in the light of the record before us and of the general policy of the law touching the matter of compensation insurance, we are satisfied that the interpretation which the petitioner would have us place upon its liability under the form of this policy cannot be approved.

ERNSTING et al. v. THE UNITED STAGES et al. (L. A. 7645.)

1. Trusts 🔑371(1)—Amended complaint in equitable action to impress corporation's property with trust held to state a cause of action.

In equitable action by owners of auto stages to impress property of corporation with trust to extent of value of rights which had been diverted by alleged fraudulent acts of plaintiffs' agent in obtaining franchise to operate auto stages in name of the corporation of his own creation, amended complaint held to state a cause of action.

2. Public service commissions 🔑19(1)—Orders and judgment of Railroad Commission on matters within its jurisdiction are conclusive.

Orders and judgments of Railroad Commission on matters that clearly fall within its jurisdiction are final and conclusive.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Marvin W. Conkling, Judge.

Action by Frederick Ernsting and others, members of United Stages, an association doing business under the name of United Stages, against The United Stages, a dissolved corporation, and others. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Robert G. Hill, of El Centro, for appellants.

S. W. Thompson and Herbert Kidd, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. Appeal from a judgment dismissing action, after demurrer sustained to the fourth amended complaint without leave to amend. The complaint contains two counts. The action was brought to enjoin a sale threatened to be made by defendant Thomas Morgan of a franchise conferring the right to operate auto stages over a described section of certain public highways of Imperial, San Diego, Los Angeles, and Santa Barbara counties, and to prevent the leasing of another section, both of which, it is claimed, are parts of a general system owned by plaintiffs; also to reform a lease of said franchise made between certain party litigants, and to quiet title to said franchises, for an accounting, and general relief.

The demurrer was general. The amended complaint is nebulous, and, had it been demurred to on any one of the special grounds named in subdivisions 7, 8, and 9 of section 430, Code of Civil Procedure, such a demurrer could have been properly sustained. We have given much time to an examination of the pleadings, with the view of determining whether it is sufficient as against a general demurrer. It is quite voluminous, and contains much irrelevant and immaterial matter, which has contributed to a confusion of the issues. This matter was permitted to remain without objection. No brief has been presented on behalf of respondents.

[1] It seems to be the theory of appellants, and perhaps the complaint contains allegations sufficiently direct and positive to support it, that appellants, after the adoption of the Auto Stage and Transportation Act, approved May, 1917 (chapter 213, p. 330, Stats. 1917), which placed with the Railroad Commission the supervision and regulation of auto stage transportation, appointed Thomas Morgan their attorney in fact and representative to appear before the commission in their behalf in the matter of fixing rates, fares, charges, classifications, rules, and regulations, and to represent them in all matters necessary to be done by said act. It is alleged that each of the appellants, including the "United Stages," was actually operating in good faith a transportation business over and upon certain of the routes in contest on May 1, 1917, and therefore, as in said act provided, were licensees under the act, and were not required to obtain from the commission a certificate of public convenience and necessity.

It is also alleged that appellants, long prior to May 1, 1917, were associated in operating an auto stage transportation business in the name of the "United Stages," and as such had earned, through the operation of said auto stages by its members and by the association as such, permits and licenses to do so; further, that said Morgan was appointed the attorney in fact of appellants and authorized and empowered to make application to the Railroad Commission for appellants in the name of "United Stages," to be placed under the supervision and regulation of said commission in the conduct of its business by authority of the license and privilege which it had theretofore earned, but that said Morgan, in violation of his duty and trust, made said application in the name of the "United Stages, Inc.," a corporation of his own creation, and in which the appellants had no interest whatsoever and that all of the rights, privileges, and prerogatives to which said "United Stages" was entitled were, by the fraud and deceit of said Morgan, obtained for and on behalf of said "United Stages, Inc.," and have since been used, exercised, and enjoyed by said corporation, to the exclusion of appellants, and that all the property rights which they rightfully owned in the way of franchises, permits, and privileges were made use of wrongfully to influence the commission to transfer them to the use and benefit of said corporation and to deprive the appellants thereof. In short, appellants are seeking by an equitable action to impress the property of said corporation with a trust to the extent of the value of the rights which they claim have been diverted by reason of the alleged fraudulent transaction.

[2] While we recognize the infirmities of the pleading, we are of the opinion that appellants have sufficiently alleged matters of a substantial character to permit them to go to trial. We do not wish to be understood by our ruling that this court will review the orders or judgments of the commission in matters that clearly fall within the jurisdiction of that body. In such cases its judgments are final and conclusive.

The judgment is reversed.

FAMOUS PLAYERS LASKY CORPORATION et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 11017.)

Master and servant 🔑367—Special employer of aeroplane pilot, furnished by general employer, held liable for compensation.

Aeroplane pilot, furnished by aircraft corporation to drive its plane one day in service of moving picture corporation, who, while so engaged and acting under direction of picture corporation, sustained injuries, held entitled to recover compensation of picture corporation as special employer, though compensation for his services was to be paid to aircraft corporation.

In Bank.

Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding for compensation before the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California by Harvey M. Pugh, claimant, opposed by the Famous Players Lasky Corporation, the State Compensation Insurance Fund, and others. The Commission awarded compensation, and the corporation named and the State Compensation Insurance Fund applied for certiorari. Award affirmed.

F. J. Creede and T. W. Slaven, both of San Francisco, and J. L. Kearney, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

W. H. Pillsbury and Walter Christie, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioners herein apply for a writ of review, whereby they seek to have reviewed and annulled a certain award made by the respondent commission in favor of one Harvey M. Pugh for injuries alleged to have been received by the latter while acting under the special employment and direction of the petitioner Famous Players Lasky Corporation. There is no material dispute as to the facts out of and in connection with which the injuries suffered by said Pugh arose. In March, 1923, the Famous Players Lasky Corporation was engaged in producing a moving picture film upon the Monterey peninsula, in the course of which certain scenes were to be filmed at Pebble Beach, near Carmel. It was deemed desirable by the representatives of the corporation to secure the use of two aeroplanes to fly within the range of the camera during these scenes, in order to give the desired effect. In seeking to procure these aeroplanes, the representatives of the corporation came into communication by telephone with the Williams Bros. Aircraft Corporation of San Francisco, which had at times operated a commercial flying field at San Carlos, but which was chiefly engaged in the business of the manufacture of aeroplane accessories, and which had a few areoplanes in stock at said place, which were used by it mainly for experimental flights in testing out aeronautical devices and equipment. They had no pilots on their regular staff, but when the request came from the Lasky Corporation they agreed to furnish them 2 aeroplanes, for which they agreed to find pilots for a total charge of $90 for the planes and pilots for the day. They accordingly sent the two aeroplanes, each with a pilot, one of which was Pugh, and each accompanied with a member of the Aircraft Corporation.

The only direction given to the pilots was that they were to fly from the San Carlos field to a polo field at or near Del Monte, where they were to report to the Lasky Corporation for instructions. This they did, and after some little delay were taken by the representatives of the Lasky Corporation over to the point at Pebble Beach where the scenes were being filmed and where their flight was to take place. Arriving there, the pilots were directed by those in charge of the filming to look through the camera to get its range of vision, and to direct their flight accordingly, so as to come within the picture. This they did, but after making one trial flight and landing were told that their planes would have to fly further out and lower in order to be in the picture. It was Pugh's better judgment that to fly lower would be dangerous, but he finally yielded to the request of the representative of the Lasky Corporation to bring his flying down to 75 feet in order to come within the scene. While making this flight the plane struck an air pocket and crashed to the ground, killing the representative of Williams Bros., who was a passenger with him, and seriously injuring Pugh. It would seem that, after reaching the scene of the flight, neither of the members of the Williams Aircraft Corporation exercised any control or direction over either of the pilots, and all of their instructions as to the time, place, and method of their flight were given them by the representatives of the Lasky Corporation.

The first contention of the petitioners herein is that the Williams Bros. Aircraft Corporation occupied toward the Lasky Corporation the relation of an independent contractor, supplying these aeroplanes with their pilots to the petitioner herein for a day's service and for a fixed price; that its employees were not the employees of the petitioner, and hence that for whatever injuries their employee, Pugh, suffered in the course of that employment, the petitioner herein cannot be held liable. That this is the general rule with respect to the employees of independent contractors there can be no doubt, but this general rule has this important limitation. Where either by the terms of the contract or during the course of its performance the employee of the alleged independent contractor comes under the control and direction of the other party to such contract, and suffers injury in the course of and in consequence of such direction and control, the relation of both general and special employer may be held to exist, and the injured employee has been held entitled to compensation from both the general and the special employer. This court had occasion to deal with this subject, and did so exhaustively, in the case of Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation v. Industrial Accident Commission, 179 Cal. 432, 177 Pac. 273, and therein pointed out both the general principle and the limitation thereof, and the reason for both, and also pointed out the distinction between that case and the case of Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721, upon which the petitioner herein strongly relies, a distinction which has also application, we think, to the case at bar. In the case of Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra, this court quotes approvingly from the case of De Noyer v. Cavanaugh, 221 N. Y. 273, 116 N. E. 992, wherein that court, in reconciling its decision in that case with the case of Nolan v. Cranford, 219 N. Y. 581, 114 N. E. 1074, said:

> "Even where no property of the general employer is intrusted to the employee to be used in the special employment, the general employer pays the compensation, may direct the employee when to go to work, and may discharge him for refusal to do the work of the special employer. The Industrial Commission, therefore, has full power to make an award against the general employer. It does not follow that by the application of this rule the special employer is not to be held in any case. The fact that a workman has a general and a special employer is not inconsistent with the relation of employer and employee between both of them and himself. If the men are under the exclusive control of the special employer in the performance of work which is a part of his business, they are, for the time being, his employees. Comerford's Case, 224 Mass. 571, 573, 113 N. E. 460. Thus at one and the same time they are generally the employees of the general employer and specially the employees of the special employer. As they may, under the common law of master and servant, look to the former for their wages and to the latter for damages for negligent injuries, so under the Workmen's Compensation Law they may, so far as its provisions are applicable, look to the one or to the other, or to both, for compensation for injuries due to occupational hazards."

This court further said in reference to the case from which the above excerpt is taken:

> "While we have heretofore held that an independent contractor is not entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Law, we find nothing in our decisions which would prevent our following the rule announced by the Court of Appeals of New York in the case of De Noyer v. Cavanaugh, supra, and recognizing the fact that in some cases where, at the time of the accident, both the general and special employer exerted some measure of control over the injured person through their respective foremen or employees, both should be held liable."

In the more recent case of Pruitt v. Industrial Accident Commission, 189 Cal. 459, 209 Pac. 31, this court, while recognizing the rule to be as above stated that where, at the time of the accident both the general and the special employer exercised some measure of control over the injured employee, both should be held liable, held upon a review of the facts of that case that the applicant had not brought himself within the rule entitling him to hold the general employer, but did uphold the award against the insurance carrier of the special employer. The evidence in this proceeding substantially showed that the general employer of the applicant for an award contracted to supply two aeroplanes with pilots to go to the location of the petitioner herein, at or near Carmel, there to make a flight under the direction of the representatives of the petitioner while they were engaged in filming a scene for a moving picture; that such flight was to be conducted at such height and at such distance from the camera being used in filming the scene as would bring said planes within the range of said camera, thus forming "atmosphere" for the background of the scene; that while the pilots of said planes in going to said location and while making their flight thereat were accompanied by two officials of the Williams Bros. Aircraft Corporation, they gave to the pilots of said planes no other direction than that they should put themselves under the direction of the representatives of the petitioner herein as to the details of said flight; that, while they doubtless might have vetoed the instructions given by petitioner, they did not do so, but rather tacitly concurred therewith; that from the time of the arrival of the pilots with their planes and passengers at the place where the flight was to be undertaken the pilots did in fact conduct both their flights under the direction of the representatives of the petitioner herein; that the first flight was unsuccessful, for the reason that the planes flew too high and too near to come within the range of the camera, wherefore the petitioner's representatives directed the pilots to make another flight lower and farther away than before. The pilots, after some demurring as between themselves upon the ground that such lower flight would be dangerous, but after no conference with or direction from the representatives of the general employer, obeyed the instruction of the representatives of the petitioner who were directing the filming of the scene, and flew across its range of vision much nearer the surface than they themselves deemed safe, with the result that toward the close of the flight the plane which the pilot Pugh was driving was caught in an air pocket and crashed to the earth, killing the passenger and seriously injuring the pilot Pugh.

We are of the opinion that these facts, as shown in the record before us, fully justify the application of the doctrine approved by this court in the cases above referred to, holding that, when the relation of both a general and a special employer is shown to exist, the award may be sustained as against both. In the case of the general employer, such award has heretofore been upheld by this court. It will also be upheld in the case of the petitioner herein, for the reasons above set forth.

ANGLO LONDON PARIS CO. et al. v. JOHNSON, State Treasurer. (S. F. 11207.)

1. States 🔑153—Statutes providing for notice by publication of sale of bonds held substantially complied with.

State Highways Act of 1915, adopted by Const. art. 16, §§ 2, 3, providing notice of time and place of sale of highway bonds by publication in two newspapers once a week for four weeks preceding sale, was substantially complied with by publication in two newspapers for three weeks and publication in such newspapers as combined on fourth week, where such consolidated newspaper was delivered to every subscriber of either or both of such newspapers, and was distributed in same manner in which both newspapers had been distributed.

2. Statutes 🔑235—Requirements of statute in which public welfare is concerned should be liberally construed.

Application for writ of mandate by the Anglo London Paris Company and another against Charles G. Johnson, Treasurer of the State of California. Writ granted.

McKinstry, Haber & Firebaugh, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert W. Harrison, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This application is for a writ of mandate, wherein the petitioners seek to compel the respondent herein, as treasurer of the state of California, to sell and deliver to the petitioners certain bonds designated as "highway bonds of the state of California" at the par value of $3,000,000, which said bonds were bid for and purchased by the petitioners at a public sale thereof held at the office of the respondent as such state treasurer on the 26th day of June, 1924, pursuant to certain proceedings for the issuance and sale of said bonds purporting to have been taken and had under the provisions of article 16, sections 2 and 3 of the state Constitution. The facts with relation to said proceedings are set forth in the petition herein, and are conceded to be correctly set forth therein by the return and answer of the respondent. They are briefly these: The provisions of sections 2 and 3 of article 16 of the Constitution in relation to the issuance and sale of state highway bonds adopt the provisions of the act of the Legislature approved May 20, 1915, known as the State Highways Act of 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 650) relative to the procedure for initiating, advertising, and holding sales of such bonds. Said act provides that "The state treasurer shall give notice of the time and place of sale by publication in two newspapers published in the city and county of San Francisco" (and in certain other newspapers) "once a week for four weeks next preceding the date fixed for such sale." Section 4. The date fixed for the sale of the bonds in question was June 26, 1924. The state treasurer duly published his notices of the sale of said bonds in the other newspapers outside of San Francisco as required by said statute. He also selected and designated as the two within the city and county of San Francisco in which such notices were to be published the San Francisco Journal and Daily Journal of Commerce and the Bulletin, each a newspaper of general circulation therein at the time of the designation and inception of such publication, and such notices were accordingly and in due form published in the San Francisco Journal and Daily Journal of Commerce on May 28, June 4, June 11, and June 18, 1924, and were also published in the Bulletin on May 28, June 4, June 11, and June 18, 1924. Between the dates of June 18, 1924, and June 25, 1924, the said two newspapers combined and consolidated, and on June 25, 1924, the said notice of said sale was published in said combined and consolidated newspapers published on said date, and thereafter under the name of the Bulletin and San Francisco Journal and Daily Journal of Commerce within said city and county of San Francisco. It is alleged in the petition herein, and admitted in the return of the respondent thereto, that said publication was made on said date in each of the six successive editions of said combined and consolidated newspapers issued at various times during said day, and that such combined and consolidated newspapers containing such published notice were delivered or mailed to each and every person who was a subscriber of either or both of said newspapers prior to and at the date of said publication thereof, and also that the said editions and issues of said combined and consolidated newspapers on and after the date of said publication of said notice were generally sold and distributed in each and every community in which prior to the date of the combination and consolidation of said newspapers the editions and issues thereof had been sold and distributed.

[1, 2] We are entirely satisfied that upon the foregoing conceded facts attending the publications of the notices of the sale of said highway bonds at the time and place named therein substantial compliance has been had with the requirements of the said statute relating to the sale of said bonds. It is to be noted that the proceeding which was to culminate in the sale of these bonds was not a proceeding in invitum in which the rights of individuals might be injuriously affected, but that such proceedings were in aid of a great public improvement in which the general welfare was concerned and in respect to which the requirements of the statute should be liberally construed. At the date of the inception of the required publication to be given in the city and county of San Francisco as to the time and place fixed for the sale of said bonds the two newspapers so selected for such publication were being separately conducted and issued, each under its own name, each with its own body of subscribers, and each in all respects qualified to be the medium of such publication as the statute requires. In the merger and consolidation of said two newspapers during the course of such publication the identity of each or either was not intended to be lost, as was evident from the fact that the name of each was preserved, and that the subscribers of each were as fully served by mail or carrier after as before such consolidation. The substantive purpose of the statute was thus as fully subserved as though the publication of each newspaper had been separately continued until after such publication in each had been completed. The language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Sage v. Central Railroad Co., 99 U. S. 334, 347 (25 L. Ed. 394), a case which in certain of its essential aspects is similar to the case at bar has direct application both in reasoning and authority to the instant situation. The court said:

> "The purpose of the order to advertise in that newspaper was publicity, and to reach those persons who saw the paper. That purpose was not defeated by a change of name or a union with another newspaper. This objection, therefore, is formal rather than substantial."

Let the writ issue as prayed for.

OUZOONIAN et ux. v. VAUGHAN et al. (DER BOGHOSIAN, Intervener). (S. F. 11109.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑82(1)—Appeal from special order after judgment constituting final adjudication dismissed where not taken in time.

An appeal from an order directing that property in hands of a receiver be turned over to plaintiffs in an action to quiet title to real estate and for recovery of personal property would be dismissed where taken over a year after date of such order; such order constituting a special order made after final judgment in the action and being a final adjudication.

2. Appeal and error 🔑907(3) — Appellate court required to assume that findings are fully supported by evidence where not inconsistent with judgment.

On appeal upon judgment roll alone, there being no bill of exceptions nor reporter's transcript, and findings not being inconsistent with judgment appealed from, appellate court is required to assume that they are fully supported by the evidence.

3. Appeal and error 🔑907(3) — Appellate court required to assume that trial court's omission to find facts favorable to intervener was because of lack of evidence.

Where facts found would not support a judgment in favor of intervener, appellate court was required to assume in absence of a bill of exceptions, or reporter's transcript of the testimony, that trial court's omission to find other facts favorable to intervener's contention was because no evidence was produced which would justify such findings.

Action by James Ouzoonian and wife against J. Vaughan and others, in which John Der Boghosian intervenes. Judgment for plaintiffs, and intervener appeals. On motion to dismiss intervener's appeal. Appeal dismissed.

See, also, 221 Pac. 958.

N. Lindsay South and Geo. G. Graham, both of Fresno, for appellant.

E. C. Loughlin and M. F. McCormick, of Fresno, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This case comes before us upon a motion of the plaintiffs and respondents to dismiss three appeals on the part of the intervener and appellant. A somewhat extended statement of facts is necessary to an understanding of the questions raised thereby. In 1920 the plaintiffs, being the owners of a ranch property together with certain personal property located thereon and used in the operation thereof, entered into a contract for the sale of said real and personal property to the defendants Vaughan at a price payable in installments, under which contract the defendants entered into possession of said land and personal property. Thereafter, in June, 1921, defendants executed to the intervener a promissory note secured by a chattel mortgage upon the crops to be produced upon said property in the year 1922. In December, 1921, plaintiffs commenced an action against defendants, in which they pleaded the conventional allegations of a suit to quiet title to the premises described in the contract and in addition thereto they set out the contract in hæc verba, alleged various defaults on the part of the defendants in the performance thereof, alleged the commission of waste upon said premises by the defendants in failing to properly farm and care for the same, averred that the appointment of a receiver was necessary to properly care for said premises and the vines growing thereon, and prayed for the appointment of such receiver, for a decree adjudging the contract forfeited, quieting the title of the plaintiffs, and debarring the defendants and all persons claiming under them from asserting any claim whatsoever in and to the premises. In December, 1921, plaintiffs also filed an affidavit alleging that said premises were set to fruit trees and grape vines, that the defendants had neglected and were then neglecting to properly care for the same, by reason of which the premises had depreciated several thousand dollars in value, and that unless a receiver should be appointed to properly care for said trees and vines the same would become an utter loss, alleging the insolvency of the defendants and praying for the appointment of a receiver "to farm said premises during the pendency of this action, to have all powers given a receiver by law." The defendants appeared and filed an answer and a cross-complaint, to which an answer was filed by the plaintiffs. Thereafter, in July, 1922, an order was made appointing a receiver to take possession of the property and to "care for said real property and the vineyards and orchards growing thereon and the crops to be produced on said premises; to sell the said crops at such times and upon such terms as he shall determine to be for the best interests of the parties interested therein * * * and in general to maintain said property in good condition and to hold all of said property and the net proceeds of the sale of any crops produced thereon until the further order of this court." The receiver took possession of the premises, harvested the crops, and sold the same and collected the proceeds thereof. Thereafter, in November, 1922, the intervener, by permission of court, filed his complaint in intervention, setting up the execution of his note and chattel mortgage and praying for the foreclosure thereof and for the sale of the crops upon said premises. The complaint in intervention was unverified, and, so far as appears from the transcript herein, no answer thereto was filed by either the plaintiffs or the defendants. Thereafter, on November 23, 1922, a trial was had, at the conclusion of which the court filed written findings of fact and conclusions of law in which it found in favor of the plaintiffs upon all of the issues of fact as between the plaintiffs and defendants, and concluded that the defendants did not have, either at the time of the commencement of the action or at the time of the making of the findings, any estate, right, title, or interest in or to said real property or said personal property, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment quieting their title against the defendants and each and every person claiming or to claim by, through, or under said defendants, or either of them, and forever debarring and enjoining said defendants, and each of them, and each and every person claiming or to claim by, through, or under them, or either of them, from setting up or asserting any right, title, interest, estate, claim, or equity in or to said property or any part or portion thereof. This was followed by the entry, December 1, 1922, of a judgment to like effect, which provided further that—

> "The court reserves the right to make all necessary further orders, judgments and decrees relative to the appointment of the receiver in this action and the disposition of all properties which have heretofore or may hereafter come into his possession."

The preamble to these findings of fact recites the appearance of counsel for the plaintiffs and defendants, respectively, but does not mention the intervener or his counsel. It is apparent from the record, however, that the intervener and his counsel did appear and participate in said trial. Thereafter the receiver filed his report and account and a hearing was had thereon January 19, 1923, upon notice to all parties, at which hearing the intervener appeared by his counsel in opposition to the confirmation of said report and account, and orally presented objections thereto, and the court made its order overruling said objections, settling the account of the receiver, fixing his compensation, and directing the payment by him of the balance remaining in his hands, amounting to about $2,000, to the plaintiffs. This order was entered January 30, 1923.

Thereafter, on June 27, 1923, other findings of fact were filed, reciting that the cause came on for hearing on November 23, 1922, the parties appearing by their counsel, including the intervener and his counsel, finding the facts as to the execution of intervener's chattel mortgage, and "that plaintiffs are and at all times since the commencement of this action have been entitled to the possession of said real property and all crops produced thereon since the commencement of this action," and concluding that the intervener should take nothing by reason of his complaint in intervention. On June 28, 1923, the intervener filed a notice of appeal from the "judgment of the trial court given in favor of plaintiffs on the 27th day of June, 1923," and "from the order of the court made June 26, 1923, ordering and directing the property mentioned in intervener's complaint paid out to the plaintiffs by the receiver." These appeals were thereafter on motion dismissed upon the ground that the judgment having been entered December 1, 1922, and the order settling the accounts of the receiver and directing the payment of money by him to the plaintiffs January 30, 1923, the appeals therefrom were too late, and that an appeal would not lie from the findings dated June 27, 1923, for the reason that no judgment had been entered thereon. Ouzoonian v Vaughan (Cal. App.) 221 Pac. 958. Thereafter, on February 7, 1924, at the request of intervener, the trial court entered a judgment upon the findings of June 27, 1923, that the intervener take nothing by his said action. Thereupon and on the same day the intervener filed notice of appeal "from the judgment of the trial court given in favor of the plaintiffs and against the intervener on the 7th day of February, 1924, upon the findings of fact and conclusions of law filed June 27, 1923," and "from the order of the court on directing the property mentioned in intervener's complaint to be delivered to the plaintiff by the receiver" and "from the order appointing said receiver as a part of the appeal from the aforesaid judgment." These are the appeals at which the present motion to dismiss is directed.

[1] Intervener now concedes that his appeal from the order appointing the receiver is ineffective because taken too late. He asserts, however, that his appeal from the judgment of February 7, 1924, is in time and that—

> "The appeal from the order directing the property to be turned over to the plaintiffs or the respondents here comes up with the appeal from the judgment and as a part thereof."

The order directing the property in the hands of the receiver to be turned over to the respondents was a special order made after final judgment in the action, and was therefore an appealable order. The intervener has in fact already prosecuted one appeal therefrom and his appeal has been dismissed upon the ground that it was taken too late. (Cal. App.) 221 Pac. 958. Intervener contends, however, that he is now entitled to a review of this order in connection with his appeal from the judgment of February 7, 1924. Respondents reply that the purported judgment of February 7, 1924, is a nullity for the reason that all issues and controversies between the parties were determined and concluded by the judgment of December 1, 1922. Respondents assert that that judgment, which debarred not only the defendants, but "each and all persons claiming or to claim by, through or under them or either of them, * * * from making, setting up, or asserting any right, title, interest, estate, claim or equity in or to said real property or said personal property or any part or portion thereof adverse to paintiffs" was necessarily an adjudication and estoppel against the intervener as to all of his rights and claims herein. It may be inferred from the record that the trial judge was of the contrary opinion. In our view it is unnecessary to determine this question for the reason that if it be assumed that the first judgment was not an adjudication of the claim of the intervener, it follows that the order which was made after the judgment, and which directed the receiver to pay over to the plaintiffs the balance of funds remaining in his hands, was such an adjudication. The intervener was an active party litigant at the hearing which resulted in that order. The only controverted question of importance then before the court for adjudication was whether the funds then remaining in the hands of the receiver should be paid to the plaintiffs or to the intervener. These funds consisted of the proceeds of the crops which had been harvested by the receiver upon the premises in controversy during the year 1922. The plaintiffs claimed to be entitled thereto by virtue of their ownership of the premises and their right to the possession thereof from and after the institution of the action, which was December, 1921. The intervener claimed to be entitled thereto by virtue of his chattel mortgage. The trial court decided this issue in favor of the plaintiffs and against the intervener and made its order directing the receiver to pay over said proceeds to the plaintiffs. This was an adjudication that the claims of the intervener were without right. Whether that adjudication was correct or incorrect it is now final and conclusive against the intervener because the time for appeal therefrom had long since elapsed when this appeal was taken. The only question presented by the present appeal which touches the merits of the case is the question of intervener's rights under his chattel mortgage. That question having been determined by an adjudication which has become final and conclusive upon the parties, it would be a vain and useless thing to retain the appeal in this court for further consideration of a question which is no longer open to reconsideration as between these parties, and the motion to dismiss should be granted.

[2, 3] We arrive at this conclusion the more readily by reason of the fact that an examination of the record upon this appeal convinces us that aside from the matter of estoppel by the previous judgment, we should be compelled to affirm the judgment here appealed from in any event. The appeal is upon the judgment roll alone, there being no bill of exceptions or reporter's transcript. The findings are not inconsistent with the judgment appealed from and we are required to assume that they are fully supported by the evidence. The facts found would not support a judgment in favor of the intervener, and we are required to assume, in the absence of a bill of exceptions or reporter's transcript of the testimony, that the omission of the trial court to find other facts favorable to intervener's contention was due to the fact that no evidence was produced which would justify such findings.

The appeals are dismissed.

1. Subrogation 🔑1—When principle of subrogation is applicable stated.

The principle of subrogation applies when one party pays a debt for which another is primarily answerable, and which, in equity and good conscience, should be discharged by the latter.

2. Insurance 🔑606(1) — Insurer's right of subrogation arises out of nature of contract of insurance as one of indemnity.

Insurer's right of subrogation against wrongdoer does not rest upon any relation of contract or of privity between them, but upon the nature of the contract of insurance as a contract of indemnity, and arises independently of a provision in the insurance contract which gives insurer the right to recover damages from the person responsible for the loss.

3. Insurance 🔑606(1)—Insurer paying loss is subrogated to insured's right of action only to amount of loss paid.

An insurer paying amount of loss on property insured is subrogated only in a corresponding amount to the insured's right of action against one responsible for the loss.

4. Parties 🔑84(1)—Wrongdoer sued by insurer under right of subrogation may be held liable to insured in another action by latter if nonjoinder of parties waived.

If a wrongdoer in action against him by an insurer for the amount of damages covered by the insurance does not demur or enter a plea in abatement because of nonjoinder of insured, the defect is waived, and he may be liable to insured in another action for the amount of the loss not covered by the insurance policy.

5. Subrogation 🔑41(1)—When court of law may treat plaintiff as assignee and allow him to maintain action of legal nature upon right to which he claims to be subrogated.

A court of law may deal with subrogation as it may with assignment, and when a right of action to which a plaintiff asks to be subrogated is a legal right of action, it may treat a plaintiff who is entitled in equity to subrogation as an assignee, and allow him to maintain an action of a legal nature upon the right to which he claims to be subrogated.

6. Subrogation 🔑41(1)—Equitable subrogated cause of action must be sued on in equity.

If a cause of action to which plaintiff claims to be subrogated is an equitable one, he must sue in equity, where he can always sue in his own name.

7 Subrogation 🔑41(1)—How right of subrogation may be established.

The right of subrogation is a right which must be established by a proceeding in equity, or, if there is a statute which recognizes the right in any particular class of claims and the right to which the party claiming subrogation is a legal right, then such right may be enforced in a court of law; in other cases the enjoyment of the right depends upon the remedy provided.

8. Subrogation 🔑41(1) — So-called equitable right is enforceable in court of law where law and equity are merged in single forum.

Where there is a merger of law and equity, and a single forum is theoretically capable of taking cognizance of all rights, both legal and equitable, a so-called equitable right may be enforced in a court of law.

9. Courts 🔑125—Action by insurer entitled to subrogation held one at law, not within superior court's jurisdiction unless claim exceeds $300.

Payment by insurer to insured of loss suffered by insured from acts of defendant wrongdoer vested in insurer a complete legal ownership and right of action by subrogation, cognizable in a court of law, in view of Civ. Code, § 954 (Code Civ. Proc. § 367), so that, where such a cause of action instituted in superior court was less than $300 within Code of Civ. Proc. § 112, the superior court in overruling a demurrer to the complaint on theory it had equitable jurisdiction under Code Civ. Proc. § 76, subd. 1 (Const. art. 6, § 5), erred.

10. Pleading ⚷49—Insurer's prayer to be subrogated to insured's rights held not to determine nature of insurer's action.

Prayer of plaintiff insurance company that the court decree plaintiff to be subrogated to rights of insured to whom plaintiff paid losses sustained by him held not to determine nature of insurer's action.

Original application for writ of prohibition by Karl Offer against the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco and George H. Cabaniss as Judge thereof. Writ granted.

Horace W. B. Smith and P. R. Lund, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

John Ralph Wilson, C. B. Morris, and H. H. Price, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition made by the attorney for and on behalf of the petitioner, the party beneficially interested, to restrain the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco and Hon. George H. Cabaniss, judge thereof, from proceeding to trial of an action for an amount less than $300, upon the grounds that the superior court has no jurisdiction in the premises, and that the petitioner has no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. An order to show cause was ordered to issue.

It appears that the Maryland Casualty Company, a corporation, as plaintiff, commenced an action against Karl Offer, as defendant, in the superior court of the state of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco, by filing a verified complaint to enforce the alleged liability of the said defendant, amounting to the sum of $53.25, for damages caused to a certain automobile, the property of one R. C. Lamayson, to whom the plaintiff had theretofore issued a certain policy of insurance, commonly called collision insurance, whereby the plaintiff agreed to pay to said R. C. Lamayson any damages which he might sustain by reason of collision; and it was further agreed that, if said automobile were damaged by collision through the fault of any third person, any amount recovered from such third person on account of said damages should be for the benefit of plaintiff, and that plaintiff should have a right to sue for such damages, and that in any action so brought the said R. C. Lamayson would assist plaintiff to recover. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled on the ground that, although the complaint involved the recovery of a sum of money less than $300, the court nevertheless had jurisdiction, and it is alleged that the trial will be proceeded with if the writ is not issued.

It is claimed in support of the application that the superior court is without jurisdiction (section 5, art. 6, Const.; section 112, Code Civ. Proc.) to entertain or further proceed in said action except to dismiss it for lack of jurisdiction.

Respondents claim jurisdiction upon the ground that section 76, subd. 1, Code of Civil Procedure, and section 5, art. 6, of the Constitution, provide that the superior court shall have original jurisdiction in all cases in equity; that, if a principle of equity is the foundation of the action, the amount of money involved is not controlling; that the right of subrogation is applicable in a case of insurance, but that in the case at bar there was in fact no complete subrogation, but only a right to the amount sued for when recovered. It is apparent from respondents' brief that what is meant by "no complete subrogation" is that the right must first be judicially determined. In answer to the petitioner's claim that the right of subrogation has become cognizable in a court of law, especially when the right of action to which the party asks to be subrogated is a legal one, respondents claim that "it cannot be said that the plaintiff is compelled to seek his remedy at law rather than in equity."

Concerning the right of subrogation it was said in a note in 25 R. C. L. 1391:

> "By the civil law a surety paying the debt is subrogated to the rights of the creditor, ipso facto, but in modern practice the true rule would seem to be that a surety by payment does not become ipso facto subrogated to the rights of the creditor, but only acquires a right to such subrogation, and that before the substitution or equitable assignment can actually take place he must actively assert his equitable right thereto. It is not a substantive tangible right of such nature and character that it can be seized and held and enjoyed independently of a judicial proceeding. It is a right in action only, that is, it must be established by a judicial proceeding. For this purpose resort must be had to a civil action. Strictly speaking, there are two distinct causes of action in such cases—one consists of those facts that show the right to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor in the securities held by the latter; the other consists of those facts which show that the security may be enforced against the principal. In the natural order of precedence, the party must establish his right to be subrogated to the security before he can be permitted to enforce it."

The note goes on to show that in every case the right to subrogation need not be first judicially determined, for if there is a statute providing for subrogation it is not necessary to the recognition of the right that there be a judicial determination thereof. 68 L. R. A. 574, 577, 587.

[1-2] The principle upon which the right of subrogation is founded applies to cases of suretyship, but it is applied in all cases in which "one party pays a debt for which another is primarily answerable, and which, in equity and good conscience, should have been discharged by the latter." Sheldon on Subrogation, p. 2. Thus insurance companies are given the right. Id. p. 333 et seq. This right of the insurer against the wrongdoer does not rest upon any relation of contract or of privity between them, but arises out of the nature of the contract of insurance as a contract of indemnity. The right arises independent of a provision in the contract of insurance which gives the insurer the right to recover damages from the person responsible for the loss. 44 Am. St. Rep. 731–739.

[3] However, it is plain that the insurer on paying the amount of the loss on the property insured is subrogated only in a corresponding amount to the insured's right of action against any other person responsible for the loss. Liverpool & Great Western Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co., 129 U. S. 397, 9 Sup. Ct. 469, 32 L. Ed. 788; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Great Lakes Engineering Works Co., 184 Fed. 426, 107 C. C. A. 20, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 60. It may be suggested that to permit the insurer to sue at law in cases where the extent of the loss is not covered by the insurance policy would result in splitting a cause of action sounding in tort, and thus subject the defendant to two suits upon a single cause of action. It seems, however, that this result may be avoided by joining the insured as a coplaintiff (Fairbanks v. S. F. & N. P. Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 579, 47 Pac. 450), or as a codefendant if the insured refuses to join as plaintiff (Liverpool, etc., Ins. Co. v. S. P. Co., 125 Cal. 434, 58 Pac. 55), and if the plaintiff fails to do so the defendant may protect himself by pleading such defects of parties, either by demurrer or by plea in abatement. See, also, note, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 835. In Powell v. Wake Water Co., 171 N. C. 290, 88 S. E. 426, Ann. Cas. 1917a, 1302, cited in the note, the wrongdoer had settled the claim of the insured for damages over and above the amount of the insurance which was paid to the insured by the insurers. The insurance companies then instituted a suit against the wrongdoer in their respective names for the amount of the insurance paid. In affirming the judgment it was held that the action was properly brought, the court saying:

> "If the insurance is less than the loss, and the insured has settled the difference between the insurance and the total loss with the wrongdoer, leaving unsettled only the amount of damages, measured by the insurance, that the cause of action for this damage would be in the insurer, for the reason that the insured has parted with all beneficial interest in the right of action, and, while the cause of action was indivisible, it has been divided by the act of the parties."

[4] It would seem to follow that, if the wrongdoer in an action against him by the insurer for the amount of damages covered by the insurance does not demur or enter a plea in abatement because of nonjoinder, the defect is waived, and he might be held liable to the insured in another action for the amount of the loss not covered by the insurance policy.

[5, 6] The development of subrogation is closely analogous to several other modes of remedy. The question often arises whether one who has suffered by being held liable for the tort or breach of contract of another should seek his remedy by an action founded on an express promise of indemnity, if such there was, or on the implied assumpsit raised by his payment of the obligation of the other, or upon the theory of subrogation. In some cases the claimant may have taken an assignment of the demand he has paid; he may have an express contract of indemnity, or an implied assumpsit to rest upon, and yet, perhaps, may have an election to proceed on the theory of subrogation, "which is a sort of assignment by operation of equity." This doctrine of subrogation having grown up out of the doctrine of assignment of causes of action, it may be well to trace the progress of the latter.

Originally the common-law courts would not recognize an assignment of a right of action; the assignee had no standing in court, and the assignor could sue notwithstanding his assignment. Finally, the courts of equity began to recognize assignments and to enforce them as between the parties and as against the debtor. This equitable practice being firmly established, the courts of law, while theoretically respecting the old common-law doctrine that the assignment was void at law, employed the fiction of a suit by one to the use of the other, and gave the assignee an adequate remedy at law. And it was not necessary to first establish the right to the assignment in a court of equity. At this stage, then, the courts of equity refused to entertain a bill brought by an assignee because he had an adequate remedy at law by suing in the assignor's name. That is the situation here. In modern practice, by the adoption of codes of procedure, the assignee is given the right to sue in his own name. The doctrine of subrogation has progressed in much the same way as the doctrine of assignment, but has not reached the same stage of development. At first subrogation was purely an equitable remedy not to be claimed at law. But the courts of law gradually grew to sustain actions founded on the doctrine of subrogation in cases where the claim itself was cognizable at law. The better view is that a court of law may deal with subrogation as it may with assignment, and when the right of action to which a plaintiff asks to be subrogated is a legal right of action a court of law may treat a plaintiff who is entitled in equity to subrogation as an assignee, and allow him to maintain an action of a legal nature upon the right to which he claims to be subrogated. When the common law first adopted the doctrine of subrogation it was held that the party seeking subrogation could not sue at law in his own name—the action must have been maintained for his benefit in the name of the original claimant. In the practice under the codes of procedure, requiring that the real party in interest shall bring the action, the courts allow one claiming subrogation to a legal cause of action to sue at law in his own name. An assignee is allowed to sue in his own name on the same ground. Of course, if the cause of action to which he claims to be subrogated is an equitable one, he must sue in equity, and there can always sue in his own name. Note to French v. Vix, 30 Abb. N. C. 158–176; Dunlop v. James, 174 N. Y. 411, 67 N. E. 60.

In Boyd v. McDonough, 39 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 389, it was said:

> "This right of subrogation is also recognized by courts of law."

In De Brauwere v. De Brauwere, 69 Misc. Rep. 472, 126 N. Y. Supp. 221, the doctrine of subrogation was held to be cognizable at law, as well as in equity, if the recovery is of a sum of money only. In Polhemus v. Prudential Realty Corp., 74 N. J. Law, 570, 67 Atl. 303, it was held that, although when the right of subrogation is in question the remedy is in equity, when the right itself is conceded, and there remains to be enforced only the right of realizing the value of the subject-matter, such right may be within the cognizance of a court of law. See, also, Baker v. American Surety Co., 181 Iowa, 634, 159 N. W. 1044; Black v. Chicago G. W. R. R. Co., 187 Iowa, 904, 174 N. W. 774.

[7-9] Section 954, Civil Code, provides that—

> "A thing in action, arising out of the violation of a right of property, or out of an obligation may be transferred by the owner."

It is clear that in the case at bar the cause of action of the insured arose out of the violation of a right of property and such right of action, or thing in action, is declared by the above Code section to be assignable. In Dibble v. San Joaquin L. & P. Corp., 47 Cal. App. 112, 117, 190 Pac. 198, the court held that the insurer merely had a cause of action arising by way of subrogation or equitable assignment which is declared to be an assignment by operation of law. If the right of the insured is assigned to the insurer by operation of law there is no necessity to go into equity to establish that right. It is to be noted that section 367, Code of Civil Procedure, wherein it is provided that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, has the practical effect of removing all difficulties in the way of assignments, so that the act of the insurance company in paying the amount of the loss suffered by the collision vested a complete ownership and right of action in such insurance company. The right of action to which the insurer was subrogated being legal, that is for the recovery of money for damages suffered, it is enforceable at law. Massachusetts Bonding & Ins. Co. v. San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, 39 Cal. App. 388, 178 Pac. 974, involved a provision of the Workmen's Compensation Act which authorizes the assignment of a right of action for personal injuries or for death by providing that a lawful claim for compensation against an employer by an injured employee shall operate as a transfer to his employer of the legal title to his claim for damages against his tort-feasor, or to the latter's insurer paying such claim. Answering the argument that the act rendered the right of action acquired by the employer or insurer an equitable cause of action as against the tort-feasor, the court held that when the payment had been made the assignment of the employee's cause of action is consummated by "such subrogation," and that the right accruing to the insurance company is that of maintaining as the assignee of the employee the same action which such employee could have maintained against the tort-feasor had no such assignment been made. The point is that the right of the insurance company was treated merely as the assigned right of action, in spite of the term "subrogated" in the act.

In considering the right of subrogation two theories must be kept in view. The first theory is that it is a right which must be established by a proceeding in equity, or, if there is a statute which recognizes the right in any particular class of claims, and the right to which the party claiming subrogation is a legal right, such right may be enforced in a court of law. This theory regards the right as a matter of substantive law. 68 L. R. A., supra. The other theory makes the enjoyment of the right depend upon the remedy provided. In New York and other jurisdictions as in this state, where there is a merger of law and equity, and a single forum is theoretically capable of taking cognizance of all rights, both legal and equitable, a so-called equitable right may be enforced in a court of law. In King v. Chase, 159 Cal. 420, 115 Pac. 207, section 1639, Code of Civil Procedure, giving the superior court authority in probate to compel the rendering of an account by the personal representative of the deceased executor, was under consideration. In meeting the contention that such authority was confided to equity, the court said:

> "Such power when it did exist was based solely on the lack of any statutory method of accomplishing the same end by proceeding in probate. Now that this lack is remedied the foundation of equity jurisdiction is gone."

The mode of procedure prescribed by section 367, Code of Civil Procedure, and section 954, Civil Code, is just as effective a mode as that prescribed by the Workmen's Compensation Act, above referred to, and the same result is reached without resort to an independent proceeding in equity. 10 Cal. Jur. §§ 1, 7–9.

[10] The fact that the complaint prays that the court decree the insurance company to be subrogated to the rights of the insured does not determine the nature of the action. In essence the action against petitioner herein is a legal action, and he is entitled to have such action tried in a court of law.

Let a writ of prohibition issue. So ordered.

HARRINGTON v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR PLACER COUNTY et al.

1. Courts 🔑1—"Jurisdiction" defined.

The word "jurisdiction" embraces every kind of judicial action, and hence every movement by court is necessarily the exercise of jurisdiction, but as ordinarily used it may be concisely stated to be the right to adjudicate concerning the subject-matter in a given case.

2. Courts 🔑17, 25—Party may submit to jurisdiction of court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

Jurisdiction in any proceeding is conferred by Constitution or by statute, and that of subject-matter cannot be given, enlarged, or waived by the parties, but, if a court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, a party may voluntarily submit himself to the jurisdiction of the court, or by failing to seasonably object thereto may waive his right to question jurisdiction over him.

3. Appearance 🔑20—Process waived by general appearance or by act equivalent thereto.

Process is waived by general appearance in person or by attorney entered in the action or by an act equivalent thereto, such as filing a pleading or otherwise recognizing the authority of the court.

4. Process 🔑1, 23—"Summons" is means of compelling appearance, and issues as matter of course.

The issuance of and service of "summons" in the manner provided by statute is a means whereby courts compel an appearance of defendant before it; it is not a judicial process, and issues as a matter of course upon application to the clerk without an order by the court or judge directed to the clerk.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Summons.]

5. Appearance 🔑20 — General appearance without objection confers jurisdiction of the person.

A defendant has a right to demand that process be issued against him, but, if not so issued, and he appears generally without making objection, his appearance confers jurisdiction on the court.

6. Eminent domain 🔑172—Jurisdiction of condemnation proceedings depends on subject-matter and an opportunity to be heard.

Under Code of Civ. Proc. § 1246, giving all persons interested in property sought to be condemned the right to appear and defend, condemnation proceedings are in the nature of actions in rem, and jurisdiction thereof does not depend on the disclosed identity of parties defendant but on subject-matter and an opportunity to be heard in the exercise of due process on the most effective notice possible.

7. Eminent domain 🔑167(4) — Prescribed method in condemning land must be strictly pursued.

The proceeding to condemn land for public use is special and statutory, and prescribed method must be strictly pursued.

8. Eminent domain 🔑185 — Service of summons not necessary, if defendant appears.

Although Code Civ. Proc. § 1243, provides that in eminent domain proceedings process shall be begun by filing the complaint and issuing summons, in view of sections 581a, 1244, 1245, 1256, where defendant voluntarily appeared, the issuance of summons was not necessary to confer jurisdiction.

9. Eminent domain 🔑124—On failure to issue summons, value of land condemned to be found on date on which defendant appeared.

In eminent domain proceedings, where defendant voluntarily appeared, and no summons was issued, the date for assessing value of the land was the date on which defendant appeared, in view of the fact that it could not be assessed on the date of issuance of summons, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1249.

In Bank.

Prohibition proceeding by Charles W. Harrington against the Superior Court in and for Placer County, W. I. Redding, Judge, and another. Writ denied.

W. J. Burns, of Auburn (Fred C. Peterson, of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioner.

Orrin J. Lowell, of Auburn, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to prohibit the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Placer, and Hon. W. I. Redding, judge thereof, from proceeding further in that certain action to condemn land for the state highway, wherein the said county is plaintiff and Charles W. Harrington et al. are defendants. On December 21, 1923, an application for a writ of prohibition was filed in the District Court of Appeal for the Third Appellate District, which was denied without hearing or opinion. A petition for hearing herein was, on February 18, 1924, interposed and granted, and an alternative writ of prohibition ordered to issue.

On July 17, 1922, the county of Placer filed its complaint, by which ten separate parcels of land out of a larger body of land owned by petitioner were sought to be condemned for public use as a highway. No application for the issuance of summons was made at the time of the filing of the petition, and it does not appear that a summons was ever issued. A paper dated September 20, 1923, and filed on December 8, 1923, was executed on behalf of the said Charles W. Harrington, the defendant. It reads as follows:

> "Comes now defendant, Charles W. Harrington, and makes his appearance in the above-entitled matter, and reserves unto himself ten days from the date hereof in which to demur or answer to the complaint on file herein."

On October 1, 1923, the defendant, petitioner herein, demurred to the complaint. On the same day a stipulation was entered into by the parties for the purpose of attaching to the complaint a map which had been inadvertently omitted, and excluding from the operation of the condemnation suit a triangular piece of ground upon which a septic tank was located. Furthermore, it was "stipulated that the complaint as so altered constitutes the complaint as to which defendant, Charles W. Harrington, accepted service, and appearing on the 20th day of September, 1923, and that all matters and pleadings subsequent to said date be construed and interpreted as to said complaint so altered."

On November 21, 1923, the demurrer was overruled, and the following order made by the court:

> "It is therefore ordered that the plaintiff take immediate possession and use of the property sought to be condemned, and that the sum of $500 be and is hereby fixed as the amount reasonably adequate to secure to the owners of the property sought to be condemned immediate payment of just compensation for such taking and any damage incident thereto, including damages sustained by reason of an adjudication that there is no necessity for taking the property as soon as the same can be ascertained; and that such possession be taken upon deposit by said plaintiff with the clerk of this court of said sum of $500."

On December 3, 1923, the petitioner gave notice of motion for December 8, 1923, and on the latter date the motion was made in the superior court for an order vacating and setting aside all proceedings therein in said suit, including the making of the above order, upon the ground the court had no jurisdiction to hear or determine any of the issues. It is specified that no summons had been issued upon the filing of said complaint, and that under the wording and meaning of section 1243, Code of Civil Procedure, said action had never been commenced, and hence the court had no jurisdiction over the person of petitioner or the subject-matter. The superior court thereupon denied said motion by an order filed on January 3, 1924. On February 11, 1924, petitioner was given ten days to answer the complaint after the final determination by the Supreme Court of the pending petition for a writ of prohibition.

> "The word 'jurisdiction' (jus dicere) is a term of large and comprehensive import, and embraces every kind of judicial action, and hence every movement by a court is necessarily the exercise of jurisdiction. In the sense, however, in which the term ordinarily is used jurisdiction may be concisely stated to be the right to adjudicate concerning the subject-matter in a given case." 7 R. C. L., 1029.

[2-5] Jurisdiction in any proceeding is conferred by law; that is, by the Constitution or by statute. Jurisdiction of the subject-matter cannot be given, enlarged, or waived by the parties. It has been held that, "where the jurisdiction of the court as to the subject-matter has been limited by the constitution or the statute, the consent of parties cannot confer jurisdiction. But, when the limit regards certain persons, they may, if competent, waive their privilege, and this will give the court jurisdiction." Gray v. Hawes, 8 Cal. 568. See Bates v. Gage, 40 Cal. 183. However, if the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, the rule is otherwise, and a party may voluntarily submit himself to the jurisdiction of the court, or may, by failing to seasonably object thereto, waive his right to question jurisdiction over him. Process is waived by a general appearance, in person or by attorney, entered in the action, or by some act equivalent thereto, such as the filing of a pleading in the case or by otherwise recognizing the authority of the court to proceed in the action. 7 R. C. L. 1038 et seq. The issuance and service of summons in the manner provided by statute is the means whereby a court compels the appearance of a defendant before it; it is not a judicial process, and issues as a matter of course upon application to the clerk; that is, it is not regarded as an act requiring an order by the court or judge directed to the clerk. Dupuy v. Shear, 29 Cal. 238. A defendant has a right to demand that process be issued against him in the manner provided by law, but if process is not so issued and he appears generally without making objection, such appearance, being the purpose of the process, confers jurisdiction of the person and the court is empowered to act in the premises.

[6] Condemnation proceedings have been described as proceedings in rem, and jurisdiction, therefore, does not depend on the disclosed identity of the parties defendant, but on the subject-matter and an opportunity to be heard in the exercise of due process on the most effective notice possible. 20 C. J. 916. In this state condemnation proceedings are in the nature of actions in rem, for all persons interested in the property described in the complaint, though not named therein, may appear and defend. Code of Civ. Proc. § 1246. It has been declared that—

> "Upon the presentation of a petition to the district court, in accordance with the provisions of the statute, showing a right on the part of the petitioner to acquire the land therein described, under the law of eminent domain, and invoking the action of the court in the premises, the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the proceeding. There is then only wanting to complete jurisdiction in the condemnation proceedings, that, by the means prescribed by statute or otherwise, the parties whose interests are involved should be brought within the jurisdiction of the court. The provisions of the statute relating to the service of notice of the time and place when the petition will be presented to the court for its action, are designed only for the purpose of investing the court with jurisdiction over the persons interested in the proceeding. Defects with respect to the jurisdiction over the person may be waived, and, when waived, cannot afterwards be questioned. Any distinct recognition by a party in the progress of a cause, of the authority of a tribunal to adjudicate therein, is effectual as a waiver of defects going merely to the jurisdiction of the person." Syllabus, Rheiner v. Union Depot, etc., Co., 31 Minn. 289, 17 N. W. 623.

See, also, 7 Ency. Plead. & Prac. 478, and note. The state of Illinois as well as this state is generally referred to as a jurisdiction in which proceedings to condemn lands are instituted by the issuing of a summons, under statutes prescribing the giving of notice in that form. The County of Yolo v. Knight, 70 Cal. 431, 11 Pac. 662; Pacific Coast Ry Co. v. Porter, 74 Cal. 261, 15 Pac. 774; Leibengut v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 103 Ill. 431; Hercules Iron Works v. Elgin, etc., R. Co., 141 Ill 491, 30 N. E. 1050; 7 Ency. Plead. & Prac 478. In Skinner v Lake View Av. Co., 57 Ill. 151, it was contended that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter The court said:

> "The filing of the petition and the appearance of the parties in interest dispensed with the notice required to be given, of the time and place of hearing. Consent, then, gave jurisdiction of the persons, but not of the subject-matter of litigation. Jurisdiction of the latter was obtained by a compliance with section 9 of the act of 1859, by presenting the petition, properly describing the lands, and praying for the appointment of appraisers to assess the damages. The service of notice was wholly unnecessary, after the appearance of the parties."

In Bowman v. Venice & Carondelet R. Co., 102 Ill. 472, a petition to condemn land was presented in vacation time, and service was had upon the landowner, but not ten days before the day set by the judge for the hearing of the petition as is required by the statute. It was held that the service was not in time for the purposes of a trial, but it gave the court jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, and, the petition having given jurisdiction of the subject-matter, the court had power to continue the case.

We may now examine the law of this state with reference to jurisdiction in condemnation proceedings. No authority has been found dissenting from the general doctrine recognized in the cases we have cited in condemnation proceedings that while jurisdiction over the subject-matter cannot be conferred by the consent of the parties, jurisdiction over the person may be acquired by service of process, by consent, by general appearance, or by waiver through a failure to seasonably object.

[7, 8] The proceeding to condemn land for a public use is special and statutory, and the prescribed method in such cases must be strictly pursued. Cal. Pac. R. Co. v. Central Pac. R. Co., 47 Cal. 549; McCarty v. S. P. R. Co., 148 Cal. 211, 82 Pac. 615. The law of eminent domain in this state is prescribed by part 3, title 7 of the Code of Civil Procedure, embracing sections 1237 to 1264, inclusive. Section 1243 declares that the jurisdiction in proceedings under title 7 must be commenced in the superior court by filing a complaint and issuing a summons. Section 1244 provides what the complaint shall contain:

> "1. The name of the corporation, association, commission, or person in charge of the public use for which the property is sought, who must be styled plaintiff. 2. The names of all owners and claimants of the property, if known, or a statement that they are unknown, who must be styled defendants. 3. A statement of the right of the plaintiff. 4. If a right of way be sought, the complaint must show the location, general route, and termini, and must be accompanied with a map thereof, so far as the same is involved in the action or proceeding. 5. A description of each piece of land, or other property or interest in or to property, sought to be taken, and whether the same includes the whole or only a part of an entire parcel or tract or piece of property, or interest in or to property. All parcels of land or other property or interest in or to property, lying in the county, and required for the same public use, may be included in the same or separate proceedings, at the option of the plaintiff, but the court may consolidate or separate them to suit the convenience of the parties. * * *"

Section 1245 is as follows:

> "The clerk must issue a summons, which must contain the names of the parties, a general description of the whole property, a statement of the public use for which it is sought, and a reference to the complaint for descriptions of the respective parcels, and a notice to the defendants to appear and show cause why the property described should not be condemned as prayed for in the complaint. In all other particulars it must be in the form of a summons in civil actions, and must be served in like manner."

Section 1249 declares:

> "For the purpose of assessing compensation and damages the right thereof shall be deemed to have accrued at the date of the issuance of summons and its actual value at that date shall be the measure of compensation for all property to be actually taken, and the basis of damages to property not actually taken but injuriously affected, in all cases where such damages are allowed as provided in section 1248; provided, that in any case in which the issue is not tried within one year after the date of the commencement of the action, unless the delay is caused by the defendant, the compensation and damages shall be deemed to have accrued at the date of the trial."

From the foregoing it appears that differing from an ordinary action (section 405, Code of Civ. Proc.) it is prescribed that a proceeding in condemnation must be commenced by filing a complaint and issuing a summons. The question to be first decided is whether the requirement of section 1243 that a summons be issued is necessary to the vesting of jurisdiction of the subject-matter. In other words, is the court without jurisdiction to act at all if the summons is not issued, or is the requirement to be confined, as in other forms of action, to jurisdiction over the person? If the alternative is to be accepted, then the court had complete jurisdiction of the subject-matter by the filing of the complaint and over the person by the appearance of petitioner. At common law process was necessary before jurisdiction of the subject-matter attached, but, since the whole system of common law writs is abolished and only one form of action is now permitted, the issuance of the writ does not determine jurisdiction; it is the filing of the complaint. We think it clear from the context of the statute and the purpose to be served by the issuance of summons it was not intended that, if the defendant appeared, the issuance of the summons would be necessary to the vesting of jurisdiction, but that the only purpose of the requirement, besides providing a mode for the giving of notice, is to fix the date at which the value of the land is to be assessed. Section 1249. The complaint is required to contain all and more than is requisite to the summons, and under section 1245 the complaint must be referred to in the summons for descriptions of the respective parcels of land. This in effect is a requirement that the complaint shall be served on the several owners. Such a construction is not opposed to the terms of the statute, and hence the usual rule of practice would apply. Section 1256. Section 1245 declares that in particulars not provided for therein the summons must be in the form of process in civil actions, and that it must be served in like manner. Neither in section 1256 nor elsewhere in the statute in eminent domain proceedings is there any provision for dispensing with the issuance or service of summons in any given contingency, and it would seem to follow that in a proper case the provision of section 581a that, if an appearance is made within three years, the action may be prosecuted in the same manner as if summons had been issued and served, would apply.

The courts have never regarded the issuance of summons as an element of jurisdiction that could not be waived. Hayes v. Shattuck, 21 Cal. 52, was an action in ejectment. Section 22 of the Practice Act declared that an action is commenced by the filing of a complaint and issuing a summons. Section 39 provided that a voluntary appearance shall be equivalent to personal service of summons. There had been no issuance of a summons in the action, but the defendant had answered. The court said:

> "Putting in an answer is an appearance; and such an appearance must be held to be a waiver of the mere formality of issuing a summons, the service of which in such cases becomes unnecessary. The only purpose of the summons is to bring the defendant into court. It is constantly said by courts, when actions are commenced by the service of process, as by capias ad respondendum, that a voluntary appearance waives all defects of process, even when objection is taken in the same action."

The identical situation is involved in the proceeding herein, and there seems to be no reason why the same conclusion should not be reached here as in that case. Section 405, before it was amended, provided that an action was commenced by filing a complaint and issuing a summons; section 406 required the summons to be issued within one year. It was held that the issuance of such summons was mandatory, and that, if the defendant appeared specially to dismiss after the year had expired, the action must be dismissed, but that the issuance of such summons could be waived by a general appearance. Linden Gravel Mining Co. v. Sheplar, 53 Cal. 245; Kimball v. Bd. of Supervisors, 46 Cal. 19.

Furthermore, it is not required that the complaint shall be filed and the summons issued at the same time. While it is provided that the proceeding must be commenced by filing a complaint and issuing the summons, the language of the statute does not in its implications negative the construction that, where the defendant voluntarily appears, it will be necessary to issue the summons in order to commence the action or vest the court with jurisdiction to act. Examining the statute in its entirety we are not prepared to hold that the filing of the complaint did not vest the court with jurisdiction of the subject-matter. The purpose of the summons is to give the defendant notice of the pendency of the proceeding. Section 1243 by its terms is not a requirement for complete jurisdiction, for it does not prescribe the service of the summons. The provision therein that "all such proceedings must be commenced by filing a complaint and issuing a summons" is a description of the steps required to secure jurisdiction—the filing of the complaint giving authority over the subject-matter, and the issuing of the summons meaning no more than a step toward acquiring jurisdiction over the person of the defendant, which may be dispensed with if the defendant has appeared. In other words, his appearance obviates giving him notice of the proceedings by process.

[9] We have said that the purpose of requiring the issuance of a summons is to fix a date at which the value of the land is to be assessed. The only provision in the statute dealing with the date at which the value of the land is to be assessed is contained in section 1249, which section also has relation to the contingency that the action may not be tried within one year after it is commenced. The question naturally arises that, if the purpose of the requirement that a summons be issued is to fix a date at which the value of the land is to be assessed, and no summons has been issued, as in this case, at what date will the value of the land be assessed? The answer is that, as the requirement is but a step in the direction of giving the defendant notice of the proceeding, the date for assessing the value of the land will be the date he appeared in the action.

The application for a peremptory writ of prohibition is denied.

1. Courts 🔑26—Court having jurisdiction empowered to define right sought to be protected.

If the superior court has jurisdiction to entertain an action, it has right to define the right sought to be protected.

2. Courts 🔑1—"Jurisdiction" defined.

The jurisdiction of a court is the power to hear and determine and is not contingent upon the regularity of its exercise, nor upon the correctness of its decision.

3. Prohibition 🔑3(2) — Incorrect judgment may be reversed on appeal, but not on prohibition.

If a judgment of the superior court is incorrect, it may be reversed on appeal, but not on prohibition.

4. Carriers 🔑18(6)—Superior court held to have jurisdiction of action against transportation company, in absence of action by railroad commission.

Where the railroad commission had taken no action under the Auto, Stage, and Truck Transportation Act and Public Utilities Act, enacted pursuant to Const. art. 12, §§ 22, 23, the superior court, as a court of general jurisdiction, under Const. art. 6, § 5, and not a county governing body, within art. 12, § 23, had jurisdiction of action by a transportation company, operating under a certificate of public conveyance and necessity, to restrain defendants from transporting freight without the required certificate.

In Bank.

Application for writ of prohibition by the Truck Owners & Shippers, Inc., and others, against the Superior Court of San Diego County and Hon. W. P. Cary, as Judge thereof. Peremptory writ denied.

Marshall Stimson and Noel C. Edwards, both of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

H. J. Bischoff, of San Diego, for defendants.

Hugh Gordon and Carl I. Wheat, amici curiæ, both of San Francisco, Attorneys for Railroad Commission.

SHENK, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain the superior court of San Diego county and the Honorable W. P. Cary, judge thereof, from taking further proceedings in the matter of the enforcement of a judgment, and particularly with reference to a citation for contempt, in an action pending in said court.

The Coast Truck Line, a corporation, commenced an action in the respondent court against M. Haydis, Truck Owners & Shippers, Inc., a corporation, and Haydis Forwarding Company, a corporation, wherein the complaint alleged, so far as pertinent here, that the plaintiff was a corporation engaged in the business of transporting freight for compensation over the public highways between the cities of San Diego and Los Angeles, and between other points in the counties of San Diego and Riverside; that the plaintiff had applied for and obtained from the railroad commission a certificate of public convenience and necessity, authorizing it to operate motor trucks for the transportation of property for compensation on and over said highways, pursuant to the provisions of "An act providing for the supervision and regulation of the transportation of persons and property for compensation over any public highway by automobiles, jitney busses, auto trucks, stages, and auto stages," etc. Stats. 1917, p. 330, and referred to as the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act; that the defendants were engaged in the business of transporting freight by auto truck for compensation between Los Angeles and San Diego, without having obtained from the railroad commission a certificate of public convenience and necessity as required by said act; that the defendants were soliciting business from the customers and patrons of the plaintiff, were depriving the plaintiff of much business that would otherwise come to it, and if such practice were to continue, the plaintiff would suffer great and irreparable injury. The plaintiff prayed for an injunction restraining the defendants from transporting freight by motor truck for compensation between the points mentioned in the complaint. After trial of the cause on the merits the court found the foregoing allegations of the complaint to be true, except as to the defendant Haydis, and of date March 4, 1924, rendered judgment restraining the defendant companies from operating auto trucks for transportation of property for compensation on said public highways, in competition with the plaintiff, until they shall have obtained from the railroad commission a certificate declaring that public convenience and necessity require such operation. Thereafter, for an alleged violation of the injunction, the court issued an order requiring the defendant Haydis Forwarding Company, its officers and agents to show cause why they should not be adjudged guilty of contempt of court. Application was then made to this court for a writ of prohibition, wherein the petitioner sets forth the pendency of the action in the respondent court and the proceedings for the enforcement of the judgment therein. It is also alleged in the petition that the Truck Owners & Shippers, Inc., is a nonprofit co-operative corporation, and that its business is the transportation of freight over the public highways for its members only; that no freight other than the freight of its members is by it so transported and that the Haydis Forwarding Company is a member of Truck Owners & Shippers, Inc. The answer of the defendants in the pending action is not before us, but it is assumed, in view of the findings of the court, that one of the issues determined by the court was whether or not the defendant companies, petitioners herein, were transportation companies as contemplated by the said Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act (St. 1917, p. 330), and were doing business as such. The court found against the petitioners on that issue, and also found that they were subject to supervision and regulation by the railroad commission. It is alleged in the return of the respondents herein, and is not denied, that the railroad commission has never exercised any jurisdiction over the said petitioners.

It is the contention of the petitioners that the superior court had no jurisdiction to determine the cause now pending before it, and, therefore, no jurisdiction to entertain the contempt proceedings to avoid which this application is made. It is urged that the constitutional amendment enlarging the powers of the railroad commission and the acts of the Legislature, passed pursuant thereof, show an intention, on the part of the people of this state and of the Legislature, to provide a complete scheme for the determination by the railroad commission of all transportation questions within the purview of said amendment and acts, and that the jurisdiction of the railroad commission thereunder with reference to such questions is exclusive.

The superior court is a court of general jurisdiction and its jurisdiction in equity is conferred by the Constitution. In section 5 of article 6, the Constitution provides:

> "The superior court shall have original jurisdiction in all cases in equity. * * *"

The cause pending in the respondent court is a suit in equity and that court has jurisdiction to hear and determine the same and to enforce its judgment therein, unless it has been divested of such jurisdiction by some provision of the Constitution or by the Legislature acting in pursuance of some constitutional authority. It is not seriously contended by petitioners that the amendment to the Constitution relating to the railroad commission and to public utilities (art. 12, §§ 22, 23) contains language sufficient in itself to divest the superior court of its equity jurisdiction to hear and determine a cause involving a complaint against a transportation company, but it is insisted that, because of the broad powers lodged in the Legislature under said section 23, and its exercise of such powers in the enactment of the Public Utilities Act (Stats. 1915, p. 115) and the said Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act, the sole recourse of the plaintiff in the injunction suit was to file its complaint with the railroad commission and there have its rights determined. A brief outline of the provisions of the Constitution and the statutes relied upon by petitioner will therefore be indicated.

Section 22 of article 12 of the Constitution provides that the railroad commission shall have power to hear and determine complaints against transportation companies. Section 23 of the same article provides that:

> "From and after the passage by the Legislature of laws conferring powers upon the railroad commission, respecting public utilities, all powers respecting such public utilities vested in boards of supervisors, or municipal councils, or other governing bodies of the several counties, cities and counties, cities and towns, in this state, * * * shall cease, so far as such powers shall conflict with the powers so conferred upon the railroad commission."

Said section 23 also provides that the Legislature shall have the right to confer upon the railroad commission power respecting public utilities, unlimited by any provision of the Constitution. Section 31 of the Public Utilities Act vests in the railroad commission the power and jurisdiction to supervise and regulate every public utility in the state and to do all things necessary and convenient in the exercise of such power and jurisdiction. Section 54 authorizes the commission to issue certain writs and all process necessary in proceedings in contempt, in like manner and to the same extent as a court of record. Section 60 authorizes the commission of its own motion or on behalf of others to hear and determine any complaint against a public utility claimed to be in violation of law or any order or rule of the commission. Section 61 (a) gives the commission power to conduct hearings in matters within its jurisdiction and to make and file its order containing its decision. Section 65 makes the orders and decisions of the commission final in all collateral actions and proceedings. Section 67 provides for a writ of review in the Supreme Court to determine only whether the commission has regularly pursued its authority or violated any provision of the state or federal Constitutions. This section further provides:

> "No court of this state (except the Supreme Court, to the extent herein specified) shall have jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct, or annul any order or decision of the commission or to suspend or delay the execution or operation thereof, or to enjoin, restrain or interfere with the commission in the performance of its official duties; provided, that the writ of mandamus shall lie from the Supreme Court to the commission in all proper cases."

Section 72 makes it the duty of the commission to see that the provisions of the Constitution and statutes affecting public utilities, the enforcement of which is not vested in some other officer or tribunal, are enforced and obeyed. Section 75 authorizes the commission to direct its attorney to proceed in the superior court against any public utility, either by way of mandamus or injunction, where, in its opinion, the public utility is failing or refusing to do anything required of it by law. Section 80 provides that the attorney of the commission shall bring actions in the superior court to recover penalties accruing under the act. The Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act in section 1 defines a "transportation company" as one engaged in the business of transporting persons or freight by automobile, stage, or truck for compensation over the public highways, "between fixed termini or over a regular route," and not operating exclusively within the limits of an incorporated city, and that a finding of the commission as to whether a transportation company is so operating shall be final and shall not be subject to review. In section 4 power and authority to supervise and regulate every transportation company in the state is vested in the commission. Section 5 prohibits any transportation company from operating on the public highways without first having obtained from the commission a certificate declaring that public convenience and necessity require such operation. Section 7 adopts the provisions of the Public Utilities Act as to applications and complaints made and filed with the railroad commission, process issued, hearings held, opinions, orders, and decisions made and filed, and petitions for rehearings filed and acted upon, and petitions for writs of review or mandates filed with the Supreme Court of the state, considered and disposed of by said court.

It may be assumed that, under the broad grant of powers to the Legislature by the Constitution, that legislative body has the authority to divest the superior court of all jurisdiction respecting the control or activities of public utilities, but the question is: Has it done so?

It is clear that the superior court is not a "governing body" of the county, within the meaning of the term thus used in section 23 of article 7 of the Constitution, and that by the enumeration of the public agencies whose powers over public utilities shall cease and the failure to include the superior court, it must be assumed that it was not intended to include the latter as coming within such automatic divestiture. Also, from a consideration of the foregoing constitutional and statutory provisions, it must be conceded that neither the Constitution nor the Legislature has expressly divested the superior court of its entire jurisdiction in cases affecting public utilities. But the petitioners contend that, from a general survey of the law as a whole, it must be concluded that a general plan has thus been devised and put into operation which has by implication divested the superior court of such jurisdiction and lodged in the railroad commission full and complete and exclusive jurisdiction in such matters; including the right to entertain the complaint of the plaintiff in the injunction suit against the defendants therein, coupled with the exclusive right to determine whether the petitioners are transportation companies operating "between fixed termini or over a regular route," and that the decisions of this court have upheld the view that the jurisdiction of the railroad commission is exclusive.

It is no longer a subject of controversy that, by reason of the provisions of section 67 of the Public Utilities Act, the superior court has no jurisdiction when the commission has acted to "review, reverse, correct, or annul any order or decision of the commission." Jurisdiction in such matters is exclusively in the Supreme Court (Pacific Telephone, etc., Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 137 Pac. 1119, 50 L. R. A. [N. S.] 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822). In that case it was contended that the attempt of the Legislature to confer upon the Supreme Court exclusive jurisdiction to review such proceedings and thus deprive the superior court of its constitutional jurisdiction in certiorari was in itself unconstitutional. It was held that the broad powers vested in the Legislature by the Constitution were sufficient to authorize it to limit or destroy the jurisdiction of the courts of the state and also to authorize it to confer upon such courts such jurisdiction as it sees fit in matters cognate and germane to the regulation of public utilities. Petitioners rely on that case as indicating that the superior court has been deprived of all jurisdiction relating to control or restraint of public utilities. But the statement in that case that "the deprivation of jurisdiction of the courts of the state may not be questioned" had particular reference, under the facts there shown, to the deprivation of jurisdiction of the superior court in cases where the railroad commission had acted and could have no bearing upon the jurisdiction of the superior court, in cases where the commission had taken no action whatsoever.

Nor is it open to question that the superior court has no jurisdiction to "enjoin, restrain, or interfere with the commission in the performance of its official duties." In the case of Sexton v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 173 Cal. 760, 161 Pac. 748, application was made to the superior court to restrain the directors of the railroad company from issuing free transportation to the members of the railroad commission, its officers and employees, and to restrain the commission from taking any action against the railroad company for failure to comply with the provisions of the Public Utilities Act relative to such transportation. It was held that the relief sought, if granted, would interfere with the commission in the performance of its official duties, which "no court of the state" could do except as provided in section 67 of the Public Utilities Act.

Again, it cannot be questioned that the superior court has no jurisdiction to compel the commission to act. That right is vested solely in the Supreme Court and was exercised in Western Ass'n, etc., R. Co. v. Railroad Comm., 173 Cal. 802, 162 Pac. 391, 1 A. L. R. 1455, in which this court issued a writ of mandamus directing the commission to exercise its jurisdiction in matters respecting transportation companies when the commission had refused to act.

Petitioners have not cited any case in this state wherein it was held or intimated that the superior court has no jurisdiction to entertain a suit in equity, the purpose of which was to restrain a public utility from unlawfully interfering with the rights of the plaintiff, and in which it appeared that the railroad commission had not acted or had failed or refused to act. On the other hand, the respondents have pointed out that such a question was involved in the case of Yolo Water & Power Co. v. Superior Court, 43 Cal. App. 332, 185 Pac. 195. That was a petition for a writ of prohibition to prevent the superior court of Lake county from hearing and determining an application for an injunction in a suit brought by the district attorney, in the name of the people of the state, against the petitioner, a public utility corporation, to restrain it, among other things, from building a dam across the arm or slough of Clear Lake at a point where the pumps of said defendant were located, and from drawing off the water of the lake any faster than the same would naturally flow therefrom. The application for the injunction was made on the ground that the alleged action of the defendant would constitute a nuisance. The principal contention of the petitioner was that the court could not entertain an action brought by the district attorney, in view of the provisions of section 75 of the Public Utilities Act to the effect that the commission shall direct its attorney to bring proceedings in the superior court against any public utility whenever, in the opinion of the commission, such "public utility is failing to, omitting, or about to fail or omit, to do anything required of it by law." It was argued by the petitioner that the course thus indicated in said section was exclusive, and that section 4156 of the Political Code, authorizing the district attorney to bring actions in the name of the people to abate nuisances, had been repealed by said section 75 so far as public utilities were concerned. By reason of the nature of the proceeding, the question of the jurisdiction of the superior court was necessarily involved and it was held that the grant of a right to the commission to prosecute injunction suits was "not at all inconsistent with the continuance of said right in others who may feel aggrieved by the act of a public utility." An application for a hearing in this court after that decision was rendered was denied. So, here, the argument is convincing that the right of the commission to proceed against the petitioners for operating a transportation company without a certificate of public convenience and necessity, is not inconsistent with the right of the plaintiff in the pending injunction suit to proceed against the defendants therein to protect its alleged rights.

[1-3] We are not here concerned with the nature of the right which the said plaintiff is seeking to enforce. If the superior court has jurisdiction to entertain the action, it has the power to define the right sought to be protected. Nor are we here concerned with the correctness of the judgment of the superior court. The jurisdiction of the court is the power to hear and determine. It is not contingent upon the regularity of its exercise nor upon the correctness of the decision. Lange v. Superior Court, 11 Cal. App. 1, 103 Pac. 908. If the judgment of the superior court be incorrect, it may be reversed on appeal, but not on prohibition. Sutter-Butte Canal Co. v. Superior Court, 183 Cal. 324, 191 Pac. 529.

[4] It is insisted by petitioners that, unless the railroad commission has exclusive jurisdiction to determine the questions of fact involved in said injunction suit and to make its order accordingly, great confusion will arise for the reason that the superior courts in the several counties may make widely divergent decisions touching the same or similar facts. It is particularly urged by counsel for the railroad commission, appearing as amicus curiæ, that it is the peculiar and sole province of the commission to determine the fact as to whether or no any particular individual or company is operating "between fixed termini and over a regular route" and is, therefore, a "transportation company." And it is argued that if the superior court should find, as it has found in the pending case, that the petitioners are transportation companies, and suppose, say counsel, that later on the commission should assume jurisdiction in a proper proceeding before it, and should determine that the said operations were not "between fixed termini and over a regular route," and that still later an application should be made to the superior court to dissolve the injunction and the court should deny the motion, would not such denial be an interference "with the commission in the performance of its official duty?" In answer to the query it should be borne in mind that we are not here dealing with a situation where the commission has acted. It may also be noted that the commission undoubtedly has power to inquire into the methods and activities of the plaintiffs, as well as the defendants, in said action as to their transportation operations, either on its own motion or on the complaint of petitioners. Likewise it may be noted that the functions of the commission may be brought into play by an application by petitioners for a certificate of public convenience and necessity. If such certificate be granted, the injunction in the pending cause would cease, for by its own terms it is enforceable against the petitioners only "until they shall have obtained from the railroad commission of the state of California a certificate declaring that public convenience and necessity require such operation." Furthermore, if the commission should assume jurisdiction in an investigation as to the activities of the petitioner and the injunction plaintiff, or both, and should determine under subdivision (3) of section 1 of the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act that the petitioners were not operating "between fixed termini and over a regular route" and, therefore, were not transportation companies as defined by that act, its finding would not be subject to review and it would then have the power, under section 31 of the Public Utilities Act, to make all necessary orders to enforce its decision in the matter.

It may be assumed for the purpose of this proceeding that the court should have included in its injunctive order the further limitation that it should cease upon a finding by the railroad commission that the petitioners are not "transportation companies," and it may be further assumed that any action on the part of the court to enforce the injunction after such finding by the commission would be in excess of its jurisdiction. But with these assumptions it would not follow that the injunction would not be valid until such finding be made. Until that event the injunction would be operative. We are here called upon to determine the jurisdiction of the court under the facts disclosed by the record, and not as they may be at some future time. We entertain no doubt that, when the commission has assumed and exercised its jurisdiction, the court would conform its orders and process agreeably to the action of the commission made within its jurisdiction. When the commission has acted, it may be said, as was very aptly stated in Yolo Water & Power Co. v. Superior Court, supra:

> "Powers conferred by the Constitution upon the railroad commission, to supervise and regulate public utilities and to bring suits to enforce its orders and compel public utilities to obey the law, are not inconsistent with the power conferred upon superior courts to entertain injunction suits instituted by others than the commission against public utilities. To so hold will not create any conflict between the courts and the commission, because in all such suits the courts will be bound and guided and controlled in all respects in entertaining and deciding or dismissing them as much by section 23 of the Constitution and the Public Utility Act as by any other provision of the law."

We find nothing in the several provisions of the Public Utilities Act or the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act relied on by petitioners, which would warrant the conclusion that the legislative branch has so framed the laws respecting public utilities as to divest the superior court of its general jurisdiction in equity under the circumstances here shown. Petitioners have called attention to the fact that in several other jurisdictions the right of control over the activities of public utilities is vested in such a body as our railroad commission, to the exclusion of the jurisdiction of the courts, either wholly or in part. The respondents have pointed out that in an equal or greater number of other jurisdictions the equity powers of the courts of general jurisdiction have continued, notwithstanding similar laws. These cases have been considered, but it is deemed unnecessary to discuss them for the reason, as frankly conceded by the petitioners, that other state courts, which hold that the railroad commission jurisdiction is exclusive, all go further than the courts of this state, because of the peculiar provisions of our constitutional and statutory law. The proper construction of the laws peculiar to this state must, of course, necessarily govern. The question of exclusive control of public utilities is primarily one of legislative policy subject, of course, to constitutional grant or limitation. Where the courts have been denied or have refused to take jurisdiction, it has been said that it was the legislative policy to relegate all such questions to the commission having jurisdiction to entertain the same. For example, in State v. Duluth, etc., 153 Wis. 650, 142 N. W. 184, relied on by petitioners, it was stated with reference to the laws of Wisconsin establishing a railroad commission:

> "The new system did not absolutely take away any of the constitutional jurisdiction of the circuit court; but deference to the legislative will, which is due to a co-ordinate department of the government, requires that such jurisdiction shall not be exercised in any situation—which the Legislature placed, as a matter of administrative power, in that of the railroad commission as regards original actions—in the absence of some extraordinary emergency not liable to arise."

But even in that case the court did not go as far as petitioners here contend. There the lower court had issued an alternative writ of mandamus to compel a street railway company to furnish cars sufficient for adequate service to the public during a strike of its employees. On appeal from an order denying a motion to quash the writ, the Supreme Court of Wisconsin held that the lower court should hesitate to interpose this extraordinary writ to solve such a complicated problem involving property rights, and made the general declaration above quoted, but stated that it did not intend "to suggest that an occasion might not arise, or may have existed in this case, warranting the exercise of the equity authority of the court to solve the difficulty."

In the proceeding before us, due deference to the legislative branch would seem to require that this court neither extend nor limit the policy which the Legislature clearly indicates should be followed in this state. The Legislature under the Constitution has full power to act, and by such action to declare such policy. It has acted and has declared that no court of the state except the Supreme Court shall have power to review the decisions of the railroad commission nor compel it to act, and that no court of the state shall interfere with the commission in the performance of its official duties, except as the action of the Supreme Court might constitute such interference in matters of review, mandamus, etc. In sections 75 and 80 of the Public Utilities Act it expressly recognizes the right of the superior court to exercise its jurisdiction in matters affecting public utilities when such jurisdiction is invoked at the instance of the commission or of its attorney. Having the right to further limit or abolish the jurisdiction of the superior court in such matters and not having done so, and thus having in effect declared its policy on the subject, it is not for the court to say that the Legislature has not gone as far as it should have gone in the matter within its exclusive control. Until it has further exercised its power to divest the superior court of its powers in matters affecting public utilities, it must be concluded that such courts as courts of general jurisdiction are open to others as well as to those upon whom the right to resort thereto is specially conferred by the Public Utilities Act and that, therefore, the respondent court had jurisdiction to entertain and decide the pending action, and to take the necessary steps to enforce its orders and judgment therein.

The peremptory writ is denied.

PETALUMA MUNICIPAL WATER DIST. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SONOMA COUNTY et al. (S. F. 11237.)

Mandamus ⚿4(1)—Will not issue solely to review alleged errors properly reviewable by means of appeal.

The writ of mandamus will not issue solely to serve the purpose of writ of review in order to pass upon claimed errors, committed by respondent court in exercise of its jurisdiction, which are properly reviewable on appeal.

In Bank.

Application by the Petaluma Municipal Water District against the Superior Court in and for the County of Sonoma and another, judge thereof, for writ of mandate to require defendants to proceed with the hearing and determination of an action in eminent domain. Application denied.

George H. Harlan, of San Rafael, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. Application for a writ of mandate. It is alleged in the petition that petitioner herein, a public agency, commenced proceedings in eminent domain in the respondent court to procure by condemnation for public use a right of entry and occupation of certain lands, together with the right to take therefrom such earth, gravel, stones, or other materials which might be necessary for the public use and for the determination of the character of the foundations of a dam proposed to be erected thereon for the conservation of water; that the defendant in said action demurred to the complaint on the ground that said court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of said action; that the respondent court sustained said demurrer with leave to amend; that said demurrer was sustained because of the erroneous belief on the part of the respondent judge that this court had decided in Jacobsen v. Superior Court, 219 Pac. 986, 29 A. L. R. 1399, that the right of entry, occupation, and taking of materials from land which is sought to be condemned in and by the pending proceeding is not subject to condemnation under the laws of California. That case does not so hold, but we will not pause here to consider and determine whether or not the respondent court erred in sustaining the demurrer. This petition is for a writ of mandate directing the respondent court to proceed with the hearing and determination of said action in eminent domain. It having jurisdiction of the pending proceeding has not refused to exercise the same, but has ruled, either correctly or erroneously, in the exercise of its jurisdiction. The writ of mandate will not issue solely to serve the purpose of a writ of review in order to pass upon claimed errors which are properly reviewable by means of an appeal.

TREADWELL v. NICKEL. (S. F. 10721.)

Rehearing Denied August 28, 1924.)

1. Attorney and client 🔑76(2)—Client's death severs all previous relations with attorney.

Death of client severed all previous relations with his attorney of whatever nature.

2. Attorney and client 🔑63—Attorneys' written contract of employment with corporation held modified by executed oral agreement.

Where corporation's general counsel agreed orally with official representing the corporation that his contract of employment should not include services to individual stockholders and parties governed themselves accordingly thereafter, the oral agreement became executed by virtue of Civ. Code, § 1661, and under section 1698 modified the original contract in writing.

3. Attorney and client 🔑76(1)—Contract of employment extinguished by rescission, which may be by consent of parties.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1688, 1689, subd. 5, providing that a contract is extinguished by its rescission which may be by consent of the parties, if corporation's contract with its counsel requiring performance of services for stockholders was rescinded by mutual consent and new arrangement made and performed, counsel was free to make independent contract with persons interested in stockholder's estate.

4. Contracts 🔑254—Executed parol agreement may rescind contract under seal.

A parol agreement to rescind a contract even under seal is good if such parol agreement is executed.

5. Contracts 🔑350(3)—Parol agreement to abandon or rescind inferable from parties' acts.

Parol agreement to abandon or rescind a written contract may be inferred from acts of the parties.

6. Attorney and client 🔑167(2)—Whether corporation's general counsel was left free to contract for administration of stockholder's estate by abandonment of his employment contract held for jury.

In suit by corporation's general counsel for fees for administering estate of stockholder, whether plaintiff's whole conduct in conducting corporation's affairs showed abandonment and rescission by both parties of his employment contract which required rendition of services to stockholders, leaving counsel free to contract for administration of stockholder's estate for extra compensations, held for jury.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1002—Rule for determining sufficiency of evidence to support verdict.

When verdict is attacked for insufficiency of evidence, Supreme Court's power begins and ends with inquiry whether substantial evidence contradicted or uncontradicted, in and of itself, supports the verdict, and, if conflicting on any material point, the jury is assumed to have resolved the conflict in favor of prevailing party.

8. Contracts 🔑350(3)—Rescission by oral contract is provable by mere preponderance of evidence.

Rescission of a written contract by oral agreement, executed and accomplished, need be proved by mere preponderance of evidence, and an instruction requiring clear, positive evidence above suspicion was most favorable to party denying rescission in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 5.

9. Appeal and error 🔑1005(2)—Sufficiency of evidence to establish fact by clear convincing proof is primarily for trial court and jury; not reviewable.

Sufficiency of evidence to establish a given fact, even where the law requires clear and convincing proof, is primarily for the trial court and jury, and, when supported by substantial evidence, their finding is not reviewable.

10. Attorney and client 🔑167(2)—Whether trustee expressly agreed to pay attorney's fees for administering estate held for jury.

In attorney's suit for fees for administration of an estate, whether defendant, a trustee and beneficiary of testator's property, expressly agreed to pay reasonable value of plaintiff's services, was a question of fact for the jury.

11. Contracts 🔑31—"Express contract" need not be written.

While Civ. Code, § 1620, defines an "express contract" as one the terms of which are stated in words, it need not necessarily be in writing.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Express Contract.]

12. Contracts 🔑176(7)—Interpretation of oral contract in first instance is for jury.

Interpretation of oral contract in the first instance is a question of fact for the jury.

13. Trial 🔑244(2)—Instructions singling out evidence are properly refused, though not prejudicial, if given.

Instructions, framed solely to emphasize some particular portion of evidence and having that effect, are not commendable, and properly refused, though not necessarily prejudicial, if given.

14. Trial 🔑296(7)—Instructions emphasizing particular evidence held cured by general instructions.

Instructions emphasizing particular portions of evidence held cured by general instructions apprising the jury that all facts and circumstances in the case were to be considered.

15. Trial 🔑253(1)—Instruction held not erroneous as excluding amended bill of particulars from consideration.

Instruction that issues of fact were precluded by denials made in the answer and allegations in the complaint and affirmative matter pleaded by defendant held not erroneous as excluding plaintiff's amended bill of particulars from consideration.

16. Pleading 🔑327—Amended bill of particulars considered as incorporated in complaint.

An amended bill of particulars, furnished to defendants, is an amplification of the complaint, and to determine plaintiff's right of recovery, or admissibility of his evidence, is considered as incorporated therein.

17. Trial 🔑256(3)—Instruction relating to bill of particulars held proper in absence of request to give more specific instruction.

In attorney's action for compensation where court charged that an amended bill of particulars segregated the various services performed, and placed a value upon each, aggregating for all $641,273, reduced in the complaint to $300,000, and no further or more explicit instruction was requested by defendants, they could not complain that they were not given.

18. Evidence 🔑570—Weight to be given expert testimony, stated.

Expert testimony is entitled to weight to which it appears in each case to be justly entitled, just as any other evidence, having little value unless material facts assumed in the hypothetical question are true, but not being wholly valueless because of some variance between assumed and actually proved facts; the weight being for the jury under proper instructions.

19. Trial 🔑235(7)—Instruction to disregard expert testimony unless all the material facts assumed were true held properly refused.

Instruction to disregard expert testimony, unless all the material facts upon which the hypothetical question to the expert was based were true, held properly refused.

20. Trial 🔑140(1)—Truth of purported facts in hypothetical question is for jury.

Where the evidence is sufficient as basis for hypothetical question, truth or falsity of purported facts upon which such question is based is for the jury.

21. Attorney and client 🔑167(3)—Trial 🔑253(3)—Instruction that attorney could not recover for ordinary services to trust estate under which bulk of estate passed held properly refused.

In attorney's suit for fees for administering an estate, instruction that plaintiff could not recover for ordinary services to a trust estate, as distinguished from the estate, and, if entitled to recover at all, could only be allowed $1,067.16, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1618, for handling the small estate, held misleading and properly refused where the bulk of the estate passed under a deed of trust, since it withdrew issue whether fees for both estates on basis regarded by the Legislature as reasonable in ordinary probate matters were reasonable.

22. Trusts 🔑227—Attorney entitled to reasonable fee.

An attorney for a trustee is entitled to the reasonable value of his legal services as a proper expense out of the trust fund, and whether compensation prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 1619, for ordinary probate matters would be reasonable is a question for the jury.

23. Evidence 🔑553(3)—Requirements of hypothetical questions, stated.

In hypothetical questions, considerable latitude must be allowed in choice of facts, and, though every hypothesis contained therein should be sustained by evidence, it need not state all such evidence in the case, and may be framed on any theory deducible therefrom, assuming any facts within the limits of the evidence upon which the expert opinion is desired, and omitting any facts questioner deems immaterial so long as not misleading or unfair.

24. Evidence 🔑553(1)—Hypothetical question to expert witness, misstating fact, held cured by subsequent summary.

In attorney's action for fees for administration of estate, plaintiff's hypothetical question, to expert witness, assuming that plaintiff had saved $83,000 in contesting a claim against the estate, where the evidence showed $53,000, held cured by subsequent summary of taxes saved, correcting the error.

25. Trial 🔑83(1)—Objection that no evidence supported question, where evidence was stricken out, held sufficient.

Objection to hypothetical question that there was no evidence to support it, where the evidence supporting it had been stricken from the record, held sufficient, since stricken evidence is no evidence.

26. Evidence 🔑553(4)—Hypothetical question to expert witness held not fatally defective because based in part on stricken evidence.

In attorney's suit for fees for administering an estate hypothetical question to expert held not fatally defective, because based in part on inconsequential evidence stricken from the record, relating to what another attorney told plaintiff concerning attitude of newspapers, and public, toward litigation against the estate.

27. Trial 🔑243—Instruction held not erroneous though inconsistent with another.

In suit, by general corporation counsel, for fees for administering estate of stockholder, instruction that, even though the contract with the corporation were in force, it would not prevent trustees of the stockholder's estate from making an independent contract with plaintiff to administer the estate, held not erroneous, though in apparent conflict with instruction that, unless changed or abandoned the contract with the corporation controlled and prevented a recovery.

28. Appeal and error 🔑882(12)—Giving of conflicting instructions on material point is error, but party cannot complain when other party's instructions correct.

Giving of conflicting instructions upon a material point is error, but a party may not complain of inconsistency, arising through giving of his requested instructions which are inconsistent or contradictory of those given for the other party, which are pertinent to the issues and correct statements of the law.

29. Appeal and error 🔑1064(1)—Conflict in instructions not injuring appellant is harmless error.

Conflict in instructions not injuring appellant is not ground for reversal.

30. Appeal and error 🔑1066—Incorrect instruction not injuring appellant's cause held harmless error.

No injury to appellant's cause appearing by reason of incorrect instruction on an abstract matter of law, the error will be disregarded as unimportant and unsubstantial.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Benj. R. Knight, Judge.

Suit, by Edward F. Treadwell against J. Leroy Nickel and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, and Frank D. Madison and Alfred Sutro, both of San Francisco (Eugene M. Prince, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

Lucien Shaw, of Los Angeles, and Franklin Swart, of Redwood City (R. S. Laughlin and E. F Treadwell, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

WASTE, J. Plaintiff brought suit for $300,000, alleged to be the reasonable value of his services as attorney for the defendants in connection with various inheritance and federal estate tax matters growing out of the trust created by Henry Miller, and covering a period of nearly six years from October, 1916, to August, 1922, and including, also, various matters in connection with the administration of the estate of Henry Miller. The case was tried before a jury upon the issues raised by plaintiff's complaint, his amended bill of particulars, and defendants' answer, and resulted in a verdict and judgment awarding plaintiff the amount prayed for and costs, from which judgment defendants have appealed.

In the year 1907, plaintiff was employed "to act as general counsel for" Miller & Lux, Incorporated, at a designated monthly salary. The contract of employment is embodied in a series of letters passing between plaintiff and the defendant J. Leroy Nickel, as vice president of the corporation. In a letter dated May 14, 1907, plaintiff proposed to take charge of all the general business of the company, to be associated in all cases in which other counsel might be employed, and to devote all his time to the company's business. He also proposed that—

> "Any work done by me [plaintiff] for stockholders of the company to be done without extra compensation, the same being a credit to Miller & Lux, Incorporated."

In reply, and under date of May 17th Mr. Nickel wrote to plaintiff:

> "Yours of May 14th is received. In reply I beg to say you do not state the terms under which Miller & Lux, Incorporated, engaged your services to act as general counsel exactly in accordance with my understanding. You limit the service to work done for stockholders of the company. The arrangement may be more correctly stated as follows: Any business or service of any nature, which you may be called upon to render either to Miller & Lux, Incorporated, or for any other interests which its officers may deem proper to place in your hands shall be attended to by you, for which you are to receive a monthly compensation of $350.00 net per month, and it is understood that no extra compensation shall be paid for services rendered in addition to the business of Miller & Lux, Incorporated."

Replying to this letter on May 18th plaintiff wrote to Mr. Nickel:

> "Your statement of the basis of our agreement is entirely satisfactory to me."

Under this contract plaintiff became general counsel for Miller & Lux, Incorporated. His salary was increased from time to time, in addition to which Miller & Lux provided his offices, necessary stenographers, clerks, and assistants, and paid other office expenses.

Prior to April 17, 1913, Henry Miller was practically the sole owner of the capital stock of Miller & Lux, Incorporated, a Nevada corporation. On the last-mentioned date, by a deed of trust, he transferred this stock to his daughter, the defendant Nellie Miller Nickel, and her husband, the defendant J. Leroy Nickel, in trust, they to collect the rents, issues, and profits thereof and pay the income therefrom to Henry Miller during his life, and after his death to sell sufficient stock to pay certain specific bequests, aggregating about $300,000, the income from the property to be paid to the trustees during their lives. The deed contained further provisions for the disposition of the property after the death of the trustees. On the same day Mr. Miller also made his last will and testament, directing that certain real property be disposed of, and leaving the residue of his estate to the defendants to be held upon the same trusts as provided in the deed of trust.

Henry Miller died on October 14, 1916, being at the time of his death a resident of the state of California. At the instance of the defendants, plaintiff filed the will for probate, recorded the deed of trust, and assumed entire charge of all legal matters and litigation connected with the estate and the trust. The estate of Henry Miller, exclusive of the Miller & Lux stock, which was appraised by federal and state officials in varying amounts up to $48,000,000, and which had been estimated in 1910 by Mr. Miller himself at about $32,000,000, consisted of three pieces of land and certain cash, all appraised at approximately $34,000. The state of California made claim against Miller's estate for inheritance taxes on a property valuation of $40,000,000, on the ground that the deed of trust was made in contemplation of death. The state of Nevada likewise contended that an inheritance tax was due upon the shares of stock of Pacific Live Stock Company, a California corporation owning a large amount of real and personal property in the state of Nevada; all of the stock of that company being held by Miller & Lux, Incorporated. Federal estate taxes, also, were imposed upon the property in the sum of nearly $4,000,000, based upon an appraised value of over $39,000,000. Though failure to file a return, a penalty was levied in an amount equal to half of the tax, which, together with interest and a claimed additional penalty, brought the entire tax to over $6,500,000, demand for the payment of which was made by the collector of internal revenue, with the threat that unless the tax was paid within 10 days the government would proceed to seize and sell the property without suit. Plaintiff expended a large amount of time and labor in contesting the various tax claims and in an effort to have their validity determined, the litigation extending over a period of nearly six years. Plaintiff contends that through his efforts there was eliminated from the amount of taxes, interest, and penalties claimed by the states of California and Nevada, and the United States, more than $17,250,000. Plaintiff was also continuously called upon to furnish legal advice in connection with matters concerning the estate and trust, the property value of which was appraised at more than $41,000, 000. Had the estate of Henry Miller been conducted in the usual manner of probate proceedings, and not almost entirely as a trust, plaintiff would have been entitled to an attorney's fee of more than $200,000 for conducting the ordinary matters of probate. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1618, 1619. In addition to such ordinary services, he conducted the litigation concerning the various tax claims to a successful termination. During the pendency of these actions it became necessary to determine upon the amount of a reasonable attorney fee for the conduct of the estate and trust, in order that the amount might be deducted from the value of the estate before the inheritance and estate taxes were computed; and the evidence shows that plaintiff and the defendants agreed upon the sum of $300,000 as being a reasonable attorney's fee in the matter. Plaintiff resigned as general counsel for Miller & Lux in 1921, but continued to handle the legal matters of the estate and trust of Henry Miller until they were finally settled.

When the estate of Henry Miller had been finally distributed, and the inheritance tax litigation was practically concluded, plaintiff requested Mr. Nickel to consider and definitely fix his compensation in the matter. Nickel replied, after considering the matter with others, that it had been decided, as a proper recognition of plaintiff's services in connection with the estate litigation, to present him with the sum of $50,000. Plaintiff declined to accept this amount, stating that in the estate tax matters it had become necessary to fix what would be a fair compensation for his work in that connection in order that the estate could get the benefit of the amount of such fee as a deduction. This amount, $300,000, he considered very conservative, and it was his view that an amount approximating that sum should be paid him. There was some further correspondence between the parties relative to the fee, and, no amount being paid, plaintiff brought this action.

Although the record brought here is voluminous, consisting, as it does, of many hundreds of pages of testimony, the case is a very simple one. It is alleged in the complaint that the defendants employed plaintiff "as their attorney to take all proceedings and give all legal advice necessary for the determination of all liens and claims against the said trust property and against the estate of the said Henry Miller, and particularly all claims of the state of California, the state of Nevada, and the United States of America to inheritance tax liens or estate tax liens upon the estate of said Henry Miller, deceased, and to perform all legal services and give all legal advice necessary in connection with the administration of said estate and trust until the final determination of said claims, and promised and agreed to pay plaintiff the reasonable value of such services." The answer denied these allegations, and by way of defense alleged that the services were performed by plaintiff under the terms of the contract with Miller & Lux. Thus the main issue was joined. In his amended bill of particulars plaintiff segregated the services rendered, and placed a value on them aggregating approximately $650,000, but waived his claim for compensation in any amount over $300,000 "for the reason that that amount was agreed upon between the plaintiff and the defendants as the reasonable value of said service." The question as to the reasonable value of the services rendered by the plaintiff was submitted to a number of able and competent attorneys, who testified in the case. Some of them advanced a lower figure than that claimed by him, but others fixed their value at amounts far in excess of that established by the verdict. Consequently the issue as to the value of the services may be considered as having been closed by the finding of the jury.

The important question in the case is whether the services rendered by plaintiff in connection with the estate and trust of Henry Miller were covered by his retainer as general counsel for Miller & Lux, Incorporated, under the contract of May, 1907, and "consisted of business and service which plaintiff was called upon to render and which was placed in plaintiff's hands by defendant J. Leroy Nickel as president and managing officer of said Miller & Lux, Incorporated"; or whether the services were rendered under an entirely separate and distinct contract with the defendants. We feel that no good will be accomplished by attempting a minute review of the long transcript of the evidence submitted in the court below. At the outset of the trial plaintiff sought to introduce evidence of the circumstances surrounding the execution of the contract of May, 1907, by which he became general counsel for Miller & Lux, upon the theory that such evidence was admissible to show that the contract did not include the extraordinary services rendered by him in connection with the estate and trust. The trial court, however, was of the view that the contract "stated in plain and unequivocal terms" what Mr. Treadwell would be required to do, and, unless changed or abandoned, would include the services sued upon in this action; that to allow oral proof to be introduced on the theory contended for by the plaintiff would serve, not to explain any ambiguity appearing on the face of the contract, but to show that a meaning was intended contrary to that which did appear upon the face of the agreement itself. Consequently, the court held that it would not allow any oral testimony to be introduced merely to show the intention of the parties at the time the contract was entered into, but the evidence of an executed oral agreement subsequent to the contract might be received to show that the contract had been changed or partially abandoned; that, although conversations in 1907 were inadmissible under the parol evidence rule to vary the plain meaning of the letters constituting the contract, such conversations, if they had been referred to or repeated after the dates of the letters, might be received in evidence to show that the contract was changed after it was made.

The parties introduced oral testimony, which is sharply conflicting on every material point, and certain documentary evidence. The case of the plaintiff rests largely upon his own testimony and evidence of acts of the parties extending over a period of 15 years. Appellants contend that the evidence does not support the verdict. It requires only a casual inspection of the record to disclose that not only is there a conflict in various material parts of the evidence, but that widely divergent conclusions may be drawn therefrom. On a careful reading of the voluminous record, we are most strongly convinced that the case is one in which the findings of the jury are based upon reasonable inferences drawn from the facts proved with such legal sufficiency that the verdict on the facts cannot be disturbed on this appeal.

From the facts established by the evidence it appears that from the time of his employment in 1907 to August, 1922, the plaintiff attended to all the legal business of Miller & Lux which its officers requested him to perform and which included not only the business of Miller & Lux but that of a number of other corporations, some of which were subsidiary to it, and others in which it held varying amounts of stock. It also appears that after his appointment, and until 1913, under his retainer by Miller & Lux and without extra charge, plaintiff performed legal work for Henry Miller and for Miller's personal corporation, the Las Animas & San Joaquin Land Company; Miller and the Las Animas Company being the predecessors in interest of defendants as sole stockholders of Miller & Lux, Incorporated. In April, 1913, all the stock of Miller & Lux was transferred to the defendants here as trustees under the deed of trust of Henry Miller. From that time plaintiff acted as attorney for the trustees without any extra compensation in the same manner as he had acted for Miller and the Las Animas Company, but, until Mr. Miller's death in 1916, appears to have had but little, if anything, to do for them in that capacity. Mr. Miller personally paid plaintiff $500 for drawing his will. When plaintiff became general counsel for Miller & Lux, Miller was its president. Defendant Nickel was then vice president and general manager and had entire charge of the business. He continued in that position until 1915, at which time he became president and has ever since held that office. He testified that from the time plaintiff became general counsel for Miller & Lux, Mr. Treadwell was his own confidential personal advisor, and without charge rendered legal services for him of a substantial nature. The nature and value of these services appears to be a matter of conflicting opinion. The parties differ very materially as to their nature and extent, but the relation between the plaintiff and Mr. Nickel seems to have been quite close and intimate from 1907 until plaintiff requested payment for his services in connection with the estate and trust of Henry Miller.

The plaintiff testified that some time after his employment by Miller & Lux certain transactions took place which, he asserts, conclusively establish the fact that the parties recognized and construed the contract of employment as not requiring the plaintiff to perform work of an entirely private nature for the stockholders of Miller & Lux, or that if the contract did originally provide for the doing of such private work for the stockholders, these same transactions show that the parties abandoned and rescinded the contract, and that thereafter the plaintiff was employed by the corporation for corporate work, and by the stockholders themselves for any private work done for them. The primary basis for this contention is his testimony of conversations taking place between Mr. Nickel as an officer of Miller & Lux and himself in 1909 or 1910, in which it was agreed that it was not proper that work of an entirely private nature for the stockholders should be put in plaintiff's hands by the corporation or by its officers acting as such, which understanding was thereafter observed and followed, and from which time the plaintiff attended only to the direct interests of the corporation. The effect of plaintiff's evidence and testimony at this point is vigorously assailed by the appellants, and Mr. Nickel denied that any conversations tending to alter the written contract ever took place.

When Henry Miller died, plaintiff at once conferred with Mr. Nickel about the business that would arise in connection with the estate. There is not, and cannot be, any dispute about the fact that the whole matter of attending to the legal business relating to the estate and trust of Henry Miller was confided to plaintiff and placed in his hands by Mr. and Mrs. Nickel. Mr. Nickel testified that while he made no formal request of plaintiff that the latter attend to the probate of Miller's will, he deemed it proper that Mr. Treadwell should attend to the matter, as he had been attending to all the business of various interests, including the Las Animas Company and all other corporations in which the estate was interested; that in his view the business connected with the estate was merely a continuation; that the interests were identical; and that after the stock in the corporations had been transferred to the trustees the business continued along in exactly the same manner as before. The plaintiff testified that he interviewed Mrs. Nickel to get certain data concerning the affairs of the estate, and sought to impress upon her "that she had a very grave responsibility. She brushed it aside and said, 'No, I am going to leave it all to Mr. Nickel.'" Nothing was said at this time by any one about the compensation of plaintiff for the services to be rendered, nor was there any discussion of the fact that the services to the estate and trust were to be regarded as outside the contract of plaintiff's employment with Miller & Lux. The contention of the respondent in this connection is that it was not necessary to discuss those matters as the contract of 1907 had been abandoned and no longer included such extraordinary services. Appellants argue that the reason why the matter of compensation, or the contract of original employment, was not discussed, was because both plaintiff and Mr. Nickel considered such services included in the contract of 1907.

[1] The plaintiff relies upon what he terms a number of significant facts established in the record, and the inferences to be drawn therefrom, which, he argues, tend strongly to corroborate his testimony and to support the finding of the jury that the extraordinary services rendered by him had no connection with the business of Miller & Lux, or its stockholders, but were rendered in pursuance of a separate and independent contract made between the plaintiff and the defendants, and which finding is reflected in the verdict. Whatever may have been the relation of the plaintiff to Henry Miller, while living, or to his personal affairs, such previous relations were severed by Miller's death. Upon that event the defendants entered upon a new relation to the property of the trust and of the estate of the decedent, for they succeeded to such property, both in the trust and in the estate. The states of California and Nevada and the United States were asserting liens against this property for taxes, which liens sprang into life upon Miller's death, when they for the first time became claims or specific liens, not upon any property of Miller & Lux, Incorporated, but upon the property of the trust and estate to which the defendants had succeeded. Defendants were the two persons in existence who were most interested in disputing these tax claims. It would seem only natural and proper, as was suggested in the oral argument in this case, that the plaintiff, who had been adviser of Mr. Miller in legal matters for many years, and fully understood the nature and extent of his property, and who, of all persons, was probably best informed as to the nature of the trust created by Miller and the testamentary disposition which he had made of the property, should be employed by defendants to defend and protect their interests. Miller & Lux, Incorporated, was in no way directly interested in the tax litigation. The corporation was an entirely separate entity from the defendants, who were the trustees and beneficiaries of the trust and estate. There is a very substantial basis for the contention of the respondent that it was in the capacity of trustees and beneficiaries of Henry Miller, and in that capacity alone, that the defendants employed plaintiff to render the services which are here in dispute; and that in that capacity they contemplated that they would pay plaintiff for such services. There is the testimony of Mr. Nickel to the effect that he did not consider that the salary received by the plaintiff from Miller & Lux was full compensation for the services rendered in connection with the estate and trust. He testified that an increase in the monthly salary was allowed Mr. Treadwell in 1918 as a proper increase to cover all of the services he [Treadwell] was doing for Miller & Lux, Incorporated, and the subsidiary interests at that time. When asked if he included in this increase the services of plaintiff in connection with the inheritance tax matters, Nickel answered:

> "I don't—I didn't include the inheritance tax because it was not under the agreement except he was working under the direction that he was to do anything that he was directed to do by the officers of Miller & Lux."

When the matters relating to the estate and trust were finally settled, and the plaintiff requested the defendants to consider and fix his compensation, Mr. Nickel offered to pay him $50,000 for his services. It was the practice of Miller & Lux, Incorporated, when plaintiff as its general counsel rendered services for any of its subsidiary interests, to make a charge against such subsidiary interest for a proper portion of plaintiff's salary. In the same way, when the corporation was conducting litigation respecting its water rights, in which other persons were interested, a like charge was made against such persons and collected from them by the corporation. That practice was not observed or followed in connection with the services rendered by plaintiff for the defendants in relation to the estate and trust, although all other expenses of the trustees were charged against them. When the plaintiff, in February, 1921, tendered his resignation as general counsel for Miller & Lux, he notified the defendants that, so far as the estate and trust of Henry Miller were concerned, he deemed his employment to require him to see those matters completed until the estate was entirely administered, and he would do so if the trustees desired it. The defendant Nickel replied that it was entirely agreeable that plaintiff should complete the Miller estate matters, and asked him to indicate his idea as to the basis for his charges for such services as he might render in connection with the litigation in inheritance tax matters.

In all of the proceedings relating to inheritance and estate tax matters, the defendants consistently claimed credit for attorney's fees allowable in the matter of the estate of Miller; the amount of such fees to be deducted from the value of the estate before the taxes were computed thereon. In the proceedings in connection with the demand of the state of California the defendants claimed and were allowed a credit in the sum of $161,195 for attorney's fees. They also presented a verified claim before the internal revenue commissioner for an abatement and deduction of attorney's fees before the federal tax should be assessed, computed on the compensation allowed executors and administrators and their attorneys by sections 1618 and 1619 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The federal tax matter was heard before the master in chancery, and a claim was made by the defendants for an allowance of an attorney fee in the sum of $300,000. The respondent points to the magnitude and value of the services rendered by him in connection with the estate and trust of Henry Miller, in support of an argument that to pretend he was to render such services in addition to all the services he was called upon to render to Miller & Lux for an annual salary, which only approached $20,000 during the last years of his connection with the corporation, is to invoke an absurdity. There is much merit in the suggestion.

Appellants' position is that the plaintiff was employed in October, 1916, to render the services in suit in exactly the same manner as he was customarily requested to attend to business admittedly covered by his salary paid by Miller & Lux, Incorporated. They contend that the facts conclusively show that the services were rendered by plaintiff as general counsel of Miller & Lux under his contract of 1907. In consonance with that contention, and their claim that the plaintiff, in order to avoid that contract, is here seeking to recover under the terms of an altered contract of employment by Miller & Lux, Incorporated, appellants argue that there is no evidence that the written contract was altered by an executed oral agreement, or that it was totally or partially abandoned to the extent of excluding the extraordinary services rendered by the plaintiff. On the other hand, the respondent asserts that he has at no time relied upon a modification or alteration of the contract, but upon the fact that the transactions which he claims took place after its execution either conclusively established that the parties recognized and construed the contract as not requiring him to perform work of an entirely private nature for the stockholders of Miller & Lux, or that, if the contract did originally provide for the doing of such work, these same transactions show that the parties abandoned and rescinded the contract, and that thereafter the plaintiff was employed by Miller & Lux, Incorporated, for corporate work alone, and by the stockholders for any private work done by plaintiff for them.

[2] A contract in writing may be altered by an executed oral agreement. (Civ. Code, § 1698.) If there was a subsequent oral agreement modifying the contract between the respondent and Miller & Lux, its object was to exclude from the terms of the employment the requirement, and to set at rest any contention that by virtue of its provisions respondent should also serve the stockholders in addition to attending to the legal business of the corporation. If thereafter the relations of plaintiff and Miller & Lux were governed by such oral agreement, and its object was fully accomplished, the agreement became executed and worked a modification of the original contract of employment. Civ. Code, § 1661. In such event plaintiff was in position, unhampered by any arrangement with Miller & Lux, to enter into an independent contract with the defendants for the performance of such services as they, individually, might require of him in connection with the trust and estate of Henry Miller, and for an agreed or an implied compensation.

[3, 4] Again, a contract is extinguished by its rescission, which may be had by consent of the parties (Civ. Code, §§ 1688, 1689), and a parol agreement to rescind a contract even under seal is good if such parol agreement is executed. (Green v. Wells & Co., 2 Cal. 584). Consequently, whether the contract of employment between plaintiff and Miller & Lux was altered or modified to exclude from the purview of its terms such services as the plaintiff rendered in this case, leaving him free to contract with stockholders of the corporation as he chose, or whether it was rescinded by mutual consent and abandoned and a new arrangement entered into, and thereafter performed by plaintiff and the corporation, as contended for by the plaintiff, he would be free to make a separate and entirely independent contract with these defendants. If the parties were free to, and did, make such an independent contract, and plaintiff has rendered the services he agreed to perform thereunder, upon an express or upon an implied promise of the defendants to pay him therefor, he is entitled to recover in this action. The trial court in its charge to the jury clearly and comprehensively instructed it on the law, both as to alteration and as to abandonment and rescission of contracts.

[5-9] A parol agreement to abandon or rescind a written contract may be inferred from the acts of the parties. Green v. Wells & Co., supra. Whether or not the whole conduct of the respondent in attending to the affairs of Miller & Lux, and in conducting their litigation, and what he did in his relations with certain stockholders of the company, tended to contradict or to support the evidence of plaintiff that there was an abandonment and rescission of his contract of employment by Miller & Lux was an issue of fact for the jury to decide. All of the circumstances under which the employment of respondent by the appellants was arranged were placed before the jury in extenso. It had before it all the antecedent relations of plaintiff and Miller & Lux and these defendants, and what was done by them after the alleged abandonment of the contract. Whether or not, in view of the situation of the parties and their relation to the entire transaction, it was likely or probable that they contracted in the manner claimed by respondent, was the peculiar province of the jury to determine. We are not disposed to attempt a further narration of the evidence, or to engage in a discussion as to its weight or significance. The transcript discloses that "the case was regularly argued by respective counsel to the jury," and from our knowledge of the eminent counsel engaged in this trial we may well assume that the jurors were thoroughly enlightened as to the views of both sides with reference to the weight and character of the evidence, and the consideration to be given to their opposing contentions. By proper instructions the court fully charged the jury as to its duty in weighing and considering the evidence. We apprehend that no good will be accomplished in setting forth any more of the evidence relied on by appellants to overthrow the case of the respondent. When a verdict is attacked for insufficiency of evidence, our power begins and ends with the inquiry whether there is substantial evidence, contradicted or uncontradicted, which in and of itself will support the conclusion reached by the jury. If, on any material point, the testimony is in conflict, it must be assumed that the jury resolved the conflict in favor of the prevailing party. Gjurich v. Fieg, 164 Cal. 429, 431, 129 Pac. 464, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 111. Therefore we have simply epitomized enough of the record to show that the verdict has substantial support if the jurors received the evidence of plaintiff as true and accepted and adopted the construction he placed upon it. Appellants contend that an oral alteration or abandonment of plaintiff's written contract with Miller & Lux, Incorporated, was not proved as the law requires (citing Ross v. Tabor, 53 Cal. App. 605, 615, 200 Pac. 971), by clear, positive, and convincing evidence. The court instructed the jury that evidence of the rescission or abandonment of the written contract in this case must be clear, positive and above suspicion.

That instruction was most favorable to the appellants, for the statutory rule in civil actions is that the case must be decided according to the preponderance of the evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 5), and all judicial expressions concerning the necessity of clear and satisfactory proof of an executed oral agreement in a case such as this must be construed in the light of the fundamental declaration that a preponderance of the evidence controls in a civil case (Edmonds v. Wilcox, 178 Cal. 222, 224, 172 Pac. 1101). The sufficiency of the evidence to establish a given fact, even where the law requires proof of the facts to be clear and convincing, is primarily a question for the trial court and the jury, and if there be substantial evidence to support the conclusion reached below, the finding is not open to review on appeal. Steinberger v. Young, 175 Cal. 81, 84, 165 Pac. 432. We are not called upon to say that the evidence in the record is entirely plain and convincing. To the extent that its determination rests upon a mere preponderance of evidence, or upon the consideration of conflicting or contradictory evidence, the finding in the lower court is not subject to review in this court. Wadleigh v. Phelps, 149 Cal. 627, 638, 87 Pac. 93; De Kahn v. Chase, 177 Cal. 281, 283, 170 Pac. 608.

It is the contention of the appellants that the trial court committed prejudicial errors in its instructions to the jury concerning the contract of 1907, and concerning the extent and value of plaintiff's services. Primarily, appellants' claim is that the court erred in denying their motion for a directed verdict; in refusing two peremptory instructions requested by them directing the jury to find in their favor; and in giving a number of instructions submitting to the jury the question whether or not the contract of 1907 between plaintiff and Miller & Lux, Incorporated, had been changed or rescinded. In support of this claim appellants rely upon the argument made and the authorities cited to uphold their contention that the evidence does not sustain the verdict. What we have already said, therefore, disposes of these primary objections to the instructions.

[12, 13] In one of the instructions (XLa), the jury was told that in determining whether there was any other or different contract than that of 1907 it might consider all the circumstances, "including the relative amount of work before and after that contract and before and after the death of Henry Miller, and all acts and declarations of the parties during the performance of said services." In another instruction, concerning the allegation in the answer that the defendants believed that the services in controversy were included by the terms of the contract of 1907, the court instructed the jury that in the determination of that allegation it might consider all of the evidence in the case, "including all of the communications either oral or in writing passing between the parties and all of the acts of the defendants with relation to the fees of said attorney in connection with the estate and trust of Henry Miller." It is contended by the appellants that these instructions are objectionable as singling out and bringing into prominence certain isolated facts and thereby, in effect, intimating to the jury that special consideration should be given to those facts. No reason appears why the court should have singled out portions of the evidence and specially directed that it might be considered. Under the general instructions contained in the full and comprehensive charge, the jury must have known that such evidence with all other evidence of facts and circumstances in the case was to be considered by them. Instructions which are framed solely for the purpose of, and which simply have the effect, of emphasizing some particular portion of the evidence, are not to be commended, and are properly refused. Still v. S. F. Ry. Co., 154 Cal. 559, 572, 98 Pac. 672, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 322, 129 Am. St. Rep. 177. Such an instruction was denounced as objectionable in Estate of Martin, 170 Cal. 657, 672, 151 Pac. 138, but it does not appear that the reversal in that case was had because of the improper instruction.

[14-17] By another instruction, the court told the jury that the issues of fact for its determination were presented by the denials made in the answer to the allegations of the complaint and by the affirmative matter pleaded by the defendants. Appellants complain that by this instruction plaintiff's amended bill of particulars was entirely withdrawn from the jury's consideration in determining the issues of fact. There is no merit in the contention. The bill of particulars furnished to the defendants was, of course, to be regarded as an amplification of the complaint, and for the purpose of determining plaintiff's right to recovery or the admissibility of evidence that might be offered in support of his claim, was to be considered as if it had been incorporated in the complaint as originally filed (Millet v. Bradbury, 109 Cal. 170, 172, 41 Pac. 865. In an instruction, proposed by the appellants, explaining at length the issues of the case, and next following the one now criticized by them, the trial court properly told the jury that an amended bill of particulars which plaintiff furnished the defendants, segregated the various services performed, and placed a value upon each of them "aggregating for all the sum of $641, 276.13, which amount in his complaint he reduced to the sum of $300,000." If defendants desired any further or more explicit instruction with reference to the bill of particulars, they should have asked that such be given. Not having done so, they cannot be heard to complain that it was not given. Rice v. Whitmore, 74 Cal. 619, 624, 16 Pac. 501, 5 Am. St. Rep. 479.

[18-20] Plaintiff called a number of experts to testify to the value of his services. It is contended by appellants that the trial court erred in refusing to give an instruction requested by them to the effect that the jury should disregard the testimony of an expert witness unless it believed that all the material facts upon which the hypothetical question propounded to the experts was based, were true. The instruction was properly refused. Expert testimony is to be given the weight to which it appears in each case to be justly entitled. The law makes no distinction between that kind of testimony and evidence of other character. Rolland v. Porterfield, 183 Cal. 466, 469, 191 Pac. 913. The witness to whom the hypothetical question is addressed assumes the facts stated to be true, and bases his answer upon the assumed case. The opinion of the witness must therefore be brought to the test of the facts in order that the jury may judge what weight his opinion is entitled to. Estate of Dolbeer, 149 Cal. 227, 252, 86 Pac. 695, 9 Ann. Cas. 795. When the evidence is sufficient as a basis for a hypothetical question, the truth or falsity of the purported facts is a question for the jury to determine. Coonan v. Loewenthal, 129 Cal. 197, 203, 61 Pac. 940. The opinion can have little, if any, value unless the material facts assumed in such question are substantially true, and the court may properly so instruct the jury whenever there is conflicting evidence as to the truth of the assumed facts. Such opinion evidence does not, however, necessarily become wholly valueless because there is some variance between the facts assumed in the question and the actual facts proven. What weight should be given in such cases to the opinion of the expert witnesses is a question for the jury under proper instructions from the court. Anderson v. Husted, 79 Conn. 535, 538, 66 Atl. 7; Madden v. Saylor Coal Co., 133 Iowa, 699, 704, 111 N. W. 57. An expression in Hallawell v. Union Oil Co., 36 Cal. App. 672, 685, 173 Pac. 177, 183, that "counsel objecting [to a hypothetical question] may have the instruction of the court to the jury to disregard the testimony of the expert unless satisfied that all of the facts upon which the question is based are true," is mere dictum, and does not correctly state the law relating to expert testimony, and is at variance with a later statement by the same court of the correct rule. Graves v. Union Oil Co., 36 Cal. App. 766, 770–771, 173 Pac. 618.

[21, 22] The appraised value of Henry Miller's estate which was actually probated was $36,878.44. The statutory attorney's fees for the usual conduct of the administration of such an estate amount to $1,067.16. Code Civ. Proc. § 1618. In his amended bill of particulars plaintiff claimed $208,776.13 for "ordinary services in the matter of the estate and trust of Henry Miller, appraised at the sum of $41,489,226.64, computed according to section 1618 of the Code of Civil Procedure." Appellants requested the trial court to instruct the jury that plaintiff could not recover fees for ordinary services to the Miller trust, as distinguished from the estate, and if entitled to recover at all could be allowed only the sum of $1,067.16, and that there was "no evidence that the plaintiff performed any service for the trust for which the law would allow compensation computed according to section 1618 of the Code of Civil Procedure." The instruction was clearly misleading, and the trial court properly refused to give it. It will be remembered that by his last will and testament Henry Miller left the residue of his estate, with the exception of certain real property, to these defendants to be held upon the same trusts as provided in the deed of trust. No one contesting either the will or the deed of trust, the residue of the small "estate" was distributed as directed, but the title to the vast bulk of Miller's property passed to the defendants under the deed of trust, and the "estate" was in fact administered as the "trust," the property value of which was $41,489,226.64, the sum mentioned by plaintiff in his amended bill of particulars. Compensation of trustees is confided to the discretion of the trial courts (Code Civ. Proc. § 1700), and an attorney for such trustees is entitled to the reasonable value of his legal services as a proper expense out of the trust fund. (Estate of O'Connor, 2 Cal. App. 470, 478, 84 Pac. 317). It is a matter of common knowledge that, since the Legislature, by statute, fixed the compensation of executors and administrators, and provided that their attorneys shall be allowed as fees for conducting the ordinary proceedings of estates the same amounts as are allowed as compensation for executors and administrators (Code Civ. Proc. § 1619), in the administration of ordinary trust affairs the same ratio of compensation for trustees and their attorneys will frequently be fixed. Under certain circumstances, a trustee is entitled to the same compensation as an executor. Civ. Code, § 2274. There was nothing unusual, therefore, in the plaintiff here seeking compensation for his ordinary services rendered to the "estate" and "trust" of Henry Miller—they were in effect the same in so far as his services were concerned—on the basis of the fees regarded by the Legislature as reasonable in ordinary probate matters. Whether or not the jury would regard such basis of compensation or any basis of remuneration of the attorney as reasonable, provided it found the "ordinary services" were rendered as claimed, was one of the issues of the case which would have been withdrawn from its consideration by the proposed instruction.

The plaintiff called a number of attorneys, who were qualified as experts, to testify to the value of his services. The opinions of these witnesses were expressed in answers to a hypothetical question containing the plaintiff's own statement of what he did in connection with the estate and trust of Henry Miller. All objections interposed to the question by the defendants were overruled, and it is contended that the trial court erred in its ruling. Other than to say in their brief that "the hypothetical question was * * * highly objectionable on the grounds stated in the written objection," appellants argue only the ground of objection that the question assumed facts not in evidence. They say:

> "The question, for example, in several places dogmatically stated that plaintiff's services had in various instances resulted in savings to defendants running into the hundreds of thousands of dollars, while in many of these instances there was no evidence to show that there had been any saving at all."

We do not feel called upon to analyze a long hypothetical question, contained in some 83 pages of typewritten transcript, and an objection involved in 14 pages more of the record, in a critical search for objections not pointed out and argued here. Only four specifications are now presented of the particulars in which it is contended the question assumed facts for which there was no support in the evidence. The first has to do with an item contained in a résumé by plaintiff of the final amount claimed to have been conserved to the Miller estate by the tax litigation conducted by him, from which it would appear that $2,000,000 was saved by the judgment of the Nevada court limiting the Nevada tax to the value of the property in that state. As the basis of this assumed fact the hypothetical question sets forth the history of the Nevada litigation in the light of the circumstance that the Nevada court held that the trust deed from Henry Miller to the defendants, which was dated April 17, 1913, was in its nature testamentary and did not take effect until his death, and that under a construction which plaintiff asserted might be placed upon the Nevada tax statute, passed March 26, 1913, it would have been possible to fix the tax on the value of the corporate stock of Miller & Lux, Incorporated, in California. "If this tax," reads the question, "had been based upon the total value of the stock, as fixed in California, the tax would have amounted to about $2,000,000." The history of this litigation and a narration of all that the plaintiff did in the matter was embodied in the question in support of the claim of the plaintiff that his efforts were the means of saving that sum for the estate. Facts shown by the defendants, and otherwise appearing in the evidence, the appellants argue, tend to practically break down the entire claim of the plaintiff as to this item of his services. Miller & Lux, Incorporated, while a Nevada corporation, possessed nothing in that state other than ownership of the capital stock of the Pacific Live Stock Company, a company incorporated in this state, and which held title to all Miller's property in Nevada. To offset the effect of plaintiff's evidence, that the sum of $2,000,000 was saved to the estate, the defendants introduced testimony which tended to show that the state of Nevada did not claim the right to tax the corporate stock of Miller & Lux, Incorporated, but demanded only a tax on the value of the stock of the Pacific Live Stock Company, which value was stipulated in the litigation; the tax thereon amounting to some $48,000.

[23] The question does assume facts at variance with the evidence introduced by the defendants, and, of course, in disagreement with the construction placed upon plaintiff's evidence by them. It was skillfully drawn, as hypothetical questions usually are, to meet the views of the party propounding it. Considerable latitude must be allowed in the choice of facts as the basis upon which to frame a hypothetical question. Every hypothesis contained in the question should have some evidence to sustain it. But while this is true, it is also the rule that it is not necessary, in framing the question, to include a statement of all the evidence in the case. The question may be framed upon any theory of the questioning party which can be deduced from the evidence, and the statement may assume any facts, within the limits of the evidence, upon which the opinion of the expert is desired. It may omit any facts not deemed by the questioner material to the inquiry. 10 Cal. Jur. p. 966, § 223. It is the privilege of a party in such cases to assume, within the limits of the evidence, any statement of the facts which he claims the evidence justifies, and have the opinion of experts upon the facts thus assumed, subject to the limitation that the question shall not be unfair or misleading. Thompson on Trials, §§ 606–610; People v. Hill, 116 Cal. 562, 567, 48 Pac. 711. Measured by these considerations, the question here was not objectionable.

[24] The second objection urged to the hypothetical question is that it assumes the plaintiff in one instance secured a reduction of taxes amounting to some $83,000, when the evidence discloses that the amount was but $53,000. The statement was an error, which was corrected in the subsequent summary of taxes alleged to have been saved to the estate, and we are satisfied no harm was done by the misstatment.

[25, 26] It is next contended that the hypothetical question did not make it clear that certain services rendered in connection with a bond issue of Miller & Lux, Incorporated, were performed for the corporation and not for the defendants. We have no doubt that the learned lawyers to whom the question was submitted clearly understood that the services were performed for the corporation. Objection is now made that the question included facts the evidence of which had been stricken from the record. Respondent admits such to be the fact, but contends that no objection on that ground was made when the question was asked. The objection was that "there is no evidence" of the fact, which would be a sufficient objection, for if the evidence on the fact was stricken from the record, there certainly would be no evidence on the point. The matter stricken out, however, related only to what another attorney told plaintiff concerning the attitude of the newspapers and the public toward the Miller estate tax litigation, and seems inconsequential in the light of the real issues involved in the case.

The remaining objection pointed out is merely a controversy as to whether plaintiff or another attorney should have credit for the line of conduct of a portion of the tax litigation. No matters have been pointed out to us which amounted to a substantial error in the ruling of the trial court on the hypothetical question.

[27] Appellants complain that the trial court gave contradictory and inconsistent instructions. At the request of the defendants, the court instructed the jury that the contract for legal services, entered into between plaintiff and Miller & Lux in 1907, was plain and unambiguous, and that, unless it had been changed or abandoned, it included the services in suit and prevented a recovery by plaintiff in this action. At the plaintiff's request, it instructed the jury that even though the contract of 1907 was in effect at the time of the alleged employment of plaintiff by the defendants, such contract would not prevent the defendants from entering into an independent contract with plaintiff and agreeing to pay him for his services, and that if they did so, and promised to pay him for his services, such promise was valid and the agreement of the plaintiff to perform such services would be a sufficient consideration for their agreement to pay him therefor. A better understanding of the situation will be had by reading the instructions in full. They are:

"At the request of the defendants:

"XVIII. Taking up first in point of time the alleged contracts concerning which evidence has been offered in this case, you are instructed that the three letters set out in the answer of the defendants written in 1907, and which may be referred to as the so-called contract of 1907, constitute a written contract between plaintiff and Miller & Lux, Incorporated. That contract is plain and unambiguous, and, under it, plaintiff, unless he has proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the contract was modified, changed, or abandoned in this respect, was bound to perform any business or service of any nature for any interests which the officers of Miller & Lux might deem proper to place in his hands, including work for stockholders, and including the services for which he seeks compensation in this case."

"XXV. If you find, in accordance with these instructions, that the written contract of 1907 between the plaintiff and Miller & Lux, Incorporated, was not modified, it makes no difference whether the services in question in this case were anticipated or contemplated by the parties when this contract was made, and it makes no difference whether the plaintiff's services were reasonably worth more than the price fixed in this contract. If this contract was not altered, modified, or abandoned, it controls this case, and the plaintiff is not entitled to recover anything."

At the request of the plaintiff:

"XXXV. Even if the contract of 1907 was still in effect at the time of the alleged employment by [of] plaintiff, such contract would not prevent the defendants from entering into an independent contract with plaintiff and employing plaintiff and agreeing to pay him for his services, and if he agreed to perform said services this would be sufficient consideration for their agreement to pay him therefor."

"XLI. One of the principal issues in this case is whether or not the plaintiff was employed to perform the services in question by the defendants, or whether the particular services were performed under the alleged contract with Miller & Lux, Incorporated, of 1907. Even if under the alleged contract with Miller & Lux, Incorporated, of 1907, that corporation or its officers might have placed these services in the hands of the plaintiff, still there was no particular term of employment under that contract, and the plaintiff therefore could have refused to perform such services under that contract. Therefore the defendants were at liberty to employ the plaintiff to perform such services independent of said contract, and, if they did so employ him and promised to pay him therefor, such promise was entirely valid, and the promise of the plaintiff to perform such services would be a sufficient consideration therefor."

Appellants contend that these instructions are contradictory and conflicting on a most material issue of the case, and that the action of the trial court in giving them constituted prejudicial error calling for a reversal of the judgment. We do not agree with this contention. The situation is clarified when it is remembered that Miller & Lux, Incorporated, is not a party to this action. We are not now considering what, if any, mutual obligations or restrictions rested upon plaintiff and Miller & Lux, Incorporated, by reason of the contract of 1907, at the time it is said plaintiff and these defendants entered into the contract here in question. The defendants were not parties to the contract of 1907. There was nothing in its terms or provisions which erected a bar against, or purported to prohibit them from individually entering into an independent engagement with plaintiff, unaffected by anything in the existing relations between plaintiff and Miller & Lux, and agreeing to pay him for his services. The vital question in the case is, Did they do so? Appellants say they did not, and have attempted to justify their denial by setting up a contract to which they were not parties, but under which they assert plaintiff rendered the services at the instance of, and as chief counsel for Miller & Lux, Incorporated. The trial court of its own motion, and again at the instance of plaintiff as just indicated, instructed the jury that a main issue was: Under which of the contracts set forth in the pleadings in the case were the legal services in question performed? By other instructions (XIX to XXIV, inclusive), the court very properly submitted to the jury the question whether or not the services of plaintiff were covered by the contract of 1907. In these instructions it construed the contract of 1907 to mean that under its terms plaintiff was in any event required to do only such work as the officers of the corporation deemed proper to place in his hands as such officers, acting as such in their official capacity, but that he was not required to perform services which might be placed in his hands by persons who merely happened to be officers of the corporation but who were not acting as such in placing the work in his hands; and also that they should consider whether Mr. Nickel, in placing the legal matters pertaining to the estate and trust of Henry Miller in the hands of plaintiff, was acting as an officer of Miller & Lux, Incorporated, or merely in his capacity as an executor and trustee. The burden of the lengthy charge—there were same 52 instructions—when read as a whole, as it must be (Peters v. S. P. Co., 160 Cal. 48, 69, 116 Pac. 400), was that if the jury found that the services for which plaintiff is here seeking compensation were rendered by him under the contract of 1907, he could not recover without first showing a modification or abandonment of that agreement; but that, if the services were in fact rendered under and in pursuance of a separate and distinct contract for their performance, entered into by the defendants individually with the plaintiff, independent of and aside from the contract between Miller & Lux, Incorporated, and having no relation thereto, plaintiff could recover, for in such event the contract of 1907 would constitute no bar to the separate and independent agreement between the plaintiff and defendants.

[28-30] Thus considered, the charge is a correct statement of the law of the case, and the apparent inconsistency and contradiction arise only by reason of the giving by the trial court of the defendants' instructions that unless the contract of 1907 was altered, modified, or abandoned, it controlled the case and prevented a recovery by plaintiff. The giving of conflicting instructions upon a material point is undoubtedly error, but a party may not be heard to complain that instructions are inconsistent, if it appear that the inconsistency arises through the giving of instructions at his request which are inconsistent with, or contradictory of other instructions given at the request of the other party which are pertinent to the issues of the case, and which are correct statements of the law. Barkhaus v. Producers' Fruit Co. (Cal. Sup.) 219 Pac. 435. Instruction XXV, supra, was prejudicial to the cause of the plaintiff and favorable to appellants', for it took away from the jury the issue of fact, raised by the answer, whether the employment of plaintiff was by Miller & Lux, Incorporated, or by the defendants, and narrowed the case to one of modification or abandonment of the contract. A conflict in instructions which does not operate injuriously to an appellant is not ground of reversal. Dennison v. Chapman, 105 Cal. 447, 458, 39 Pac. 61. Complaint is also made that there is no evidence in the record to warrant the instruction (in XLI, supra) that as there was no particular term of employment of plaintiff under the contract of 1907, plaintiff could have refused to perform the services here in question, if required to do so under that agreement. It is true there is no evidence in the record that the plaintiff ever refused to perform the services in question, but appellants concede that—

> "It may be true as an abstract matter that plaintiff could have terminated his contract with Miller & Lux, and that, if he had done so, he might have made an enforceable contract with defendants to pay him for his services."

No injury to appellants' cause affirmatively appearing by reason of a correct instruction on an abstract matter of law, the error will be disregarded as unimportant and unsubstantial. Vallejo, etc., R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 554, 147 Pac. 238.

The judgment is affirmed.

FOX et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 10923.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 29, 1924. Rehearing Denied August 28, 1924.)

1. Master and servant 🔑388—Injured mother held not legally liable for maintenance of minor children within Compensation Act concerning conclusive presumption of total dependency.

A mother held not legally liable for maintenance of minor children within Compensation Act, § 14(a) (2), amended by St. 1919, p. 917, and Civ. Code, § 196, where parents were married and living together and both contributed from their respective earnings to bank account in husband's name, out of which minor children at time of injury to mother were being supported in Japan, and father was not unable to support children and hence conclusive presumption of total dependency, raised by said section 14(a) (2), did not apply.

2. Master and servant 🔑388—Status of minors under Compensation Act, for purpose of applying presumption of total dependency, held not changed because sent to foreign country for education.

That minor children, born here, of deceased employee, were sent to foreign country for their education, was immaterial so far as concerned their status under Compensation Act, § 14(a), amended by St. 1919, p. 917, providing that presumptions of total dependency for support upon deceased employee shall not apply in favor of nonresident aliens, in view of federal Constitution, Fourteenth Amendment, providing that all children born or naturalized in United States are citizens thereof.

Certiorari by C. A. Fox and another, to review an award of compensation by the Industrial Accident Commission for the death of Nobu Wakiya, in favor of Morio Wakiya and others. Award annulled.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

W. H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. This is a review of an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of Morio Wakiya and his three minor children, for the death of the wife and mother, the award amounting to the sum of $4,149.

The deceased, Nobu Wakiya, and her husband, Morio Wakiya, were both employed by petitioner, C. A. Fox, at Fresno. She served as a chambermaid in a hotel conducted by petitioner and received a wage of $3.50 a day, working 7 days a week, plus room, water, ice, and certain other advantages, such items aggregating 50 cents a day, and this remuneration was stipulated to be the basis of any award that may be rendered. The husband received the same wage and customarily deposited the joint earnings of both in a bank account conducted in his own name. The three children were all born in the United States, aged at the time of the death of deceased, 14, 15, and 16 years, respectively. When two years of age each child had been sent to Japan to boarding school. They were all in Japan at the time of the death of deceased. Thirty-five dollars monthly was forwarded to these children in Japan from the common earnings of husband and wife. During the course of the employment the wife was electrocuted as a result of her hand coming in contact with a nest of uncovered electric wires, and upon her death proceedings were instituted by the husband and father, as guardian ad litem and trustee of the children, and by the father-in-law of the deceased (a resident of Japan), for the collection of the death benefit.

The Commission filed the following findings of fact:

"A. Nobu Wakiya, while employed as a chambermaid on December 14, 1922, at Fresno, Cal., by defendant C. A. Fox, doing business as Fox Hotel, sustained an injury occurring in the course of and arising out of her employment, as follows: Her hand came in contact with an open electric switch, causing her immediate death. At said time said defendant's insurance carrier was Ætna Life Insurance Co., and the employer and the employee were subject to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917.

"B. The employer had notice of said injury and death within the terms of the aforesaid act.

"C. Employee left surviving her Wataru Wakiya, Masako Wakiya, and Seishi Wakiya, her minor children, each of whom was at said time under the age of 18 years. Said deceased and her husband at all times herein mentioned and since the year 1911, were residents of the state of California, and said minors and each of them were born in said state and subject to the jurisdiction thereof. Said minors were sent by their parents to boarding schools in Japan for more economical education and support.

"D. The surviving parent of said minors was not dependent for support upon said deceased.

"E. Said minors were therefore at the time of said injury citizens of the state of California (section 1, Amendment 14, United States Constitution; 11 C. J. 777, 778), constructively residents therein (section 52, Political Code of California), and conclusively presumed to be totally dependent for support upon said deceased (section 14, Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917, as amended July 22, 1919; sections 196 and 197, Civil Code of California).

"F. Said minors are therefore, entitled to a death benefit of $4,049.60, payable at the rate of $17.29 a week, together with an award for $100 burial expense, payable direct to Morio Wakiya. Said payments are based upon daily earnings of $4 for employment 7 days a week. Payments accrued to August 16, 1923 (35 weeks) are $605.15, no part of which has been paid.

"G. Deceased also left surviving her applicant Tadakichi Wakiya, her father-in-law, who was at said time partially dependent upon her support; the annual amount contributed to such support by deceased being the sum of $92.80.

"H. It is the judgment of this Commission that the whole of said benefit should be awarded to said minor children."

Section 14 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 844), as amended in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 917), is as follows:

> "(a) The following shall be conclusively presumed to be wholly dependent for support upon a deceased employee; provided, that these presumptions shall not apply in favor of aliens who are nonresidents of the United States at the time of the injury.
> "(1) A wife upon a husband with whom she was living at the time of his injury, or for whose support such husband was legally liable at the time of his injury.
> "(2) A child or children under the age of eighteen years, or over said age, but physically or mentally incapacitated from earning, upon the parent with whom he or they are living at the time of the injury of such parent or for whose maintenance such parent was legally liable at the time of injury, there being no surviving dependent parent.
> "(b) In all other cases, questions of entire or partial dependency and questions as to who constitute dependents and the extent of their dependency shall be determined in accordance with the fact, as the fact may be at the time of the injury of the employee."

Petitioners contend that the Commission erred in holding that the children were conclusively presumed to be totally dependent for support upon their mother under section 14(a)(2) of the Compensation Act, and that the award should have been made under section 14(b) and section 9(c)(2) instead of section 14(a)(2). It is first argued that under the law the presumption of total dependency would be upon the father of the children and not upon the mother. It is urged that:

> "The children were not totally dependent upon their mother for support, as they received at least one-half of their support from their father. * * * If the children were totally dependent upon their deceased mother for support, the award is a correct one, but if they were only partially dependent it should be reduced to $630, pursuant to section 9(c) (2) of the Compensation Act, which allows partial dependents to recover only three times the annual contributions of their deceased relative for support. * * * Assuming that the money sent abroad was furnished half by the wife and the other half by the husband, the actual amount received by the children from each parent approximated $210 per year. * * * The children at best were only partially dependent upon their mother, in view of the fact that they received at least one-half of their support from the father. * * * We contend that if the children were presumptively totally dependent upon any one it was upon their father and not their mother. If the father had died instead of the mother, the Commission would have applied the presumption of total dependency; but we contend that the act does not authorize it upon the death of the mother, when the father is still alive and has been contributing to the support of his children."

Upon this contention petitioners claim that the provision does not contemplate "a total dependency upon both parents"; that it might be either but not both, citing the statutes and the common law to the effect that the primary duty of support is on the father. The brief continues:

> "We call particular attention to the words 'the,' 'such,' and 'was.' * * * These are restrictive terms and indicate a single person only. They show that it was not the intention of the Legislature to make the children presumptively totally dependent upon both parents but rather upon one only. If it had been intended to make the presumption apply to both parents the words 'the' and 'such' and 'was' would not have been used; and the term 'parent' would not have been in the singular but rather in the plural. The act would have read 'upon the parents with whom he or they are living * * * or for whose maintenance such parents were legally liable.' But, as one of the parents is singled out in the act, it becomes a question of construction to determine which was intended. We submit that in a case of this kind the father was intended and not the mother, and our contention for that construction finds support in the Compensation Act, the Codes of the state, and the general law."

Sections 156, 196, and 198 of the Civil Code, and section 52 of the Political Code, are cited in support of this contention, as are also the following authorities: 29 Cyc. 1606; Ex parte Gordan, 95 Cal. 374, 377, 30 Pac. 561; In re Campbell, 130 Cal. 380, 62 Pac. 613; Henly v. Wilson, 137 Cal. 273, 70 Pac. 2158, L. R. A. 941, 92 Am. St. Rep. 160. And Shebley v. Peters, 53 Cal. App. 288-293, 200 Pac. 364; Sinnerton v. Robert Addie, 13 Butterworths' Workmen's Compensation Cases, 500, and Spreckels v. Industrial Accident Commission, 186 Cal. 256, 199 Pac. 8, are cited to the effect that, where several wage earners contribute to a common fund, those supported by it are only partially dependent upon each contributor. Sections 156, 196, and 198 of the Civil Code provide that the primary duty of the father is to support his minor children, that he is the head of the family, that if the support of the father is inadequate the mother must assist him to the extent of her ability. The authorities hold that at common law the father had a right to the services of his minor children, which right is coupled with the obligation to support and educate them, that he is entitled to the custody, control, and benefits of minor children as against the wife, unless during separation, that it makes no difference if such minor children have ample means of their own for support, the duty continues upon the father, and that section 376, Code of Civil Procedure, authorizes the father to sue for injuries to, or death of, the minor children.

Respondents, on the other hand, contend that the award should be affirmed on two grounds:

The first, which is based upon a construction of the language of section 14(a)(2), that—

> "The conclusive presumption contained in section 14(a) (2) creates a total dependency upon the parent who happens to be the employee killed in the course of employment * * * without regard to the sex of the deceased employee. * * * Preliminarily it is to be noted that section 14(a) (2) does not say that the minor child is dependent upon the father, but instead upon the parent. The term includes either father or mother. * * * Obviously, the term includes both a mother and a father, without other limitation than that stated herein. The section does not refer to the male parent or to the female parent but to the injured parent, whichever it may be. * * *"

And second, upon the ground that—

> "The limitations contained in the section are all complied with. (a) There was no surviving dependent parent, since the father was not dependent upon his wife's earnings. (b) The mother was legally liable for maintenance. (c) The children were 'living with' her."

Point (a) is based upon finding D of the Commission. There is no evidence to contradict this finding that the husband of deceased was not dependent upon his wife for support and was not entitled to any death benefit under the act. Point (b) is based upon section 196, Civil Code, and the Code sections which declare that the rights of custody in the minor children are equal in the husband and wife when they are living separate and apart (section 198). Respondents argue that—

> "Section 196, Civil Code, provides that the parent entitled to the custody of the child must support it, and that the mother must assist where the father's means are inadequate. * * * The Code sections quoted establish the proposition that, while the father is expected primarily to support the minor children, the mother is not exempted from this obligation. Where a father cannot fulfill the duty, the mother must. * * * The existence of a legal duty resting upon the father does not free the mother from her legal obligation; it is only performance of the duty by him that excuses her. * * * There is reasonable ground for deducing that the father needed assistance from the mother in paying for the maintenance of the three children in a boarding school in Japan."

The brief then assumes to show by computations what the earnings of the husband were as a basis for the argument "that assistance from the mother was absolutely necessary in order to give the children the support actually sent them," but we do not find any evidence in the record justifying the contention, and there is no finding on the point.

Point (c) is based upon a construction of the words "living with" in section 14(a)(2). It is argued that—

> "Where the child is living with both parents, and both parents are employed, both would seem to be within the presumption, depending upon which was injured. In the present case, the children were not physically living with either, although constructively domiciled with both (Pol. Code, § 52), as both the children and wife take the domicile of the father during his lifetime, and hence all are domiciled together. The term 'living with,' in the case of husband and wife, has been interpreted to mean a relation where there is physical separation but no separation in the nature of an estrangement. Belle City, etc., Co. v. Rowland, 170 Wis. 293, 174 N. W. 899, 7 A. L. R. 1071; N. W. Iron Co. v. Ind. Comm., 154 Wis. 97, 142 N. W. 271, L. R. A. 1916A, 366, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 877. Whether in the case of minors a constructive domicile is tantamount to 'living with' the parents seems to be a novel point without published precedent; but we submit that this court is amply justified in holding that such a meaning is in accord with the intent of the Legislature to find parents liable if there is no legal separation from their minor children."

It will not be necessary to discuss the first ground upon which the affirmance of the award is based, for the reason, as will presently be seen, the award must be annulled on other grounds. Suffice it to say that we cannot accept respondents' contention that section 14(a)(2) refers to the injured parent, whichever it may be, in a situation where there is no legal or actual separation between husband and wife, and they are both contributing to the support of the minor children.

[1] The second ground upon which it is sought to uphold the award is that the conditions contained in section 14(a)(2) are present. There is no dispute, as we have said, touching the finding that there was no surviving dependent parent. The precise question is whether the mother can be said to be legally liable for the maintenance of the minor children within the meaning of the words of section 14(a)(2), quoted above, where the parents are married and living together and both contributing from their respective earnings to a bank account in the husband's name out of which the minor children at the time of the injury of the mother were being supported in Japan. No finding was made by the Commission that the deceased parent in this case otherwise contributed to the support of the children, and, from the evidence in the record before us, we are unable to see how an implied finding that the mother was legally liable for the maintenance of the minor children can be supported. The legal liability of the father for the support of his minor children had not been altered; the voluntary contributions made by the deceased parent did not shift his legal responsibility. Section 196 of the Civil Code provides that the mother must support the minor children if the father is unable to do so. There was no finding made by the Commission that the father was unable to support the minor children, and no other finding that it was therefore necessary for the mother to contribute to such support, nor were any facts adduced at the hearings before the Commission which would warrant such findings. A situation is conceivable in which the husband and wife might be living together, both contributing to the support of the minor children in the manner described above, where by some judicial proceeding and decree, or by a contract between the parties, the mother has made herself legally liable for the support of the minor children, and the father has, at least as far as the other parent is concerned, been divested of such legal responsibility. But there is nothing here which in any manner detracts from the legal liability of the father. It will serve no purpose to further discuss this point, since neither by the statute law of this state nor by voluntary contribution to the support of the minor children did the deceased parent become legally liable for their maintenance, and, such being the fact, the conclusive presumption of total dependency does not apply as to her.

[2] The second ground upon which this review is based is that "There is no place for a presumpton of total dependency in this case," since section 14(a) provides that "these presumptions shall not apply in favor of aliens who are nonresidents of the United States at the time of the injury." It is urged that, while the minor children were born here and therefore citizens of the United States, they were residing in Japan, and "no proof was offered to show their present status." And, further, "there was nothing indicating any intention on the part of the deceased or the father to bring these children back during their period of minority, and it is a fair presumption that these children were actively engaged in productive labor in Japan." Moran's Case, 234 Mass. 152, 125 N. E. 157, is cited as authority for the proposition that the Compensation Act "is dealing with the fact of actual not constructive residence."

If the contention of petitioners is valid—that is, if the minor children are nonresident aliens—they are not entitled to the benefit of the conclusive presumption of total dependency, and their actual dependency should be determined in accordance with the provisions of section 14(b).

The Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States reads:

> "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside"

The fact that the minor children were sent to a foreign country for the purposes of education is immaterial as far as their status is concerned (In re Look Tin Sing [C. C.] 21 Fed. 905; 11 Corpus Juris, 777–8; U. S. v. Wong Kin Ark, 169 U. S. 649, 18 Sup. Ct. 456, 42 L. Ed. 890). It cannot be doubted that the minor children here concerned do not come within the proviso of section 14(a), and, such being the case, the presumption of section 14(a)(2) would be applicable if all the conditions of that section were found to be present.

It having been held that the deceased parent was not legally liable for the maintenance of the minors, within the meaning of section 14(a)(2), it is clear that the conclusive presumption of total dependency does not apply. Section 14(b) provides that, in all cases where this conclusive presumption does not apply—

> "Questions of entire or partial dependency * * * and the extent of their dependency shall be determined in accordance with the fact, as the fact may be at the time of the injury of the employee."

There is neither evidence nor findings as to what, if any, portion of the money contributed to the support of the minors came from the earnings of the deceased parent. It is found that her earnings were $28 per week, but it is not found whether the whole or any part thereof went into the bank account, although it appears from the evidence that the father customarily deposited the joint earnings. On the going down of this decision, the Commission will find the fact and make an award accordingly under section 14(b) and section 9(c)(2), which provides that in case of partial dependency the amount of the death benefit shall be three times the annual amount contributed.

The award of the Commission approved, ratified, confirmed, and ordered filed on September 4, 1923, is annulled, and the proceeding remanded for further action by the Commission in accordance with this decision.

1. Corporations 🔑513(1)—Administratrix's complaint for money had and received held not to authorize accounting.

Complaint by administratrix against corporation for money had and received, failing to allege fraud or deceit, or that deceased was a stockholder, held not to authorize plaintiff to accounting and recovery of any money wrongly credited or wrongfully paid out.

2. Corporations 🔑182—Administratrix of stockholder leasing building for corporation could not contend that it was not corporation lease, so as to recover rents from subletting.

Where two stockholders leased a building intended for and used solely by the corporation, administratrix of one stockholder could not contend lease was individual property, in order to recover part of rents from subletting.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Separate actions for accounting by Alice G. Watton, as administratrix of the estate of Norval L. Watton, deceased, against the Colonial Amusement Syndicate and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant.

Case & Forslund, of Stockton, for respondents.

WEYAND, Justice pro tem. By stipulation of the parties in open court, the above cases were tried together. Separate records of the cases are made, but the briefs filed are the same in both cases.

[1] Both actions were begun on January 25, 1922. In substantially the same words, except as hereinafter disclosed, both complaints alleged that the Colonial Amusement Syndicate was a Nevada corporation, licensed to do business within California; that Norval L. Watton died on May 24, 1921, and that Alice G. Watton, his widow, was, after due proceedings, appointed the administratrix of his estate; that on divers times between the 24th day of May, 1921, and the 8th day of October, 1921, defendants received moneys, aggregating $20,000, for the use of Norval L. Watton, "in his lifetime," and since his death for the use and benefit of his estate. These moneys are alleged to have received by defendants from the following sources, to wit: "For and on account of moneys had and received as the proceeds of the operation of the Colonial Theater in the city of Stockton, and the lease of the property thereof, and, for moneys deposited in bank belonging to said corporation, and deceased." Then follows a further allegation of a promise on the part of defendants to pay said Norval L. Watton, "in his lifetime," and a like promise to pay the administratrix, said sum. Further the complaint avers demands made for payment and refusal of payment by defendants.

In the second case above named the complaint makes the same charges, except that an additional defendant, one E. G. Vollman, is added, and the sum of moneys charged to have been had and received was stated as being $6,000, and the time covered was from October 8, 1921, until the filing of the complaint. Specific denial was made in each case that any such sums, or any moneys whatsoever, were received by defendants for the use of Watton or his estate.

The evidence disclosed that the Colonial Amusement Syndicate was a Nevada corporation, entitled to do business in the state of California, and which was doing business at Stockton in the state of California, as a moving picture and vaudeville theater. The deceased, Watton, and the defendant Yori each owned substantially one-half the stock of the said company; the defendant Burritt owning just sufficient stock of the company to qualify him as an officer of the corporation. Watton, up to the time of his death, was a director of the corporation, and was manager of the theater at Stockton, and which business was the only business of the said company. Watton, Yori, and Burritt were the directors.

The line of questions asked by plaintiff's attorney at the trial indicated that it was plaintiff's claim that by false entries in the books of the corporation, and by sundry fraudulent acts of the defendants, Watton had been defrauded in his lifetime, and his estate had been prevented, since his death, from receiving moneys due the estate. These questions indicated that it was claimed moneys were, by fraudulent acts of the defendants, taken from Watton's estate, and for the uses and purposes of the defendants. In the second case, which has been called the "Vollman Case," and which designation we will adopt, to more briefly name this case, the testimony sought to be elicited by plaintiff indicates that the contention of plaintiff is to the same effect that the defendants Yori, Burritt, and Vollman, by fraud, and for their own advantage, after the death of Watton, procured a lease of the Colonial Theater to be made by the company to Vollman. The questions indicate that the plaintiff claims part of the rentals paid by Vollman.

There was not even the semblance of an attempt to allege fraud or deceit in either of the above actions. There was not as much as an allegation in the complaint that Watton, the deceased, was a stockholder in the Colonial Amusement Syndicate, and yet plaintiff claimed the right to go into an accounting of the affairs of the corporation, and claimed the right to attack each and every act and thing done by the corporation, all upon the theory that, if perchance moneys were wrongfully credited by the corporation, or wrongfully paid out, all such matters could be litigated in an action for money had and received for the use of the said Watton or for the benefit of his estate. Under her complaints she had no such right.

The court did render judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $622.50 on account of a dividend declared by the Amusement Syndicate. The dividend referred to was in the sum of $2,171.48. Of this sum $1,082.98 was by resolution of the board of directors declared to be deceased's share thereof. This was the proper proportion of the whole dividend declared. According to the testimony of the company's secretary this dividend was just sufficient to "square" the account of Watton on the books. Two of the items charged against Watton were properly stricken from the list charged to Watton. These two items amounted to the sum allowed as a judgment in favor of plaintiff. It is beyond our comprehension how plaintiff could expect to recover herein for money had and received under the circumstances of this case. No fraud or deceit was alleged; not even an allegation that Watton was a stockholder. No dividend except the one above mentioned was declared to the stockholders.

[2] As to the allegation of the receipt of moneys from a lease of the properties of the company, the facts were clearly shown to be as follows: The lease of the theater building in Stockton, and wherein, during the lifetime of Watton, the sole business of the Colonial Amusement Syndicate was conducted was made by one Wolf to Yori and Watton. This lease contained a clause against subletting. The evidence disclosed that Yori and Watton as individuals never did use the property leased. The evidence disclosed that it was leased for, and at all times was used for, the business of the Colonial Amusement Company. It clearly appears that Yori and Watton at all times intended the leased premises to be used for no other purpose. The evidence attempted to be introduced by the plaintiff in the Vollman Case seemed to be directed to a claim on the part of plaintiff that, as this lease was made to Yori and Watton, as individuals, it remained their property, and, as it contained a clause against subletting, the attempt to sublease by the Amusement Syndicate to Vollman created an obligation to Watton or his estate for one-half of the rentals. The trial judge rightly held that, as the lease was taken for the company, and was always considered as being property of the company by the deceased, Watton, during his lifetime, his estate could not now contend otherwise.

Our conclusions are that no error was committed by the trial court in the case. We feel that no authorities need be cited to sustain our conclusions.

The judgments in both actions are affirmed.

WURL v. WATSON et al. (Civ. 4241.)

1. Negligence ⚿56(1)—"Proximate cause" defined.

"Proximate cause" is that cause which in natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any efficient intervening cause, produces injury and without which injury would not have occurred.

2. Highways ⚿175(1)—Negligence in driving left of center of highway held proximate cause of collision.

3. Highways ⚿177 — Statute limiting speed around curves held inapplicable, where highway visible for 100 yards ahead.

Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 409, § 22, subd. [a]), as amended by St. 1919, p. 220, § 13, subd. (a), limiting speed of automobiles to 15 miles per hour around curves when view is obstructed, has no application, where curve is so slight that highway is visible for a distance of 100 yards ahead of an automobile.

4. Highways ⚿177—Statute limiting speed of automobile around curve should be reasonably construed.

Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 409, § 22, subd. [a]), as amended by St. 1919, p. 220, § 13, subd. (a), limiting speed of automobiles to 15 miles an hour in going around curves when driver's view of the road is obstructed, should be given a reasonable construction.

5. Highways ⚿175(1)—Motor vehicle driver may assume that approaching vehicle will be lighted in accordance with the law.

Motor vehicle driver has right to assume that a motor vehicle approaching from opposite direction at night will have two lighted lamps visible 200 feet ahead, as required by St. 1919, p. 206, § 13, subd. (a).

6. Highways ⚿177—Plaintiff held not contributorily negligent in driving around curve at more than 15 miles per hour.

Plaintiff, who was familiar with road, was not contributorily negligent in driving his car in nighttime around curve so slight that in daytime highway was visible for 100 yards ahead at more than 15 miles per hour, where his own lamps lighted one-half of highway for a distance of 75 feet ahead of him, in reliance on duty imposed upon motor trucks approaching from other direction to have two lighted lamps visible at least 200 feet ahead.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Paul A. Wurl against Fred Watson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

B. P. Gibbs and W. I. Gilbert, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Allen G. Mitchell, of Pomona, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. This is an action for damages arising out of a collision which occurred between an automobile driven by plaintiff and a motor truck being operated by defendants. The collision occurred on a long curve in a highway at about 11 o'clock at night. The findings show that just prior to the happening of the accident plaintiff was driving his automobile easterly over a highway with which he was very familiar at a rate of 25 miles per hour; that defendants' truck with a trailer attached thereto was being driven westwardly at from 8 to 12 miles per hour, with the left wheels of the truck about 1 foot south of the center of the highway, and with no lights either on the truck or on the trailer; that the lights were burning on plaintiff's automobile both immediately prior to and at the time the accident occurred. The evidence showed that on the northerly side of the highway an embankment cut off the view so that neither of the parties saw the other as each of them was rounding the curve until they were separated by a distance of approximately 50 feet, although in the daytime from the point of the accident the highway is visible in a westerly direction for a distance of about 100 to 120 yards. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

While it is admitted by appellants that the findings show negligence on the part of defendants, it is contended, first, that as a matter of law such negligence was not the proximate cause of the accident; and, secondly, that the evidence established the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, and hence that the judgment should be reversed.

[1, 2] Proximate cause has been variously defined, but the definition thereof which appears to meet with general approval is that it is that cause which in natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any efficient intervening cause, produces the injury, and without which the injury would not have occurred. The actual contact of the two machines was only as to the left front wheel of the automobile driven by plaintiff, passing very closely to the inside of the left front wheel of the truck, and then colliding with the front of the truck, which of necessity resulted in the left front wheel of the truck pursuing a similar course, with the same result with reference to the automobile—from which it follows, without consideration of the fact that the truck was being driven without lights, that, had the truck been "on its own side of the road," the collision would not have occurred. The position of the truck as it was driven over the highway was at least one of the direct causes which continued unbroken by any other efficient intervening cause up to and including the very instant that the accident occurred, and without which cause there would have been no collision between the two motor vehicles.

Plaintiff was driving his car where he had a legal right to drive it. The only question with reference to his operation of his automobile arises from the manner in which the automobile was driven around the curve. The substance of the law, as set out in subdivision a of section 22 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1915, p. 397, as amended by Stats. 1919, p. 220), § 13, subd. (a), is that no person shall operate or drive a motor vehicle on any public highway at a greater rate of speed than 15 miles an hour in "going around corners or curves in the highway, when * * * the operator's or driver's view of the road * * * is obstructed."

[3-5] The first matter entitled to consideration is whether or not that part of the statute which limits the speed of automobiles to 15 miles per hour "in going around corners or curves in the highway" when the view is obstructed was violated. Notwithstanding the fact that the embankment shut off the view on the side of the curve on which the accident occurred, the road was visible in the daytime to a person situated as was plaintiff for a distance of at least 100 yards ahead of him. The degree of the curve, therefore, must have been so slight that to a driver of an automobile, in the absence of the embankment, the road would appear to be nearly straight. However, although the highway could be seen for a distance of 100 yards ahead, the embankment, beyond a distance of 100 yards, constituted somewhat of an obstruction. The words of the statute should be given a reasonable construction. The purpose of the statute was that one driving an automobile might see sufficiently far so that in case another automobile was approaching from the opposite direction a clear opportunity for avoiding a collision would be afforded. One hundred yards is a considerable distance. If an accident could not be averted within such a space, it would seem unlikely that the question of distance would be a factor in preventing a collision. To hold that anything which prevented the driver of an automobile from seeing the road ahead of him for only a greater distance than 100 yards constituted such an obstruction within the meaning of the statute as would limit the legal rate of speed on such a curve to 15 miles per hour, would be placing a construction upon the statute which, in the light of experience and observation in the management and operation of automobiles, would be unreasonable and not within the contemplation of the Legislature in its enactment of the statute.

The suggestion is also made that darkness constitutes an obstruction. Plaintiff testified that as he rounded the curve the lights of his automobile showed one-half the road for a distance of 75 feet in front of him, and that, traveling as he was at the time of the accident, his automobile could have been stopped in a distance of 50 feet. Assuming, then, that at the very instant defendants' truck could possibly have been seen by plaintiff, he had exerted every effort to stop his automobile, there would have been a space of 25 feet between the automobile and the truck by the time plaintiff's automobile could have been stopped had the truck, instead of moving, been a stationary object. Defendants' truck however, according to the evidence, was moving toward plaintiff's automobile at a rate of between 8 and 12 miles per hour. Of course, in such emergencies both distances and rates of speed can only be estimated. Any testimony which would pretend accuracy in such matters on occasions of that nature would ordinarily be regarded as questionable. Plaintiff's view of the road may have been a few feet more or a few feet less than 75 feet, and, in addition thereto, a further inaccuracy may have existed in the width of the road which was visible to him for the distance of 75 feet; likewise regarding the distance which in the prevailing conditions the automobile might have been stopped.

On the date of the accident the statute to which reference has been made provided that (except under certain conditions therein specified) "it shall be unlawful to operate or drive at a rate of speed in excess of thirty miles an hour." Therefore, if neither the embankment nor darkness constituted an "obstruction," each of the parties to this action had the legal right (without considering other provisions of the statute) to operate his car around the curve in question at the rate of 30 miles per hour. Taking plaintiff's statement as correct, that to him one-half the highway was visible for a distance of 75 feet as he rounded the curve, and that traveling thereon at the rate of 25 miles per hour he could stop his automobile in a distance of 50 feet, it may be assumed also that, if another automobile traveling at the rate of 25 miles per hour in a direction opposite to that in which plaintiff was traveling had been similarly equipped with lights and brakes, the driver thereof would also have been able to see one-half the highway for a distance of 75 feet ahead of his automobile, and likewise could have stopped his automobile in a distance of 50 feet. The lights on plaintiff's automobile and the lights on defendants' truck, assuming them to have been burning, would have made the highway visible for at least 150 feet. Of course, the lights on the one automobile would be visible to the driver of the other automobile for a much greater distance than 150 feet—probably under normal atmospheric conditions for at least as great a distance as the curve of the road would permit vision in the daytime, which, as above stated, was about 100 yards; and as plaintiff rounded the curve he had a right to assume that, in accordance with the law (section 13 [a], Stats. 1919, p. 206), defendants would have two lighted lamps which would be visible at least "two hundred feet in the direction in which the truck was traveling." Judd v. Webster, 50 Cal. App. 743, 195 Pac. 929; Scott v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 604, 93 Pac. 677. Under such conditions plaintiff would have been able to see defendants' truck when it was at least 100 yards ahead of plaintiff, and in all probability, because of the light on defendants' truck, would have been apprised of the fact that some motor vehicle was approaching long before it actually came within the range of plaintiff's actual vision of it.

The case of Ham v. County of Los Angeles, 46 Cal. App. 148, 189 Pac. 799, is authority for the rule to the effect that, as to an inanimate object not required to be lighted (as is a motor vehicle), and with which inanimate object the automobile may collide, darkness may be considered as an obstruction within the meaning of subdivision b of section 22 of the Motor Vehicle Act; but, as is laid down in the case of Haynes v. Doxie, 52 Cal. App. 133, 198 Pac. 39, where the condition of the road is known to the driver of an automobile, he is entitled to proceed at a rate of speed reasonable under such conditions and within the limits of the law, and negligence cannot be imputed to him simply because he may be driving in the dark and unable to stop his automobile and avoid collision with objects after they come within the range of the lights on his automobile.

[6] If the conclusion be correct that in the daytime the statute which forbids driving at a greater rate of speed than 15 miles per hour around a curve where the view is obstructed has no application where the curve is so slight that the highway is visible for a distance of 100 yards ahead of an automobile, it would also follow that negligence may not be ascribed to the operator of an automobile who, being familiar with the road (as was plaintiff here), drives his car in the nighttime around the same curve at a greater rate of speed than 15 miles per hour, relying not only upon his own lamps to light one-half of the highway for a distance of 75 feet ahead of him, but as well upon the duty imposed by law upon motor trucks approaching from the opposite direction requiring them to have two lighted lamps visible at least 200 feet in the direction in which the motor truck is proceeding.

WOLCOTT v. HUDNER, Superior Court Judge. (Civ. 4747.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑460(2)—Appeal from order granting relief from failure to give timely notice for transcript held to stay proceedings.

Since court's order relieving defendant from the effect of his failure to file notice within ten-day period prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, to entitle him to a certified reporter's transcript, is not mentioned in sections 942–945, an appeal by the plaintiff from such order stayed all proceedings upon the order in view of section 949.

2. Appeal and error 🔑485(1)—Certification by trial judge of transcript held stayed by appeal from order.

Pending appeal from order under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, relieving defendant from his noncompliance with section 953a with respect to notice to clerk of intention to appeal, trial judge was precluded under section 949 from certifying the transcript.

Application by N. A. Wolcott for writ of mandate against John L. Hudner, as Judge of the Superior Court in and for the County of San Benito, sitting as a Judge pro tem. in the Superior Court of Los Angeles County. Alternative writ discharged and peremptory writ denied.

Stutsman & Stutsman, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

J. M. Fursee and Dan V. Noland, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is a petition for a writ of mandate directing Hon. John L. Hudner, judge of the superior court in and for the county of San Benito, to certify to the truth and correctness of a reporter's transcript in accordance with the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] Petitioner is one of the defendants in the case of Callaway et al. v. Wolcott et al., a case brought in the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles and which was there tried before respondent, who was sitting in one of the extra sessions of that court. The plaintiffs in that action recovered judgment. From that judgment the petitioner in this proceeding took an appeal to the Supreme Court. It was his intention to bring up a record on appeal prepared under the alternative method, so called, i. e., under the method provided for by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. Petitioner neglected, however, to file the necessary notice with the clerk within the ten-day period prescribed by that section to entitle him to a certified transcript of the reporter's phonographic report of the trial. Because of this remissness on his part petitioner presented a motion under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure to be relieved from the effect of his failure to give the clerk timely notice of his intention to appeal and of his request for a reporter's transcript. The motion was heard by Hon. Victor R. McLucas, one of the judges of the superior court for Los Angeles county, who granted the motion and made an order relieving petitioner from the effect of his default. Thereupon petitioner filed with the clerk the notice required by section 953a. Within a few days after the entry of Judge McLucas' order an appeal therefrom to the Supreme Court was taken by the plaintiffs in the action. Thereafter petitioner presented a reporter's transcript to respondent with the request that he, as the judge before whom the case was tried, certify to the truth and correctness of the transcript. Respondent refuses to certify to the transcript pending the appeal from the order made by Judge McLucas.

Petitioner contends that since the order made by Judge McLucas relieved him from the effect of his default in failing to give the clerk timely notice of his intention to appeal and of his request for a transcript, it is now respondent's duty to certify to the truth and correctness of the reporter's transcript. Respondent, on the other hand, contends that the appeal from the order of Judge McLucas stays all further proceedings thereon in the superior court, and that therefore it is not his duty to certify to the reporter's transcript until final disposition shall have been made of that appeal.

In their presentation of the question as to respondent's duty in the premises counsel on both sides have assumed that the order made by Judge McLucas is appealable, and we therefore shall follow their lead by indulging in the same assumption.

Sections 942–945 of the Code of Civil Procedure provide a mode by which the "execution" of the judgment or order appealed from may in certain cases be stayed until the determination of the appeal, and section 949 provides that "in cases not provided for" in those sections the perfecting of an appeal "stays proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from," except as to certain designated matters not necessary to be enumerated here. As the order of Judge McLucas granting relief to petitioner under section 473 is not one of the orders mentioned in sections 942–945, it follows that the appeal from that order had the effect of staying all proceedings in the court below "upon the * * * order appealed from."

[2] It only remains to consider whether the act of respondent, if he were to certify to the truth and correctness of the reporter's transcript, would be a "proceeding" upon the order appealed from within the meaning of section 949. That section, in so far as it is germane to the question here under consideration, has so frequently been construed by our Supreme Court that we are not left in doubt as to its general scope and effect. Thus in Dewey v. Superior Court, 81 Cal. 68, 22 Pac. 333, it is said:

> "During the pendency of the appeal, the court below could do no act wihich did not look to the holding of the subject of the litigation just as it existed when the decree was rendered."

"The effect of the appeal," says the court in Vosburg v. Vosburg, 137 Cal. 493, 70 Pac. 473, "is to remove the subject-matter of the order from the jurisdiction of the lower court, and that court is without power to proceed further as to any matter embraced therein until the appeal is determined." See, also, In re Dupes, 31 Cal. App. 698, 161 Pac. 276. In Ruggles v. Superior Court, 103 Cal. 128, 37 Pac. 211, the court says:

> "By the appeal the order or decree is set at large, and the subject matter removed from the jurisdiction of the lower court, until the appeal has been determined, and the matter remitted back from the appellate court."

In State I. & I. Co. v. San Francisco, 101 Cal. 150, 35 Pac. 549, the court expresses itself as follows:

> "The effect of an appeal from a judgment when the proceedings thereon are stayed is to preserve the rights of the parties to the controversy in the same condition as they were prior to the entry of the judgment."

Under the principles as thus announced we think it clear that not only is it not respondent's duty to certify to the transcript pending the appeal from Judge McLucas' order, but that he is without authority to do so until final disposition shall have been made of that appeal. Because the appeal from Judge McLucas' order operated to stay all proceedings thereon in the superior court, respondent's authority to certify to the truth and correctness of the reporter's transcript subsequent to the appeal from the order is precisely what it was prior to the making of the order. The effect of the appeal was to preserve the rights of the parties in the same condition they were before the order was made. Before he was relieved from the effect of his default by Judge McLucas' order, petitioner had lost his right to proceed with the preparation of a record under the alternative method (Des Granges v. Des Granges, 175 Cal. 67, 165 Pac. 13); and, contrariwise, the plaintiffs in the action had gained the right to object to any certification of the record by respondent. It is clear, therefore, that if we were to direct respondent to certify to the reporter's transcript while the appeal from Judge McLucas' order is pending, the rights possessed immediately prior to the making of that order by the parties who appealed therefrom would not be preserved the same as they were before the order. Our mandate would operate to carry the order into effect notwithstanding the appeal, and might render a reversal of the order entirely ineffectual. The case is not distinguishable in principle from Foster v. Superior Court, 115 Cal. 279, 47 Pac. 58; Stewart v. Superior Court, 100 Cal. 543, 35 Pac. 156, 563; State I. & I. Co. v. San Francisco, supra, and Estate of Loyd, 175 Cal. 699, 167 Pac. 157. It results inevitably from these considerations that the writ should be denied.

The alternative writ of mandate heretofore issued is discharged, and the application for the peremptory writ is denied.

PEOPLE v. PRATT. (Cr. 1169.)

1. Criminal law 🔑798½—Forms of verdict submitted should cover every phase of the law and any kind of verdict warranted.

Forms of verdict submitted to jury should cover every phase of the law under the evidence and include any kind of verdict which the jury would be warranted in returning, especially where a statute requires that a verdict of guilty shall assess the degree of the crime and the place of imprisonment.

2. Criminal law 🔑14—Amendment of statute did not affect prosecution for offense previously committed.

Under Pol. Code, § 329, saving prosecutions for offenses previously committed from operation of repeal of criminal laws, in a prosecution for rape, with consent, on a prosecutrix 15 years old, under Pen. Code, § 261, subd. 1, where section 264, making such an offense a felony, was amended after the offense and before the trial, so as to make it a felony or a misdemeanor at the option of the jury, the amendment had no application.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

Thomas Pratt was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Jos. P. Lacey, of Oakland, and Ben F. Jones, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. Defendant was accused, tried, and convicted of the crime of rape. A motion for a new trial was made and denied. The accusation was based upon section 261, subd. 1, of the Penal Code, condemning acts of sexual intercourse with females under the age of 18 years. The prosecutrix was of the age of 15 years, and the act was accomplished upon her with her consent on January 6, 1923. Trial was had in October of the same year, and judgment was pronounced the November following. At the time the offense was charged section 264 of the Penal Code read as follows:

> "Rape is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not more than fifty years, except where the offense is under subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code, and the female is over the age of sixteen years and under the age of eighteen years in which case the punishment shall be by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year or in the state prison for not more than fifty years, and in such case the jury shall determine by their verdict whether the punishment shall be by imprisonment in the county jail or in the state prison."

It will be observed that under this section a minimum sentence may be imposed by the jury, in their discretion, when the female is over the age of 16 and under the age of 18 years, where the prosecution is had under subdivision 1 of section 261. In the exercise of this discretion, therefore, an offense committed under this subdivision could have been made a felony or a misdemeanor by the jury provided the female was over the age of 16 and under the age of 18 years.

After the alleged commission of the offense and prior to the trial, verdict, and sentence the Legislature in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 271) amended this section in two particulars. It emasculated therefrom the age of the female, leaving it discretionary with the jury to determine by their verdict whether in any case and irrespective of the age of the female an offense charged under subdivision 1 of section 261 was a misdemeanor or a felony. The amendment also provided that the trial court in the event of a plea of guilty might, in imposing sentence, also exercise a like discretion. This section as amended in 1923 became effective 90 days after May 18, 1923, which was, as above stated, prior to the trial.

Under these facts appellant claims that the trial court should have instructed the jury on the law as applicable at the time of the trial, and should have submitted for their consideration with the necessary instructions an additional and appropriate form of verdict in conformity with section 264 of the Penal Code as amended and effective at the time of the trial; in other words, the claim is made that defendant was entitled to have a form of verdict setting forth a recommendation as to the place of imprisonment included with the forms submitted to the jury, as the trial should have been conducted under the statute as amended. It is conceded that the forms of verdict submitted would have been proper prior to the amendment because of the fact that the prosecutrix was only 15 years old, and the jury at that time had no discretion to fix the punishment except where the female was over the age of 16 years.

[1] When forms of verdict are submitted to the jury they should be comprehensive enough to cover every phase of the law under the evidence, and should include any kind of verdict that the jury would be warranted in returning after its deliberation, and this is especially so where a statute requires that a verdict of "guilty" shall assess the degree of the crime and the place of imprisonment. If, therefore, the defendant was entitled to the benefit of the amendment it is clearly apparent that his substantial rights have been affected.

[2] The question is thus presented whether the amendment referred to affects the prosecution and punishment of offenses committed prior to its becoming operative. The situation is analogous to that arising upon the repeal of a statute and the effect of such repeal upon violations of the statute theretofore committed but for which prosecutions have not yet been had. To meet this situation we have in this state a general provision saving from the effect of the repeal such violations, namely, section 329 of the Political Code, which reads as follows:

> "The repeal of any law creating a criminal offense does not constitute a bar to the indictment or information and punishment of an act already committed in violation of the law so repealed, unless the intention to bar such indictment or information and punishment is expressly declared in the repealing act."

In construing this section the Supreme Court, in the case of People v. McNulty, 93 Cal. 427, 26 Pac. 597, 29 Pac. 61, held that a permanent saving clause in the general body of the law, if couched in apt language to express the purpose, is as efficient as a special clause expressly inserted in the particular statute saving the operation of the repealed statute in its applicability to past offenses. It is there further held that an amendment to a statute as to the penalty does not apply to offenses committed prior to the amendment. To the same effect is People v. Vincent, 95 Cal. 425, 30 Pac. 581, where it is held that such amendments do not apply to convictions for offenses committed prior to their enactment; in other words, the amendment must be given a prospective operation only.

In harmony with the views expressed in these cases the District Court of Appeal of the Third District, in the case of People v. Davis, 227 Pac. 494, decided May 10, 1924, a case which in its facts is on all fours with the one at bar, held that the amendment to the statute now under consideration was to be given a prospective operation only, and that the defendant could not have the benefit of its provisions. These authorities are determinative of this case.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Mary L. Falvey, as administratrix of the estate of Jeremiah Baldwin Falvey, deceased, against Elmer A. Roberts. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas, Beedy & Lanagan, George J. Presley, and Ernest T. Hall, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Gilbert D. Ferrell and Daniel A. Ryan, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Action by the administrator of the estate of Jeremiah Baldwin Falvey, deceased, for damages resulting from the latter's death in an automobile collision July 12, 1922.

The collision occurred between a Ford sedan owned and operated by the deceased's son, in which the deceased was a passenger at the time, and an Oakland touring car owned and operated by defendant herein. The cause was tried before the court without a jury, and the court found, in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, that defendant so carelessly, negligently, and unskillfully managed, drove, and operated his automobile that it ran into and collided with the automobile in which decedent was riding, overturning the same and killing decedent, and rendered judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $5,000. Defendant appealed.

The appeal is on the sole ground that the evidence fails to disclose any negligence on the part of defendant which either proximately or at all caused or contributed to the injuries suffered by respondent's intestate.

The collision occurred at the intersection of San Mateo drive and Peninsula avenue, in San Mateo county. San Mateo drive runs in a northerly and southerly direction, and Peninsula avenue runs easterly and westerly. Double car tracks run along San Mateo drive. The Ford sedan in which respondent's intestate was a passenger was proceeding south on San Mateo drive, about 2 feet from the westerly curb line, while appellant was proceeding west on Peninsula avenue, traveling about the middle of the street. The Ford sedan was on appellant's right, and had the right of way, unless it was further from the point of intersection of their paths than appellant's automobile. Failure of the driver of either car to yield the right of way resulted in their collision, overturning both cars and killing respondent's intestate. On the question of which party had the right of way, as well as the speed of the respective cars, the evidence was sharply conflicting. Appellant's position is that the only evidence that the Ford had the right of way was the testimony of the driver Falvey, the son of respondent's intestate; that his testimony upon this point "is so improbable and fantastic in the light of what admittedly happened that it should be disregarded entirely"; and that the physical facts support this contention. He refers particularly to that portion of Falvey's testimony where, on cross-examination, he says he started to swerve to the right when he had gone about 10 feet past the northerly curb of Peninsula avenue, and that at that time appellant's car had gone about a couple of feet past the easterly curb of San Mateo drive. Appellant then says it would have been physically impossible for him to have reached the point of collision by the time Falvey did. We agree with appellant that these figures are undoubtedly wrong. The space occupied by the crossing of the two streets formed a square 70 feet across from property line to property line. The sidewalk was 12 feet wide on each side, leaving the square between the curbs 46 feet across. It was 16½ feet in a diagonal line from the point where Falvey testified he turned to the point designated as the point of collision, and, according to this evidence, appellant was distant 52 feet from the point of collision. A rate of speed more than three times that of Falvey's would be required to have enabled appellant to reach the point of collision at the same time as Falvey. Falvey attributed to appellant a rate but two and a half times his own, and his was the highest estimate.

[1, 2] However, we do not agree with appellant that the improbability of a single isolated portion of the testimony binds the court to disregard the witness' testimony in its entirety where it is otherwise consistent and not improbable. It is to be expected that there will be some variance in the evidence in a case of this kind on such questions as distance and speed. The evidence fixed the place of the collision as slightly south of the middle of Peninsula avenue and between the western curb and property line, if extended, of San Mateo drive—about 8 feet past the curb line. On direct examination intestate's son testified that he was traveling at about 14 miles an hour; that when the front wheels of his car were about on a line with the northerly curb of Peninsula avenue he saw appellant's car just approaching the easterly curb of San Mateo drive—"I would say he was in the vicinity of this property line, possibly between the property line and the outside curb, but he had not reached the outside curb in the vicinity of the easterly property line of San Mateo drive; very close to it"; that he saw appellant look over in his direction, and appellant being on his left-hand side and further away, he (Falvey) proceeded to cross the street at a rate of about 14 miles an hour until he saw appellant crossing the car tracks on San Mateo drive and knew he was coming across, when he (Falvey) swerved to his right and turned up Peninsula avenue in an effort to avoid a collision; that appellant had been traveling about 30 miles an hour on approaching the intersection and increased his speed to about 35 miles an hour as he crossed the intersection in order to clear another automobile which approached on his left, traveling north on San Mateo drive. The driver of this third automobile testified that appellant was traveling "better than 20 miles an hour" as he entered the intersection and increased his speed as he crossed.

Mathematically tested, this testimony of Falvey is not at all improbable. Falvey's car was traveling about 2 feet from the westerly curb of San Mateo drive. The distance from the northerly curb line of Peninsula avenue to the center of the avenue and then at a right angle to the point of collision was 33 feet. The distance, traveling diagonally from a point ten feet south of the northerly curb of Peninsula avenue, was over 26 feet. Taking for the moment the evidence which put Falvey's rate of speed at 14 miles an hour and appellant's at 35 miles an hour, the latter was traveling two and a half times as fast as the former and would have traveled 65 feet while Falvey was traveling 26. The distance from the easterly curb of San Mateo drive to the designated point of collision was 54 feet. A variance in another witness' testimony from that of the witness Falvey did not oblige the trial court to accept the former and reject the latter. Neither do we think the position of the automobiles after the collision precludes the credibility of Falvey's testimony.

[3] The record then simply presents a conflict in the evidence, which it was the function of the trial court to weigh, and which cannot be disturbed on appeal.

PEOPLE v. UPTON. (Cr. 745.)

1. Escape ⚷1—Statute making escape from prison offense held valid.

Pen. Code, § 106, which makes escape from state prison under certain circumstances an offense, is valid.

2. Criminal law ⚷240—Formal written order holding defendant to answer prevails over oral order of committing magistrate.

A regular order made by justice of peace as committing magistrate at the close of the preliminary hearing, holding accused for the offense of escaping while at work in a prison camp, prevailed over an oral order made by the same justice and which might have been at variance with the facts adduced at the hearing.

3. Statutes ⚷205—All sections of statute referring to same general matter to be read together.

All sections of a statute referring to the same general matter must be read and considered together.

4. Criminal law ⚷96—Escape ⚷9—Jurisdiction of offense of escaping from state prison lies in any county so that variance is immaterial.

Under Pen. Code, § 777, providing that, "except as herein otherwise provided," jurisdiction is in the county of the commission of the crime, construed with section 787, jurisdiction of the offense of escaping from prison, as defined in section 106, lies in any county, and a variance as to the county is immaterial; the quoted words referring to the Penal Code as a whole or to the same title and chapter.

5. Escape ⚷1—Statute making it crime to escape from state prison construed; "while at work"; "while being conveyed" to prison.

Under Pen. Code, § 106, making it a felony for one committed to state prison to escape "while being conveyed to or from or while confined within such prison," or "while at work" outside such prison, the words "while at work" refer to the general mission upon which the prisoner is engaged at the time, and the words, "while being conveyed to" a prison, apply to the original conveyance or delivery of a prisoner to the prison for confinement or a transfer from one prison to another.

6. Escape 🔑9—No variance between information and proof.

Where an information charging escape, in violation of Pen. Code, § 106, alleged the escape was made while accused was at work, but the proof showed the escape occurred while accused was being taken from a prison camp to the prison there was no variance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Howard Upton was convicted of escaping from a prison camp, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Howard Upton, in pro per.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WEYAND, Justice pro tem. Defendant was accused of the crime of escaping from a prison camp, in Trinity county; he being a prisoner of the state of California under the jurisdiction and control of the state prison at Folsom, Cal.

[1] He appeared at the trial without an attorney, and he appears upon this appeal in his own behalf, and by lengthy brief presents his claims for a reversal of the judgment of the lower court.

Three of the points presented by appellant herein are identical with the claims made in People v. Vanderburg (Cal. App.) 227 Pac. 621. These relate to the following alleged errors of the trial court, or objections advanced: That section 106 of the Penal Code is unconstitutional; that Sacramento county superior court had no jurisdiction; and that the evidence failed to prove that the guard on duty was a "prison guard."

These points were, in the Vanderburg Case, decided against the defendant, and a like ruling will be made in this case.

[2] In addition to these claims for reversal defendant in the instant case makes the additional claims: (1) That he is prosecuted for an offense other than the one for which he was held to answer; (2) that he was denied process for witnesses to his injury, and (3) that there was a material variance between the allegations of the information and the proof adduced, in that in the information it was alleged that defendant escaped "in said county of Trinity," and "while at work outside such prison," while the proof clearly showed an escape within the county of Shasta, and that the escape occurred while returning from work outside such prison.

1. The defendant was held to answer in the regular manner, and while it is disclosed that the justice of the peace who acted as committing magistrate did make an oral order at the close of the preliminary hearing, which might have been at variance with the facts adduced at said hearing, yet it is in the record that upon making the oral order the justice made the usual written order holding defendant to answer, and it was to the effect that defendant be held for the offense "in the within depositions mentioned." The record does not disclose a formal motion to set aside the information. After arraignment and plea was taken, defendant, on his own motion, was permitted to withdraw his plea of not guilty "for the purpose of entering the demurrer." The defendant presented his demurrer orally in the trial court, and this oral demurrer contains the only pretended assignment, allegation, or statement that raises this particular objection before the trial was had. Even conceding to a defendant appearing in his own behalf that this objection was properly presented to the lower court for decision, the trial court must be sustained. The record discloses a regular order holding to answer for the offense in the "within depositions mentioned," and the complaint upon which that indorsement was made did set forth the crime of escaping while at work in a convict camp. What the committing magistrate may have said cannot be taken as against the formal written order holding the defendant to answer.

[3] 2. As to the contention that defendant was denied proper process to secure the attendance of his witnesses, it appeared that at the trial of the case the defendant made a definite request for the attendance of one Major, a convict at Folsom prison. This witness was brought before the court by order, and testified upon behalf of defendant. Later, during the trial, the defendant did make the suggestion that other witnesses were desired by him to properly make his defense, but there is nothing that can be construed into a demand for any particular witnesses. In view of the statements of defendant as to witnesses desired by him, we can see no merit in this point.

[4, 5] 3. The original complaint before the magistrate was for an escape "in said county of Shasta." and "while at work outside such prison (Folsom)." For that charge defendant was held to answer. The information, whether carelessly drawn or for some other reason not apparent, charged an escape "in said county of Trinity." The proof disclosed an escape in Shasta, and at a time when the defendant was being transferred from the work at the camp back to the state prison at Folsom. Section 777 of the Penal Code, as it existed prior to 1919, in so far as now concerned, was as follows:

> "Every person is liable to punishment by the laws of this state, for a public offense committed by him therein, * * * and except as herein otherwise provided, the jurisdiction of every public offense is in the county wherein it is committed."

In 1919 (St. 1919, p. 81) the Legislature added to said section a proviso relating only to the venue in prosecutions under section 270 of the Penal Code. In all other respects section 777 aforesaid was allowed to stand as it had been for many years. Appellant seems to contend that the words, "except as herein otherwise provided," in this section, as it has been since the year 1919, means as provided in said section 777. Ever since 1905 the words, "except as herein otherwise provided," were a part of section 777 and it is apparent that these words as then used meant as otherwise provided in the Penal Code, or in the same title and chapter thereof. To have said "as herein otherwise provided" in a section that had no provisos whatsoever therein would have been futile and meaningless. It is also apparent that by amending section 777, Penal Code, the Legislature did not intend to restrict its operation, but intended to make definite the question of jurisdiction in another particular kind of action. The Penal Code, since the year 1880, and in the same title and chapter, had therein and still contains another section, to wit, section 787, which reads as follows:

> "The jurisdiction of a criminal action for escaping from prison is in any county of the state."

Section 777 aforesaid and section 787 of the same chapter must be read together. It is an elementary principle governing the interpretation of laws that all sections referring to the same general matter must be read and considered together. It must be held that the words, "herein otherwise provided," used in section 777 since the amendment of 1919, have no different meaning in said section than they had before the amendment of that year, and it then follows that to give these words meaning they must refer to the Penal Code as a whole or to the title and chapter thereof dealing with jurisdiction. Construing these two sections together jurisdiction for this offense will be in any county of the state. In Bradford v. Glenn, Superior Judge, 188 Cal. 350, 205 Pac. 449, it was held that jurisdiction was in Sacramento county for a like escape in the county of Trinity. It then follows that the only necessary material allegation as to the place of escape would be an allegation of its occurrence within the confines of the state of California. It would then appear to be quite immaterial as affecting jurisdiction or venue whether either allegation or proof fixed Trinity county or Shasta county as the county within which the acts complained of occurred, if the information disclosed an escape in California, which fact was clearly set forth. If a variance, it is upon an immaterial matter.

[6, 7] The charge in the information was that the escape was made while defendant "was at work," etc., but the proof disclosed that the defendant had been taken to this camp in Trinity county from Folsom prison to work upon the state roads, and that the actual escape occurred while the defendant was being taken back from the highway camp to the prison. The words, "while at work," as used in section 106 of the Penal Code as it now stands, must be given the usual and ordinary meaning. Strictly speaking, there can never be an escape while at work. The "work" would of necessity have to cease and the "escape" begin. It then becomes a question as to whether, as used in this section, the words, "while at work," may be given their ordinary and usual meaning. The section does begin with a statement of an offense of escaping "while being conveyed to" a prison, but it is apparent that as there used these words are meant to apply to the original conveyance or delivery of a prisoner to the prison for confinement, or a transferring from one prison to another, and by its use shows that it is there intended in a quite different sense from conveying prisoners to a work camp. The words, "while at work," as used in the section, will be held to refer to the general mission upon which defendant was engaged at that time.

The only other phase of the matter that could be urged is this: Was the defendant sufficiently apprised of the charge against him, and was he enabled to make a proper defense? There can be no question but that the defendant was sufficiently advised of what the exact charge was. He made a full and complete defense in so far as he could. He was at no time "in the dark" as to the exact nature of the charge against him; indeed, his own testimony discloses that he did escape from the guards.

No reversible error appears, and the judgment is affirmed.

1. Pleading 🔑379—Admission of evidence affecting allegations of supplemental complaint held proper.

In action to terminate an oil lease, where a supplemental pleading was authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 464, evidence affecting its allegations was properly admitted, the sufficiency of the original pleading being unquestioned.

2. Pleading 🔑279(3)—Supplemental pleading may be filed to show material facts occurring after commencement of action.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 464, where a complaint is unobjectionable, a supplemental pleading may be filed in aid thereof which, leaving the original complaint intact, sets forth material facts occurring after commencement of the action.

3. Mines and minerals 🔑78(7)—Instruction that in determining whether development was prosecuted diligently before suit not to consider what came afterward held correct.

In an action to terminate an oil lease for failure to develop diligently, where supplemental complaint set up such failure after action was brought, instruction that the jury in determining whether the work was so prosecuted before the action was commenced, should not consider what was done afterwards, was not error.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1050(1)—Admission of stipulation in other case which was merely cumulative not reversible error.

In an action to terminate an oil lease for failure to develop diligently, continuously, and in good faith, where there was evidence that the work had not been so prosecuted, admitting a stipulation by attorneys in another suit to show materials used in developing the lease were not purchased until after the commencement of the action held not reversible error, being merely cumulative.

5. Mines and minerals 🔑78(5)—Lessors not estopped from suing for failure to develop oil lease by permitting lessees to erect derrick.

That lessors under oil lease permitted lessees to erect derrick which was completed one month before suit did not estop them from suing to terminate lease for failure to develop continuously, diligently, and in good faith, as required by lease.

6. Mines and minerals 🔑78(7)—Exclusion of evidence that if lessor had permitted lessee to assign lease money would have been available for developing not error.

In action by a lessor to terminate oil lease for failure to develop diligently, continuously, and in good faith, exclusion of evidence that if consent to assignment of lease had been given by plaintiffs and if the suit had not been brought defendants could have obtained money to develop the lease held proper, it being uncertain and problematical.

7. Mines and minerals 🔑78(7)—Evidence of offer of bonus for lease, and agreement to finance suit for cancellation of existing lease, properly excluded.

In action by lessor against lessee to terminate an oil lease for failure to develop according to contract, testimony that plaintiff had been offered a bonus for a lease of the land in question by another oil company, which had agreed to finance an action for cancellation of the lease, was properly excluded.

8. Mines and minerals 🔑78(7)—Instruction that failure to develop oil lease diligently would be excused in event of unavoidable delays properly refused.

In an action by a lessor to terminate an oil lease for failure to develop diligently, continuously, and in good faith as required by the lease, requested instruction that a compliance by the lessees with the lease would be excused by unavoidable delays and accidents held properly refused as inapplicable.

9. Mines and minerals 🔑78(7)—Instructions defining diligence required in development of oil lease properly refused.

In an action to terminate an oil lease for failure to develop diligently and continuously and in good faith as required by the lease, which prescribed that nothing but substantial work and continuous operations under terms of the lease should be considered as a compliance, instructions defining diligence held properly refused.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1078(1)—Errors not argued nor seriously presented entitled to no consideration.

Where points suggested by appellants are neither argued nor seriously presented they are entitled to no consideration.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by L. F. Dolley and wife against Edward D. Ragon and others. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 228 Pac. 665.

Everett L. Ball, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frederick W. Smith and G. Randolph Miller, both of Whittier, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. The purpose of this action was to terminate an oil lease entered into between plaintiffs and the individual defendants. By the terms of the lease the said defendants bound themselves to commence active work developing the land for oil on or before April 1, 1921, and thereafter "to prosecute said work diligently and continuously and in good faith." The lease contained the further provision that "nothing but substantial work and continuous operations under the terms of this lease shall be considered a compliance with the terms hereof." The action was tried before a jury to which certain special issues were submitted, and the jury specifically found in substance that the defendants had violated the terms of the lease in that the defendants had failed to prosecute the work diligently and continuously and in good faith.

[1, 2] The first objection to the judgment which is presented by appellants' brief is that the trial court erred in permitting evidence to be introduced in support of the allegations contained in a supplemental complaint which was filed by plaintiffs. Authorities are cited by appellants which go to the point that where the original complaint fails to state a cause of action no relief can be granted on a supplemental complaint, and of course, in such circumstances, evidence affecting the allegations contained in the supplemental complaint would be improperly received. But no such condition is presented by the pleadings herein; indeed, the sufficiency of the original pleading is unquestioned. The rule appears to be that, where a complaint is unobjectionable, a supplemental pleading may be filed in aid thereof, which, leaving the original complaint intact, brings to notice material facts relating to the case alleged to have occurred after the commencement of the action, but which may materially affect the rights of the plaintiff. Section 464, Code Civ Proc.; Giddings v. Seventy-Six Land & W. Co., 109 Cal. 116, 41 Pac. 788; California Farm, etc., Co. v. Schiappa-Pietra, 151 Cal 732, 91 Pac. 593.

The supplemental pleading here being authorized by statute as well as by judicial interpretation, evidence affecting its allegations was properly admitted.

[3] Appellants complain of error in that the jury was instructed that in determining whether or not the defendants prosecuted the work of developing plaintiffs' land for oil, gas, or other materials diligently and continuously and in good faith prior to the commencement of the action, the jury should not consider what was done by the defendants in connection therewith after the action was commenced. The criticized instruction contains the further statement that—

> "Now, that does not mean that you are not to consider at all whether there was a failure to prosecute the work diligently and continuously after the suit was brought, but it simply means that, in determining whether it was so prosecuted before the suit was brought, you are not to consider what came afterwards."

The instruction directed the attention of the jury to an alleged breach of the covenant of the lease said to have occurred before the action was commenced, and informed the jury that in determining that particular fact it should not take into consideration evidence of what, if anything, occurred thereafter; but for an alleged breach occurring after the action was commenced, under the allegations contained in the supplemental pleading it could properly consider such evidence. In view of what has heretofore been said with reference to the allegations contained in the supplemental complaint and which related to the failure of defendants to prosecute the work diligently after the action was commenced, we are unable to agree with counsel for appellants in his contention as to the impropriety of the instruction of which complaint is made.

[4] This action was commenced on July 13, 1921. The burden of the complaint was that up to that time the defendants had breached the covenant contained in the lease calling for diligent and continuous work. The answer of the defendants, besides specifically denying the allegations of the complaint, set up certain affirmative allegations, among which was the averment that certain boilers, feed pumps, fittings, and hand tools had been purchased by the defendants prior to the date of the commencement of the action, looking to the performance by them in good faith of the conditions imposed upon them by the terms of said lease. It appears that only a partial payment had been made by the defendant Signal Hill Oil Company on the purchase price of the articles to which reference has been made, and that an action in claim and delivery had been brought by the vendors to recover possession of the same. On the trial of the instant case, plaintiffs offered in evidence a stipulation which had been entered into between the parties in the claim and delivery action, to the effect that the plaintiff therein was the owner of the property referred to in the action; that, in consideration of such plaintiff abstaining from further proceedings for a period of about three weeks, he might resume possession of the said personal property, provided that, in the meantime the defendants had not paid to said plaintiff the sum of $4,089, with costs of court; and that, upon the failure of the defendants to make such payment, plaintiff should have judgment. Objection was made to the introduction of the stipulation—the basis of the objection being that, inasmuch as the stipulation was signed by the attorneys representing the respective parties in that action and that it provided for a confession of judgment to be taken against the defendants which was unauthorized by the defendants personally, the stipulation was of no validity. In ruling upon the objection the judge of the trial court made the following statement:

> "I don't believe that the fact that a lawyer is employed to contest a case gives him authority to stipulate his client's rights away; objection sustained."

And the court limited the effect of the stipulation by the further statement that "I am only admitting it for the purpose of showing that those things were not purchased until about the 23d of July," which was a date 10 days after the commencement of the action in the instant case. The evidence merely tended to disprove the averments contained in the answer, to the effect that those articles had been purchased before the action was commenced. The final objection of defendants' attorney to the introduction of the stipulation in evidence, that it was not proper under the supplemental complaint, was overruled by the court. But, as heretofore shown, it was not a stipulation for judgment in the claim and delivery action, but only the implied fact arising out of the stipulation (which was annexed as an exhibit in another case) that the articles had not been purchased at the time when it was alleged in the instant case that they had been purchased, which was permitted to go to the jury. Limited as was the stipulation to its tendency to prove that particular fact, its effect was only cumulative to the mass of other evidence going to the main issue in the original complaint, namely, that up to the time the action was commenced the work had not been prosecuted diligently and continuously and in good faith, as defined by the provision of the lease that "nothing but substantial work and continuous operations" should be considered as a compliance with the terms thereof. Under such conditions, even assuming the correctness of appellants' contention (which point becomes unnecessary of decision), the admission of the stipulation for the purpose stated by the trial judge is not of that consequence which would justify an order of reversal of the judgment.

[5] Error is predicated upon the refusal by the court to give to the jury, at the defendants' request, an instruction to the effect that plaintiffs were estopped by virtue of their conduct to object to any noncompliance with the terms of the lease by the said defendants prior to the commencement of the construction of the derrick on said property.

The answers of the jury to the several special interrogatories submitted to it show that, although the lease was executed on December 22, 1920, the defendants were not obliged to commence actual work to develop the land in controversy for oil or gas before April 1, 1921; that after work was commenced it was not prosecuted diligently and continuously and in good faith until the suit was brought on July 13, 1921; but that there was "continuous substantial work done on the property from the time the construction of the derrick was begun until it was completed." The evidence tends to show that the derrick occupied about three weeks in building, and that it was completed on or before the 15th day of June, 1921; that 28 days elapsed between the date of the completion of the derrick and the date when the action was commenced; and that plaintiffs were frequently on the premises and at all times observed what progress was being made by the defendants in carrying out the covenants of the lease. Appellants urge that in such circumstances, plaintiffs being cognizant of all the facts, could not permit the defendants to proceed with the erection of the derrick and afterward object to delays in the development prior to the time the work was actually started in the construction of the derrick. But the lease itself contains no provision which requires plaintiffs to give notice to the defendants of any claim on the part of plaintiffs that the defendants either were violating or had violated the terms of the lease. Whatever were the difficulties or the problems which beset the defendants in connection with the work were of their own making. The evidence clearly shows that none of the defendants possessed any capital; or at least that if any of them had any assets, he was either unwilling or unable to put any considerable part thereof into this enterprise. The necessities of the defendants were merely the result of their own rashness in undertaking a large project when there appeared to be no certainty of financing the proposition. By admitting appellants' suggestion as being a correct statement of the law, it would follow that any act, however slight and inconsequential, performed by the defendants with the knowledge of plaintiffs in furtherance of the terms of the lease, even at the very last moment before action was commenced, would preclude plaintiffs from asserting their rights and from proving on the trial of the case whatever may have been the facts with reference to the inactivities of the defendants theretofore in connection with the development of the property. For example, let it be assumed that up to one week preceding the date when action was commenced nothing whatsoever had been done by the defendants with reference to carrying out the covenants of the lease requiring diligence and continuous work in the matter of the development of the land; let it further be assumed that on that day, to the knowledge of plaintiffs, the defendants delivered a load of lumber on the premises and actually commenced the erection of a derrick thereon: Could it then rightfully be assumed that plaintiffs, because of their knowledge of the facts, should be estopped to prove on the trial the delays and the inactivities of the defendants preceding the delivery of the lumber on the premises? It should be remembered that the claim of plaintiffs is not that no work was done by the defendants, but rather that the defendants failed "to prosecute said work diligently and continuously and in good faith." In such circumstances the fact that some work was done, however important, is not an answer to plaintiffs' contention that the provision of the lease requiring diligent and continuous work in good faith was violated. Estoppel is based upon principles of equity; but it would be most inequitable and unjust to preclude plaintiffs here from showing just what were the facts relating to the acts of the defendants in connection with their attempted compliance with the requirements of the lease from its inception until the date when the action was commenced.

[6] Appellants next contend that the trial court erred in refusing to permit the defendants to introduce testimony offered to the effect that had plaintiffs consented to an assignment of the lease, and had this action not been commenced, money would have been available for diligent operation under the lease.

By the terms of an instrument signed by plaintiffs, it was agreed that under certain conditions therein expressed plaintiffs would consent to an assignment of the lease by the defendants to a corporation to be organized by the lessees, to be known as the Signal Hill Oil Company (one of the defendants herein); also:

> "This consent to an assignment shall not be effective until the form of said assignment is submitted to the undersigned and approved in writing by them, nor unless the said Signal Hill Oil Company is organized and empowered to do business by the corporation commissioner of the state of California within thirty days from the date hereof."

The date of the instrument referred to was uncertain in that the date appeared as "this —— day of February, 1921." No attempt was made to show that the corporation was ever "empowered to do business by the corporation commissioner of the state of California"; nor was it shown that any form of assignment was ever submitted to plaintiffs, nor that they refused to approve any form of assignment. On the other hand, it clearly appears from the record herein that the defendants were afforded every reasonable opportunity to show that plaintiffs refused to consent to an assignment of the lease. The only instrument submitted by the defendants to plaintiffs for their approval was a drilling contract entered into between the individual defendants as parties of the first part, and Signal Hill Oil & Gas Company, as party of the second part, and the evidence is to the effect that plaintiffs orally assented to its terms, and the evidence is very uncertain that plaintiffs ever refused to approve in writing even the drilling contract. Of course, it is manifest that the bringing of the suit could in no way have affected the defendants in any efforts which they might have seen fit to exert in the way of raising money before the suit was brought. The proposition that if such consent had been given by plaintiffs, and if said suit had not been brought, the defendants could have shown that money would have been available for the diligent operation of the lease, is so uncertain, so problematical, and so incapable of ascertainment that no reasonable basis is afforded for the admission of evidence tending to establish the suggested conclusion. At most, evidence of such a nature would necessarily have consisted of opinions of witnesses of what might have occurred in a given contingency. It would have been in the nature of a prophecy, and in this day and generation such matters are neither given, nor are they entitled to, very great consideration.

[7] Appellants complain that the trial court was in error in refusing permission to the defendants to show that the leased land was undeveloped territory at the time the lease was executed; that thereafter, and before plaintiffs refused to consent to the "assignment" to which reference has heretofore been made, the leased property had become a proven oil field; that prior to the filing of the complaint plaintiffs had been approached by another oil company which had offered plaintiffs a large bonus for a lease on the land in question and that said oil company had agreed "to finance the bringing of an action for the cancellation" of the lease between plaintiffs and the defendants.

Assuming that each of the foregoing facts might have been established, just what bearing either or all of them would have had upon the main issue as to whether or not the work had progressed with diligence is not pointed out; neither is it apparent to this court; nor does the record entirely comport with appellants' contention that evidence of each of those facts was not permitted by the court to be introduced. As to the first point, the evidence is clear that the territory was as is claimed by appellants. As to the second point, this court has been unable to locate in the record any attempt on the part of either counsel, other than certain photographs which were offered and received in evidence, which would have even tended to show that the land ever became proven oil territory. Regarding the third point, as heretofore indicated, we are unable to perceive that the court committed any error in rejecting defendants' offer to prove same.

[8] Appellants further contend that the court erred in that the instructions to the jury did not contain any admonition to the effect that a compliance by the defendants with the terms of the lease would be excused in the event of unavoidable delays and accidents preventing such compliance. Counsel for appellants fails to show that any such instruction was requested by him on the trial of the case. Nor is it claimed that there was any evidence of any accidents, nor of any unavoidable delays, other than such as may have been occasioned possibly by scarcity of materials, condition of the roads, or of the soil, making difficult the delivery of materials on the leased premises. By the great preponderance of the evidence it was shown that such claimed conditions were not genuine, but that all such delays were wholly attributable to defendants' lack of money with which to carry on the work. Besides, the finding by the jury that continuous substantial work was not done on the property between April 1st and July 13th negatives appellants' contention that any real endeavor was made by the defendants to overcome such obstacles. No authorities are cited by appellants to sustain their position that delays of the sort mentioned by them constituted "unavoidable delays," within the legal meaning of the words, and we know of none which would make the principle for which appellants contend applicable to even the facts as presented by defendants' witnesses.

[9] The last contention on the part of appellants is that the trial court erred in refusing to give to the jury at the defendants' request an instruction defining the word "diligence" as a "steady application, a constant effort to accomplish the undertaking"; and in addition to such definition, refusing to instruct the jury that "the law does not require unusual or extraordinary efforts, but only that which is usual, ordinary and reasonable." On this point the jury was instructed that, unless the jury found from the evidence that substantial work was done on the premises and that continuous operation was carried on as provided by the terms of the lease, the verdict should be for plaintiffs. It will be remembered that by the terms of the lease the defendants were required to "prosecute said work diligently and continuously and in good faith." The lease also undertakes to define what is meant thereby in the following language:

> "Nothing but substantial work and continuous operations under the terms of this lease shall be considered as a compliance with the terms hereof."

Any other definition of what was meant by the language of the contract would be to place an interpretation upon the contract which was never contemplated by the parties to it. They said exactly what was meant when they said that substantial work and continuous operation was the meaning of the terms employed. For a trial court, or for any other court, to say that something greater or something less than "substantial work and continuous operation" was what the parties intended would be in effect to make a different contract for the parties. The jury found that the defendants did do "substantial work" in the matter of the construction of the derrick, only, and that what other work was performed by them was not done continuously nor in good faith. Such a finding negatives any effect which possibly might have resulted from an instruction that all that was required was the "usual, ordinary and reasonable" effort on the part of the defendants as outlined by the refused instruction.

[10] Other points suggested by appellants are neither argued nor seriously presented in any way. In such circumstances, under the rule frequently announced by the Supreme Court of this state, such alleged errors are entitled to no consideration. Brown v. Tolles, 7 Cal. 398; People v. Woon Tuck Wo, 120 Cal. 294, 52 Pac. 833; Taylor v. Bell, 128 Cal. 306, 60 Pac. 853; People v. McLean, 135 Cal. 306, 67 Pac. 770; People v. Chutnacut, 141 Cal. 682, 75 Pac. 340; Bell v. S. P. R. R. 1. Master and servant 🔑278(12)—Evidence held insufficient to establish negligence in maintenance of ladders in light well.

Evidence held insufficient to establish negligence in construction and maintenance of ladders in a light well, for use of deceased workman, who fell while going down.

On Petition for Rehearing.

2. Master and servant 🔑278(12)—That custom was departed from does not show place unsafe.

The mere fact that usual custom of maintaining ladder in light well of building under construction has been departed from does not in itself, prove that place of employment was unsafe, if facts are without dispute that system used was in fact reasonably safe.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action by Flora A. Valentine and others, minors, by Flora A. Valentine, their guardian ad litem, against W. W. Hayes. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Miller, Thornton & Miller, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Stanley Moore and George K. Ford, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This action was instituted by the widow and minor children of Clarence A. Valentine to recover damages for his death, resulting from a fall from a ladder while in the course of his employment as a carpenter under the defendant Hayes during the construction of a building in the city of San Francisco. The case was tried before a jury, and a verdict rendered for $7,500 in favor of the plaintiffs. Thereafter the defendant moved for and was granted a new trial upon the sole ground that the trial court had erred in giving a certain instruction to the jury. From this order granting a new trial, the plaintiffs appealed to the District Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, Division 1. That court held that, though the ground upon which the new trial was granted was insufficient, as the instruction complained of was a proper one, nevertheless, a new trial was properly granted because the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict. Thereafter the case came on for a second trial, at which time an amended complaint was filed setting forth in some greater detail the manner in which it was claimed that the place of work was unsafe. The trial was had, which resulted in a verdict for the plaintiffs in the sum of $7,500, and from the judgment following the defendant has prosecuted this appeal.

The facts of the case are clearly stated in the former opinion (Valentine v. Hayes, 37 Cal. App. 42, 45, 173 Pac. 410, 411), from which we quote:

> "In the construction of the building the defendant provided a system of ladders in a light well for his employees, to be used in ascending to and descending from their work. At each floor planks were run across the light well resting on the window sills. From these platforms ladders were run, each ladder being one floor in height, running from alternating sides of the light well. The platforms so constructed were about 2 feet 6 inches in width, filling up the entire space in the windows between which they extended, and the boards thereof were 2 inches thick. The ladders resting upon these platforms were about 22 inches wide at the bottom and 18 inches wide at the top. The platforms were secured by nails, and there is no evidence to show that the system adopted was not strong and substantial, and reasonably safe for the purpose for which it was used. At the time deceased received the injuries resulting in his death, nothing gave way or broke about the ladders or platforms. The evidence further shows that when the accident happened deceased was going down one of the ladders carrying a lot of tools, with his face outward from the ladder and his back turned thereto, and that he lost his balance and fell, receiving the injuries from which he died."

Upon the second trial the respondent depended to a great extent upon the testimony of the witnesses given at the former trial, and a great part of this testimony was read into the record. In addition to this, evidence was offered tending to show that the place of work was unsafe because the ladder from which the deceased fell was not constructed and maintained in the ordinary and usual manner. It was also shown that it was not customary to maintain these temporary ladders in a light well, but that they were ordinarily constructed from floor to floor, where the beams and girders were covered with flooring to protect the workmen, in accordance with a state statute and city ordinance.

[1] All the evidence which was adduced at the second trial proved exactly the same facts which were before the appellate court on the former appeal. Taking all this evidence and all the inferences to be drawn therefrom as most favorable to the respondent, there is a complete failure of proof, as on the former appeal, that the accident was caused by any improper or faulty or defective construction or dangerous place of work. The case, therefore, stands as it did before—there is no evidence to prove negligence on the part of the appellant. The evidence is insufficient to support the assumption of the respondent that it was necessary for the deceased to come down the ladder in the manner in which he did. It is clear from the testimony of those present that he could have descended with his face toward the ladder, which would have enabled him to have held to the rungs of the ladder with his free hand. He was not required by reason of the construction of the latter or by any demands of the appellant to descend in the careless manner in which he did.

From a review of the entire evidence it follows, unmistakably, that the accident was caused by the carelessness and negligence of the deceased, rather than by any negligence on the part of the appellant. For this reason the judgment must be reversed, and it is therefore unnecessary to consider other points raised by the appellant.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; STURTEVANT, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a rehearing is denied. In their petition the respondents direct their criticism to the statement in the opinion that "there is no evidence to prove negligence on the part of the appellant." This is said to be in conflict with the former statement in the opinion that:

> "Evidence was offered tending to show that the place of work was unsafe because the ladder from which the deceased fell was not constructed and maintained in the ordinary and usual manner. It was also shown that it was not customary to maintain these temporary ladders in a light well, but they were ordinarily constructed from floor to floor where the beams and girders were covered. * * *"

[2] Taking these statements alone, and without reading the entire opinion, they do appear to be in conflict. What we were endeavoring to show was that the case, so far as proof of negligence was concerned, was the same as that before the court on the former appeal. The evidence that the ladder was maintained in a light well was not new, but was considered on the former appeal. The new or additional evidence offered was to the effect that this was not the usual or customary method of maintaining such ladders. The testimony of a witness that a week after the accident he visited the place and discovered that one of the ladders was not securely nailed was considered in the former opinion and held to be insufficient.

In this case another court has reviewed a former judgment, and the Supreme Court denied a transfer. The evidence was reviewed at length and held insufficient. The only essential addition to the evidence then considered is that the ladder was not maintained in the usual and customary manner and place. But this does not necessarily mean that the appellant was negligent, or that the place of employment was unsafe, in view of the fact that it was shown without conflict that the system used was the usual one in buildings such as that under construction when the injury occurred. In other words, the mere fact that the usual custom has been departed from does not, in itself, prove that the place of employment was unsafe, if the facts are without dispute that the system actually used was in fact reasonably safe, and this we understand to be the law of the former decision.

COLLOPY et al. v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 4721.)

1. Eminent domain 🔑300—Evidence held to show that county's purpose in acquiring land was to change grade and relocate tracks of interurban.

Where plaintiffs executed and delivered to county a deed conveying a right of way and incidents thereto for a public highway, evidence held to show that county's only purpose in acquiring the land was to change grade and relocate tracks of an interurban railroad thereon, and that this fact was known to plaintiffs.

2. Eminent domain 🔑280—Consideration received by landowner for right of way covers all damages.

Where a landowner agrees to convey a right of way for a highway across his land, consideration received by him covers all damages to which he would have been entitled in a regular condemnation proceeding; he being presumed to have contemplated all such damages in fixing consideration for contract.

3. Eminent domain 🔑119(1)—Abutting owner not entitled to be compensated anew for every improvement in street or vehicle.

An abutting owner is not entitled to be compensated anew for every improvement in street or vehicle, or with every change made imperative with such improvement, especially where he has made a conveyance in full contemplation and knowledge of such change.

4. Highways 🔑88—Conveyance of land for public highway implies that it will be used as public welfare and convenience demands.

Conveyance of land for a public highway implies that it will be used as convenience and welfare of public may demand, although that demand may be augmented by increase of population.

5. Eminent domain 🔑79, 80—Abutting landowner held estopped to claim damages for location of interurban on highway.

Where abutting owners had been fully compensated for the location of a highway on their land, and by express terms of their deed had signified their approval of the location, and waived all claims for damages on account of its establishment, they were estopped by their agreement from claiming damages for the location of an interurban railway thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Ella W. Collopy and husband against the United Railroads of San Francisco. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Thomas M. Stuart, of Fresno, for appellants.

Wm. M. Abbott and K. W. Cannon, both of San Francisco, and Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action for damages to real property, and for abatement of an alleged nuisance. The complaint recites the corporate existence of defendant railway company, and the operation and management by it of street railroads and suburban and interurban lines of electric roads in the counties of San Francisco and San Mateo. The facts upon which the complaint is based, chronologically stated, show that for a long period of time prior to October 6, 1890, plaintiffs were the owners of the parcel of land described in the complaint. On the date last mentioned the county of San Mateo, by ordinance, granted to the predecessors in interest of defendant company a franchise for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a street railroad, with all necessary side tracks, over the main county road. This road passed through the town of Colma and along and adjacent to plaintiffs' property. The ordinance required that the grade of the railroad should conform to the grade to be established or re-established by the board of supervisors of the county or their successors, and that the particular portion of the highway upon which the railroad was to be located or relocated should be designated by the county surveyor under the direction of the board. It also expressly provided that the rights and privileges granted were to be held by the grantees and their successors subject to the general laws of the state, and also subject to such requirements and restrictions, which might thereafter be imposed by the board.

The street railroad was thereafter constructed and operated under the ordinance, and some nine years later appellants deeded to the railroad company a small portion of their property for county road purposes, which was thereafter graded off so that it might be used for said purposes, the grading leaving an embankment some two feet high. The railroad, as originally constructed, was located in the center of the highway, and was some 25 or 30 feet distant from appellants' property line. Some 23 years later, on March 24, 1913, and while the defendant company was thus maintaining and operating its railway, viewers were appointed by the board of supervisors of San Mateo county to survey and lay out a proposed new road from the San Francisco-San Mateo county line. The proposed route paralleled the county road upon which the tracks of defendant company were situated, but upon approaching one of the streets at Colma the route curved to the left and crossed a small portion of plaintiffs' lands. The property being thus affected by the proposed improvement, the California highway commission, which had through its engineering department inaugurated the change in the highway, addressed a letter to Mr. Collopy, advising him of the filing of the petition for the changed route, and also of the appointment of certain viewers, and requested that he meet them on the property to discuss the matter of acquiring that portion of plaintiffs' property which was affected by the survey. The parties accordingly met, and the parcel which was required was staked off, and the question of the new grade and how it would affect plaintiffs' other land was discussed, and an agreement between the parties was reached as to the amount of money plaintiffs should receive as damages by reason of the change. This agreement was in writing, and it recited, among other things, that "in consideration of the location of a public highway across said land and of the benefits to accrue to G. M. Collopy thereby, and the payment by county warrant of twelve hundred ($1,200) dollars, hereby agrees to grant by a proper deed of easement to the county of San Mateo, state of California, or to the state of California, as hereinafter provided, for the purpose of said highway, a strip of land across the above described land whereon to build said highway, as located by the department of engineering of the state of California. * * * And G. M. Collopy hereby waives all claim and damages whatsoever for and on account of said location and construction of said highway as aforesaid."

Pursuant to and in conformity with this agreement, plaintiffs on May 5, 1913, executed and delivered to the county their deed of a right of way with incidents thereto for a public highway over and across the portion of the lands of plaintiffs so selected. After the execution of the deed, the fence line of the property was moved back to the new line, and the land between the old fence line and the new fence is the land described in the deed executed by plaintiffs to the county. It consists of a strip some 40 feet at its widest point, and it tapers off to a point at either end. At this time the tracks of the company ran in a curve around and in front of plaintiffs' property, and bordered upon, and ran parallel to and along its entire frontage on the highway, a distance of some 450 feet. The deed of conveyance contained certain recitals, which had been incorporated in the agreement to the effect that, in consideration of the benefits to accrue to plaintiffs by reason of the location of the highway and other considerations, they consented to the location and waived all claim for damages or compensation on account of its re-establishment. It further expressly provided that the state of California should have the right to adopt and approve as a state highway the whole or any part of the right of way granted.

On November 7, 1913, the California highway commission notified the president of defendant corporation to relocate and reconstruct its tracks so as to place the center line thereof in a position 12 feet westerly from the established easterly curb line, and 13 feet easterly from the established center of the state highway. Two weeks later the commission also wrote a letter to the board of supervisors of San Mateo county concerning the removal of the defendant company's tracks, and inclosed a draft of an ordinance with reference thereto, which the commission suggested the supervisors adopt. A like communication was sent to the supervisor for the district where plaintiffs' land was situated, asking that the board confirm the center line location, and requested that he assist in the passage of the proposed ordinance covering the matter. Pursuant to these various communications the board adopted an ordinance in conformity with the suggestions. The ordinance required that the defendant company relocate and reconstruct its tracks to conform to the change as outlined in the communication sent to its president by the state highway commission. In April, 1914, the company proceeded to make the directed change. In doing so it excavated the property conveyed by plaintiffs to the county to the established grade, and removed its tracks thereto from the center of the highway, and it ever since has and is now maintaining and using them on the public highway. Some two years later and in 1916, just prior to the bar of the statute of limitations, appellants filed this action.

The complaint alleged the removal of the tracks from the center of the road without the consent of the plaintiffs. Damages were claimed in the sum of $10,000 for the alleged wrongful taking of plaintiffs' lands and the use thereof by defendant company. An additional sum of $5,000 was prayed for on account of the destruction of plaintiffs' right of egress and ingress to the county road. By way of a second cause of action, plaintiffs alleged that the operation of the heavy interurban cars over the tracks as relocated caused the dwelling house of plaintiffs and the earth on which it rested to vibrate, thus rendering the use of the premises less comfortable and inhabitable, and diminishing its value, for which reason an additional sum of $5,000 was claimed as damages, and the complaint also prayed that this nuisance be abated.

The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury. With the exception of proof of the alleged jarring of the house caused by the change of location of the tracks, plaintiffs made no effort to segregate the different elements of damages, and they confined their proof in support of their action to the testimony of two witnesses, who stated that in their opinion the removal of the tracks affected the value of the property in the sum of $15,000.

Upon the conclusion of the evidence the case was submitted on briefs September 30, 1919. Plaintiffs failed to present their opening brief until some two and a half years later. Upon the filing of defendant's brief shortly thereafter the court in August, 1922, rendered judgment in favor of defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

The substance of their contention is that neither the Legislature nor a municipality can permit a street or highway to be taken, used or incumbered in such a manner as will interfere with the rights of abutting owners, or permit any use of it, which will amount to an additional burden, unless some provision for compensation is made, as such owners have special easements therein, such as the right to ingress and egress, which cannot be taken away, materially impaired, or interfered with, even under legislative authority, without just compensation being made.

The principle, that an ordinance affecting an easement must be taken in subordination to the paramount rights of an owner, presents varied and very interesting questions, included in which are the subjects relating to the loss suffered and benefits acquired by abutting owners by reason of a change of grade in highways made imperative by the increase in traffic and the ever changing modes and means of travel, and the effect upon the owners of the original acquisition of lands for highway purposes where additional burdens are imposed thereon. These and other questions, while highly interesting, do not require extended discussion, for the principles announced in the cases upon the subject have in our opinion little bearing on the case.

[1] As above set forth it appears in evidence that the plaintiffs executed and delivered to the county a deed conveying a right of way and incidents thereto for a public highway. By the express terms thereof they signified their approval of the location, and they likewise waived all claims for damages or compensation for or on account of its establishment. The deed contains a provision that the state of California shall have the right to adopt and improve as a state highway the whole or any part of the right of way granted. There is also evidence in the record to show that plaintiffs knew that defendant's tracks were to be moved. The right of way agent for the highway commission testified that he discussed this subject with both plaintiffs. He further testified that, before acquiring the property, he advised them that it would be necessary to make a cut that would create an embankment on practically the entire distance of the frontage of plaintiffs' land which abutted the highway, starting with a small cut at a point where their barn is situated, which would be increased gradually to form seven to eight feet at the highest point. The testimony of one of the viewers is practically to the same effect. It is therefore manifest from the evidence that the only purpose of acquisition of the land by the county was to change the grade and relocate the tracks, and that this fact was known to plaintiffs. As intimated by the trial court, it is not conceivable that the county would pay the sum of $1,200 for the property for road purposes and its incidentals without intending to use it for such purpose, as the evidence shows that it was an inclined elevation and could not be used for any purpose unless it was graded. Under the evidence presented the trial court found, and, we think, correctly so, that plaintiffs are concluded by their deed.

[2, 3] The findings in substance show that the evidence was insufficient to warrant a recovery upon the second cause of action relating to the alleged injury caused by the vibration resulting from the cars, and that plaintiffs had abandoned the same. They further show that the damages, if any, claimed by plaintiffs, by reason of the grading of the property for road purposes, had been fully settled by the consideration paid to plaintiffs for the land for road purposes and incidentals thereto, and that plaintiffs by their deed, having expressly waived any claim for damages which they might suffer on account of the establishment and use of the highway, were estopped from claiming the same. We fail to see how the court could have reached any other conclusion. The deed itself covered, in contemplation of law and by implication, all claims for damages. Where a landowner agrees to convey a right of way across his land, the consideration received by him covers all damages to which the landowner would have been entitled in a regular condemnation proceeding. In such a case he is presumed to have contemplated and arranged for all such damage, in fixing the consideration for the contract, and he is therefore remitted to it. Hord v. Holston Ry. Co., 122 Tenn. 399, 123 S. W. 637, 19 Ann. Cas. 333, 135 Am. St. Rep. 878; 2 Lewis, Eminent Domain, p. 845. Nor is one acquiring such an easement limited in the use thereof to the particular methods in vogue when the easement was granted. As civilization advances and new and improved methods of transportation are developed, these are in aid of and within the general purposes for which highways are designed. Cater v. Northwestern, etc., 60 Minn. 539, 63 N. W. 111, 28 L. R. A. 310, 51 Am. St. Rep. 543. An abutting owner, therefore, is not entitled to be compensated anew for every improvement in street or vehicle, or with every change made imperative by such improvement, and especially so where he has made a conveyance in full contemplation and knowledge of such change. Such in effect is the principle established in Montgomery v. Railway Co., 104 Cal. 186, 37 Pac. 786, 25 L. R. A. 654, 43 Am. St. Rep. 89, and Hayes v. Handley, 182 Cal. 273, 187 Pac. 952. See, also, Albany v. United States, etc., 38 Cal. App. 466, 176 Pac. 705.

[4] Where land is conveyed for a public highway the implication must be that it will be used as the convenience and welfare of the public may demand, although that demand may be augmented by the increase of population. The benefits which an owner of the servient estate receives from the increase in population and consequent building up of the community usually far more than compensate him for the increased burden he may claim to have suffered. Huddleston v. City of Eugene, 34 Or. 343, 55 Pac. 868, 43 L. R. A. 444. True, in some instances a landowner may suffer a loss; but he often obtains the benefit for nothing through the increase of the value of his land, and he must bear the burden in the less common case of the depreciation in value in consequence of the work. Morris v. Indianapolis, 177 Ind. 369, 94 N. E. 705, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 73.

[5] Aside from these considerations, plaintiffs having, as the evidence and findings show, been fully compensated for their alleged injury, and having expressly waived any claims for damages by reason of the improvement, they are estopped by their agreement from claiming the same.

Appellants complain of certain alleged errors in the rulings of the trial court. We do not deem a discussion of the same necessary. We have examined them, and in our opinion they are without merit.

Other questions raised are controlled by the views herein expressed.

The judgment is affirmed.

James Gallagher, of Fresno, for appellant Tarpey.

L. L. Cory, of Fresno, for other appellants.

Frank D. Stringham, of San Francisco, for respondent Piedra Magnesite Co.

Beverly L. Hodghead, of San Francisco, for respondent American Refractories Co.

ST. SURE, J. This is an action to recover $33,617.20, balance due on a last installment of $37,500 under agreement to purchase certain magnesite mining claims, to which plaintiff as vendor and defendants Curran and Phillips as vendees were the original parties, and for the foreclosure of a vendor's lien on said mining claims.

Defendants Thomas, Winter, Piedra Magnesite Company, and American Refractories Company are joined as claimants of interests in the mining property and a calcining plant, as purchasers, grantees, assignees, mortgagees, and judgment creditors.

The third amended complaint alleges that defendants Winter, refractories company, and Thomas, with full knowledge of the mutual rights and obligations of the original parties to the contract, and while the same was wholly executory, promoted and incorporated the defendant Piedra Magnesite Company for the purpose of assuming said contract and performing its terms, and became stockholders of said company; that said company, with knowledge of the rights and obligations of the parties to the contract, took and accepted an assignment of said contract, and agreeably to plaintiff assumed its obligations, entered upon the property, and proceeded to the keeping and performance of the conditions and covenants of the contract; that it erected the plant mentioned, and otherwise performed under the terms of the contract and made installment payments thereunder with the exception of the payment sued on.

Defendants Phillips, Thomas, and Belle M. Curran, as executrix of her husband testator, denied generally the allegations of the complaint with respect to themselves, and cross-complained against the remaining defendants, alleging the execution of the original agreement; also execution of an agreement between themselves and Winter and the refractories company to form a corporation for the purpose of assuming, as assignee, the burdens of the original agreement, and holding them harmless thereunder, for the consideration of 50 per cent. of the stock of said corporation and the assignment of said contract. The third amended complaint of the plaintiff is made part of the cross-complaint, and the prayer is that as to any deficiency judgment that may be entered, the remaining defendants be adjudged primarily liable and these defendants (Thomas, Curran, and Phillips) sureties.

Defendants Winter, the refractories company, and the Piedra Magnesite company answered separately the third amended complaint and the cross-complaint, after demurrers interposed thereto had been overruled. Trial was had, resulting in judgment for plaintiff, foreclosing any rights of all the defendants in the real property the subject of the original contract; and against defendants Curran, Phillips, and Thomas for the amount sued for; for a sale of the property mentioned in the contract, and for a deficiency judgment; denying judgment against defendants Piedra Magnesite Company, American Refractories Company, and Emil Winter, both for a deficiency judgment as to them on the original action, and a declaration of their status as principal debtors with Curran, Thomas, and Phillips as sureties, on the cross-complaint of the latter.

[1] Motion for new trial by plaintiff and cross-complainants on the grounds of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, and that the decision was against law, is deemed denied by failure of action thereon within the statutory period. This is a joint appeal by plaintiff and cross-complainants from that part of the judgment adjudging that no deficiency judgment be entered or docketed against defendants Piedra Magnesite Company, American Refractories Company, and Emil Winter; and that cross-complainants take nothing by their cross-complaint against said defendants. Defendant and cross-complainant Thomas appeals from the whole of the judgment against himself.

The record shows that on June 1, 1917, a contract of sale was entered into between plaintiff Tarpey as vendor and defendants Curran and Phillips as vendees for certain magnesite mining claims in Fresno county, Cal., for the purchase price of $75,000, of which amount $2,500 was to be paid in cash and the balance in installments. A further consideration expressed in the contract was that within 120 days from its date the vendees, at their own cost and expense, should erect a calcining plant, crusher, works, machinery, and appliances on the right of way of the Atchison, Topeka & Sante Fé Railway Company's railroad, or otherwise in the vicinity of the said claims, and expend thereon a sum not less than $35,000 within said period, which plant was to be appurtenant to said mining claims and stand as additional security for the performance of the contract. A proviso that the vendees should, on demand, execute a mortgage on this plant to the vendor, was included in the contract. The cash payment was made, and for the balance of the purchase price the vendees gave their promissory notes, due at the respective due dates of the payments to be made under the contract. Default in the payment of the last installment under the contract is the basis of this action. Defendant Thomas, though not a party to the contract, became jointly interested with the vendees by advancing one-third of the initial payment of $2,500 and entering into a separate agreement whereby they were to share equally under whatever arrangement was made for financing and operating the property. Thomas then was, and since April 25, 1916, had been, the representative in Tulare county, Cal., of the American Refractories Company to buy magnesite.

Shortly after the making of the Tarpey contract, the vendees, together with Thomas, went east for the purpose of interviewing officers of the American Refractories Company with a view to the financing of the Tarpey property by the latter company. Mr. Curran took with him maps, photographs, and a report prepared by engineer Coghlan on the property, together with a copy of the Tarpey contract. At Chicago and Joliet they met Messrs. Mossman and Allen, respectively manager and vice president of the American Refractories Company, and had conversations with them respecting the business in hand. From Chicago the vendees, Thomas, and Mossman, at the suggestion and on the arrangement made by the last named, proceeded to Pittsburg to confer with Mr. Winter, the president of the refractories company. At Pittsburg a meeting was held at which Curran, Phillips, Thomas, Mossman, and Winter were present, and after discussion an agreement drawn which was then signed by all those named there present, and a few days later by Mr. Allen at Joliet or Chicago. This instrument, called the Pittsburg agreement, was dated June 9, 1917, and dealt with the formation of a California corporation "for the purpose of mining, calcining and shipping magnesite," to have five directors, three of whom (Allen, Mossman and Winter) "will represent the American Refractories Company," and Curran and Thomas "are to represent the California stockholders." The stock of the corporation, of the value of $10,000, was to be divided equally between Curran, Thomas, and Phillips as one party and the American Refractories Company. This agreement recited that—

> "Messrs. Curran, Thomas and Phillips have secured an option to purchase a cerain magnesite property located at Piedra, Fresno county, Cal., * * * and they have made a payment of $2,500 on the purchase price of the property. In consideration of receiving fifty per cent. of the corporation stock they are to assign this contract to purchase to the new corporation with all its rights, titles and privileges. * * * The $2,500 cash they have paid and the contract to purchase shall be in full payment of their subscription of $5,000. The American Refractories Company, by its three stockholders named above agree to pay $5,000 in cash for the $5,000 stock they are to receive."

Provisions were made for advances of cash as a loan to the corporation by Allen, Mossman, and Winter on behalf of the American Refractories Company to the extent of $50,000 for building purposes and machinery; the name of the company agreed upon, that the entire production of the new company was to be sold to the American Refractories Company, Curran named as vice-president and general manager, with his salary for the first year; and Phillips as general superintendent and his salary for the first year; counsel to be retained specified; the amount to which contracts might legally be made by the California representatives without the consent of a majority of the directors, limited; and, finally, a statement made that the corporation was to be organized on the strength of representations made by Messrs. Curran, Thomas, and Phillips as to deposit and quantity and quality of same, and as to their ability to have the plant built and in operation within sixty days. This last condition was stated to be satisfied if the plant was built and in operation within three months, on account of recognized abnormal conditions prevailing. There is a conflict in the evidence as to whether or not there was a copy of the Tarpey contract at the Pittsburg meeting.

Returning from Pittsburg to California, defendant Thomas caused the incorporation of the Piedra Magnesite Company, as provided in the Pittsburg agreement, retaining Attorney Powers of Visalia for the legal work. After the incorporation of the company, Mr. Thomas requested the same attorney to prepare an assignment by Messrs. Curran and Phillips of the Tarpey contract to the new company. This assignment, referred to as the "first" assignment, was executed by Messrs. Phillips and Curran some time in July, 1917, and was delivered to defendant Thomas, who was secretary and treasurer of the new company. It presumably remained in his possession with the other records of the company until they were sent to Mr. Mossman at Joliet, Ill., some time in August or September. There is a dispute as to whether or not the assignment was actually sent with the other records or remained in Thomas' possession until produced November 22, 1917. One provision of this assignment read:

> "This instrument is made and delivered by said undersigned upon the condition that said Piedra Magnesite Company shall keep and perform all the conditions of said contract to be kept and performed by said undersigned."

And a copy of the Tarpey contract was annexed to and made a part of it. The assignment was at the directors' meeting of the Piedra Company on organization, but there is no evidence of any resolution of the board of directors, as such, accepting it. Plaintiff testified also that there was no notice of any assignment of the contract ever given him by the original vendees.

The company was organized under instructions from Attorney Powers, and the necessary organization meetings held. The original directors were Curran, Phillips, Thomas, Mitchell, and Stevenson, the two last mentioned being merely accommodation resident signers to make up the necessary quota of five. A second meeting was held on July 23, 1917, but the minutes of the meeting were unsigned. Until November 22, 1917, these appear to be all the directors' meetings held. At the first stockholders' meeting Phillips was elected temporary president and Thomas temporary secretary, the articles and certificate of incorporation were read, and a draft of the by-laws presented, read, and adopted. At the first meeting of directors, officers of the corporation were elected as follows: Phillips, president; Curran, vice president; Thomas, secretary; Thomas, treasurer. The business ensuing consisted in following out the Pittsburg agreement by the employment of Curran as general manager at the agreed salary and of Phillips as superintendent, at the agreed salary; the method of signing checks specified and the general manager authorized to contract obligations not to exceed $5,000. These minutes were signed by the president and secretary. By the unsigned minutes of the directors' meeting of July 23d the following appears to have taken place: Joe L. Mitchell resigned as director, and Emil Winter was elected director in his place; R. D. Stevenson resigned as director, and P. B. Mossman was elected director in his stead; Phillips resigned as president, and Emil Winter was elected to that position; Thomas resigned as secretary, and Mossman was elected as such. The new lineup of directors and officers then stood: Winter, president; Mossman, secretary; Thomas, treasurer; Curran, vice president; Phillips, director; which, excepting that Allen was not on the directorate, for which purpose an additional meeting was deemed necessary, was the program outlined for the corporate representation in the Pittsburg agreement.

On November 22, 1917, at the instance of Mossman and under direction of Attorney Hodghead, another meeting was held. "There were present Directors Thomas J. Curran, J. W. Thomas, and W. B. Phillips. There were also present former directors Joe L. Mitchell and R. D. Stevenson, two of the original incorporators of said Piedra Magnesite Company, and directors thereof until the 23d day of July, 1917." Then follows a recital of the proceedings of substituting Winter and Mossman by election as directors and president and secretary, respectively, at the meeting of July 23d, and their refusal to accept such election. A resolution is then set forth rescinding the proceedings of the meeting of July 23d in toto. Mitchell and Stevenson were again elected directors, Phillips was again elected president and Thomas secretary, and after qualifying shares had been issued, the meeting continued with this personnel. A resolution was then passed reciting the advance by the American Refractories Company to Piedra Company of an aggregate of $69,000, or some $19,000 in excess of that agreed to be advanced in the Pittsburg agreement, and in consideration of assurance of the American Refractories Company, through Mossman, that it would refrain from instituting action to recover this money, or attach the property of the company therefor, the Piedra Company acknowledged its indebtedness to the American Refractories Company in the sum of $69,000, less the actual payments on account as shown by the books of account of the Piedra Company, and authorized the execution of promissory notes of the company to the American Refractories Company for the various amounts which had been advanced from time to time, to bear interest at 6 per cent. from the respective dates of advancement. The place of business of the corporation was then moved from Porterville to San Francisco, and the notes executed and delivered to Mossman as treasurer for the American Refractories Company. Mitchell and Stevenson then resigned as directors, Phillips as president and director; Curran, as vice president, was called to preside. Mossman and S. H. Dolbear were elected directors to replace Mitchell and Stevenson, and F. D. Stringham to fill the vacancy as director, of Phillips. Dolbear was then elected president. The minutes were signed by Thomas as secretary, and a note, also signed by him, was added, to the effect that Mossman and Winter, though declining to admit that they were directors or officers of the company, were willing, and Mossman authorized for Winter, in the latter's absence, to consent to the holding of the meeting if such consent were deemed necessary to the validity of the proceedings.

At this last meeting an assignment of the Tarpey contract, called the "second" assignment, was signed by Curran and Phillips, antedated July 30, 1917, which recited the making of the Pittsburg agreement and the formation of the Piedra Company in accordance therewith; and also in stated accordance therewith, for the expressed consideration of one dollar, assigned the Tarpey contract to the Piedra Company. The clause for assumption of liability by the company, contained in the first assignment, was omitted from this instrument. Phillips testified that he protested executing this second assignment, saying that he had already signed the necessary instrument following the incorporation of the company, but that it was represented to him that the first assignment was lost and this was merely to replace it and complete the records. Mossman testified that they never consented to such an assignment as the "first," and that he had no knowledge of such an instrument until the meeting of November 22d. Winter testified he had no personal knowledge of the "first" assignment. There was also executed at this time by Curran and Phillips a release of the Piedra Company, the American Refractories Company, and the stockholders of the latter, of all liability incurred or to be incurred by reason of the assignment of the Tarpey contract to the Piedra Company. The expressed consideration for this release is the advancement to Phillips and Curran of the sum $17,000, or thereabouts, "being such sum as is necessary to make the payment due under said Tarpey contract on the 30th of November, 1917, if the same be paid."

The Piedra Company continued to operate the claims until May, 1918, but abandoned them before the final payment under the Tarpey contract matured on May 31, 1918, and with the exception of the application of a small royalty of $2 per ton for what had been mined during this period, the last payment was never met.

The findings of the court pertinent to this appeal are substantially as follows:

III. That on June 1, 1917, the Tarpey contract was fairly entered into for an adequate consideration, between Tarpey, Curran, and Phillips.

IV. That Thomas did not sign the contract and was not obligated to plaintiff thereunder.

V. That while the Tarpey contract was executory and nothing done thereunder save the initial payment of $2,500 by the original vendees, the Pittsburg agreement was made by the American Refractories Company by and through its representatives, Emil Winter, P. B. Mossman, and E. M. Allen, with defendants Curran, Phillips, and Thomas.

VI. That the magnesite company was incorporated "pursuant to the terms of" the Pittsburg agreement; that Curran and Phillips assigned to said corporation all their right, title, and interest in and to the Tarpey contract; and, further, that the "first" assignment was executed in July, 1917, by Curran and Phillips, and delivered to Thomas, but never accepted by Piedra Magnesite Company nor any other defendant; that no officer of the Magnesite company was authorized to assume the indebtedness under said Tarpey contract for the Piedra Company, and the Piedra Company never assumed said indebtedness. Further, that the "second" assignment was executed November 22, 1917, by Curran and Phillips, delivered to the board of directors of the Piedra Company on the same day, and accepted by the Piedra Magnesite Company.

VII. That in July, 1917, while the Tarpey contract was wholly executory, the Piedra Company entered into and took possession of the Tarpey contract property, and mined and extracted ore therefrom. That thereafter they advanced to Curran and Phillips and caused to be made on the Tarpey contract the following payments: $15,000 on or before June 30, 1917; $20,000 on or before November 30, 1917; and an aggregate of $6,062.63 as royalty on ore extracted payable to plaintiff under the terms of the Tarpey contract.

VIII. That on November 22, 1917, for the consideration named therein, Curran and Phillips executed the "release" of that date (the consideration expressed being the advancement of the amount necessary to meet the payment of November 30th), and that on November 30th the Piedra Company advanced to Curran and Phillips the sum of $17,000 to meet the November 30th payment, and the payment was made by the latter to the plaintiff Tarpey.

XI. That the amount sued for, with interest, is due and owing plaintiff by Curran, Phillips, and Thomas; that the Piedra Magnesite Company, American Refractories Company, and Emil Winter did not assume any of the obligations of Curran or Phillips under the Tarpey contract or the payment of the purchase price thereunder; and that the Piedra Company, American Refractories Company, and Winter are not liable to plaintiff nor to the cross-complainants in any amount whatever.

XII. That within three months from the Pittsburg agreement the Piedra Company constructed a calcining plant on the property of the Atchison, Topeka & Sante Fé Railway Company at Piedra; that it was not constructed as appurtenant to or as part of the Tarpey contract property, but for the purpose of reducing magnesite ore received from the property of plaintiff or from any other source.

The appeal, as was the motion for a new trial, is grounded on the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings, and that the decision is against law.

It is also urged that the entire judgment against Thomas has no support in the evidence or findings; that the decision in favor of Piedra Magnesite Company, American Refractories Company, and Winter is wholly unsupported by the evidence, as is also the decision that cross-complainants are entitled to no relief against their codefendants.

In appellants' closing brief the points on which the correctness of the decision is questioned are thus set forth:

(1) In denying a deficiency judgment to plaintiff against the Piedra Company with a consequent stockholder's liability against the Refractories Company and its stockholder Winter.

(2) In denying cross-complainants relief against respondents.

(3) In finding that the calcining plant erected was not so erected as appurtenant to the Tarpey claims, and additional security for the Tarpey contract.

(4) In awarding judgment against defendant Thomas.

[2, 3] Appellants and respondents agree that the Pittsburg agreement constitutes the measure by which the rights and liabilities of the various parties are to be established. Introductory to their main contention appellants argue that the Piedra Magnesite Company was created a de facto corporation, and an equitable assignment of the Tarpey contract with all its rights, titles, and privileges, presently made to it by the original vendees, in accordance with the terms of the Pittsburg agreement; and that the determination of the character of that assignment as imposing or withholding the assumption of the burden of the Tarpey contract, is a matter of law to be determined by the court from the agreement itself; and that what the Piedra Company did or failed to do in formally accepting such assignment when it became a de jure corporation, cannot affect its liability under the Tarpey contract, nor that of the parties to the Pittsburg agreement. If this were so, the finding of the court on a conflict of evidence that the Piedra Company did not accept the "first" assignment would become of no consequence in determining the actual liability of that company under the Tarpey contract, for the burden of liability would attach as soon as the de jure corporation came into existence. But it is not a question of law; it is a question of fact with which we are confronted. In this connection appellants refer to the "compelling equities" in the case, but the rule as to conflict applies in cases formerly denominated cases in equity, as in cases of law. 2 Cal. Jur. § 546.

Appellants' main attack is directed against findings VI, VII, and VIII. Upon the sustention or reversal of these findings depends appellants' case. These findings and the allegations contained in the third amended complaint, as to the acceptance of the "first" assignment and the assumption of the obligations of the Tarpey contract, are correlative. The main question thus presented for our decision is whether or not, in case of a conflict, there is substantial evidence supporting the finding negativing assumption. With the fact of assumption or non-assumption, and depending upon it, are inextricably interwoven the secondary propositions of the construction of finding VII (relative to advances or loans to the Piedra Company or Curran or Phillips, used in paying installments upon the Tarpey contract); and, likewise, of the effect to be given finding VIII (concerning consideration for the release).

[4] The law is settled that as to the original vendor in an executory contract for the sale of real estate there can be no recovery of deficiency judgment or personal judgment for the purchase money, for default in the payment of the purchase price, against the assignees of the vendee without an assumption of the obligations of the contract, in either an action for specific performance or for foreclosure of the so-called vendor's lien. The utmost relief to which the vendor is entitled is a strict foreclosure of his vendor's lien on the property. Personal judgment for deficiency must be against the original vendee. This is based on the ground of lack of privity of contract between the assignee and the vendor without an assumption of the obligations of the contract, and also on the ground that the assignment is in the nature of a covenant in gross personal to the vendee and not running with his estate in the property. Lisenby v. Newton, 120 Cal. 571, 52 Pac. 813, 65 Am. St. Rep. 203, and cases cited. And this is true where the assignee has acted under the contract of sale to the extent of making payments thereunder (Lisenby v. Newton, supra), and even where, after assignment, he has taken possession of the property and wasted it (Wilson v. Beazley, 186 Cal. 437, 199 Pac. 772; Beazley v. Embree, 41 Cal. App. 706, 183 Pac. 298). The seeming exceptions to the rule are exemplified in the cases of Jones v. Allert, 161 Cal. 234, 118 Pac. 794, and Robinson v. Rispin, 33 Cal. App. 536, 165 Pac. 979, holding in the latter case (page 541 [165 Pac. 982]):

> "Of course, * * * the mere assignment of the rights under an executory contract would not make the assignee liable to the other contracting party. Such was the case of Lisenby v. Newton, 120 Cal. 571. * * * But where, after the assignment is made, the executory provisions of the contract are fully performed, the benefit inuring solely to the assignee, and where by his actions he holds himself out as personally liable and recognizes the original contract as binding upon him, he is liable to the other party equally with the assignor. Such is this case, as was Jones v. Allert, 161 Cal. 234."

Jones v. Allert was a case where land was purchased especially for a corporation to be formed. The corporation was later formed, recognized the contract as binding on itself, and performed affirmative acts looking toward further benefit, in securing the vendor to deal directly with it.

The contract here was not expressly entered into in the first instance on behalf of a corporation to be formed, as was the case of Jones v. Allert, supra, and the trial court evidently did not believe that the acts of those interested in financing the corporation, both prior to its formation and afterwards, were consistent with the idea that they expressly, either in equity or otherwise, assumed the obligations of the Tarpey contract already entered into by Curran and Phillips. Only on such an assumption could the Piedra Company be held at suit of the vendor under the theory of Jones v. Allert or Robinson v. Rispin, or under section 1589 of the Civil Code, which has almost uniformly been restricted to parties to the contract under which relief is sought. Canale v. Copello, 137 Cal. 22, 69 Pac. 698; Stone v. Owens, 105 Cal. 292, 38 Pac. 726; Beazley v. Embree, 41 Cal. App. 706, 709, 710, 183 Pac. 298; Wilson v. Beazley, 186 Cal. 437, 199 Pac. 772.

[5, 6] The trial court had all the evidence, documentary and oral, before it, on which to judge the intent of those planning the Piedra Company, and their and its acts, formal and informal, following incorporation. Entering into and a necessary part of the evidence on which its decision was based was the presumption of good faith in the proceedings attending the transactions preceding and providing for the incorporation of the Piedra Company, with the subsequent actions of it and its organizers, and the power to look through and beyond defective or lacking formalities to the real purpose and meaning of the whole plan. In a case in equity, with full power to act, the trial court found on a conflict of evidence adduced before it that the "first" assignment, with its clause of express imposition of liability, was never accepted by the Piedra Company. It also found that the Piedra Company did not assume the obligations of the Tarpey contract. As to findings VI, VII, and VIII the evidence presents a conflict. "The decision of the trial court * * * is conclusive upon us, in so far as there is any substantial evidence tending fairly, with such inferences as may reasonably be drawn therefrom, to support such decision, even though we may think that a different conclusion should have been reached." Clopton v. Clopton, 162 Cal. 27, 31, 121 Pac. 720, 721.

What we have heretofore said concerning findings VI, VII, and VIII, and the reasons given for refusing to interfere with them, applies with equal force to finding XI.

Finding XII excludes the calcining plant from the decree of foreclosure and sale. It is contended by appellant Tarpey that he is entitled to have that property included in the decree of sale. The Pittsburg agreement provides:

> "This corporation is to be formed for the purpose of mining, calcining and shipping magnesite and the manufacturing and sale of the same into the various products, if found necessary. * * * That Curran, Thomas, and Phillips have secured an option to purchase certain magnesite property from M. F. Tarpey," which they agree to assign and "also agree to assign any other property they may now have, control or can get, etc."

The agreement further recites that large sums of money will be necessary for buildings and machinery to operate the plant, and provides for an advance for this purpose of $50,000. The Tarpey contract with Curran and Phillips provides for a plant to cost not less than $35,000. Appellant's argument is based upon the contention that it appears uncontradicted that the plant was constructed with full knowledge of the Tarpey contract and pursuant thereto. Respondents contend that this calcining plant was erected by the Piedra Company, as agreed by the parties at Pittsburg, to do a general calcining business in the Fresno district, including the ore from the Tarpey mines and from "any other property" they could secure. The finding of the court is in accord with respondents' contention. It was made upon conflicting evidence and for reasons heretofore stated will not be disturbed.

[7] The trial court found (IV) that appellant Thomas did not sign the Tarpey contract and was not obligated thereunder. And yet the trial court gave judgment against Thomas. Neither the evidence nor the findings support such judgment. Appellants ask that the judgment against Thomas be set aside, and respondents say they are not concerned about the matter. Under such circumstances we deem it advisable to direct the court below to modify the judgment. Fox v. Hale & Norcross S. M. Co., 122 Cal. 219, 54 Pac. 731. The cause is therefore remanded to the superior court, and that court is directed to modify its judgment herein by striking out those portions thereof which authorize any judgment against J. W. Thomas.

As so modified, the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

PEOPLE v. MILLER. (Cr. 754.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 13, 1924.)

1. Sodomy ⚿6—Evidence held to sustain conviction of assault.

Evidence held to sustain conviction of assault with intent to commit the crime against nature.

2. Criminal law ⚿511(1)—Sodomy ⚿6—Testimony held to sufficiently corroborate assaulted man whether victim or accomplice.

In prosecution for assault, with intent to commit crime against nature, testimony of an officer as to what he saw over hotel transom held to sufficiently corroborate testimony of assaulted man whether accomplice or victim.

3. Criminal law ⚿507½—Evidence held to show assaulted man was victim, not accomplice.

Evidence held to show assaulted man was victim, rather than accomplice, in assault with intent to commit crime against nature.

4. Criminal law 🔑1086(14)—Transcript held not to show request for instruction.

Transcript on appeal held at most to show that defendant suggested that the court frame instructions covering particular points not a request for instructions.

5. Criminal law 🔑830—Rule as to giving requested instructions stated.

Court must give any instructions asked by either party, correctly expounding the law upon any evidence before the jury, but may refuse an erroneous instruction, and is not bound to modify or give another in its place.

6. Criminal law 🔑815(9)—Instruction that conviction might be for simple assault should present question of intent.

In prosecution for assault with intent to commit crime against nature, requested instruction that defendant might be convicted of simple assault should present question of reasonable doubt as to whether defendant entertained the intent charged.

7. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Omission to charge that defendant might be convicted of simple assault held not prejudicial.

Where the evidence clearly warranted conviction of assault with intent to commit crime against nature, and instructions were given requiring prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt assault with intent and purpose charged, omission to charge that conviction might be of simple assault was not prejudicial, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Bud Miller was convicted of assault with intent to commit the crime against nature, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. T. McMenamin, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. On the 26th day of November, 1923, the defendant and appellant was found guilty of the infamous crime against nature, as charged in the information, and from the sentence and judgment pronounced thereupon the defendant appeals.

The information charges the defendant as follows:

"That on the —— day of September, 1923, and within the limits of the city of Sacramento, in the state of California, the said defendant, Bud Miller, did then and there, before the filing of this complaint, and within one year prior thereto, willfully and unlawfully and feloniously and carnally, upon the person of one Parley Sheya then and there being, make an assault with the intent then and there feloniously and carnally upon the person of said Parley Sheya to commit the infamous crime against nature; the said Parley Sheya being then and there a male person, contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute of said state in such case made and provided," etc.

The defendant asks a reversal of said judgment upon two grounds, first, insufficiency of the testimony to warrant the verdict; secondly, that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury as requested by the defendant.

[1] The testimony in the case is so utterly revolting that we shall not attempt to state it in detail. Suffice to say that it shows every element of the crime charged in the information. It shows that the defendant and one Sheya, upon whom the assault was made, and a witness by the name of Stenzel, were in a room at the Pacific Hotel in the city of Sacramento; that all of the persons in the room had been drinking more or less; that Sheya and Stenzel appear to have been very good friends; that Stenzel took Sheya to the room in the hotel mentioned and put Sheya to bed; that Sheya, at the time of being put to bed, was more or less under the influence of liquor, and more or less helpless; that after Sheya had been put to bed the defendant Bud Miller began acting in such a manner as to alarm Stenzel; that Stenzel became so impressed with the idea that Miller was about to attempt the act with which he is charged that he (Stenzel) left the room and went for an officer; that upon the return of the officer the door of the room was found closed, and the officer looked over the transom, and his version of what he saw is as follows:

"I stood up on the table; then I was enabled to look over the transom, a glass transom over the top of the door, and this young gentleman here, Sheya, and the defendant were both absolutely naked; both on the bed, Miller was sitting on his knees, with his back to the transom, and Sheya was resting with his head and shoulders on the bed, and his feet almost straight in the air—Miller had his arms underneath his back, the small of Sheya's back, pulling him up close; Sheya originally had been on his back, but pulled so close his feet were standing right up, and Sheya was crying, kind of whining and crying and pleading with Miller to leave him alone, and Miller kept repeating, 'Come on, put it up, put it up,' and Sheya kept pleading, 'No, leave me go,' and whining and crying, and Miller kept repeating, 'Put it up.' * * * Suddenly Miller became furious evidently, and jumped out of bed and went to the window where his pants were hanging, and took a pocket knife out of his pants, then turned, I think, and faced the door, and, opening the knife, he said, it was partly to himself and partly to Sheya I presume, 'I am going to cut your G—— d—— heart out right now,' and Sheya says, 'I want you to go away.' Sheya was still on the bed sort of crying, and Miller on the floor trying to open the knife; Miller approached the bed with the knife open, then Sheya said, 'All right, I will give it to you,' and Miller says, 'No, you won't give it to me, it is too late now, G—— d—— you, I'll cut your heart out right now,' and he grabbed Sheya with his left hand by the throat and raised the knife—just then I kicked on the door, * * * and Miller opened the door."

This witness further testified that—

> "Sheya was exhausted and appeared to be coming out of a drunk; he had the appearance of a man who had been drinking; he seemed more exhausted than intoxicated; Miller was the much more powerful of the two; he seemed to me a pretty powerful man; he is a muscular fellow."

The testimony of Sheya, the victim, is to the same effect that the defendant was attempting to have sexual intercourse with him, and that he refused and resisted, and then the defendant, as stated by the officer, grabbed a knife and threatened to cut his heart out. This testimony, and more along the same line, abundantly justified the jury in finding a verdict of guilty as charged.

On page 25 of the transcript in this case appears the following:

> "(1. Cloud the issue by introducing Stenzel case.)
> "(2. 'Lay over on your face.')
> "(2) Testimony of an accomplice is to be weighed very carefully.
> "(3) Def. cannot be convicted upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice.
> "(4) The corroboration must in and of itself tend to connect with the commission of the offense.
> "(5) That Def. might be convicted of a simple assault.
> "Refused. Pullen, J."

[2, 3] Upon what has been set forth it is urged by counsel for defendant that the judgment herein should be reversed. In so far as the question of an accomplice is concerned, the testimony of the officer is sufficient, in and of itself, to justify the verdict of the jury, whether Sheya be or be not regarded as an accomplice, but a thorough reading of the testimony leads us to the conclusion that Sheya was not an accomplice, and that he was, in every sense of the word, an unwilling victim. However, as just stated, this is immaterial, because the officer's testimony alone is sufficient to sustain the verdict. We may state, however, that in the case of People v. Dong Pok Yip, 164 Cal. 143, 127 Pac. 1031, in cases of this kind, it has been held that, where the victim appears to be other than a free agent, the rule relating to accomplices does not apply. Everything in the testimony, as set out in the transcript, tends to show that Sheya was not consenting to any act of the defendant.

The court did, however, instruct the jury on the subject of accomplices by quoting section 1111 of the Penal Code. It is strongly urged by counsel for defendant that the court erred in refusing to give what has been hereinbefore set out as No. 5 of defendant's proposed instructions, which reads as follows: That Def. might be convicted of a simple assault."

[4-6] The transcript does not clearly show that the court was requested to give any such instruction. At most, what we have set forth amounts only to a suggestion to the court to frame instructions covering particular points. But, assuming that the words quoted were intended as proposed instruction, it is manifest that the court did not err in refusing to give the same. It would have been a direct instruction to the jury concerning their privilege of finding the defendant guilty irrespective of the testimony. As stated in 14 R. C. L. 800:

> "A court is bound to give any instructions asked for by either party which correctly expound the law upon any evidence before the jury, but may refuse to give an instruction which is erroneous and is not bound to modify it or give any other in its place, for a party cannot, by asking an erroneous instruction, devolve upon the court the duty of charging the jury on the law of the case. It follows, therefore, that a reversal will not be directed because of the refusal to give an instruction, unless it is strictly and entirely accurate."

A large number of authorities are there cited to support the text just quoted. That an assault is necessarily included in the charge contained in the information in this case may be admitted, but, in order to justify the giving of an instruction to the jury, it would be necessary to so frame the instruction as to present to the jury the question of reasonable doubt in their minds as to whether the defendant entertained the intent charged in the information, and that, if they were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt from the testimony that the defendant committed the assault but were not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty that the defendant committed the assault with the intent charged in the information, then, and in that case, they might find the defendant guilty only of an assault.

[7] If the defendant desired an instruction to the jury to such effect, it should have been so requested. Again, we do not think the defendant has been prejudiced in the matter of instructions, because the court instructed the jury that, in order to find a verdict of guilty, the burden rested upon the prosecution to establish beyond a reasonable doubt every element of the offense charged in the information, which included, of course, establishing beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant made the assault with the intent and purpose charged against him. The evidence which we have quoted shows that the defendant was clearly guilty of the offense with which he was charged. In a number of cases it has been held that, where the evidence shows the defendant clearly guilty of the offense charged, it is not error for the court to refuse an instruction referring to a lower offense included in the offense charged in the information. People

v. Turley, 50 Cal. 469; People v. Barney, 114 Cal. 554, 47 Pac. 41; People v. Franklin, 70 Cal. 641, 11 Pac. 797; State v. Kapelino, 20 S. D. 591, 108 N. W. 335; Brantley v. State, 9 Wyo. 102, 61 Pac. 139. A number of other cases might be cited to the same effect.

The appellant calls attention to the case of People v. Hickey, 109 Cal. 275,[1] where the offense was the same as in this case. However, it appears by a reading of that case that the testimony concerning one of the occurrences merely disclosed a simple assault, and the court held that it was error to refuse the giving of an instruction on the subject of simple assault. That case we do not think controlling in this instance, because of the dissimilarity of the circumstances. From what we have quoted of the testimony it is scarcely perceivable how the jury could come to any other conclusion than that the defendant was guilty of the offense just as set forth in the information. Under such circumstances, although we may admit that the instruction involving the subject of simple assault might have been given, if the proper request had been made therefor, yet, in view of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, it would be a manifest miscarriage of justice to set aside the verdict finding the defendant guilty as charged, where the testimony abundantly sustains such verdict, simply because the court did not call the attention of the jury to the fact that they might find him guilty of a lesser crime.

The judgment is affirmed.

FIDELITY & CASUALTY CO. OF NEW YORK v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 4796.)

1. Master and servant 🔑417(7)—Findings on evidence in compensation case final.

In certiorari proceedings the appellate court will not weigh the evidence and decide whether in its opinion the finding of the Industrial Accident Commission accords with the preponderance thereof, and if there is evidence to sustain such finding the action of the commission will not be reviewed.

2. Master and servant 🔑385(1)—Pain caused by disease factor in estimating amount of compensation.

Where kidney or Bright's disease, which is usually not painful, is accompanied by pain of such severity or frequent occurrence as to interfere with claimant's ability to pursue his calling, it becomes a factor in estimating amount of award of compensation.

3. Master and servant 🔑417(7)—Province of Industrial Accident Commission to determine existence of pain.

Though repeated examinations of claimant's back did not disclose any particular cause for pain in the back, it was the province of the Industrial Accident Commission to determine its existence from the evidence.

4. Master and servant 🔑405(6) — Evidence held to sustain finding of compensable injury to back and kidney.

Evidence held to sustain finding of Industrial Accident Commission of injury to claimant's kidneys from electric shock and of injury to his back.

5. Master and servant 🔑387—Award of compensation held not double award.

An award of compensation, based on claimant's kidney condition and the pain caused in his back, held not a double award, where the allowance for the kidney condition was for a condition of the kidneys unaccompanied by pain.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceedings for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act by James F. Fulmer, claimant, opposed by H. W. Jacobs, employer, and the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, insurance carrier. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded compensation, and the insurance carrier brings certiorari. Award affirmed.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Certiorari for the purpose of reviewing the proceedings of respondent Industrial Accident Commission and its order therein by which on June 29, 1923, it made an award against petitioner and in favor of respondent James F. Fulmer of compensation in the sum of $5,436.63 for a partial permanent disability suffered by said Fulmer as the result of an injury received in the course of his employment.

It appears from the record that the respondent Fulmer on or about the 8th day of March, 1920, was employed by H. W. Jacobs as an electrical lineman, and the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York was the insurance carrier of the employer. Fulmer was at that time 32 years of age and received weekly wages of $38.50. On said date he was working upon a certain power pole engaged in painting it. He was near the top of the pole supported by his lineman's belt. As he was about to descend the pole, his right hand came in contact with the wet surface thereof, and he received an electric shock. He did not fall from the pole, being supported by his belt. He remained supported in this manner for approximately one hour, when he was lowered from the pole still unconscious. As the result of the shock he sustained burns on his left hand and right foot. He was removed to a hospital and was under the care and treatment of Dr. Jackson Temple. While in the hospital some kidney trouble developed accompanied by pain in the lower region of the back. The burn on the hand necessitated the amputation of the middle minor finger at the proximal joint. The petitioner, as the insurance carrier of Fulmer's employer, paid the medical and hospital expenses and certain compensation to Fulmer, who, on December 27, 1920, not being in accord with petitioner as to the total amount to be paid him, filed an application with the Industrial Accident Commission requesting that it fix such amount.

Thereafter hearings were had, and on March 30, 1921, the Commission made and filed an award in favor of the applicant, in which it found that he had "sustained a permanent disability consisting of the loss of the minor (left) middle finger at the proximal joint, and limited flexion of the index, ring and little fingers, which for applicant's occupation and age, 32 years, is equal to 16½ per cent. of total disability, entitling him to a weekly payment of $20.83 for 66 weeks, and amounting to the total sum of $1,374.78." The Commission further found that the injury suffered by the applicant "also caused a certain disability to the back which is only partially disabling and which it is not possible to fix as permanent at this time."

On January 16, 1923, respondent Fulmer filed with the Commission an application for a further award based upon permanent disability arising from injury to his back. Hearings were duly had upon said application, and reports of physicians who had examined the applicant filed, and on June 29, 1923, the Commission made and filed an order amending its previous findings and award, and by which it found that in addition to the injuries upon which its first award was based the applicant had sustained in said accident additional injuries consisting of spasm of lombar muscles causing a painful condition, and permanent disease of the kidneys; and it increased the rating for permanent disability to 65¼ per cent., thereby entitling the applicant to weekly payments of $20.83 aggregating the sum of $5,436.63.

Thereafter the petitioner applied to the Commission for a rehearing upon the grounds (1) that the evidence did not justify the findings of fact and award, and (2) newly discovered evidence, such evidence consisting of reports of three physicians after a new examination of the applicant, together with laboratory and pathological reports. This petition for rehearing was by the Commission denied on September 6, 1923.

On November 14, 1923, the petitioner made application to the Commission for an alteration of its award of June 29, 1923, based upon an alleged improvement in the applicant's condition in that there was no longer any ascertainable or discernable injury to the back of the applicant, and filed in support of its application certain medical reports, one of Dr. Nolan based upon an examination made by him on October 17, 1923, and one by Dr. Harbaugh, assistant medical director of the Commission, based upon an examination of the applicant subsequent to the making of the Commission's award and a review of the history of the case. On December 27, 1923, the Commission denied this application, holding that the evidence tendered was not sufficient to establish that there had been any change in the applicant's condition from and after September 6, 1923, the date of the order denying the petitioner's petition for a rehearing. On January 9, 1924, the petitioner applied to the Commission for a rehearing of this last-mentioned application upon the ground that the evidence was not sufficient to justify the Commission's order in that behalf, and this application was also denied.

In support of its petition for a writ of review the petitioner contends that there is no evidence in the record of the proceedings before the Commission to sustain the finding of that body that Fulmer suffered any injury to his kidneys by reason of the electric shock, that the evidence does not show any actual injury to his back, and that in any event the applicant should not have been granted a permanent disability rating for both his back and the condition of his kidneys, since, if the subjective symptoms of pain in the applicant's back are actually existent, it is probable that they arose from the kidneys and not from any anatomical or muscular impairment in the back itself.

[1-4] It is, of course, not the province of this court to weigh the evidence and decide whether in its opinion the finding of the Commission accords with the preponderance thereof. If there is evidence to sustain such finding the action of the Commission will not be reviewed. Dr. Jackson Temple, who attended the applicant immediately after his injury, testifies to an injury to the applicant's kidneys which he attributed to the effects of the accident; and Dr. Gibbons, medical director of the Commission, in his report upon the case, and referring to the fact that three hours after the accident the symptom of hematuria was observed in the patient, declares that that circumstance is good presumptive evidence that damage to the kidney occurred. With this evidence in the record we cannot say that the Commission was not justified in considering the kidney condition as an important element in fixing the amount of the award, and its rating department did in fact base a certain percentage of permanent disability upon this condition. But the evidence also shows that kidney or Bright's disease is not usually painful, and we think it apparent that where it is accompanied by pain of sufficient severity or frequent occurrence as to interfere with the applicant's ability to pursue his calling it becomes a factor in estimating the amount of the award.

In this connection the applicant testified that before the injury he never had pains in his back, but commencing immediately thereafter he had suffered and now suffers from them; that he cannot lean over; that he can stoop but little, and that he cannot lift anything; that this pain is right where he wears the lineman's belt, and that since his accident he has not been able to retain employment as a lineman, and has had to give it up and go into the store as a floor man; and that he cannot work on his knees. While repeated examinations of the skeletal and muscular structure of the applicant's back do not disclose any particular cause for this pain, it was the province of the Commission to determine its existence from the evidence, and we cannot say that there is not a sufficient base for that portion of its award which is referable to the condition of pain in the back of applicant.

[5] It is also suggested by the petitioner that the proportion of the award based upon the painful condition of applicant's back is a double award since if it exists at all it arises from the kidneys, the diseased condition of which has already furnished the basis for the compensation allowed. But it appears sufficiently from the record that the allowance for the kidney condition was for a condition of the kidneys unaccompanied by pain. There has not, therefore, been a double allowance for this phase of applicant's disability.

It follows from what we have said that the award of the Commission must stand; and it is so ordered.

Master and servant 🔑419—Order denying application for alteration of compensation award held within commission's jurisdiction and not reviewable.

Where the evidence offered by insurance carrier, in support of its application for alteration of an award, consisted of medical reports of a similar tenor to prior reports already before the Commission and considered in making the award, and was cumulative, order denying the application held within its jurisdiction, and not reviewable in certiorari proceedings.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceedings for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act by James F. Fulmer, claimant, opposed by H. W. Jacobs, employer, and the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, as insurance carrier. The Industrial Accident Commission made an award and denied insurance carrier's application for alteration of the award, and insurance carrier brings certiorari. Writ discharged.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Certiorari for the purpose of reviewing the proceedings before the Industrial Accident Commission upon the application of the petitioner for the alteration of an award and its order dated December 27, 1923, denying said application.

The facts giving rise to and upon which said award was based are stated in the opinion filed this day by this court in a proceeding bearing the same title as the present and numbered 4796, and the order to which the present proceeding is addressed is one made by the Commission denying an application made by the petitioner herein for an alteration of said award. Said application set forth as the ground thereof that an improvement had taken place in the condition of the beneficiary of said award. In its order denying the application the Commission found that the evidence was insufficient to establish that there had been any change in such condition. The evidence offered by petitioner in proof of such change in condition consisted of medical reports made after new examinations, but such reports were of similar tenor to prior reports already before the Commission and considered by it in making said award, and introduced matter which was cumulative rather than new, and were not therefore sufficient to satisfy the Commission that the alleged change had occurred. Its order denying said application was thus within its jurisdiction.

We will not therefore review this order, and the writ heretofore issued in this behalf is discharged.

RICHEY v. CORRALITOS UNION SCHOOL DIST. OF SANTA CRUZ COUNTY. (Civ. 4866.)

1. Schools and school districts 🔑120—Pleadings alleging existence of defendant district held not ambiguous.

A complaint alleging that "since July, 1919, Corralitos union school district of Santa Cruz county has been, and now is, a union school district of the county of Santa Cruz," held good against a special demurrer assigning ambiguity in the manner of pleading defendant's existence.

2. Ejectment 🔑63—Complaint for recovery of land held to state cause of action.

A complaint which alleged plaintiff's right to possession of land, definitely describing it, and the unlawful withholding of the possession thereof by defendant, held good against general demurrer.

3. Schools and school districts 🔑65—Land deeded for school purposes held not so used, and to revert to grantor.

Where land was deeded to a school district, for school purposes, on condition for forfeiture and reverter, if not used for school purposes, grantor held entitled to possession, though building was still used to store furniture and books, and intermittently by teacher of another school.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Benj. K. Knight, Judge.

Action by Harold E. Richey, as administrator of the estate of Charles M. James, deceased, against the Corralitos Union School District of Santa Cruz County. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stanford G. Smith, Dist. Atty., of Santa Cruz, for appellant.

Charles B. Younger, of Santa Cruz, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. [1] The plaintiff sued to recover the possession of certain property held by the defendant school district. The complaint alleged the appointment of the plaintiff as administrator of the estate of Charles M. James, deceased, the right of plaintiff to the possession of the property, the unlawful holding of possession by the defendant, and the corporate existence of the defendant as the successor in interest to the Brown's Valley school district. A demurrer was interposed, both general and special. The special demurrer assigned ambiguity in the manner of pleading the existence of the defendant corporation; the argument being that the complaint should have named the officers or trustees of the district, its boundaries, and the laws under which it was incorporated. The complaint alleges that "since July, 1919, Corralitos union school district of Santa Cruz county has been, and now is, a union school district of the county of Santa Cruz, in the state of California." We do not find any ambiguity in these allegations.

[3] The issue framed by the pleadings and tried by the court, sitting without a jury, was that in the year 1885 plaintiff's predecessors had deeded to the Brown's Valley school district the land in question to be "used for school purposes only, and if at any time not so used, the estate hereby granted shall be forfeited and revert to said grantors." The trial court found, in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, that the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the property which the defendant was unlawfully holding, and that said property had not been used for school purposes since July 1, 1919. There was ample evidence to support these findings. It appeared that when the property was deeded to the Brown's Valley school district a school building was erected thereon, and this had been used for school purposes by the trustees of that district until July 1, 1919. It then appeared that on the latter date the Corralitos school district was organized, and that it thereupon succeeded to all the interest of the Brown's Valley school district, the grantee under the deed. It was shown that from that date the property had not been used for school purposes, but that the trustees of the union school district had allowed certain school furniture, which was unfit and unsuitable for school purposes, to remain in the building, that they had allowed some books belonging to the Santa Cruz public library to be stored there, and that they had permitted a teacher of an adjoining Oriental school to use the building intermittently for the purpose of exhibiting pictures and drawings, made by herself, to some of her pupils. This teacher, as well as the pupils, however, came from another school district and there was no attempt to show that their use of the building pertained to the school purposes of the defendant school district.

PEOPLE v. MENDEZ. (Cr. 1100.)

1. Criminal law ⚷1173(3) — Refusal to instruct on crime of which jury acquitted accused held not prejudicial.

Where jury acquitted accused of crime of assault with intent to commit murder and found him guilty of assault with deadly weapon, refusal to give instruction relating to assault to commit murder held not prejudicial to accused.

2. Criminal law ⚷829(1) — Refusal to give proposed instruction covered by instruction given held not error.

The refusal to give a proposed instruction covered by instruction given held not error.

3. Homicide ⚷310(1) — Instruction predicating guilt of assault on element of criminal negligence held not error.

In a prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder, an instruction, that in every crime or public offense there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent or criminal negligence, held not erroneous as including the element of criminal negligence, in view of Pen. Code, § 20.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Refugio Mendez was convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon, and he appeals from the judgment of conviction and from an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Scott McReynolds, of Ventura, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CURTIS, J. The defendant was charged with an assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder. He was found guilty of an assault with a deadly weapon and appeals from the judgment of conviction, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The defendant and the complaining witness, Rodriguez, were on friendly terms, and on the day of the assault the defendant visited the complaining witness at the home of the latter. While the evidence is conflicting as to just what transpired in the house on the occasion of this visit, there was nothing to indicate that the friendly relations theretofore existing did not continue throughout the entire time the defendant was at Rodriguez's house. While in the house it was agreed between them that they would retire therefrom and engage in a friendly wrestling contest. They left the house for this purpose in company with Rodriguez's wife and one Ortiz. On reaching the yard in front of the house they began wrestling with each other, with the result that on the third trial the defendant threw Rodriguez. At its conclusion the latter was desirous of continuing the contest and advanced toward defendant, evidently with this purpose in mind. The defendant retreated a few steps, avoiding Rodriguez, who continued to advance toward defendant. Whereupon, the defendant, when Rodriguez was about 15 feet from him, drew his pistol and fired, hitting the latter in the groin and inflicting a painful and serious injury upon Rodriguez. The defendant assisted in taking Rodriguez to the hospital, offered to pay the expense of his care, and expressed his regret over the affair. The sole defense of the accused was that he pointed his gun at the ground and fired to frighten Rodriguez, and that he had no intention of shooting him or injuring him in any manner.

Appellant submitted five instructions to the court, all of which were refused. The court also gave the following instruction at the request of the prosecution:

> "In considering the following definitions (of the several different kinds of assaults) you should remember that in every crime or public offense there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent, or criminal negligence."

Appellant now assigns as error the action of the court in refusing to give the five instructions proposed by him, and in giving the instruction above set forth, offered on behalf of the prosecution.

[1, 2] Proposed instruction No. 3, offered by the defendant and refused by the court, referred entirely to the crime of an assault to commit murder. The verdict of the jury, finding the defendant guilty of an assault with a deadly weapon, was an acquittal of him of the more serious crime of an intent to commit murder. The defendant, therefore, could not be injured by the refusal of the court to give proposed instruction No. 3, and if any error was committed by the court in refusing to give said proposed instruction, it was without prejudice to the defendant. People v. Wallace, 101 Cal. 281, 285, 35 Pac. 862. Moreover, the subject-matter of this instruction was, in our opinion, fully covered by the instructions given to the jury. Proposed instruction No. 4, refused by the court, was fully covered by instruction No. 11 as given by the court.

[3] Appellant's objection to the action of the court, in refusing to give proposed instructions numbered 1, 2, and 5, proposed by him, and his objection to the instruction above set forth, given by the court on behalf of the prosecution, is that the court's charge was calculated to mislead the jury into the belief that if the defendant was reckless in the use of his pistol for the purpose of intimidating Rodriguez, that he might be found guilty of the crime of an assault with a deadly weapon. Appellant's contention is that, before one accused of such a crime can be found guilty thereof, it must be established that he intended to inflict bodily injury upon the person assaulted, and that in the absence of such proof he must be acquitted of the charge, even if it be shown that he was guilty of criminal negligence in the use of a deadly weapon, and that the injury caused was the direct result of such criminal negligence on his part. He admits that, had the shot which took effect in Rodriguez' body caused the death of the latter, the defendant could be found guilty of manslaughter, but contends that unless death ensued he is not guilty of any crime as a result of the wound inflicted by him through his negligence.

The only authorities cited by appellant in support of this contention are the cases of People v. McMakin, 8 Cal. 547, and People v. Yslas, 27 Cal. 630. Neither of these cases sustained the position of appellant. On the other hand, the precise point was before the court in People v. Price, 9 Cal. App. 218–221, 98 Pac. 547, and decided adversely to appellant's contention. The defendant in this latter case was found guilty of an assault with a deadly weapon. The court refused to give the following instruction:

> "I further instruct you that in every crime or public offense there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent."

On appeal the appellate court sustained the judgment, and in doing so used the following language:

> "The above instruction may well have been refused for the reason that it states that 'in every crime there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent.' It leaves out the element of 'criminal negligence' which the statute contains. Pen. Code, § 20. The jury might well have inferred from the evidence in this case that even if defendant did not intend to shoot at Toomey or fire the shot that hit him, that it was criminal negligence to draw the pistol and fire it once in the ground to frighten Toomey, and then to hold it in his hand in such position that it might be discharged in the scuffle which ensued."

We think this is a correct exposition of the law upon this subject, and are therefore of the opinion that there was no error on the part of the court in the settlement of the instructions.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

EDW. L. SOULE CO. v. SEVERTSON.
(Civ. 2827.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 1, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑595—Parties may stipulate that their separate appeals shall be heard on a single transcript.

Parties may stipulate that their separate appeals may be heard on a single transcript; stipulation being in effect that transcript is sufficient for determination of both appeals.

2. Appeal and error 🔑595—Defendant and plaintiff both appealing, defendant held not to have right to use plaintiff's transcript without stipulation.

Defendant had not the right to use plaintiff's transcript on appeal, where both parties had taken separate appeals from different parts of same judgment; no stipulation having been made that their separate appeals might be heard on a single transcript, and plaintiff having paid entire cost of transcript.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Action by the Edw. L. Soule Company against S. Severtson. From an adverse judgment, both parties appeal. On motion to dismiss defendant's appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Thelen & Marrin, of San Francisco, and Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, for plaintiff.

Carter & Smith, of Redding, for defendant.

FINCH, P. J. This is a motion by respondent to dismiss the appeal herein, on the ground that appellant has not filed a transcript of the record within the time required. The facts hereinafter stated are admitted.

Plaintiff sued for the sum of $1,112.25. By cross-complaint the defendant demanded judgment against plaintiff in the sum of $1,200. "November 19, 1923, judgment was entered * * * in favor of defendant and against the plaintiff on the complaint, and in favor of plaintiff and against defendant on the cross-complaint." On the following day the "plaintiff filed with the clerk of said superior court a notice of appeal from the judgment on the complaint, and on the same date filed with said clerk a request that he prepare the papers on the appeal from said judgment on the complaint in the manner provided by sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure." The transcript on plaintiff's appeal, including the reporter's transcript of the proceedings at the trial, was filed in this court April 3, 1924. On January 7, 1924, the defendant filed notice of appeal from the judgment "on the cross-complaint," but has taken no steps to provide a record on his appeal; the only record on file herein being defendant's notice of appeal. Prior to the preparation of the record on plaintiff's appeal, its counsel offered to stipulate "that defendant might use the transcript which plaintiff had requested the clerk to prepare for his appeal provided defendant would pay one-half of the cost of preparing said transcript." The defendant declined to so stipulate, but now contends that, notwithstanding the fact that plaintiff has paid the entire cost of preparing such transcript, the defendant has the right to rely on and use the same on his own appeal. The only question presented on this motion is whether the defendant has the right to so use such transcript.

[1] The plaintiff and the defendant have taken separate appeals from different parts of the same judgment. A party desiring to appeal by the alternative method may, in lieu of preparing and settling a bill of exceptions, within 10 days after notice of entry of the judgment, file with the clerk "a notice stating that he desires or intends to appeal, or has appealed therefrom, and requesting that a transcript of the testimony offered or taken, evidence offered or received, and all rulings, instructions, acts, or statements of the court, also all objections or exceptions of counsel, and all matters to which the same relate, be made up and prepared." The clerk must thereupon require the stenographic reporter to transcribe the phonographic report of the trial. When such transcription is completed, after notice to respective counsel given by the clerk, it becomes the duty of the judge to certify to the truth and correctness of the transcript. "The respondents on said appeal may at the time said transcript is presented for settlement and allowance, require the insertion therein of such other papers, files, documents, records and proceedings of said cause as they then desire to have incorporated therein, and the said papers, files, documents, records and proceedings shall, when so incorporated, be deemed fully authentic for use on said appeal. The parties may by stipulation omit any matters from said record which they desire to so omit." Code Civ. Proc. § 953a. A transcript so prepared and certified may fully and fairly set forth every part of the record material to the determination of the issues raised by the appeal of one party, and, at the same time, be wholly insufficient to cover the issues presented on an appeal by the other party. One party may perfect his appeal and file his transcript in the appellate court before the other party gives notice of his appeal. If in such case the second appellant has the right to rely on and use the transcript filed in the other appeal, the first appellant, respondent in the second appeal, may find himself bound by a record prepared without the grounds of that appeal in view and inadequate to the proper determination thereof. The parties may stipulate that their separate appeals may be heard on a single transcript. In such case, the stipulation is, in effect, that the transcript is sufficient for the determination of both appeals. Whether or not the record in this particular case is sufficient is immaterial, because the question under consideration is one of statutory construction.

[2] In Fair v. Stevenot, 29 Cal. 486, it was held that where both parties appeal from different part of the same judgment, and they do not stipulate that either transcript may be added to the other, each appeal must be heard on its own transcript. To the same effect is the decision in Gates v. Walker, 35 Cal. 289. In Estate of Bell, 157 Cal. 528, 532, 108 Pac. 497, 498, it is said:

> "There is no rule or statute authorizing an appellant to dispense with the filing of a transcript by making reference to a transcript on file in another appeal. Nor do we find any case in which it has been held that the appeals of separate independent appellants should be embodied in a single transcript. * * * In such case the necessity for filing a second transcript might be obviated by a stipulation of all the parties."

It is clear that appellant's position is untenable.

The appeal is dismissed.

WHITING MEAD COMMERCIAL CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 4845.)

1. Master and servant ⚿417(7)—Award cannot be based on inferences unsupported by evidence.

Industrial Accident Commission cannot base award on inferences not supported by evidence.

2. Master and servant ⚿367—Motor truck owner hauling material held not "employee" within Compensation Act, but independent contractor.

Motor truck owner who did hauling for company and pursued his work as he saw fit, using his own means and judgment to accomplish result, receiving as compensation full hauling charge imposed by company on purchaser of material hauled, held not "employee" within Workmen's Compensation Act, but independent contractor.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employé.]

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Ernest A. Wells, claimant, opposed by the Whiting Mead Commercial Company, employer, and the State Compensation Insurance Fund, insurance carrier. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded compensation, and the employer and the insurance carrier bring certiorari. Award annulled.

F. J. Creede and T. W. Slaven, both of San Francisco, and J. L. Kearney, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Petition for a writ of certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission.

It appears therefrom that the State Compensation Insurance Fund, a state instrumentality, is the insurance carrier of the Whiting Mead Commercial Company. On June 18, 1923, one Ernest A. Wells sustained injuries by being pinned between an automobile truck and the side of a building, and he subsequently filed his application with the Industrial Accident Commission for the purpose of obtaining benefits under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279), and he averred that his injury arose out of and in the course of his employment with the company above mentioned. Thereafter his application came on for hearing before the Commission, which subsequently made an award in his favor and against the State Compensation Insurance Fund, as insurance carrier, for the sum of $558.69, and it ordered that the Whiting Mead Commercial Company, the alleged employer, be released from further liability. A petition for rehearing was prayed for and denied, whereupon this proceeding was instituted. The sole question presented by the controversy is whether or not the evidence is sufficient to show that Wells was an employee, and not an independent contractor.

The facts are without practical conflict. They show that the Whiting Mead Commercial Company was engaged in the business of wrecking buildings and selling building material. In the conduct of such business it owns and operates some 25 trucks for the purpose of delivering its goods to customers. The drivers of these trucks are in the regular employ of the company and are paid regular wages. Wells was at one time such an employee. Some time prior to January, 1922, he left his employment, and at or about the last-mentioned date he, with his brother, interviewed the shipping clerk of the company, who had charge of its delivery yard, and solicited employment. At this time Wells was out of work, and the brother volunteered to assist him in procuring a truck. Owing to pressure of business the company, in addition to using its own trucks, found it necessary to contract with various draying concerns to make delivery of its materials. This extra hauling was sufficient in volume to furnish several independent owners of trucks with work. This fact was made known by the shipping clerk to Wells and his brother, and it was suggested that Wells might make more money driving a truck owned by himself than he could make by working for wages. The Whiting Mead Company sold all of its materials f. o. b. the company's yards. Where the customers did not have the means of transporting their purchases, the company would make delivery for them and impose a charge for so doing. When the company used its own trucks for this purpose it retained any profit arising from the hauling; but the shipping clerk informed Wells that if he procured a truck, the full amount of the charge for any load which might be turned over to him for delivery would be paid to him without any deduction therefrom by the company. This plan was different from the one adopted by the company, when it had occasion to employ certain independent trucking firms. In such case the trucks with their drivers were rented by the hour.

The situation and suggestion appealed to Wells and his brother. Wells procured a truck and solicited work from the company. He paid all his own expenses, including gasoline, oil, and repairs; he received in payment for such hauling as was given him the full charge made by the company to its customers; he had no certain hours of employent and was not required to report to any one at any specified time; he was free to go and come as he pleased, as the company never gave him orders or directed him in his work or exercised any control over his operations or activities, excepting, according to the testimony of Wells, he was once told to hurry back. On some days he did not visit the yard at all. It was his custom, however, along with other independent truck owners, to be at the yard of the company about 7:30 o'clock each morning, so as to receive such business as might be assigned to him after the company had exhausted its own capacity in distributing loads to its own drivers. Under his prior employment with the company, Wells had been earning $4 a day in wages. Under the independent new arrangement he made from $60 to $75 a week. He was not on the pay roll of the company during the time that he owned and operated his own truck. The superintendent of the company hired and discharged all employees, and he never hired Wells. The evidence shows that the company had certain cardboard signs upon which its name was printed, and when deliveries were made by the company's trucks it was customary to tack such signs upon the loads for advertising purposes merely, and that Wells had himself procured one of these cards and tacked it to his own truck. It further appeared by the testimony of Wells himself that the company had on some occasions furnished him with a helper. This fact was denied by the company, whose officers testified that it was against the rules to furnish independent drivers with helpers.

Under these circumstances, on January 18, 1923, a year after Wells commenced hauling for the company under this arrangement, and while he was in the course of making a delivery, his truck, operated by a friend of his who frequently rode with him, and who had no connection whatever with the company, skidded and pinned Wells between a house and his machine, and he received the injuries of which he here complains.

It is the claim of petitioner that these facts do not justify the finding of the Commission that the applicant was an employee of the company, and that the injury arose out of and in the course of his employment. Respondents, on the other hand, in support of the award, claim that, while the facts present a border-line case, certain inferences may be drawn therefrom which go to establish the fact that the relation of employer and employee existed at the time of the accident, and that all doubt upon this subject should be resolved in favor of the action of the Commission.

[1, 2] There is no question that it is not within the power of courts to set aside findings of the Commission, based upon reasonable inferences drawn from facts proven with legal sufficiency; but, where there is no evidence upon which such inferences may be based, it is equally true that the Commission is without power to draw them and base an award thereon. Here there is nothing contained in the facts from which any inference can be drawn that Wells was an employee of the company. On the contrary, they negative any such inference, as they show affirmatively that he was exercising an independent calling, and, so far as the company was concerned, he was free to prosecute his work in any manner he saw fit, using his own means and judgment to accomplish the result. The case is thus brought clearly within the rulings in Flickinger v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 181 Cal. 425, 184 Pac. 851, 19 A. L. R. 1150, and Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 216 Pac. 578.

In the Flickinger Case it is held that where a person, operating a trucking business and having his own truck, is engaged to do certain hauling, and in the performance of such work loads his truck in his own way and at his own convenience, and who does not report before going to work and has no one controlling his actions at any time, he is an independent contractor and not an employee. To the same effect is Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm. In this case the rule is laid down that the controlling factor in the determination of the question as to whether a person is an employee or an independent contractor is found in the solution of the question as to who has the power of control, not as to the result of the work only, but as to the means and methods by which that result is accomplished. The same principle is also declared in Stephens v. Ind. Acc. Comm. (Cal. Sup.) 215 Pac. 1025. See, also, Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721; Barton v. Studebaker, 46 Cal. App. 707, 189 Pac. 1025.

We do not consider further citation of authority necessary. We are of the opinion that there is no evidence in the record from which any inference can be drawn which justifies the finding that Wells was an employee of the company.

For the reasons given, the award is annulled.

CAMPBELL et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

(Civ. 4716.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 20, 1924.)

Prohibition 🔑3(3)—Remedy by appeal from order appointing receiver held to preclude writ to prevent appointment.

Petitioners held not entitled to writ of prohibition to prevent appointment of receiver in absence of showing that an appeal from the order appointing the receiver, as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 963, did not afford a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy.

Application by Amy I. Campbell and husband for writ of prohibition against the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and Hon. W. C. Doran, as Judge thereof. Writ denied.

Douglas L. Edmonds, Collier & Laberere, and Louis F. Laberere, all of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

James F. McBryde and Eugene J. Wix, both of Glendale, for respondents.

WORKS, J. Petitioners are defendants in a certain action pending in respondent court, in which one Rose A. Parry is plaintiff. The action was commenced to compel the specific performance of an alleged contract whereby petitioners agreed to exchange certain of their real property for real property of Rose A. Parry. The action was tried by respondent court, findings and judgment were ordered for plaintiff, and her counsel were directed to prepare them. The signing of the findings and judgment was delayed for some months, and in the interim the plaintiff in the action served upon petitioners, as defendants therein, a notice of motion for the appointment of a receiver "to handle the properties affected by the * * * action during the pendency of said matter and the appeal that has been threatened; said receiver to do such things as may be necessary under such receivership." On the day for which the motion was noticed a hearing was had pursuant to the notice, and at its conclusion respondent court entered its minute order granting the motion. Thereafter and on the same day, the findings and judgment in the action were signed and the judgment was thereafter duly entered. Petitioner then presented to this court his petition for an alternative writ of prohibition restraining respondents from proceeding with the appointment of a receiver pursuant to the order made by respondent court, and an alternative writ was granted. The question now before us is whether a peremptory writ shall issue.

Upon demurrer to the petition respondents contend that this court cannot issue the writ for the reason that petitioners will have a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by appeal from any order made by respondent court appointing a receiver. The Supreme Court said in Jacobs v. Superior Court, 133 Cal. 364, 65 Pac. 826, 85 Am. St. Rep. 204:

> "Formerly—and when Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192, was decided—there was no appeal from an order appointing a receiver, but in 1897 (Stats. 1897, p. 55) section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended so as to allow such appeal, and at the same time section 943 was amended so as to provide for the staying of an order appointing a receiver by an undertaking on appeal. These amendments were apparently intended to afford a remedy for prodigal, unwise, and unwarranted appointments of receivers, which seems to be a growing evil; and we think that they do afford an adequate remedy, as contemplated by * * * section 1103 [of the Code of Civil Procedure] and the decisions of this court on the subject. The fact that a question of jurisdiction arises does not change the rule as to the adequacy of the remedy by appeal. See Agassiz v. Superior Court, 90 Cal. 101. The filing of the undertaking operates as a supersedeas, suspends all authority of the receiver under the order, withdraws from him the right to the control and possession of the property involved, and restores the same to the appealing party, from whom it had been taken."

The same rule is stated in California F. G. Ass'n v. Superior Court, 8 Cal. App. 711, 97 Pac. 769, and in Western U. & M. Co. v. Superior Court, 22 Cal. App. 413, 134 Pac.

732. It is said, however, in Jacobs v. Superior Court that there "might perhaps, be exceptional facts in a case which would call for a writ of prohibition notwithstanding an appeal from an order appointing a receiver, but the general rule is as above stated," and language to the same import occurs in Western U. & M. Co. v. Superior Court. Are the facts of the present case such as to make it an exceptional one and not subject to the general rule? We think not. If petitioner shall appeal from any order of respondent court appointing a receiver, that order will become innocuous upon the giving of an undertaking for the purpose of staying the operation of the order. The receiver cannot then enter upon the performance of his duties, and, especially, cannot take possession or control of the properties involved in the action, nor exercise dominion over them. This condition will continue until disposition is made of the appeal from the order, and that event will probably occur either before or at the same time with the determination of the appeal which will doubtless be taken from the judgment in the action, which latter event will finally settle the controversy between the parties. Although the record here contains copies of the pleadings and findings in the action and of various affidavits used upon the motion made in the trial court, petitioners point us to nothing indicating that the case should be treated as an exception to the general rule that prohibition will not lie to prevent the appointment of a receiver. They merely say that the question is for us "to decide from all the circumstances of the case." There is nothing in those circumstances impelling us to determine that the case is not within the operation of the general rule.

It is to be observed that the right to appeal from an order appointing a receiver, said in Jacobs v. Superior Court, supra, to have been conferred by section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure, is now provided for in section 963 of that Code.

The demurrer is sustained, the alternative writ of prohibition is vacated, and the application for a peremptory writ is denied.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 28, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑659(1)—Motion to certify would be granted where documents would be included in judgment roll and might be certified by clerk alone.

Motion to certify and have documents filed as part of clerk's transcript would be granted where documents called for were such as would be included in judgment roll and might be certified by clerk alone.

2. Appeal and error 🔑659(1)—Motion requiring clerk to show cause why he should not be ordered to make demanded certificates should be made below.

Motion for an order requiring clerk of superior court to show cause why he should not be ordered to certify certain documents would be denied, especially where clerk was willing to certify documents called for, since order, if proper to be made, should have been applied for to superior court.

3. Appeal and error 🔑659(1)—Motion to have documents made part of transcript on appeal denied.

Lease and motion to vacate, both made subsequent to judgment, could not be a part of record on appeal and could not be included in transcript, unless first certified by trial judge, and hence motion to have them made part of transcript would be denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by John Lapique against E. L. Kelley and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals and moves for an order directing that certain documents be supplied from record and made part of transcript. Granted in part, and denied in part.

John Lapique, of Orange, in pro. per.

Clyde Bishop and M. B. Wellington, both of Santa Ana, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. On motion of appellant, suggesting diminution of the record, and applying for an order directing that certain documents be supplied from the record and thereby be made part of the transcript on appeal.

[1] The documents called for are, first, the summons issued October 9, 1922, "the return of the sheriff of Kansas City, Mo.," the affidavit for publication of summons, and the order for publication of summons. As to these documents, assuming their genuineness and regularity, and that they have any relation to the judgment from which the appeal has been taken, they are such documents as would be included in the judgment roll, and may be certified by the clerk alone. Therefore, without at this time considering in any way the legal effect of said documents, the motion to have them certified and filed herein as part of the clerk's transcript is granted.

[2] Appellant also, on notice, accompanied by his affidavit claiming that the clerk of the superior court refuses to certify to said documents, moves for an order requiring the clerk to show cause why he should not be ordered to make the demanded certificates. The clerk, by counsel, assures the court that he is ready and willing to certify to said documents, now on file in his office. For that reason, and also because such order to the clerk, if appropriate to be made, should be made on application to the superior court, the motion for an order to show cause is denied. People v. Bartlett, 40 Cal. 142, 148.

[3] The second group of documents called for, as described in the motion, consists of "a certain so-called lease" (purporting to have been executed May 28, 1923), and a motion of plaintiff "to vacate and set aside said so-called lease," denied by the superior court on April 4, 1924. Manifestly, these cannot be a part of the record on appeal, since the appeal itself was taken on the 14th day of June, 1923, from a judgment entered on the 12th day of March, 1923. Moreover, said documents could not be included in the transcript unless first certified by the judge of the court in which the case was tried.

As to said so-called lease and said order of April 4, 1924, the motion is denied.

Supersedeas ⚿3—Denied in action to quiet title where plaintiff would not be deprived of possession under court process.

Writ of supersedeas would be denied in action to quiet title to real property, where plaintiff was in no danger of being deprived of possession under any process of court, as remedy against persons acting independently of the court is not by supersedeas.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by John Lapique against E. L. Kelley and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals and applies for a writ of supersedeas. Writ denied.

See, also, 228 Pac. 355.

John Lapique, of Orange, in pro. per.

Bishop & Wellington, of Santa Ana, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. On application for writ of supersedeas.

In this action to quiet title to certain real property, the court entered its decree against the plaintiff and at the same time granted relief on a cross-complaint and thereby quieted title to said premises in favor of cross-complainant, "The Re-Organized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints," a corporation. The plaintiff Lapique has appealed from the judgment and now applies for a writ of supersedeas to be directed to the respondents, and that certain of the respondents be required to surrender possession of the premises to the plaintiff and appellant. The petition shows by the facts alleged therein that, since the appeal was instituted, a certain "Farmers' Gun Club" has taken possession of the premises under a purported lease from one McGuire, which lease also was executed after this appeal was instituted. The decree in this action determined that said McGuire, sued personally, has no title or interest in said premises; but the court's findings state that he is the presiding bishop of said church.

Assuming that under a decree quieting title as provided in the terms of the decree in this case, the prevailing party might obtain possession through a writ of assistance or other process of the court, and further assuming that supersedeas, directed to the trial court, would be a proper remedy to prevent that court from issuing any such process and from thereby taking possession of the property from the appellant during the time while the appeal is pending, nevertheless it is clear upon the showing made by appellant himself in his petition that he stands in no danger of being deprived of possession through the issuance of any process of the court in aid of the respondents or either of them.

Archer v. Miller (Cal. Sup.) 218 Pac. 410, much relied upon by petitioner, has no application to the situation presented in this case. In Archer v. Miller the court merely held that, for stated reasons, the clerk of the court below, as commissioner of the court to execute a deed under the terms of the decree, should not be permitted to execute and deliver such deed during the pendency of the appeal. On that ground the writ of supersedeas was granted. But in this present instance it is not threatened, nor do the circumstances indicate, that any attempt will be made to have anything done pursuant to the terms and provisions of the decree during the time of pendency of the appeal. If, as he complains in his petition, appellant has been deprived of possession of the premises described in this action by acts of parties proceeding independently of the court and without the aid of any process of the court, and if such acts constitute any wrong to appellant, his remedy may not be obtained through a writ of supersedeas in this action.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 13, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 11, 1924.)

1. Criminal law 🔑108(1)—Convict removed from state prison to work on roads held to be under jurisdiction of state prison and prison guards.

Where a convict was taken from a state prison into another county to work on roads under prison guards, he was still under the jurisdiction of the state prison and prison guards as respected jurisdiction of prosecution for an escape.

2. Criminal law 🔑400(3)—Testimony that guards were acting as prison guards held sufficient.

In prosecution for escaping from state prison, testimony that guards from whom defendant escaped were acting as prison guards was sufficient without their authority or appointment being shown by written order.

3. Criminal law 🔑223—Accused held tried for offense for which held by committing magistrate.

Where committing magistrate held accused for trial for offense named in depositions, which showed an escape while at work outside of the prison under surveillance of prison guards, for which offense he was tried, he was tried for the same offense for which he was held to answer.

4. Criminal law 🔑108(1)—Court of county where escaped convict was captured held to have jurisdiction.

Where a convict confined in a state prison, while at work in another county under prison guards, escaped, and was captured in a third county, the superior court of that county had jurisdiction over prosecution for the escape.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Gust Johnson was convicted of escaping from the state prison, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Neil R. McAllister, of Sacramento, and Gust Johnson, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant and appellant in this case, while a prisoner, lawfully confined within the state prison at Folsom in the state of California, and serving a term therein upon conviction previously had and judgment pronounced, was taken from said prison to the county of Sierra to one of the construction camps there being maintained, and placed at work on road construction being carried on in said county of Sierra, and, while there escaped from the surveillance of the prison guards; was thereafter apprehended and brought to trial in the county of Sacramento, state of California. Judgment of conviction was had. A motion for a new trial was made by the defendant. This motion being denied, the defendant appeals therefrom and also from the judgment of conviction just referred to. A very lengthy brief was filed in this matter covering a number of minor points, but the main objection urged on this appeal is that the superior court of the county of Sacramento had no jurisdiction to try the defendant for the offense set forth in the information.

[1-4] The briefs submitted in this case present almost the identical questions considered by this court in the case of People of the State of California v. Vanderburg (Cal. Sup.) 227 Pac. 621. The question of jurisdiction was also considered by this court in the cases of People of the State of California v. French, 61 Cal. App. 275, 214 Pac. 1003; and People of the State of California v. Lewis, 61 Cal. App. 280, 214 Pac. 1005. These cases decide adversely to the contention of the appellant practically all the points that are made for reversal herein. The testimony set forth shows that the defendant was being confined at Folsom under a conviction of burglary; that he was taken from Folsom to the road camp above mentioned herein, was placed in charge of guards, and while at work upon the highway, under the charge of prison guards, escaped therefrom. In these respects the facts are almost identical with that of the Vanderburg Case, supra, and the ruling in that case as to the defendant still being under the jurisdiction of the Folsom state prison and prison guards is applicable here.

The point is made that the authority of the guards or their appointment was not shown by any written order. The testimony shows that they were acting as prison guards, which we think sufficient. The point is also made that the defendant was not tried for the offense for which he was held to answer by the committing magistrate. It appears from the record, however, that the magistrate held the defendant for trial for the offense named in the depositions. The depositions showed the offense for which the defendant was tried, to wit, an escape while at work outside of the Folsom prison to which the defendant had been committed, while under the surveillance of prison guards, in the county of Sierra. The cases heretofore cited hold that the superior court of the county of Sacramento has jurisdiction of such offenses.

There being nothing in the record justifying a reversal herein, it is hereby ordered that the judgment of the trial court and order denying a new trial herein be and the same are hereby affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GRAY. (Cr. 1081.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 29, 1924.)

1. Intoxicating liquors 🔑236(13)—Evidence held sufficient to show liquor sold was fit for beverage purposes and was intoxicating.

In a prosecution for violation of the Wright Act, evidence held sufficient to show that liquor sold was fit for beverage purposes and that it was intoxicating.

2. Criminal law 🔑304(20)—Court takes judicial notice that whisky is alcoholic, intoxicating, and usable as a beverage.

Court takes judicial notice that whisky is an alcoholic liquor, intoxicating, and may be used as a beverage.

3. Criminal law 🔑1036(1)—When admission in evidence of liquor not objected to, it cannot be complained of.

In a prosecution for sale of intoxicating liquors, where accused did not object to the introduction in evidence of a bottle and its contents purchased from him, he cannot complain of its admission on appeal.

4. Intoxicating liquors 🔑236(11)—Evidence held sufficient to support conviction for sale.

In a prosecution for the sale of intoxicating liquors, evidence held sufficient to support a conviction.

5. Criminal law 🔑1177—Accused cannot question judgment for error in his favor.

Where one found guilty of a second violation of the Wright Act was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment but no fine was imposed as required by the National Prohibition Act, he cannot attack the judgment for failure to impose a fine, since the error was in his favor.

Robert Gray was convicted of violating the Wright Act, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Stanley Visel, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and J. L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CURTIS, J. The defendant was charged by information with a violation of the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), so called, and a prior conviction thereof. He was found guilty as charged in the information and sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail for the period of nine months. On appeal to this court he attacks the judgment upon two grounds: First, that the evidence was not sufficient to support the verdict; second, that the court exceeded its authority in imposing upon him the sentence of nine months' imprisonment in the county jail.

[1-4] In contending that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict, the appellant specifies three particulars in which he claims that the evidence is lacking. They are that the liquor which the evidence shows was sold by the defendant was not shown to have been fit for beverage purposes, nor was it shown to have been intoxicating, and that, to use the expression employed by appellant's counsel in his brief, "the integrity of the evidence is not good." The evidence introduced on behalf of the prosecution was to the effect that one McMillan bought from the defendant two pint bottles of whisky, paying him for the same the sum of $5. McMillan, the evidence shows, went to the defendant's car and asked the defendant for whisky, and upon this request being made to him the defendant produced the two pint bottles and delivered them to McMillan. One of these bottles of liquor was consumed shortly after its purchase, and McMillan, after tasting the contents of the second bottle, turned it over to the district attorney's office of Los Angeles county on the following day. McMillan testified that the bottle, the contents of which he tasted, contained whisky. A Mr. Langdon, another witness, testified regarding the purchase of the liquor substantially as did the witness McMillan. He further testified that he tasted the contents of each of the two bottles of liquor sold by the defendant and that the contents of each bottle was whisky. This evidence completely answers the two objections made by the appellant to the effect that the evidence failed to show that the liquor sold was fit for beverage purposes and that it failed to show that the liquor was intoxicating. In People v. Mueller, 168 Cal. 526–528, 143 Pac. 750, it was held that the court takes judicial notice that wine is an alcoholic liquor, that it is intoxicating and may be used as a beverage. The same rule would apply when the issue before the court is as to whether or not a particular liquor is whisky. Black on Intoxicating Liquors, § 5; 17 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 198. See, also, People v. Allen, 37 Cal. App. 180, 174 Pac. 374; People v. Ellena, 56 Cal. App. 428, 205 Pac. 701. Upon the trial a bottle of liquor was introduced in evidence by the prosecution, after it had been shown that this bottle, with its contents, was the same bottle of liquor purchased by McMillan from the defendant and by him delivered to the district attorney's office. Appellant criticizes the custom employed in the district attorney's office in storing and keeping liquors purchased of alleged offenders against the Wright Act and kept for the purpose of being used in evidence in prosecutions under said act. As the defendant made no objection to the introduction in evidence of the bottle and its contents, he cannot now complain of its admission against him. Had it been admitted over his objection, the action of the court would not have been error for the reason that appellant's criticism goes, not to the legality, but only to the weight, of such evidence. Under these circumstances, we are not disposed to question the integrity of the evidence upon which defendant was convicted. In our opinion, it was sufficient to support the judgment.

[5] Under the provisions of the National Prohibition Act (the Volstead Act [U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138¼ et seq.]), as made applicable to the state of California by the Wright Act, any person who sells liquor contrary to the provisions of the statute, for the first offense, is punishable by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding six months; and for a second or subsequent offense, by a fine of not less than $200 nor more than $2,000, and by imprisonment for not less than one month nor more than five years. Defendant was found guilty of a second offense under this statute, and the court sentenced him to nine months' imprisonment in the county jail, but failed to impose upon him any fine whatever. It is conceded by the Attorney General, as well as by appellant that in order to meet the requirements of this statute, a valid judgment against a defendant found guilty of a second offense thereunder should provide for a fine of not less than $200, in addition to the sentence of imprisonment. Defendant now asks that the judgment in this case, for its failure to impose a fine against him of at least $200, be either reversed or the cause returned to the trial court for the entry of a proper judgment. This error in the judgment being one in favor of appellant, he cannot question the judgment. In re Reed, 143 Cal. 634–5, 77 Pac. 660, 101 Am. St. Rep. 138; People v. Oliver, 7 Cal. App. 601, 602, 95 Pac. 172. In the case of People v. Oliver, supra, the defendant was adjudged guilty of the crime of grand larceny after a prior conviction of burglary. The offense was punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than ten years. He was sentenced to serve a term of seven years. On appeal the court affirmed the judgment and held that the judgment was not void and should not be returned to the trial court to be corrected to the detriment of the defendant.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for new trial are affirmed.

BLANCHARD v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 4922.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 2, 1924.)

1. Master and servant 🔑398—Payment of compensation extends running of limitations.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11 (c), voluntary payment of compensation to injured employee, by employer's insurer extended the running of the statute as to such employer.

2. Master and servant 🔑373—Compensation for occupational disease apportioned among several employers, under statutory definition of "injury."

Under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 3, subd. 4, as amended by St. 1919, p. 911, defining "injury," where a glass-blower slowly contracted "glass-blowers' arm" during employment under three different employers, the Industrial Commission properly apportioned the award among the respective employers, based on periods of employment.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Injury.]

3. Master and servant 🔑398—Payment of compensation for occupational disease by one employer held not to estop others from pleading limitations.

Where an employee slowly contracted an occupational disease during employment under three employers, and allowed period specified in Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11 (b), subd. 1, limiting commencement of compensation proceedings, to run before applying for compensation, payment of compensation by one employer without collusion with the others did not estop the others from claiming benefit of the statute.

Certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Joseph Blanchard, claimant, opposed by the Pacific Coast Glass Company and others, employers, and the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation and others, insurers. From an order of the Industrial Accident Commission, apportioning an award among the employers, plaintiff brings certiorari. Affirmed.

Heidelberg & Murasky, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

R. P. Wisecarver and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for respondent Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation.

NOURSE, J. This is an original application in certiorari to review the award of the respondent Industrial Accident Commission made under the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917. Stats. 1917, p. 831. The petitioner is a glass-blower by trade. He worked at his calling under 3 different employers as follows: For about 12 years with the Illinois-Pacific Glass Company, then for 6 months with the Pacific Coast Glass Company, and then for 6 months with the Southern Glass Company. While working under these employers he contracted what is known as "glass-blowers' arm." He was re-employed by the Pacific Coast Glass Company for about two weeks, during which period he was engaged in packing and lifting boxes. At the end of this period, about October 12, 1922, he was transferred to the glass-blowing department, where he worked for about 40 minutes and was then forced to discontinue his employment on account of the trouble with his arm. It appears that some 3 or 4 years before this date his right arm was affected with the disease and he was then compelled to discontinue the use of that arm. He then shifted his work to the left arm and was able to continue in his trade without medical treatment, though with diminished efficiency. Within a short time thereafter the left arm began to trouble him and then for the first time he reported his condition to his employer and was informed that he was suffering from the disease mentioned. He continued, however, in his employment until October 12, 1922, when, while in the employ of the Pacific Coast Glass Company, as above stated, he was forced to discontinue his work.

[1, 2] Application for compensation was first made on May 24, 1923, more than 6 months after he had thus quit work. However, the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, the insurance carrier of the last-named employer, paid some compensation to the petitioner during this period and thereby, under the terms of section 11 (c) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, the running of the statute of limitations was extended as to that employer. Upon the hearing of his application for compensation the Commission awarded the petitioner $1,249.80, being 15 per cent. of the total disability and prorated the amount awarded among the 3 employers above named. On this basis the amount of the award against the Pacific Coast Glass Company (three-eighths of the total) was $468.70, and no objection is made by that company or its carrier to the payment of that amount. The Commission then found that the remaining five-eighths of the total award, which was charged to the other two employers, was barred by the statute of limitations and the petitioner is therefore unable to collect the same. The purpose of this petition is, therefore, to seek the annulment of that portion of the Commission's award which prorates the compensation between the three employers and holds the two previous employers freed by reason of the statute of limitations.

Subdivision 4 of section 3 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, as amended (Stats. 1919, p. 911), defines "injury" for which compensation may be awarded under the act as follows:

> "The term 'injury,' as used in this act, shall include any injury or disease arising out of the employment, including injuries to artificial members. In case of aggravation of any disease existing prior to such injury, compensation shall be allowed only for such proportion of the disability due to the aggravation of such prior disease as may reasonably be attributed to the injury."

Under this section it was plainly the duty of the Commission to apportion the award of compensation among the respective employers, and in doing so the Commission was required to exercise a discretion based upon the evidence of the various periods of employment, which is not attacked in this proceeding. The petitioner contends that no apportionment should have been made, but that the Commission should have charged the entire award to the last employer. In support of this contention he cites In re Johnson, 217 Mass. 388, 104 N. E. 735, where the court held that, where an employee is compelled to discontinue his trade because of an occupational disease, the injury should be deemed to have occurred at the time of cessation from labor. The respondent urges that, under our statute, it is made the duty of the Commission to apportion the award among the various employers, and it is not the function of the court to declare, as the Legislature might have done, that in a case of occupational diseases running over a long period of employment, the last employer should be liable for the total disability. The rule of the Johnson Case was indirectly criticized in Miller v. American Steel, etc., Co., 90 Conn. 349, 361, 97 Atl. 345, 348 (L. R. A. 1916E, 510) where the court says:

> "It is notorious that the typical occupational disease is not an injury which can be said to have been 'sustained' at a given date. If, for the purpose of escaping this difficulty, it is attempted to substitute the date of the incapacity for the date of the injury, it will be necessary to repeal and reconstruct a considerable portion of the act."

On this branch of the case we therefore conclude that the respondent Commission acted in accordance with the statute when it apportioned the amount of the award among the three employers.

[3] As to the statute of limitations, the act is equally clear. Section 11 (b), subd. 1, provides that proceedings for the collection of benefits of this nature must be commenced within 6 months from the date of the injury. It is not disputed that the petitioner failed to commence any proceedings against the Illinois-Pacific Glass Company or the Southern Glass Company until long after this period had expired. It is admitted that while in the employ of one of these two companies he had knowledge of the disease which eventually incapacitated him, but that no application for benefits was made as against such employer. It is argued that, by reason of the payment of compensation by the Pacific Coast Glass Company, the last employer, the petitioner was lulled into a sense of security as to his two former employers, and that we should hold that they are therefore estopped from claiming the benefits of the statute. There is, however, no showing that the last employer was acting in collusion with either of the two former employers or that either of these employers had any knowledge of either the fact that the petitioner was suffering from this occupational disease or that he was being paid compensation by the Pacific Coast Glass Company. For these reasons we conclude that the Commission correctly held that the petitioner was precluded by the statute of limitations from enforcing his claim for compensation against his two former employers.

PEOPLE v. REED. (Cr. 1091.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 28, 1924.)

1. Criminal law 🔑517(4)—Evidence held to sufficiently establish corpus delicti for purpose of admitting confession.

Evidence, that on alleged night of burglary certain goods were taken from certain store without knowledge or consent of owners, and that entrance was obtained by breaking through door and unlocking inside fastening, held to sufficiently establish corpus delicti so as to warrant admission of confession.

2. Criminal law 🔑531(1)—Prosecution has burden of proving confession before officers was voluntary, before introducing it.

Before introducing defendant's confession, made to the district attorney in the presence of several officers, the prosecution must prove it was voluntarily made without inducement on officers' part.

3. Criminal law 🔑532(1)—Court must hear evidence as to involuntary character of confession before admitting it when question raised.

When question whether accused's confession was voluntary is raised, the court is bound to hear evidence on the subject, before allowing proof of the confession, and admit confession only if it finds it voluntary.

4. Criminal law 🔑522(1)—Confession within few days after threats, not admissible, unless they have ceased to operate as an influence.

Confessions within a few days after threats and inducements are made to prisoner are inadmissible, unless it clearly appears that the threats and inducements had ceased to operate on his mind, to bring about his statement.

5. Criminal law 🔑532(1)—Admission of evidence of confession without granting defendant's request to first show circumstances indicating involuntary character held error.

Admission of testimony of officer as to conversation with defendant containing some incriminatory matter, more fully covered in formal statement introduced as confession later, without granting defendant's request to first show circumstances, including offer of immunity and reward, held error.

6. Criminal law 🔑531(3)—Burden on state to show confession voluntary held not sustained.

Burden on state to show that confession was voluntary before introducing it in evidence held not sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

M. S. Reed was convicted of burglary, and he appeals from the judgment and order denying a new trial. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

J. C. C. Russell, of Hanford, and Rowen Irwin, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., and William R. McKay, Dist. Atty., of Hanford, for the People.

CONREY, P. J. Pursuant to an indictment charging that the defendant, on December 7, 1923, in the county of Kings, committed the crime of burglary, defendant was tried and convicted. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] An important part of the evidence without which we cannot say that probably the defendant would have been convicted, consisted of a statement made by him while in the custody of the sheriff. The statement was made to the district attorney in the presence of several officers and other persons, and amounted to a confession of guilt. The defendant objected to this evidence upon the ground that the corpus delicti had not been proved, and on the further ground that any statement made by the defendant was made following a promise of immunity from prosecution, which promise was made by the district attorney to the defendant.

Evidence had been introduced tending to show that on the night of the alleged burglary certain goods had been taken from the store of the J. S. Williams Company, in the city of Hanford, without the knowledge or the consent of the owners, and that the person or persons who took away said goods had obtained entrance to the store by breaking through the door and unlocking the inside fastening thereof. We think this was sufficient to establish the corpus delicti.

[3, 4] Before introducing in evidence such a confession of a defendant, the burden is upon the prosecution to show that the confession was made voluntarily and without inducement on the part of the officer. People v. Castro, 125 Cal. 521, 526, 58 Pac. 133. "It is the duty of the judge of the trial court, when the question is raised whether or not a confession of the defendant was voluntarily made, to hear evidence on the subject, before allowing proof of such confession; and to admit the proof only in the event that he finds it to have been voluntary." People v. Fowler, 178 Cal. 657, 662, 174 Pac. 892, 893. "It is also true that if threats and inducements are made to a prisoner, and within a few days thereafter he makes a confession, such acknowledgment of the commission of the crime may not be introduced in evidence unless it clearly appears that the threats and inducements had ceased to operate upon his mind to bring about his statement of his own guilt." People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 6, at page 14, 112 Pac. 720, 723.

[5] It is admitted that the district attorney, within three hours before the confession was made, promised the defendant immunity from prosecution "if he would come through and tell everything." The first promise was made by the district attorney through one W. B. Dalby, a constable. The second was made a few minutes later by the district attorney personally. Dalby was present at the third conversation, wherein the confession was obtained. Being asked what was said at that time, he replied:

> "Well, Mr. McKay asked him in regard to his making a statement, if what he made was free and voluntary. I don't know; he went through the usual performance. I can't repeat the questions."

Near the close of Dalby's testimony, counsel for the defendant said:

> "If the court please, I don't care whether I make it now or later, but I would like to introduce some evidence in addition to that by this witness."
> The Court: "I am going to let the district attorney make his case first. He has a right to introduce a little evidence on that line before you introduce any more."

At that time the defendant had not introduced any evidence on that subject aside from cross-examination. A little later and following his objection to a question calling for a statement by Dalby of the substance of a conversation wherein the defendant stated the manner in which he had secured the goods, counsel for defendant further said:

> "Before any confession is gone into, we would like to introduce evidence to show what had been said, and the immunity and reward that had been offered to him at that time."

The court responded: "Proceed with your statement." Whereupon the witness answered the question. This answer contained some of the incriminatory matter of confession which was more fully contained in the formal statement afterwards introduced. It was error to admit such evidence without granting defendant's request to first introduce his evidence of the circumstances under which the confession was made. People v. Columbus, 49 Cal. App. 761, 194 Pac. 288.

[6] The formal statement itself was taken down in shorthand by Mrs. Schubart, a deputy sheriff, and was afterwards transcribed and signed by her. There is no evidence that this statement was ever read over to or signed by the defendant, but we do not understand that objection has been made to it on that ground. At the close of the testimony of Mrs. Schubart, the district attorney offered in evidence the said statement as written out by Mrs. Schubart. The defendant renewed his objection before made. The objection was overruled, and the statement then was read in evidence.

Following the reading of the statement in evidence, the sheriff, W. J. Hime, testified that he was present when said statement was made, and that the statement was given freely and voluntarily. He admitted, however, that he was not present at the beginning of the making of the statement and therefore did not hear any of the conversation until some half dozen of the questions contained in the statement had been answered. The testimony of the district attorney, wherein he claimed that he had retracted his promise, was all introduced after the confession had been read in evidence, and after the testimony of Mr. Hime.

After the people had presented their case the defendant introduced the testimony of Mrs. Reed, wife of the defendant. She stated, among other things, that she was present at the time when the alleged statement was given by her husband, and that the district attorney did not make any statement at that time that he had retracted his promise of immunity. In this connection it should be noted that Mr. Dalby, who was present at that same time and place, testified that he did not hear the district attorney say that he had retracted his promise of immunity. The district attorney himself in his testimony, while he claimed that he had retracted his earlier promise to the defendant, declined to say that he had in direct terms stated that he retracted what he had said. He testified that he had done so in substance. He also said, "Everything I said was taken down by the reporter." But when we turn to the statement as taken down by the reporter, we find in it no statement wherein any reference is made to the previous conversation in which the promise had been given. There are merely the formal questions and answers, to which Mr. Dalby referred in his statement that the district attorney "went through the usual performance."

We deem it unnecessary to discuss the other points relied upon by appellant. In large part, they have some relation to the admission in evidence of the alleged confession. The error committed, in allowing the introduction of that evidence, is so far prejudicial to the rights of the defendant that he is entitled to a new trial.

The judgment and order are reversed.

WARD v. MASSACHUSETTS BONDING & INS. CO. (Civ. 2718.)

1. Attachment 🔑333—Sureties liable when attached property released though no record made.

Sureties on a bond for redelivery to defendants of attached property, were liable where sheriff upon approval of the bond returned attached property to attachment defendants though he never made a record thereof as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 560.

2. Estoppel 🔑22(3)—Recitals in redelivery bond operate as estoppels.

Recitals in bond for delivery to defendant of attached property operate as estoppels against attachment defendant and his sureties.

3. Evidence 🔑571(7)—Expert testimony held sufficient to establish value of ore destroyed by attachment defendants.

Where ore which had been attached was released to attachment defendants and completely destroyed by them by milling testimony of expert who knew character of ore in general way and who had mined and milled ore from same mine and chute was sufficient to establish its value in action on bond, especially where neither of attachment defendants offered any evidence as to value.

4. Attachment 🔑351—Measure of damages in action on redelivery bond stated.

In an action on redelivery bond, plaintiff can but recover amount of his judgment unless property attached is of less value than amount thereof in which case his recovery is limited by value of property released.

5. Trial 🔑255(14)—Court's failure to state amount of judgment and date thereof in action against surety on redelivery bond held not erroneous.

In an action on redelivery bond, court's failure to state amount of judgment and date and permit jury to compute amount due thereon at time of trial was not erroneous, where defendant offered no instructions, and it was not suggested that amount then due at time of trial was erroneously stated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mariposa County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by Chas. A. Ward against Massachusetts Bonding & Insurance Company, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 57 Cal. App. 623, 208 Pac. 188.

John A. Wall, of Mariposa, for appellant.

F. W. Henderson, of Merced, for respondent.

WEYAND, Justice pro tem. This is an action to recover from the Massachusetts Bonding & Insurance Company, on account of an undertaking executed by said bonding company, for the redelivery to defendants of certain attached property.

The plaintiff above named brought an attachment suit in the superior court of Mariposa county and attached certain real and personal property, claimed to belong to M. C. McIntyre and J. C. Yancey, the defendants in said attachment suit. The property attached was a certain mine known as the "Early Mine," an ore bin and a lot of gold-bearing ore in the ore bin.

Immediately after the attachment, and before a return of the writ of attachment, McIntyre and Yancey gave an undertaking to the sheriff of Mariposa county, for the release of said property from the attachment. This bond was accepted by the sheriff, aforesaid, and the sheriff delivered the ore to the defendants in the attachment suit. The Early Mine was never released of record.

[1, 2] Appellant herein contends that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, and this contention is based upon two separate claims. It is first asserted that as there was no proof of a release of the Early Mine and the ore bin, there can be no recovery. The evidence adduced at the trial herein clearly showed that McIntyre and Yancey had been operating the said Early Mine under some form of bond or working agreement, but that their rights under this bond had expired on November 17, 1915. The attachment herein was levied on or about March 11, 1916, some four months after their rights in this mine had expired. Between the date of the expiration of their working bond or agreement on this mine, and the attachment by the sheriff of Mariposa county, McIntyre and Yancey had been maintaining possession of the Early Mine by force and "under guns," as some witnesses expressed it. After the giving of the undertaking by the bonding company, it is true, the sheriff never made a record of the release of the attachment, as is required by section 560 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The undertaking given for the release of the property recites that it is given "in consideration of the release from said attachment of the property attached." The evidence clearly shows that upon the approval of this undertaking the sheriff did return the ore in the ore bin, and discharged the keeper of the property, and it further appears that McIntyre and Yancey took possession of and milled the ore. The sole and only property held by the sheriff, that was of value to the defendants in the attachment suit, was returned to them. The recital in this undertaking is to the effect that the release has been made. It is not recited that a release is to be made in the future. The usual doctrine applicable to bonds of this nature is that all recitals operate as estoppels against the attachment defendant and his sureties. See 3 Cal. Jur. p. 530.

In Gardner v. Donnelly, 86 Cal. 367, 24 Pac. 1072, it was disclosed that an application had been made to the court for release of attached property, and the order for release was made. It was there held, in a case involving a like bond for release, that it was not a matter of answer or defense to show that the property was not released. In the instant case the proceedings were not of that nature; no formal application made to the court for the release, but the sheriff received and approved the undertaking for release, and did actually release to the attachment defendants all property of value held by him. Possession of the mining property, the ore bin, and the ore was turned over to McIntyre and Yancey. The Early Mine, under the evidence given, had, and could have had, no value whatsoever to the defendants in that suit. Aside from the suggestion that the surety is bound by the recital in his undertaking, the law should not require the performance of an idle act.

Upon the question as to the value of the ore, it was shown by testimony that, after the release of the attachment, McIntyre and Yancey milled the ore and extracted the gold therefrom. This was done between the time of the release from attachment and the rendition of the judgment in the attachment suit. The proceeds were taken by McIntyre and Yancey and no accounting was ever made to the plaintiff in that suit, or to the sheriff. Nothing was paid to the plaintiff from the proceeds of that ore.

[3] The actual ore having been completely destroyed by the attachment defendants, and no method being present to definitely determine its value, resort was had to the testimony of an expert, who knew the character of the ore in a general way, and who had mined and milled ore, from the same mine, and from the same chute in that mine. It is proper to recount that neither the defendant in the present suit, nor McIntyre and Yancey, defendants in the attachment suit, offered any evidence as to the value of this ore. The proof offered was sufficient to establish the value, as the same was determined by the jury trying the case. In Montana Min. Co. v. St. Louis Min. & Mill. Co., 183 Fed. 70, 105 C. C. A. 343, under a like situation, the federal court said:

> "The ore sued for had been taken and carried away by the Montana Company. The St. Louis Company was therefore unable to prove the value of the specific ore taken, but it was allowed to show the value of similar ores taken from the same vein near by."

Speaking of like testimony, the Supreme Court of California, in Antoine v. Ridge Co., 23 Cal. 219, 221, said:

> "If this resulted in causing the jury to return too large a verdict of damages, the defendants are themselves principally to blame; for they had the means in their own power of showing the correct amount of gold taken out by them."

It is quite true that these last-quoted cases were between parties directly involved, but the same principle must apply where one party is standing as surety for one who received the proceeds of released property. Under the circumstances the evidence as to value, offered by the plaintiff, was the best that could be offered, and was sufficient to sustain the finding of the jury.

Appellant complains of the following instruction, given by the trial court:

> "If you find that the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendant in this action, I instruct you that plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendant the full value of the ore levied on in the case of Ward v. McIntyre and Yancey, not exceeding the sum of $1,857.50, the amount of the judgment in said action with interest and costs of suit therein, if you shall find that the value of said property was in excess of said sum. If you shall find that the value of said property was less than the sum of $1,857.50, the amount of said judgment with interest and costs, I instruct you that plaintiff is entitled to a verdict not exceeding the value of said ore levied on in said action."

The evidence disclosed that there were 180 tons of ore attached, and that like ore, from the same mine, and same chute, had yielded from $17 to $18.45 per ton. Against this there was properly deductible a milling charge of $3 per ton. Thus it will appear there was a total net value of $2,500 or upwards in the released property.

[4] Under authority of Mullally v. Townsend, 119 Cal. 47, 50 Pac. 1066, the above instruction states the true rule of law applicable. The plaintiff herein could but recover the amount of his judgment, unless the property was of less value than the amount of his judgment, in which case his recovery was limited by the value of the property released.

[5] Appellant seems to further contend that the court should have stated the amount of the judgment, and the date thereof, and left the jury to compute the amount due thereon at the time of trial. Again it must be borne in mind that counsel for defendant did not offer any instructions, nor was there any suggestion that the amount then due, at the time of trial, was erroneously stated. There is no merit in this contention.

Other alleged errors are claimed, but we see no necessity of considering them separately; suffice it to say they have no merit.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

COATS v. STEPHENS. (Civ. 2736.)

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑331(6)—Evidence held to sustain finding that tenant did not breach farm lease with respect to planting crops.

In action against tenant for breach of farm lease, evidence held to sustain finding that so far as rice was not raised in certain year it was because of topography of land making it impossible to conduct water thereto; that such defect was discovered too late to plant any other crop thereon during that year; that so far as land was not cultivated in following year it was because of farming practice of letting land lie fallow after planting of rice in previous seasons; and that allegations as to planting inferior quality of rice were not sustained.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑324—Tenant held not liable in absence of negligence for result of mutual mistake in supposing land suitable for rice culture.

Under lease providing for raising of rice or other suitable crops on farm, which parties believed could be successfully irrigated, if tenant acted upon such belief and proceeded in good faith to prepare all land for rice, some of which could not be used for that purpose because of impossibility of irrigating, he could not be held in damages for result of such mistake, unless he was negligent in ascertaining true facts.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑331(6)—Evidence held to show lease did not contemplate tenant should procure water from wells for irrigation of rice.

Under a lease providing for the raising of rice or other suitable crops on a farm, evidence held to show that at the time of execution thereof it was not contemplated that tenant should go to unusual expense of procuring water from wells for irrigation of the rice.

4. Landlord and tenant 🔑331(6)—In action against tenant for letting part of land lie fallow, certain evidence concerning financial results held immaterial.

In an action on farm lease for tenant's failure to farm as required thereby, objection to question whether tenant made more money the way he handled land by letting part lie fallow than by putting in grain crop should have been sustained; it being immaterial whether tenant received more from one crop above expense of production than he would have received from two.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1052(8)—Admission of immaterial evidence of certain fact held harmless, in view of findings as to other facts.

Admission of immaterial evidence of certain fact on behalf of successful part was harmless, where other facts found by trial court on sufficient evidence required judgment in his favor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by A. S. Coats against J. H. Stephens. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. McLaughlin and C. P. McLaughlin, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

Downey, Downey & Seymour, of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was given judgment for costs, and the plaintiff appeals. The plaintiff leased 150 acres of land to defendant for a term of three years, commencing on the 1st day of December, 1918. The lease provided:

"The party of the second part shall dig and construct such irrigating ditches on said premises as may be necessary properly to irrigate the crops to be grown by him on said premises. The party of the second part hereby covenants and agrees to and with the party of the first part that he will occupy, till, and in all respects cultivate the premises above mentioned during the term aforesaid in a farmerlike manner and according to the usual course of farming practiced in the neighborhood, and that he will plant and devote to the raising of rice or other suitable crops all of said leased premises. It is understood and agreed in this connection that, if at any time during the term of this lease there shall be a shortage of water so that said party of the second part shall be unable to secure water sufficient for the growing of rice, he shall have the right to plant and grow such other crops as he may deem best." The lease further provided that the defendant would deliver to plaintiff as rent "one-fifth of the entire crops of rice or the usual proportion of such other crops as may be raised on said premises."

The complaint alleges that during the year 1919 the defendant failed to cultivate or plant "any crops of any kind or nature" upon about 10 acres of the land and planted an inferior quality of rice upon a portion thereof, and that during the year 1920 he failed to cultivate or plant any part of the land.

The answer alleges that—

"During the first part of 1920 and the spring of said year defendant made arrangements and planned to and intended to plant said leased property to rice; that he was unable to secure, and it was impossible to secure, water sufficient for the growing of rice during 1920, but that said shortage of water did not develop until it was too late to plant any other crop in the spring of said year; that during the preceding season said leased premises had been entirely planted to rice, except about 10 acres thereof which had been planted to barley; that after said property had been planted to rice for a season, and rice had been harvested thereon, it was impossible to plant other crops successfully on said property until after said property had lain fallow for at least one season after the harvesting of said rice, and that the usual course of farming practiced in the neighborhood was, and is, to let land lie fallow after the harvesting of rice thereon for at least one season before planting any other crop thereon; that, because it was too late to plant other crops until the fall of 1920 after the shortage of water for rice became apparent and developed, and because of the additional fact that said property would not have been suitable prior to that time for the growing of other crops, no additional crop was planted in the spring of 1920; * * * that said shortage of water was not the fault of defendant, and was due to shortage of water in California arising from an excessively dry year in 1919 and the spring of 1920; that the method of farming employed by defendant was followed in the neighborhood, was for the best benefit of said property and the parties to said lease, and was believed by defendant in good faith to be the best plan of farming to be followed, and was the best method of farming said property."

[1, 2] The court found that in the year 1919 no crop was raised on about six acres of the land; that both parties "contemplated the planting and threshing of rice on said six acres, and that said six acres were plowed, cultivated, and prepared for the planting of rice thereon during 1919, but that it was impossible to raise a crop of rice on said six acres, because the topography of said six acres made impossible the conduct of water thereto; that water is essential to the production of rice; that the unfavorable topography of said six acres was discovered too late to plant or mature any other crop thereon during the year 1919; that said six acres were tilled, cultivated, and planted to crops in the year 1920"; and that the defendant did not plant an inferior quality of rice in the year 1919. The other facts were found in accordance with the averments of the answer.

The leased land lies under and receives water for irrigation from the canal of the Yolo Water & Power Company. The defendant testified that the six-acre tract not planted in 1919 is too high to be irrigated from the canal, but that he did not discover that fact until it was too late, to plant to barley. From the terms of the lease it may be inferred that, at the time of the execution thereof, both parties believed that water could be carried through ditches to all of the land. If the defendant acted upon such belief, and, as he testified, proceeded in good faith to prepare all of the land for rice, he cannot be held in damages for the result of a mistake which was common to both parties, unless he was negligent in ascertaining the true fact, and the evidence does not warrant the inference that he was so negligent.

The defendant testified that no land under the company ditch system was planted to rice in the year 1920 by reason of a shortage of water; that he first learned definitely that no water would be available about the middle of March; that it was then too late to plant to other crops; that the soil is adobe, and that barley is planted in that section in the fall of the year; that the land will not produce a crop of barley in the year following a rice crop thereon, but that it is necessary to summer fallow it first; that that is the "customary practice that prevails with other rice farmers in Yolo county"; that the defendant could not have produced a crop of barley on the land in the year 1920; that in that year he did plant six acres heretofore mentioned to barley, but that it did not mature because of the dry year. In the years 1919 and 1921 valuable crops of rice were grown on the land; the plaintiff receiving therefrom the sum of $2,154.05 in 1919 and more than $1,900 in 1921. The foregoing evidence is sufficient to sustain the findings of the court.

[3] Appellant contends that it was not impossible for respondent to procure water for the irrigation of a rice crop in 1920, because the evidence shows that he could have put down wells and installed pumping plants to provide such water. The matter of obtaining water from wells was given consideration by the parties. February 24, 1920, defendant wrote plaintiff as follows:

> "I am just in receipt of your letter of February 21st, and note what you have to say with reference to the wells, but personally I cannot see my way clear to spend so much money installing these wells, unless I am to be reimbursed. * * * Investigation shows that I will have trouble in securing the engine and pump, and I understand that the expenses would run about $5,000 or $6,000. * * * Would you be willing to reimburse me out of your share of the crops if I should see my way clear to install the wells?"

The plaintiff testified as follows:

> "Q. Do you believe Mr. Stephens ought to go to the expense of putting wells there on your property? A. That was not in the proposition. Q. * * * You are not contending now, are you? A. No, sir."

Not only the foregoing testimony of plaintiff but the circumstances surrounding the parties at the time of the execution of the lease and the very terms of the lease itself show that it was not contemplated that the lessee should go to the unusual expense of procuring water from wells for the irrigation of rice. If the defendant had agreed so to procure water, he would have been bound to do so, as contended by appellant, however great the expense, but it is clear that neither party understood that he was so bound.

[4, 5] The court overruled plaintiff's objections to the following questions:

> "State whether or not in your opinion he (defendant) handled it in a farmerlike manner, according to the usual practice? * * * In your judgment, did Mr. Stephens make more money the way he handled the land than by putting in a grain crop in 1920?"

The objection to each question was as follows:

"Objected to as irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent."

It may be doubted whether the first question was subject to the objection made. The objection to the second question should have been sustained. It would have been material to show, by competent evidence, that plaintiff received more from the land as actually farmed than he would have received if grain had been planted in 1920, but whether defendant received more from one crop, above the expense of production, than he would have received from two over the expense of production thereof was wholly immaterial. But, independent of the answers to these questions, the other facts found by the court on sufficient evidence required a judgment in favor of defendant. Any error, therefore, in overruling the objections did not result in a miscarriage of justice, but was harmless.

The judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 23, 1924.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1071—Application for appeal held to sufficiently state the "points" relied upon; "grounds."

Application for appeal, stating that "said defendant, hereby fixes as ground for his appeal the following," setting forth generally eight specifications, held to sufficiently state the "points" relied upon to satisfy Pen. Code § 1247, as against motion to dismiss appeal; the word "grounds" being equivalent to "points."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Grounds; Point.]

2. False pretenses 🔑5—Accused telling payee that he had no funds to meet check held not guilty of intent to "defraud" within statute.

Where accused told the payee, when delivering his check, that he had no funds to meet it, but would have, on or about September 1st, there was no deception or intent to defraud, within Pen. Code, § 476a, punishing utterance of checks with such intent, though he failed to keep his promise; "defraud" meaning to deprive of right, either by procuring something by deception or artifice, or by appropriating something wrongfully (citing words and phrases, Second Series, Defraud).

W. C. Wilkins was convicted of issuing a check in violation of Pen. Code, § 476a, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem. The defendant was convicted of issuing a check in violation of section 476a of the Penal Code and appeals from the judgment and an order denying him a new trial.

[1] The attorney general has made a motion to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the defendant failed to comply with the provisions of section 1247 of the Penal Code.

In so far as it is material to a consideration of the motion, that section reads as follows:

> "Upon an appeal being taken from any judgment or order of the superior court, to the Supreme Court or to a District Court of Appeal, in any criminal action or proceeding where such appeal is allowed by law, the defendant, or the district attorney when the people appeal, must, within five days, file with the clerk and present an application to the trial court, stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which the appellant relies, and designate what portions of the phonographic reporter's notes it will be necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points relied upon. If such application is not filed within said time, the appeal is wholly ineffectual and shall be deemed dismissed and the judgment or order may be enforced as if no appeal had been taken."

It is claimed in support of the motion that the application made by the defendant failed to state the "points" relied upon. The record discloses that defendant's application, filed in pursuance of said section, states: "And said defendant hereby fixes as ground for his appeal, the following." There is then set forth in general terms eight specifications of appeal and a request to the court for a transcript of all of the testimony offered and received, also all objections and exceptions, and all matters to which the same relate, and a further statement that all of the same is necessary "to fairly present the points relied on as aforesaid."

This question was before the court in People v. Preciado, 31 Cal. App. 519, 160 Pac. 1090, and decided adversely to respondent's contention, and it is there said:

> "We fail to appreciate respondent's argument that there is, in contemplation of the statute, a substantial distinction intended in the use of the terms 'grounds' and 'points.' By stating 'in general terms the grounds,' we think the defendant complied with the statute sufficiently to entitle his appeal to be heard."

The foregoing language applies with equal force to the motion in this cause. The motion to dismiss the appeal is therefore denied.

[2] The principal point relied upon by the defendant for a reversal of the judgment and order is that the proof fails to show an intent to defraud.

The evidence upon which this contention is based, stated in the light most favorable to the prosecution, is that at the time of the making and delivery of the check defendant stated to the payee that he did not have sufficient funds in the bank to meet the check, but would have on or about the 1st of September, and the further fact that he did not keep such promise and the amount of the check has never been paid.

Section 476a of the Penal Code provides:

> "Every person who for himself or as the agent or representative of another or as an officer of a corporation, willfully, with intent to defraud, makes or draws or utters or delivers to another person any check or draft on a bank, banker or depositary for the payment of money, knowing at the time of such making, drawing, uttering or delivery, that he or his principal or the corporation of which he is an officer has not sufficient funds in, or credit with such bank, banker or depositary, to meet such check or draft in full upon its presentation, is punishable by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year or in the state prison for not more than fourteen years. The word 'credit' as used herein shall be construed to be an arrangement or understanding with the bank or depositary for the payment of such check or draft."

So far as we are advised, the question here presented has never been decided by either the appellate or Supreme Court of this state, but in People v. Bercovitz, 163 Cal. 636, 126 Pac. 479, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 667, the Supreme Court says:

> "We are not here concerned with a case where the fact of want of sufficient funds and credit is made known by the drawer to the person to whom he delivers the check or draft at the time of the delivery, and the payee chooses, with such knowledge, to rely on a promise or representation of the drawer that he will make such provision that the amount thereof will be paid on presentation. It may be that as to such a case, a conviction could not properly be had under the section in question."

In People v. Wilbur, 33 Cal. App. 511, 165 Pac. 729, it is held that the intention to defraud is the gist of the offense under section 476a of the Penal Code, and in People v. Landman, 103 Cal. 577, 37 Pac. 518, it is said:

> "When a specific intent is an element of the offense, no presumption of law can ever arise that will decide this question of intent."

In State v. Sichfield, 23 Nev. 304, 46 Pac. 802, 34 L. R. A. 784, 62 Am. St. Rep. 800, it is held the intent must be proved as a matter of fact and beyond a reasonable doubt. Can it be said that where the maker of a worthless check truthfully states to the payee, at the time of the delivery of the check, that he has no funds in the bank to meet the same, and the payee accepts it upon the promise of the defendant to make it good at some future day, that it was issued with intent to defraud? Cases of obtaining money or property by false pretenses bear some analogy to prosecutions under section 476a of the Penal Code. In each a specific element of the offense is the intent to defraud. In the former, however, there is the additional element that the injured party relied upon the false pretense and was thereby defrauded.

In State v. Miller, 47 Or. 562, 85 Pac. 81, a case of obtaining property by false pretenses, the defendant issued his check in payment of certain property. At the time of the making and delivery of the check defendant informed the payee that he had no funds in the bank to meet it. It was held by the Supreme Court of Oregon that the payee did not rely upon the check and was not defrauded thereby. It was also held that there was no intent to defraud shown, and the following pertinent language was used by the court:

> "Miller having told Goss that there was no money in the First National Bank of Sumpter to pay the check, there was no deceit and hence there was no intent on Miller's part to defraud Goss."

In 1 Words and Phrases, Second Series, p. 1273, it is said:

> "As defined by lexicographers, the word 'defraud' means to deprive of right, either by procuring something by deception or artifice, or by appropriating something wrongfully."

In the case at bar, the defendant having at the time of the delivery of the check to the payee, made known to him that he had no funds in the bank to meet the check, there was no deception. And the mere fact that he failed to keep the promise does not, in our opinion, constitute any evidence that at the time of the transaction the check was issued with intent to defraud.

There being an entire lack of evidence upon a material element of the offense, it follows that the judgment and order must be reversed, and it is so ordered, and the cause remanded.

PEOPLE v. SMITH. (Cr. 1139.)

1. Criminal law 🔑728(2), 829(1)—Court's failure, without request, to instruct jury to disregard statements of district attorney, held not erroneous.

In a prosecution for passing a check without funds, court's failure to instruct that statements of district attorney that he intended to prove two other similar offenses by defendant should not be considered as evidence was not erroneous, where no instruction was requested covering subject-matter, and trial court fully and fairly instructed jury.

2. Criminal law 🔑938(1)—Failure to grant new trial on ground of newly discovered evidence held not erroneous.

Court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial on grounds of newly discovered evidence, where defendant failed to show why new witnesses had not been produced at trial, and newly discovered evidence was merely cumulative.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; George Samuels, Judge.

Charles B. Smith was convicted of an offense, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Harold D. Perry, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. Defendant was charged with the violation of section 476a of the Penal Code, consisting in his passing, for a valuable consideration, in the city of Oakland, a check which he had drawn upon a bank in which he had neither funds nor credit. All the elements of the crime were proved by the prosecution by competent evidence, which was not contradicted. The only defense offered by the defendant was an alibi to the effect that on the day the check was passed he was ill at the home of his mother in the city of Oakland. On this showing the jury found the defendant guilty as charged in the information. He moved for a new trial, which was denied, and he now appeals from the judgment following the verdict, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Three grounds are raised on the appeal: (1) That the district attorney committed error in stating to the jury at the opening of the trial that he intended to prove two other similar offenses by the appellant, but that no effort was made to prove these; (2) that the court failed to instruct the jury that statements made by counsel should not be considered as evidence; and (3) that the court should have granted a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence.

[1, 2] 1. As to the first assignment, it appears that appellant is not supported by the record. The district attorney did attempt to prove one of the other offenses referred to in his opening statement as having been committed by the appellant at about the same time that the offense for which he was on trial was committed.

2. As to the second assignment, we find that no request was made for an instruction covering the precise point mentioned. But in addition to this, we have examined the instructions given by the trial court and find that, on the whole, the jury was fairly and fully instructed.

3. As to the third assignment, the appellant failed to show any reason why the new witnesses had not been produced at the time of the trial. Furthermore, the evidence which is referred to as having been newly discovered was merely cumulative of the testimony which was offered by the appellant at the time of the trial, and we are satisfied that the trial court committed no error in denying the motion on the grounds which were presented.

Judgment and order affirmed.

MACHADO v. BANK OF ITALY et al. (Civ. 4537.)

1. Mortgages 🔑159—Mortgage for future advances held to have priority over deed to vendor.

Where vendor knew terms of vendee's deed of trust to a bank, which provided for future advances, and agreed that the deed should take priority over one securing payment of purchase price, the bank's deed constituted a valid prior lien for the advances, though made after notice of vendor's incumbrance; mere fact that the amounts to be advanced were left open being immaterial.

2. Mortgages 🔑50—Oral agreement to make future advancements held binding.

Oral agreement by bank, taking deed of trust providing for future advances, to make advancements up to 60 per cent. of the appraised value of property, held binding, though definite statement of the amount to be loaned was not set forth.

3. Banks and banking 🔑295—That agreed loan in excess of that permitted held not to affect priority.

That amount savings bank agreed to loan on real estate mortgage was in excess of 60 per cent. of the market value of the land, in violation of California Bank Act, § 67, subd. 4, is matter to be adjusted between the bank and the state authorities, and does not prevent priority of mortgage on theory that agreement was not binding.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⚷266(8)—Vendor's lien waived by accepting deed of trust and chattel mortgage and foreclosing.

Vendor's lien upon premises under contract of sale is waived by acceptance of security in nature of a deed of trust and chattel mortgage, and subsequent foreclosure of both.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by Frank R. Machado against the Bank of Italy and others. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Myers, C. J., dissenting.

Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for appellant.

John J. Jones, of San Jose, and Louis Ferrari, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Appellant instituted this action against the Bank of Italy, a corporation, for the purpose of requiring it and others to state and set forth their rights and interests in and to certain lands described in the complaint, whether acquired through deed of trust, liens, or otherwise. The relief asked for was that the court determine the amount due, together with the cost of reconveyance, and upon payment or deposit in court of such sum the title of plaintiff be quieted. General relief was also asked for. Defendants, answering, set up the defense that they claimed certain rights and interests in the property as beneficiaries by virtue of a certain deed of trust given as security for a loan in the sum of $25,000, together with interest thereon, and that such deed of trust provided and required that defendant corporation make future advances. It is then alleged that said defendant did accordingly make such advances in the sum of $25,500, in addition to the original loan of $25,000, aggregating, with interest, more than $50,500. The answer prayed that plaintiff take nothing and that it be decreed that defendants have a lien upon the property under the terms of the deed of trust to the amount of its original note, together with the additional advances, amounting in all to the sum of $53,254.77 principal and accrued interest, and that such lien be declared to be prior in right to plaintiff in the premises.

After trial judgment went for defendants as prayed for, and plaintiff appeals.

The facts disclosed by the record are the following: Prior to and on the 21st day of February, 1920, the appellant was the owner and in possession of the lands described in the complaint. At that time the land was incumbered by two deeds of trust in favor of one Dussing, which were executed to secure the payment of notes aggregating the sum of $25,000 principal and some $300 accrued interest. One Francesco Amato desired to purchase the land, and he, together with an agent named Danzi, visited appellant and entered into negotiations with him with that end in view. Appellant was ready to sell and the parties agreed upon the terms. Amato, the intending purchaser, had no ready money, and he, accompanied by the agent, called at the defendant bank at its branch in the city of Santa Clara for the purpose of procuring a loan. They there met Fatjo, the manager, and Amato made the request that he be permitted to borrow the sum of $25,000 and such other sums later on as he might need to erect improvements on the land and make it fit for his business purposes. The principal sum requested was required by him to pay off the Dussing incumbrance. Mr. Fatjo stated that he would have the property appraised and would lend up to 60 per cent. of its value. Thereupon, at the suggestion of Mr. Fatjo, Amato and the agent interviewed one I. E. Pomeroy, the bank's official appraiser, and they proceeded to the premises, and the land was appraised by Pomeroy as of the value of $72,000. Thereafter Amato and Danzi again visited the bank, and, in a conversation with Manager Fatjo, Amato again requested that he be advanced sums in excess of $25,000 for the necessary improvements. Fatjo again agreed to lend up to 60 per cent. of the appraised value of the land. Subsequently Amato, Danzi, and the appellant Machado called at the office of John J. Jones, an attorney at law, for the purpose of having the oral agreement concerning the sale and purchase of the land reduced to writing. The agreement was prepared on February 21, 1920, and executed in duplicate. By the terms thereof appellant agreed to sell, and Amato agreed to purchase, the land for the sum of $72,600, and Amato also agreed to buy certain personal property used for Machado in his business for the further sum of $10,000. The sum of $25,000 was to be paid in cash on account, which sum it was agreed should be used to pay off the amount due under the Dussing deeds of trust then incumbering the land so as to make it clear of all liens, and the payment of the balance of the purchase price amounting to the sum of $57,600 was to be secured by the execution of a deed of trust by Amato on the real estate and a chattel mortgage on certain cattle. The agreement provided that beginning May 1, 1920, Amato should pay on account of interest and the purchase price the sum of $1,500 per month for the period of three months, and that thereafter and beginning August 1, 1920, he should pay not less than $2,000 per month, together with interest on all deferred payments. It further provided that the appellant should have an abstract of title prepared.

This was done, and it was brought down to the date of March 10, 1920. It showed title in the appellant subject to the incumbrances for $25,000 in favor of Dussing, and it also contained a copy of the executory contract of sale entered into between appellant and Amato. The abstract was delivered to Mr. Jones. The bank at this time had no regular attorney at Santa Clara, but it intrusted the matter to Jones, who up to this time was acting for Amato in the transaction with appellant. Jones made an examination of the abstract, found the title satisfactory, and the matter of sale and loan thereupon proceeded. One J. M. Atkinson acted for the appellant in the transaction. He drafted a deed from Machado to Amato, and a deed of trust and chattel mortgage from Amato to Machado, to secure the balance of the entire purchase price of $57,600. Jones, as attorney for defendant bank, also prepared a note from Amato to that institution for the sum of $25,000 and a deed of trust to secure the payment of said sum, together with future advances. The various instruments covering the transaction all bear date March 22, 1920, and all were signed and acknowledged as one transaction at the office of Jones in San Jose; there being present appellant Machado, Amato, Danzi, Atkinson, and Jones. The instruments being ready for delivery and recording, it was ascertained that Machado did not have the funds with which to pay a balance due as interest on the Dussing notes, amounting to some $300 or to purchase the necessary United States documentary stamps to affix to his deed to Amato. The parties thereupon adjourned to March 29, 1920. The defendant bank in the meantime advanced to Amato the sum of $5,000. The deed of trust given by Amato to the bank, as also the deed given by Amato to Machado, provided for future advances, and it was under this provision in favor of the bank that Amato obtained the $5,000. On the day last mentioned the parties again met, and the transaction was completed by delivery between them of the various instruments. They then proceeded to the county recorder, where the papers were delivered for recording. The reconveyance from Dussing to Machado was first recorded, following which came in the order recited the deed from Machado to Amato, the deed of trust from Amato to the Bank of Italy, the deed of trust and the chattel mortgage from Amato to Machado.

Thereafter Mr. Jones delivered the abstract of title to defendant Fatjo as manager of the bank, together with his written report. This report refers to one of the two deeds of trust to Dussing, the deed to Amato and the deed of trust of Amato to the bank, but it does not refer to the written agreement between appellant and Amato or the deed of trust from Amato to appellant, which were then both of record. In other words, the bank by this communication was not directly advised how Amato financed the transaction or that appellant had a deed of trust upon the property for the unpaid portion of the purchase price. Mr. Fatjo, who personally made all the loans for the bank, testified that he had no knowledge upon the subject. Machado individually, and through his attorney, had agreed to the priority of defendant bank's deed of trust, one of the provisions of which related to future advances.

Thereafter Amato went into possession of the premises under his deed, but failed to comply with his agreements with reference to payments, and the land and chattels were sold at a trustee's sale; Machado bidding in the property. Thereafter Machado tendered to defendant bank the sum of $28,000 due under its original loan of $25,000. The bank refused to accept this sum, claiming that the tender should have also included the amount of money loaned by way of future advances; and one of the claims of appellant is that the effect of such tender and refusal is to discharge the entire lien by reason of the provisions of section 1504 of the Civil Code. Thereafter this suit was instituted against the bank and the trustees named in the Amato trust deed to obtain the relief herein prayed as heretofore set out.

Under the facts as narrated, plaintiff claimed below, and does here, that while his deed of trust at the date of its execution was subordinate to that of defendant bank in so far as the original loan of $25,000 is concerned, it was not subordinate to the sums advanced by the bank under the clause of its trust deed relating to future advances. At the conclusion of the trial the court below found in substance that Machado agreed with Amato that defendant bank's trust deed should be a first lien upon the property and that he consented to all the provisions thereof, and that the deed of trust provided that such future advances should be secured by its provisions. It further found that advances were subsequently made by the bank to the extent of $25,500, which advances were obligatory upon the bank by reason of the oral agreement entered into by the manager thereof at the time the loan was negotiated by Amato, and that such agreement was an essential and integral part thereof. Additional findings are to the effect that the bank had no actual notice, either direct or indirect, of the execution, existence, or recordation of the deed of trust executed by Amato in favor of Machado as security for the balance of the purchase price of $57,600, nor did it have such notice at the times of the making of the additional loans aggregating the sum of $25,500. It was accordingly found that there was due to the bank from Amato on the 22d day of January, 1922, the sum of $53,254.77, which said sum was by the bank's deed of trust above referred to, according to the terms thereof, a first lien upon the premises.

[1, 2] It is contended by appellant that the evidence is wholly insufficient to sustain either one of such findings or the judgment based thereon.

If the finding of the court to the effect that appellant consented that the bank's lien should have priority and that his lien should be subordinate thereto finds support in the evidence, it is decisive of this case, irrespective of whether or not the bank had knowledge of the existence or terms of the incumbrance held by appellant.

That the evidence is ample upon this subject there can, in our opinion, be no question. As to the original loan and the sums due thereunder it is conceded that the appellant agreed that the bank's trust deed should have priority. All the parties knew of the terms of this deed when this consent was given. There was no limitation in any way affecting this agreement. The attorneys for both sides were quite familiar with all the conditions thereof, and plaintiff was represented by counsel. Under such circumstances, the future advances provided for tact, and the deed gives a valid lien for all advances made thereunder although made after notice of the subsequent incumbrance.

Nor does the mere fact that the amount of such advances was left open alter the situation or indicate that none was intended. Amato and the bank had not agreed upon any specific sum, but only that 60 per cent. of the appraised value of the property would be loaned. This oral agreement to advance at least such amount was obligatory upon the bank. Bank of Soquel v. Ashbury, 117 Cal. 96, 48 Pac. 1081; Sivers v. Sivers, 97 Cal. 518, 32 Pac. 571; Valley Lumber Co. v. Wright, 2 Cal. App. 288, 84 Pac. 58; Langerman v. Puritan Dining Room, 21 Cal. App. 637, 132 Pac. 617; Fuller v. McClure, 48 Cal. App. 185, 191 Pac. 1027.

Neither does the law require a definite statement of the amount to be loaned be set forth. Buck Co. v. Buck, 162 Cal. 300, 122 Pac. 466; Langerman v. Puritan, etc., supra.

Aside from the express terms of the deed of trust, the entire evidence fully supports the conclusion that such was the intention of the parties. Appellant knew that Amato was without funds and that the defendant bank was loaning him money. He also knew that he intended to bring a large herd of cows to the premises for dairy purposes, and that the barns and equipment on the place were insufficient for their accommodation, and that other improvements would have to be erected for this purpose. He saw the improvements being made. His security was proportionally strengthened by the advances; and if he did not desire them to take precedence over his liens he should not have consented thereto.

[3] The argument is made that the finding of the trial court that the advances amounting to $25,500 were obligatory upon the bank is unsupported by the evidence for the reason that the California Bank Act (St. 1909, p. 102, § 67, subd. 4) provides that a savings bank shall in no event make loans on property exceeding 60 per cent. of the market value thereof; and as the sums advanced exceeded this amount the obligation based thereon is void.

There are two answers to this contention. The act does not declare that an agreement in violation of its terms is void. The question of a loan being excessive under the act is one to be regulated and adjusted between the state authorities and the bank, and is a matter with which appellant has no concern. Brittan v. Oakland Bank, 124 Cal. 282, 57 Pac. 84, 71 Am. St. Rep. 58; Blochman v. Investment Co., 177 Cal. 762, 171 Pac. 943. Then, again, the value of the premises was increased from time to time as the advances went into improvements upon the land, which increased its value to an amount beyond the limitation.

[4] Something is contained in appellant's briefs with reference to the right of appellant to a vendor's lien and its effect upon the bank's deed. Whatever right appellant may have had to a vendor's lien he waived when he accepted security in the nature of his deed of trust and chattel mortgage and his subsequent foreclosure of both. Lee v. Murphy, 119 Cal. 364, 51 Pac. 549, 955.

From what we have said it follows that by reason of the provisions in the bank's trust deed permitting future advances to be made, which were, as the trial court found, understood and fully agreed to by the parties, the balance of the purchase price represented by the trust deed given by Amato to appellant was subordinated to the deed of trust of the bank not only for the amount of the original loan but also for the sums subsequently advanced. Fuller v. McClure, 48 Cal. App. 185, 191 Pac. 1027.

This conclusion renders unnecessary a discussion of the evidence and its sufficiency to support other findings.

The judgment is affirmed.

67 Cal. App. 777

SMITH et al. v. HALLWOOD IRR. CO.
(Civ. 2787.)

1. Waters and water courses 🔑253—Evidence held to warrant finding vendor's stock in irrigation company was not appurtenant to land.

In action by purchaser of land for writ of mandate against irrigation company to compel furnishing water for irrigation, evidence held to warrant finding vendor's stock was not appurtenant to land, and that it was personal property and did not pass to purchaser.

2. Waters and water courses 🔑253—Purchaser of land held not to acquire interest in water, unless irrigation stock appurtenant to land.

Where 265 shares of stock in irrigation company were not made appurtenant to any portion of owner's 550 tract, as required by amended by-laws and Civ. Code, § 324, conveyance of 160 acres did not give purchaser any right to water.

3. Waters and water courses 🔑253—Whether shares in irrigation company had become appurtenant to land held question of fact.

Under amended by-laws of irrigation company, requiring owner to make shares appurtenant to equal number of acres of land, whether stockholder had made stock appurtenant to land held question of fact to be determined from his acts and those of irrigation company and manner in which water was used and furnished on his lands and those of other stockholders.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑263—Evidence held insufficient to establish prescriptive right to use water for irrigation.

On Petition for Hearing in Supreme Court.

5. Waters and water courses 🔑253—Stockholder's vote to make irrigation stock appurtenant to land held binding contract.

Stockholder in irrigation company, by voting for amendment to by-laws and articles of incorporation, requiring stock to be made appurtenant to equal number of acres of land, entered binding contract with fellow stockholders, which was not against public policy, estopping purchaser from claiming benefits of Civ. Code, § 552, except on performance of conditions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Application for writ of mandate by W. H. Smith and others against the Hallwood Irrigation Company. From a judgment for defendant, petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

W. A. Latta and Elliott & Atkinson, all of Sacramento, for appellants.

Richard Belcher, of Marysville, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Petitioners applied to the trial court for a writ of mandate to compel defendant to furnish water for the irrigation of their lands. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendant, and petitioners have appealed.

[1] The defendant company was incorporated in February, 1910, with an authorized capital stock of 5,000 shares. Its purposes, as set forth in the articles of incorporation, were very broad, and indicated an intention to supply water to the public generally, but it is admitted that at all times it conducted its business as a mutual water company, furnishing water to its stockholders only, and permitting them to apply the water to all or any part of their lands as they saw fit; no steps being taken to make the water stock appurtenant to the land upon which the water was used. Prior to October 16, 1913, it issued 4,079 shares of its capital stock, of which 265 shares were issued to W. D. Smith, the grantor of plaintiff, who owned 550 acres of land under defendant's canal; 250 shares thereof being issued to him October 25, 1910, and 15 shares June 23, 1911. October 16, 1913, by amended articles of incorporation, the purposes of the company were limited to supplying water to its stockholders, "based upon the number of shares of stock held by each person." The original by-laws did not designate the territory to be supplied with water or specify whether water was to be furnished to stockholders only or to the public generally. Neither was there any provision making the right to the use of water appurtenant to the lands to be irrigated. The by-laws provided:

> "Shares of the corporation may be transferred at any time by the holders thereof or by attorney legally constituted or by their legal representatives by indorsement on the certificate of stock. But no transfer shall be valid until the surrender of the certificate and the acknowledgment of such transfer on the books of the company."

At the time the articles of incorporation were amended the by-laws were also amended to provide:

> "The water owned, controlled, or developed by this company shall be sold or disposed of for use on the following-described lands: (Here follows a description of an area which includes the Smith lands.) And said water shall be distributed only to stockholders of this corporation. Rights of stockholders to the water distributed by this corporation shall be evidenced by certificates of stock issued to such stockholders. Said stock shall be issued only to owners of the lands or portions of the lands hereinabove described and in proportion to their holdings, one share for each acre of said lands owned by stockholder. Said shares so issued shall be appurtenant to the lands for which they are issued, one share to each acre thereof, which lands shall be described in the certificate evidencing such shares, and shares of stock shall be transferable only with said lands, and shall pass as appurtenant thereto. * * * The stockholders will pay to the company such assessments as shall be levied by it. * * * The said water shall be used to irrigate the land described in the certificate of stock, for domestic purposes incidental thereto, and for no other purposes whatever. * * * The water to which the purchaser of said shares of stock is entitled and the water thereby made appurtenant to said land, shall be an equal pro rata proportion of all the water available for the irrigation of all lands covered by such stock."

This amendment was unanimously adopted at a duly called meeting of the stockholders at which the owners of 3,598 shares of the capital stock were present, in person or by proxy. Smith was not personally present at the meeting, but was represented by his proxy. A certified copy of the amendment was duly recorded in the office of the county recorder on the 8th of November, 1913. It does not appear whether other stockholders complied with the provisions of the foregoing amendments, but Smith did not comply therewith. In a written communication to defendant, dated April 27, 1914, he stated:

"In accordance with law and the by-laws of Hallwood Irrigation Company I hereby locate upon and make appurtenant to the lands owned by me * * * the stock and shares of stock * * * owned and held by me * * * to wit, 265 shares; * * * hereby canceling and annulling any previous location or locations of said water stock upon said lands or any part thereof made, or attempted to be made, for or by me or in my behalf. And I hereby authorize and empower you to issue to me in my name a certificate of stock for 265 shares of the capital stock of said Hallwood Irrigation Company in lieu of the certificates of stock in said company now held by me, and I do hereby make the said water stock appurtenant to the lands owned by me (describing the 550 acres first mentioned). * * * And I hereby tender and offer to surrender for cancellation the stock certificates now held by me * * * upon your delivering to me a certificate of stock for an equal number of shares of the capital stock of said Hallwood Irrigation Company, properly executed to show the location of said stock and the water right connected therewith upon and as appurtenant to the above-described real property."

The defendant refused to issue certificates of stock to Smith upon the terms proposed by him in the foregoing communication, and the certificates theretofore issued to him have never been canceled, nor have other certificates been issued in lieu thereof. The defendant derives no profit from its operations, but furnishes water to its stockholders at cost; the expenses thereof being provided by assessments upon the capital stock. All assessments upon the Smith stock have been paid. At all times herein mentioned the Smith lands have been farmed by a single tenant, and the defendant has furnished him water for irrigation until May, 1922, when any further supply was refused, except on condition that the 265 shares of Smith stock be made appurtenant to some designated 265 acres of the land. Not less than 160 acres of the Smith lands nor more than 200 acres thereof have been supplied with water during any one year, but all of such lands have received water from defendant at some time since its organization.

On the 26th day of May, 1916, by three grant, bargain, and sale deeds, in the usual form, W. D. Smith conveyed 160 acres of the aforesaid lands to plaintiffs. No reference was made therein to any shares of capital stock or to any right to the use of water. These deeds had not been recorded up to the time of the trial. Smith died in December, 1917. In the year 1920 a special administrator of his estate was appointed, but no further proceedings have been had in the administration thereof. It is conceded that the title to the 265 shares of capital stock owned by him is in his estate, unless a part thereof passed to plaintiffs by the aforesaid deeds as appurtenant to the lands thereby conveyed. Among other facts the court found:

"That prior to the 16th day of October, 1913, neither the directors nor stockholders of said corporation took any action of any kind to make the water so used by said stockholders appurtenant to the land of said stockholders, or any thereof, and permitted water to be used by said stockholders on any part or all the land owned by stockholders as said stockholders saw fit to use it; * * * that said W. D. Smith in his lifetime did not comply with the provisions * * * of said by-laws as amended on the 16th day of October, 1913; * * * that the conveyance of the said three above-described tracts of land did not transfer the said stock of W. D. Smith, or any part thereof, and neither the said stock nor the water of said company nor any thereof became appurtenant to the said three tracts of land so conveyed or either or any of them; that the plaintiffs are not stockholders of said corporation."

be entitled to water from defendant's system. Clearly the Smith stock was not made appurtenant to any of his lands under the provisions of the amended by-laws and those of section 324 of the Civil Code. Appellants contend that they have acquired a right to the continued use of water under the provisions of section 552 of the Civil Code. That section is not applicable, however, because it is limited to "any corporation" which "furnishes water to irrigate lands which said corporation has sold." The defendant has sold no lands. Whether or not, then, Smith's stock became appurtenant to his land was a question of fact to be determined by the trial court from the acts of himself and the defendant and the manner in which water was furnished and used upon the Smith lands and those of other stockholders. Estate of Thomas, 147 Cal. 236, 240, 81 Pac. 539; Wiel on Water Rights (3d Ed.) § 550. It cannot be said that the evidence is insufficient to justify the court in finding as a fact that the Smith stock did not become appurtenant to the lands of plaintiffs. It follows that such stock is personal property, and, therefore did not pass to plaintiffs by the mere conveyance to them of their lands. It is not necessary to consider what rights the owners of the Smith stock may have to the use of water or on what lands the same may be used. It may be surmised from the evidence that some of the plaintiffs are heirs of W. B. Smith. There is nothing, however, to indicate who all the heirs are or the proportions of the Smith estate to which they are respectively entitled.

[4] Appellants contend that they have acquired a prescriptive right to the use of the water claimed by them. Their complaint is based upon their alleged right to the use of water as stockholders, on the theory that a proportionate share of the Smith stock is appurtenant to their lands. The evidence does not show a hostile or adverse use of water by the tenant of plaintiffs, but rather a permissive use. It does not appear whether water was used continuously upon plaintiffs' lands for a period of five years. The area of 160 to 200 acres of the Smith lands irrigated each year may not have been the same acreage during any two successive years. In other particulars the evidence is insufficient to establish a prescriptive right in plaintiffs, but the foregoing suggestions show that plaintiffs' contention is without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: PLUMMER, J.; BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [5] The petition for a transfer and hearing by this court after decision of the District Court of Appeal is denied. In view of the decision in the case of Merrill v. Southside Irrigation Co., 112 Cal. 426, 434, 44 Pac. 720, we cannot approve the construction placed in the opinion of that court upon section 552 of the Civil Code, but we do not deem that interpretation essential to the validity of the conclusion reached by that court. It may be conceded that in 1913 appellants' grantor, W. D. Smith, was seized of a water right which was appurtenant to his entire tract of 550 acres, and which constituted a servitude upon the works and system of the defendant company. But when he attended the stockholders' meeting of October, 1913, and there voted either in person or by proxy for the adoption of the amendment to the by-laws and articles of incorporation, he thereby in effect entered into a contract with his fellow stockholders and with the corporation to the effect that his water right should thereafter be subject to the limitations and conditions set forth in said amended by-laws and articles of incorporation. The like agreements on the part of his fellow stockholders and the corporation afforded sufficient consideration to support such contract, and the same was not unreasonable or against public policy. Riverside Land Co. v. Jarvis, 174 Cal. 318, 163 Pac. 54. We are not here concerned with the question of the effect of said amendments upon the rights of stockholders who did not participate in the adoption thereof or consent thereto. The contract so entered into was binding upon Smith, and is equally binding upon appellants who are claiming here as his successors in interest and privies. They are estopped thereby to claim the benefits of section 552 of the Civil Code, except upon the performance of the conditions of said contract. As pointed out in the opinion, the respondent has always stood ready to furnish the water claimed by them upon the performance of said conditions.

PEOPLE v. WHITAKER. (Cr. 1102.)

1. Forgery 🔑44(2)—Evidence held to sustain conviction.

In a prosecution for forgery under Pen. Code, § 470, by indorsing, without authority, checks payable to fictitious payee in name of named payee and passing checks as genuine, evidence held to sustain conviction.

2. Courts 🔑91(1) — Decision of District Court of Appeals as authoritative as that of Supreme Court when petition to rehear denied by latter.

On denial by Supreme Court of a petition to hear and determine a cause after judgment of the District Court of Appeals, such decision possesses all the authority of a pronouncement by Supreme Court itself.

3. Criminal law 🔑365(2)—Testimony held not inadmissible as evidence of another offense.

In prosecution for forgery, court did not err in permitting witness to testify that defendant had stated that he procured forged checks to obtain money to settle another forgery charge, where such statement was but portion of conversation, much of which was relevant and material as part of res gestæ, and, unless supplemented by other evidence, had no tendency to prove other offenses, and, moreover, was statement of reason why defendant committed crime charged.

4. Criminal law 🔑829(1)—Refusal to give requested instructions covered by given instructions held not erroneous.

Refusal to give defendant's requested instructions was not erroneous, where trial court repeated in almost exact words parts of requested instructions, and gave them all in effect.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Charles L. Whitaker was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank W. Allender, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CRAIG, J. The appellant herein appeals from a judgment based upon an information consisting of three counts, each of which charged him and one Val Amthor with the crime of forgery, under section 470 of the Penal Code. The appeal is also from an order denying his motion for new trial. Appellant was granted a separate trial, and a jury found him guilty under each count. The counts are alike in all respects material here, and embody copies of certain checks drawn on the First National Bank at Vernon, Cal., signed by R. E. Dusenberry, dated, respectively, the 7th, 14th, and 20th of November, 1923, and payable to "C. R. McPhearson Electric Co.," "C. R. McPhearson," and "C. R. McPhearson Electrical Co." It is charged that the defendants, without authority therefor, indorsed each of said checks in the name of the payee, and thereupon unlawfully, knowingly, falsely, fraudulently, and feloniously uttered, published, and passed them as true and genuine, with intent to cheat and defraud the payees and the bank.

There is no evidence in the record that either of the payees named in the checks in fact existed, and a witness for the people testified that he had been in business at Los Angeles for a period of 14 years but had never heard of C. R. McPhearson or of a company bearing that name, and that he had been unable to find either of them by a search of the city and telephone directories.

This testimony was objected to on the grounds that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and that such evidence would be admissible only upon a charge preferred against one "who makes, passes, utters, or publishes, with intention to defraud any other person, or who, with the like intention attempts to pass, utter, or publish, * * * any fictitious bill, note, or check, purporting to be the bill, note, or check, * * * of some bank, corporation, copartnership, or individual, when, in fact, there is no such bank, corporation, copartnership, or individual in existence, knowing the bill, note, check, or instrument in writing to be fictitious," as provided by section 476, Penal Code.

It is conceded by counsel for the prosecution, and, in fact, he asserts that the evidence shows, that the names to whom the checks were made payable were believed to be fictitious, and they assert that the defendant knew that no such person or firm existed. In support of this theory J. F. McPherson was called as a witness for the people, and testified that he was an electrical contractor, but that he was not "C. R. McPhearson," and that he did not know of a person or company bearing the name appearing upon the checks in question.

This latter evidence was also objected to upon the usual grounds, and, specifically, that the initials were different, and that the name of the witness was unlike "McPhearson" both in spelling and in sound. The respondent argues that the prosecution was confronted with the difficulty of proving that the defendant did not sign the indorsement on the check with the authority of some unknown person, and that McPherson was called as a witness because he was the only person having a name resembling that of the fictitious payee, and for the purpose of proving that he did not authorize the indorsement, "and for the further purpose of conclusively proving that the payee named in the check was a fictitious person, firm, or corporation."

Section 470 of the Penal Code provides that "every person who, with intent to defraud, signs the name of another person, or of a fictitious person, knowing that he has no authority so to do, to * * * any * * * check * * * or utters, publishes, passes, or attempts to pass, as true and genuine, any of the above-named false, altered, forged or counterfeited matters, as above specified and described, knowing the same to be false, altered, forged, or counterfeited, with intent to prejudice, damage, or defraud any person," is guilty of forgery.

[1] The evidence introduced by the people which is not contradicted, was to the effect that R. E. Dusenberry, who issued and signed the checks set forth in the information, was the sole owner and proprietor of the Sound Construction Company, by whom appellant and Amthor were employed in connection with electrical work; that the defendant Whitaker obtained the checks from E. D. Lundberg, secretary of the Sound Construction Company, who had them signed by Duseenberry, upon representations that they were for purchases of electrical supplies from C. R. McPhearson Electrical Company. Duseenberry later discovered that no such supplies were purchased, and when appellant was confronted with this fact he stated that defendant Amthor was the McPhearson Electrical Company, but that Amthor received none of the money for said checks; that he, appellant, obtained and cashed them to settle another forgery charge. Defendant Amthor testified that he indorsed one of the checks "C. R. McPhearson Elec. Co.—C. R. McPhearson" at Whitaker's request, although he had never heard of such a firm or person, and that he received no money therefrom, but that he saw Whitaker cash the check at the bank. This was a sufficient showing of the fictitious character of the checks. People v. Brown, 61 Cal. App. 574, 215 Pac. 1031; People v. Eppinger, 105 Cal. 36, 38 Pac. 538.

Appellant offered no evidence, and conceding, for the purposes of the appeal, without admitting, the truth of the foregoing as facts, he contends that upon the evidence adduced he should have been charged and tried under section 476, Penal Code.

This claim may have been tenable prior to 1905 and under the provisions of the Penal Code as they were when People v. Elliott, 90 Cal. 586, 27 Pac 433, cited by appellant was decided. However, in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 673) section 470, Penal Code, was amended to include the signing of the name of a fictitious person to a check and the passing of such check as genuine. In 1909 People v. Jones, 12 Cal. App. 129, 106 Pac. 724. was decided upon a state of facts quite similar to those here presented. Jones falsely represented to Smith Bros., a corporation, that he was collecting money for Walter Miller, an invalid, and obtained from them a check payable to the latter, which was indorsed and cashed. It later developed that Walter Miller did not exist and Jones was prosecuted under section 470 Penal Code. He was convicted, and the judgment was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal for the First District, in whose opinion it was said:

> "But assuming that the act complained of here comes within section 476, still defendant's contention cannot be sustained, for after the decision in the Chretien Case section 470 was amended, so that the crime of forgery may be committed under that section by signing the name of a fictitious as well as of a real person to any of the instruments therein enumerated. The indorsement of a check is equivalent to an 'order for money,' and therefore is included within section 470. It seems plain to us that the case falls within that section, and it was unnecessary either to allege or prove whether or not Walter Miller was a real or fictitious individual."

[2] A petition to have that case heard by the Supreme Court was denied. Hence it is the law of the instant case as fully as though determined by the Supreme Court itself. Bridges v. Fisk, 53 Cal. App. 117, 200 Pac. 71.

[3] Appellant also insists that it was error on the part of the trial court to permit witnesses, over his objection, to testify that he stated to them that he procured and indorsed the three checks in controversy for the purpose of obtaining money to settle another forgery charge, because it constituted evidence of another offense. However, such statement was but a portion of the conversation related by the witnesses to have occurred between themselves and appellant, much of which was relevant and material as a part of the res gestæ, and unless supplemented by other evidence, it would have no tendency to prove other offenses. People v. Jones, supra. Moreover, it was a statement of the reason why he committed the forgeries with which he is charged here.

[4] The only remaining grounds upon which the appeal is based relate to the refusal to give certain requested instructions or to portions stricken from those given. The trial court repeated in almost exact words parts of the requested instructions, and gave them all in effect. It has been repeatedly held that this is sufficient. People v. Wolfgang (Cal. Sup.) 221 Pac. 907; People v. Bringhurst (Cal. Sup.) 221 Pac. 897.

1. Embezzlement 🔑11(1)—Proved when defendant used check deposited to credit of employer to cover shortage caused by previous defalcations.

That defendant, a railroad cashier, deposited a check which he was charged with having embezzled to credit of his employer, held no defense, where he credited amount of check to wrong accounts to cover up shortage caused by previous defalcations.

2. Embezzlement 🔑11(1)—Charge of embezzlement of money held supported by proof of crediting check to wrong account to cover prior defalcation.

Charge of embezzlement of money held supported by proof of receipt by defendant of check, and that, though depositing it to credit of employer, he credited it to wrong account to cover up prior defalcations.

3. Criminal law 🔑409, 517(4)—Evidence held sufficient to prove corpus delicti to warrant proof of extrajudicial admissions and confessions.

In prosecution for embezzlement, based on disposition by defendant of check received by him on certain day, proof that defendant's employer suffered loss in its assets on that day of amount of check, and that such loss was result of defendant's action in fraudulently manipulating accounts of his employer, was sufficient to prove corpus delicti, so as to allow proof of defendant's admissions and confessions.

4. Criminal law 🔑370, 371(2)—Evidence of general shortage admissible, in prosecution for embezzlement, to show guilty knowledge.

In prosecution for embezzlement, court did not err in receiving evidence of general shortage, which necessarily covered other acts of embezzlement; it being admitted to show fraudulent intent and guilty knowledge and to negative idea of mistake or inadvertence.

5. Criminal law 🔑419, 420(1)—Testimony as to shortage of defendant, ascertained by witness from books kept by defendant and others, held not objectionable as hearsay.

In prosecution for embezzlement, testimony of witness concerning total amount of defendant's general shortage, ascertained from books kept by defendant and from books not kept by him, held admissible as against objection that such testimony was hearsay, witness testifying to matters within his own knowledge acquired in discharge of his duty.

6. Criminal law 🔑1169(2)—Admission of hearsay testimony held harmless as being merely cumulative.

Admission of hearsay testimony, concerning facts established by extrajudicial confession of defendant, which was part of evidence, held not harmful.

7. Embezzlement 🔑48(4)—Refusal of instruction held proper as not conforming to indictment.

Refusal to give instructions, based on theory that defendant was charged with embezzlement of check or its proceeds, was not erroneous, where charge was of embezzlement of sum "in lawful money of United States."

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

Bruce Forman was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Silverstein, Collier & Silverstein, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KNIGHT, J. The defendant, Bruce Forman, appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of embezzlement, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Defendant was charged by indictment with the embezzlement of the sum of $6,468.54 in lawful money of the United States, belonging to the Western Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation. Forman for many years was the cashier of the freight office of said railroad company. During the month of December, 1923, while he was away on a vacation, the traveling auditor of the said company discovered a shortage in the cash accounts of the defendant of about $25,000. Thereupon the defendant confessed that he had been wrongfully taking the money from said company for a period extending over seven years. The amount stated in the indictment, and of which the defendant was convicted of embezzling, constituted a part of that shortage. The method employed by the defendant in misappropriating the particular money in question was as follows: The California Hawaiian Sugar Refining Company were shippers of large quantities of freight over the lines of said railroad company, upon which prepayment of freight charges was required. The accounts of the freight charges were kept in the following manner: A billing clerk, employed in the same office with the defendant, prepared in quadruplicate freight bills covering the various items of shipment. One copy, the original, was delivered to the defendant as cashier, and by him retained in the office until the bill was paid. The second copy was sent to the sugar company to notify them of the amount due. A third copy was sent to the head office of the railroad company, and the fourth copy was retained as an office record. The prepayment of freight charges was supposed to be a cash transaction and therefore, other than the copy of the bill itself, filed alphabetically in the cashier's office under the name of the shipper, no books, except a cash book, were kept in the office showing the freight bills due and unpaid.

Referring to the transaction in question said sugar company, after receiving said freight bills and verifying the correctness thereof, forwarded to said railroad company its check for $6,468.54, in payment of the same, together with a memorandum specifying the particular freight bills covered by the amount of the said check. The check and the memorandum accompanying the same were received by L. L. Davis, the agent in charge of said railroad company office, on November 5, 1923, and were by him delivered to the defendant, whose duty it was to receipt the original freight bills and forward them to the sugar company, then to deposit the check in the Central National Bank of Oakland to the credit of said railroad company and enter the bills as paid in the cash book, which it was his duty to keep. The check was drawn by said sugar company, in favor of the railroad company, against the account of said sugar company in a bank in which said sugar company had on deposit funds to meet its payment.

It appears that after the check was delivered to the defendant he receipted the original bills and sent them to the sugar company in the regular way. He also deposited the check in the bank to the credit of said railroad company. He failed, however, to make any entry in the cash book of the payment of those particular freight bills. Instead of doing so, he wrongfully carried those bills as being unpaid and credited the amount represented by said check to the payment of other freight bills of the said sugar company, which in fact had been previously paid, but upon which credit of payment had not been given, for the reason that the money which had been received by said railroad company in payment thereof had theretofore been embezzled by the defendant. Briefly stated, the defendant used the money represented by the check for $6,468.54 to cover prior defalcations. By the manipulation of the accounts in the manner thus narrated, he was able to balance his cash accounts at the close of the day, but nevertheless the books of the company showed a decrease in the company's assets in the amount represented by said check.

[1] The first contention made by appellant upon this appeal is that, inasmuch as he deposited the check for $6,468.54 to the credit of the railroad company, he committed no crime, even though he did credit the amount of said check to the wrong accounts for the purpose of covering up a shortage caused by previous defalcations. Appellant cites and relies upon the cases of Commonwealth v. Este, 140 Mass. 279, 2 N. E. 769; Dickey v. State, 65 Tex. Crim. 374, 144 S. W. 271; Gibson v. State, 13 Ga. App. 459, 79 S. E. 354. It may be conceded that the cases cited by appellant do hold as he contends. But, whatever may be the rule in those jurisdictions, it is quite certain that a different rule prevails in this state, for in the case of People v. Rowland, 12 Cal. App. 6, 106 Pac. 428, it is clearly held that the fraudulent secretion of money by an employee under the circumstances here shown, with intent to appropriate it to his own use, constitutes embezzlement, and that it is immaterial whether he actually drew the cash on the day on which the check was drawn or used the shortage of that day to cover up previous defalcations to the extent of the embezzlement which was committed on that day. That case is similar, both in fact and in law, to the instant case, and the rules therein stated are therefore controlling, not only on this point, but they also dispose of most of the other contentions made by appellant on this appeal.

In that case a depositor of a bank delivered to the defendant Rowland, as cashier of said bank, a check drawn upon and payable to said bank for $1,036.15, in payment of a note and interest held by said bank against said depositor. Rowland delivered to said depositor the canceled note, placed the check at the disposal of the bookkeeper for proper cancellation and entry, and personally entered the receipt of the interest, $36.15, in the interest account. Rowland failed, however, to make out and file the proper tag showing the payment of said note, and likewise omitted to make proper entry thereof in the "loan register" as he should have done. He actually applied the balance of said check, $1,000, to the payment of other accounts in order to cover up previous defalcations. The result of this transaction was that, notwithstanding the cash books of the bank balanced at the end of the day, the assets of the bank were decreased to the extent of $1,000. It was held embezzlement, the court saying:

> "By this we mean to be understood as saying that even if he actually took no money from the bank on the day of the Cook transaction but merely used it to juggle the books as to some other account in order to make it balance or appear straight, he nevertheless thereby misappropriated that particular money and in substantial effect wrongfuly converted it to his own use, the fraud of the transaction being indubitably shown, as we have seen, by the fact that he allowed the canceled note of Cook & Passalacqua to remain as though a living asset of the bank. If this is not embezzlement within the meaning of the law (Pen. Code, § 504), then we confess that we are at a loss to know what acts will constitute that offense."

Appellant makes the further contentions that there is a fatal variance between the proof and the indictment; that the court erred in admitting in evidence the admissions and confessions of the defendant for the reason, as he contends, that the corpus delicti had not been established, and that it also erred in admitting evidence of other acts of embezzlement and of the general shortage. All of those points are disposed of adversely to appellant's contention by the case of People v. Rowland, supra.

[2] Referring to the question of variance, appellant has cited several cases to the point that the proof of the embezzlement or larceny of a check or other evidence of money, without proof of the conversion of that check into money by the defendant, will not support a charge of embezzlement or larceny of money, and he argues, therefore, that it cannot be said here that a check actually received and deposited in the proper account and to the credit of the owner constitutes embezzlement of the actual money. In People v. Rowland, supra, the same as here, the defendant did not cash the check. The bank received credit for the amount thereof, but the sum represented by said check was used by the defendant to cover up his previous defalcations. The defendant there, as here, was charged, not with the embezzlement of the check or the proceeds of the check, but with secreting a specified amount of cash with intent to appropriate the same to his own use. The court pointed out that it was not necessary that the appellant actually appropriate the money alleged to have been embezzled, but that it was sufficient to prove that he fraudulently appropriated that amount of money to his own use and purpose, not in the due and lawful execution of his trust, the court saying:

> "So, as stated, if in the case here the money was either secreted within the meaning of the statute, or used to cover up some other shortage or actually taken from the vaults of the bank and used in some transaction with which the bank had no connection, the crime is, in either event, proved."

[3] There is no merit in the contention that the corpus delicti was not sufficiently established to allow proof of the extrajudicial admissions and confessions of the appellant. The fact that the state proved that the railroad company suffered a loss in assets on that day of $6,468.54, and that such loss was the result of the action of the appellant in fraudulently manipulating the accounts of said railroad company, was sufficient. People v. Rowland, supra.

[4] The trial court did not commit error in allowing evidence to be received of a general shortage which necessarily covered other acts of embezzlement. This evidence was admitted for the purpose of showing fraudulent intent and guilty knowledge, and to negative the idea of mistake or inadvertence. Those precise points were involved in People v. Rowland, and it was held that they were without merit. It is therefore unnecessary to discuss them further here. The case of People v. Walker, 142 Cal. 90, 75 Pac. 658, relied upon by appellant in support of this contention, is not applicable here for the reason that there the so-called shortage consisted merely of a general indebtedness due from the defendant to his employer, the inception of which was free from fraud or crime. Here it consisted of wrongful defalcations of the appellant.

[5] The further contention is made by appellant that error was committed by the trial court in receiving, over his objections, testimony of a witness for the state concerning the total amount of the general shortage of the appellant, ascertained by said witness from books kept by the appellant and from books of said sugar company not kept by the appellant. It is claimed that such testimony was hearsay. We are of the opinion that it was not hearsay, for the reason that the witness was testifying to matters within his own knowledge, acquired in the discharge of his duty. Moveover, the facts covered by this testimony were all established by the extrajudicial confession of the appellant, which was a part of the evidence in the case. Therefore the testimony given by the witness, if it did involve hearsay, was merely cumulative and therefore not harmful.

[6] Appellant also complains of the refusal of the trial court to give certain instructions proposed by the appellant. Those instructions were drafted upon the theory that appellant was charged with the embezzlement of a check or the proceeds of a check. As already pointed out, such was not the fact. He was not so charged The subject of embezzlement was $6.468.54 in "lawful money of the United States." The instructions proposed were therefore not applicable to the charge, and the refusal to give the same was not error.

The concluding point made by appellant is that if the appellant was guilty of any crime at all it was that of the embezzlement of the smaller amounts, which constituted a misdemeanor, part of which were repaid by the appellant out of the amount represented by the check in question, and that, since those smaller amounts were appropriated by the appellant more than a year prior to the date of the finding of the indictment, the misdemeanor resulting from said transactions was barred by the statute of limitations.

[7] It is obvious, we think, without discussion, and from what has already been said, that appellant was not charged with the embezzlement of the smaller amounts, but with the misappropriation, on November 5, 1923, of the sum of $6,468.54, in lawful money of the United States. Therefore there is no merit in the point last made.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment of conviction and the order appealed from are affirmed.

KIMBALL et al. v. BAXTER. (Civ. 4299.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 9, 1924. Rehearing Denied July 9, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 7, 1924.)

1. Partnership 🔑244—Surviving partner has duty to wind up partnership business without unnecessary delay.

Surviving partner occupies fiduciary position towards representatives of deceased partner and has the duty to wind up partnership business diligently and without unnecessary delay.

2. Partnership 🔑245(1)—Right of surviving partner to possession of assets stated.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1585, surviving partner is entitled to possession of firm assets and to settle partnership affairs unconfused by any control by representatives of deceased partner.

3. Partnership 🔑255(1)—Liability of surviving partner continuing business without consent of decedent's representatives, stated.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1585, when surviving partner continues partnership business unnecessarily without consent of decedent's representatives, he becomes liable either for profits made in business, including those made after his partner's death, or to account for surplus at death of decedent with interest, and representatives of decedent have right of election of those remedies.

4. Partnership 🔑258(10)—Findings in action for accounting against one as surviving partner held not contradictory.

In suit by personal representatives of deceased partner against one as surviving partner for an accounting, an interlocutory finding that defendant continued business as surviving partner was no more in effect than finding that he was surviving partner, and final finding that defendant had claimed the partnership assets as his own and appropriated them to his own use was not contradictory to finding of interlocutory judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Carolyn Kimball, as administratrix, and another, as administrator, of the estate of Wade H. Kimball, deceased, against W. E. Baxter. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. A. Freeman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

D. A. Stuart, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. The plaintiffs, as personal representatives of Wade H. Kimball, deceased, allege a partnership between decedent and defendant, and ask for an accounting. The answer denies the partnership. It avers in effect that the relationship between defendant and decedent was that of employer and employee, that the compensation to the decedent was to have been one-half of the net profit of the business, and that there was no net profit. By way of counterclaim defendant alleges a substantial indebtedness by decedent to defendant.

Evidence was taken and an interlocutory judgment entered. Thereby it was adjudged that the agreement between the parties was one of partnership, and a referee was provided "to take an account of all of the partnership dealings and transactions * * * from the time of the commencement thereof to the time of the dissolution thereof by the death of said Wade H. Kimball, and of the moneys received and paid by the said partners respectively in regard thereto, and of all dealings in and transactions had in regard to the property, assets and effects of said firm since its dissolution by the death of the said Wade H. Kimball, and of the property belonging to the business of said partnership sold or disposed of by said W. E. Baxter, either as surviving partner or otherwise, and of the moneys received and paid out by him on account thereof." From the interlocutory judgment no appeal was taken.

Kimball died May 18, 1919. The interlocutory judgment was entered December 31, 1920. The referee made an extensive examination requiring months of time, prepared a tentative statement pursuant to agreement of the parties, submitted this to them and held hearings thereon, and thereafter made and presented to the court his report and findings. Exceptions thereto were filed, testimony taken before the court, and on July 5, 1922, final findings of fact and conclusions of law were made. Thereby it was found that upon the death of Kimball defendant came into possession of all the property, effects, books, and papers of the partnership; that defendant did not proceed to wind up the partnership business, but proceeded to enlarge it, made new contracts, incurred new and enlarged indebtedness, increasing the liability from $56,359.02 at the time of Kimball's death on May 18, 1919, to $99,925.69 on July 26, 1920; that such increase was not necessary to the winding up of the partnership business; that on July 26, 1920, defendant exchanged the partnership business and properties for stock of a corporation organized by him; that upon the death of Kimball defendant "became possessed of all of the assets of the partnership business as the surviving partner and trustee by reason of being such surviving partner, and immediately claimed all of said assets as his own and appropriated the same to his own use, and resisted plaintiff's proceedings to force him to account to them as the representatives of the estate of decedent"; that the conduct of the business by defendant after Kimball's death resulted in a loss; that the plaintiffs have elected to accept in lieu of any other claim the amount of the profits of the partnership business which belonged to decedent at the time of his death, with interest thereon. The profits of the partnership from the beginning to the death of Kimball were then determined, based upon the referee's report with certain modifications, the counterclaim of the defendant was allowed, and the court concluded that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment for the difference, with interest from Kimball's death. For this judgment was entered. Defendant appeals.

[1-3] A surviving partner is entitled to possession of the partnership assets and to settle its affairs, unconfused by any control by the representatives of a deceased partner. Code Civ. Proc. § 1585; Theller v. Such, 57 Cal. 447; Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 168 Cal. 120, 142 Pac. 83; Minifie v. Rowley, 187 Cal. 481, 202 Pac. 673. However, he occupies a fiduciary position toward such representatives and is held to a strict accountability. It is his duty to wind up the partnership business diligently and without unnecessary delay. When he continues it unnecessarily without the consent of the decedent's representatives, he acts at his peril and becomes liable either for the profits made in the business, including those made after his partner's death, or to account for the surplus at the time of the death of the deceased partner, with interest thereon, and the representatives of the deceased partner have the right of election of these remedies. Code Civ. Proc. § 1585; Theller v. Such, supra, p. 460; Berson v. Ewing, 84 Cal. 94, 23 Pac. 1112; Brown's Appeal, 89 Pa. 147; Killefer v. McLain, 78 Mich. 249, 44 N. W. 405; Hooley v. Gieve, 9 Daley, 104, 112; Id., 73 N. Y. 599; Dickens v. Dickens, 174 Ala. 345, 357, 56 South. 809; Goodburn v. Stevens, 1 Md. Ch. 420; Clay v. Field, 138 U. S. 473, 11 Sup. Ct. 419, 34 L. Ed. 1044; Storey on Partnership (7th Ed.) § 344; 30 Cyc. 640. This rule is peculiarly salutary where, as here, the survivor denied the partnership and claimed its assets as his own.

[4] Defendant contends that the court in its interlocutory findings and judgment determined that since Kimball's death Baxter "has conducted said business as the surviving partner and has been in possession of all the books, business and assets of said partnership"; that this finding is final (Zappettini v. Buckles, 167 Cal. 27, 138 Pac. 696; Williams v. Reed, 43 Cal. App. 425, 185 Pac. 515); and that the subsequent finding and judgment that defendant claimed the assets as his own and appropriated them to his own use is irreconcilably contradictory to the finding of the interlocutory judgment. This part of the later finding is not necessary to the judgment; but assuming it to be, appellant's position cannot be sustained. There is nothing necessarily contradictory between the two findings. Baxter did come into possession of the partnership as the surviving partner. He may have conducted that business "as the surviving partner"—he could not in contemplation of law do otherwise. To find that Baxter "conducted the business as surviving partner" is nothing more in legal effect than a finding that he was the surviving partner. It is surely not a finding that he conducted the business rightfully, or that he proceeded without delay to close the partnership affairs. This could not be determined except by a long and involved accounting in court or through the medium of the referee. The trial court appropriately chose the latter method. When the referee's work was completed, it clearly appeared from his findings and from evidence taken by the court upon the objections thereto that Baxter, while acting under his trust as surviving partner, had not proceeded to wind up the partnership affairs but had enlarged the business, increased its liabilities, attempted to appropriate to his own use the whole of the partnership property, and finally had sold its assets as his own to a corporation organized by him and for stock issued to him. The final finding to such effect then made was proper.

What we have said disposes of all of appellant's contentions except the one that the referee and the court erred in the finding as to the surplus at the time of Kimball's death. An examination of the record shows this point to be without merit. The referee founded his report upon the best evidence available, and it was sufficient.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HINES. (Cr. 1181.)

1. Criminal law ⚷511(2)—Evidence corroborating accomplice held sufficient to warrant conviction on his testimony.

Evidence adduced in corroboration of accomplice held to tend to connect defendant with offense charged so as to warrant conviction on testimony of accomplice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Walter Hines was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

H. D. Perry, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery and from that judgment he has appealed. On the nights of the 14th and 15th of November, 1923, two men robbed R. E. Barr in Alameda county. Immediately prior to the robbery R. E. Barr and Miss Alice Heeney were seated in an automobile in front of her residence at 1817 Castro street in Oakland. At some time around 11:30 in the evening two men approached the automobile, one on the right-hand side, one on the left-hand side, and by threats caused the occupants to get out of the front seat and to enter the car and take seats in back, while the two men proceeded to occupy the front seat. One man drove the car and the other held the gun. The street lights were sufficient for both Mr. Barr and Miss Heeney to see, and they did see the two men more or less distinctly. While these persons were seated in the car as described above, the man at the wheel drove to Brush street, thence out to Market and down Park street, and then back to San Pablo and out San Pablo to Stanford avenue, then down Stanford avenue to the point where the robbery took place. As stated above, Mr. Barr and Miss Heeney sat immediately behind the robbers during that period of time. From what he saw Mr. Barr testified that the defendant resembled the taller man of the two. He said he could not see the defendant's face, but the other man he could identify. Miss Heeney testified:

> "One of the men was a little taller than the other. The tall man was the stockier of the two. Considering the size, weight, and stature of these men I saw that night the defendant resembles the tallest man."

As to when the accused were arrested the record does not show, but before the 21st day of December both of the accused were in custody. On a date somewhat prior to the date last mentioned the defendant and Charles Leraux were before John Mulhern, an inspector of police in Oakland. At that time Leraux had confessed to being one of the robbers. Mulhern had been talking to Hines, and sent for Leraux to be brought in. When Leraux came in Hines was asked whether he knew Leraux. He stated that he did, but that he had not seen him for several months or a year; that he really forgot the time. On the trial he was sworn as a witness in his own behalf, and testified that he had not seen Leraux for 18 months; that is, since the 26th of August, 1922. Ione Ratelle testified that she was the wife of the man who goes by the name of Charles Leraux. She said that she met the defendant with her husband at her home on 18th street in Oakland in the evening about the middle of November, 1923. They came to the house about 9 o'clock in the evening and stayed there for an hour or so and left. They came back some time after midnight, and stayed at the house until the next morning. After breakfast the defendant left. Charles Leraux testified that he and the defendant committed the robbery.

On this appeal the appellant makes one point, and that is that there was not sufficient corroboration to warrant a conviction. In this behalf the appellant points out that Leraux was an accomplice under the facts stated, and the appellant claims that the testimony of Leraux was entirely unsupported by any other evidence. Thereupon he cites and relies upon People v. Morton, 139 Cal. 719, 73 Pac. 609; People v. Robbins, 171 Cal. 466, 154 Pac. 317; People v. Sciaroni, 4 Cal. App. 698, 89 Pac. 133; People v. Main, 114 Cal. 632, 46 Pac. 612; and People v. Smith, 189 Cal. 31, 207 Pac. 518. While the proposition of law as stated by the appellant is perfectly sound, its application to the facts of this case is entirely unsupported. Without referring to the evidence of the accomplice, there was clearly evidence before the trial court which tended to connect the appellant with the offense charged.

HASEROT v. KELLER. (Civ. 4387.)

1. Trusts 🔑354—Seller has remedy against proceeds of property conveyed by fraudulent vendee to innocent purchaser.

When a fraudulent vendee has conveyed property or any interest therein to a third party who by reason of his innocence acquires a good title as against equity of original vendor, latter has remedy against substituted property.

2. Patents 🔑192—Patentee held accountable for royalties under licenses granted after obtaining assignment of interest by fraud.

Patentee, who by fraud procured his co-owner to assign his interest, had patent reissued to himself as sole patentee, and granted exclusive rights to innocent licensees, was bound to account to co-owner for share of royalties.

3. Contracts 🔑318—Forfeitures not favored.

Forfeitures are not favored in the law, and any inconsistent acts or dealings by party claiming a forfeiture will be regarded as a waiver thereof.

4. Estoppel 🔑57—Waiver need not be supported by valuable consideration.

To constitute a waiver of a forfeiture, there need not be a new agreement nor a valuable consideration; a simple voluntary relinquishment of a right with knowledge of all the facts not to demand a certain thing being sufficient.

5. Patents 🔑192—Patentee held to have waived right to reassignment of co-owner's interest in patent.

Patentee waived a reassignment of a co-owner's interest in a patent under a contract providing for assignment on failure to sell a certain number of patented articles during year following execution of contract, where patent was not issued until almost four months after expiration of year and patentee requested co-owner not to sell before issuance of patent, and falsely represented to co-owner that by reason of certain improvements patent was valueless to co-owner.

6. Patents 🔑192—Co-owner of patent held excused from tendering performance under contract.

If provision in contract for reassignment by co-owner of interest in a patent on failure to sell a certain number of patented articles did not amount to covenant for a forfeiture, co-owner was excused from performance under Civ. Code, § 1511, where patentee falsely represented that patent was valueless to co-owner because of certain improvements.

7. Fraud 🔑11(1)—Representations must be of fact.

Generally in an action for deceit, the representations must be of a fact as distinguished from a mere matter of opinion, which ordinarily is not presumed to deceive or mislead.

8. Fraud 🔑11(1)—Expression of opinion may be actionable.

When one of the parties possesses or assumes to possess superior knowledge regarding subject-matter of representation and other party is so situated that he may reasonably rely upon such supposed superior knowledge, a representation, though it might be regarded as an expression of opinion if made by any other person, is not excused if false.

9. Patents 🔑192—Patentee's statement that improvements on patented device rendered it valueless to co-owner held a positive assertion of fact.

Patentee's statement to co-owner to induce an assignment of co-owner's interest, that undisclosed improvements perfected by him on patented device rendered it valueless to co-owner, was a positive assertion of fact as to which he possessed means of information not accessible to co-owner, and not a mere opinion.

10. Contracts 🔑265—Party seeking to rescind contract must place other party in status quo.

Party seeking to rescind a contract and obtain retransfer of property must ordinarily place or offer to place other party in same position he would have occupied if contract or transfer had not been made.

11. Contracts 🔑266(2) — Person attempting to rescind for fraud not required to restore that which he is entitled to retain.

A person attempting to rescind a transaction for fraud is not required to offer to restore that which in any event he would be entitled to retain.

12. Patents 🔑192—Failure of plaintiff's complaint to offer to refund such sum as might be due after taking of account held immaterial.

In an action to cancel an assignment of plaintiff's interest in a patent and to compel defendant to account for profits by reason thereof, failure of plaintiff's complaint to contain a formal offer to refund such sum as court might decree to be due from him after taking of the account was immaterial, in absence of a special demurrer, where he alleged that he was ready to perform all terms and conditions of his original agreement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Rupert W. Haserot against Clarence D. Keller. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James E. Kelby and Kemp & Clewett, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. C. Shelton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to cancel an assignment of plaintiff's interest in a patent and to compel defendant to account for the profits gained by him by reason of the assignment. The gravamen of the action is fraud on the part of defendant, by reason whereof plaintiff was induced to execute the assignment. Judgment passed for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

The facts as found by the trial court in response to issues tendered by the pleadings are substantially these: Plaintiff and defendant were friends and neighbors residing in the city of Los Angeles. On July 18, 1917, the parties executed a written agreement, the embodiment of a similar oral agreement previously entered into by them on June 1, 1917. The written agreement, after reciting that defendant is the inventor of an automobile windshield improvement, that he desires to make application to the United States government for letters patent, and that both parties desire to exploit the invention to the best possible advantage, sets forth, among other covenants, the following: (1) Plaintiff agrees to bear the expense of securing the patent, to pay to defendant the sum of $250 after the patent shall have been issued, to bear the expense of putting the invention on the market, and to sell a minimum number of 25 sets of windshields per month; (2) defendant agrees to transfer to plaintiff an undivided one-half interest in the invention and in the letters patent to be obtained therefor; (3) in case plaintiff, for any reason, should fail to manufacture and sell a minimum of 25 sets per month, he is to reassign his undivided one-half interest to defendant on demand, such demand not to be made prior to one year from the date of the contract.

On June 14, 1917, the parties, pursuant to their oral agreement, made application for letters patent in defendant's name, the cost whereof was paid by plaintiff as he had undertaken to do. On June 17, 1917, defendant, pursuant to his agreement, transferred to plaintiff an undivided one-half interest in the invention. On November 12, 1918, a United States patent was issued to plaintiff and defendant jointly.

Subsequently to the application for letters patent but prior to the issuance thereof, plaintiff requested defendant to supply him with samples of the device so that he could exploit the invention and put it upon the market pursuant to his agreement. Defendant not only refused to comply with this request, but told plaintiff that he did not want the latter to exploit the patent or to sell any of the patented devices until letters patent should be issued. Plaintiff, in compliance with this expressed wish on the part of defendant, made no effort to exploit the invention or to manufacture or sell any of the devices. Thereafter, but prior to the issuance of the letters patent, defendant told plaintiff that the patent applied for would be of no value to plaintiff for the reason that the former had perfected certain improvements upon the device and that such improvements belonged solely to him. The nature of these asserted improvements was not disclosed to plaintiff. Defendant's statements that the patent applied for would be rendered valueless to plaintiff by reason of defendant's improvements upon the device were false and fraudulent, were known by defendant to be false, and were made for the purpose of discouraging plaintiff and to induce him to abandon his contract, to the end that defendant could thus obtain the entire control of the patent and procure a reassignment to him of plaintiff's undivided half interest for a nominal consideration. Plaintiff, believing defendant's statements and relying thereon, was induced thereby to fail to advance the final payment for the patent, amounting to $20, and also was induced to refrain from further attempting to carry out the terms of his agreement.

Again, on January 11, 1919, the date of the assignment which plaintiff is seeking to have canceled by this suit, and on several occasions prior to such assignment, defendant, for the purpose of misleading and defrauding plaintiff and to induce him to assign his interest in the patent for a nominal consideration, reiterated his statements to plaintiff that he (defendant) had perfected certain improvements upon the patented device, the nature of which he refused to disclose, and that by reason thereof the patent was rendered valueless to plaintiff, and that he (plaintiff) would lose all he had invested in the patent unless he sold and assigned his undivided one-half interest therein to defendant. These statements that the improvements would render the patent valueless to plaintiff, like those previously made by defendant, were false, were known by defendant to be false, and were made at a time when defendant was actually negotiating with third parties for the payment to him of substantial and profitable royalties in return for licenses to manufacture and sell the patented article. Plaintiff had no knowledge of these negotiations, and the fact that they were pending was fraudulently concealed from him by defendant. By reason of this concealment and of defendant's false and fraudulent statements that the improvements upon the patented device would render the patent valueless to plaintiff, the latter, on January 11, 1919, for the nominal consideration of $100, was induced to and did assign to defendant all of his half interest in and to the invention and in and to the letters patent. Thereafter defendant caused a reissue of the letters patent to be made to him by the government. Since then defendant has transferred to the third parties with whom he previously had carried on negotiations the exclusive right to manufacture and sell the patented device within the territory of the United States, and has received therefor royalties aggregating $7,708.70.

Before commencing this action plaintiff tendered to defendant $100, the amount which defendant had paid to plaintiff at the time of the latter's assignment of his interest in and to the patent. At the same time plaintiff demanded rescission and a cancellation of his assignment to defendant.

By its judgment the court decreed: (1) That plaintiff's assignment of his one-half interest to defendant be rescinded; (2) that defendant holds an undivided one-half interest in and to the reissued patent in trust for plaintiff; (3) that within ten days defendant, by proper assignment, convey to plaintiff such undivided one-half interest, and that upon his failure so to do the clerk of the court execute such conveyance; (4) that defendant holds in trust for plaintiff an undivided one-half interest in and to the royalty contracts made by defendant; and (5) that plaintiff have judgment against defendant for $1,849.35, with interest. The last-mentioned sum is one-half of the royalties received by defendant from his licensees, less the amounts which plaintiff had obligated himself to pay when he entered into his original agreement with defendant. The net sum so awarded to plaintiff was the result of an accounting taken by the court whereby the respective equities of the parties were adjusted.

In addition to the findings already mentioned, the trial court found that the written agreement of July 18, 1917, was a partnership agreement for the joint exploitation of the patent. Both parties to this appeal seem to assume that this finding of a partnership constitutes the sole basis for plaintiff's right to compel defendant to account for the royalties received by him from the licensees to whom he had granted, after the reissue to him of letters patent, the exclusive right to manufacture and sell the patented device in the United States.

The grounds of the appeal are: (1) That a partnership relation was not created by the original parol agreement nor by the written agreement of July 18, 1917; that therefore the finding of a partnership is not supported by the evidence; and that if there be no partnership plaintiff is not entitled to any part of the royalties received by defendant from the licensees. (2) That plaintiff is not entitled to any relief whatever because: (a) He did not fully perform either his oral agreement of June 1, 1917, or his written agreement of July 18, 1917, and therefore defendant was entitled as of right to a reassignment of plaintiff's interest in the patent; (b) defendant's representation that the patent was rendered valueless to plaintiff was the statement of an opinion and not the misrepresentation of a fact; (c) plaintiff's tender of $100 at the time when he demanded a rescission was not a sufficient offer to restore the status quo.

[1, 2] As we view the case it is immaterial whether the joint venture created by the original oral agreement or by the written agreement of July 18, 1917, did or did not amount to a partnership, and it therefore is of no consequence whether the evidence does or does not support the finding of a partnership. In either case respondent would be entitled to one-half of the royalties received by appellant, less the credits allowed the latter by the court's decree. It is a familiar principle that when a fraudulent vendee has conveyed the property, or any interest therein, to a third party, who, by reason of his innocence, acquires a good and valid title as against the equity of the original vendor, the latter has a remedy against the substituted property, which in this case is that part of the royalties received by appellant as the result of his transfer to the licensees of respondent's individual right in and to the monopoly created by the patent.

Appellant claims that the principle last announced is inapplicable where, as here, a patent right is the subject-matter of the transfer to the fraudulent vendee. The case chiefly relied upon by appellant to support this claim is Blackledge v. Weir & Craig Mfg. Co., 108 Fed. 71, 47 C. C. A. 212. The facts pleaded by the plaintiff in that case showed that the defendant, a co-owner of letters patent, did no more than transfer to licensees its own separate right in the patent as a co-owner thereof. It is true that the declaration, which was in assumpsit, alleged that the defendant, at Chicago and elsewhere throughout the United States, had by itself "exercised the exclusive rights of both owners" by granting licenses, shop rights, and other rights under the letters patent. But it was held that under the facts there alleged it was not possible that defendant could have exercised the rights of both co-owners—for which reason it was held that the defendant was not accountable to its co-owner for any part of the profits received by it. There the defendant, unlike the defendant in this case, had not clothed itself with the apparent lawful title to the entire patent; and the defendant's licensees, so it would seem, knew that their licensor was only a part owner of the patent. It was evidently in view of this knowledge on the part of the licensees that the federal court, in sustaining a general demurrer to the declaration, said:

> "Knowing the law, the parties to the contract [i. e., the defendant and its licensees] knew that the stipulated grant could confer upon the licensees only the right of the licensor—that is to say, the right to make, use and vend the patented article—but not an exclusive right, because the other patentees might confer upon rival manufacturers or dealers equal privileges under the patent. This being so, it is to be presumed that the price agreed to be paid for the individual license, which left the other patentees free to use and to license others to use the invention, was less than would have been paid for a license from all of the patentees. * * * The separate action of any one owner or of his licensees can be an exercise or use only of his individual right, which, though exclusive of all besides, is not exclusive of the other patentees, their assignees or licensees. On principle, therefore, there can be no accountability on the part of a part owner of an invention to other owners for profits made by the exercise of his individual right, whether it be by engaging in the manufacture and sale, or by granting to others licenses, or by assigning interests in the patent. His use of the invention in any lawful way is not an appropriation of anything which belongs to another. The separate rights of the other owners remain unaffected. They are equally free to use the invention in all legitimate ways for their individual profit. * * * It follows that the charge in the declaration that the defendant 'has by itself exercised the exclusive rights granted to both the plaintiff and defendant' is not true." (Italics ours.)

Between that case and this there is a wide gulf. In the present case appellant, by his fraudulent conduct, caused himself to be vested with all the indicia of title to the patent as the sole and exclusive owner thereof and of all the monopoly created thereby. As the result of his fraudulent conduct in procuring the assignment from respondent, appellant was able to and did procure the reissue of letters patent to himself as the sole patentee. Having thus wrongfully garbed himself with the apparent title to the patent as the sole owner of all of the monopolistic rights created thereby, appellant granted to innocent licensees the exclusive right to manufacture and sell the patented device throughout the United States—granting to one the exclusive right to manufacture and sell in all the territory east of the Mississippi river, and to another a similar right to manufacture and sell west of the Mississippi river. As innocent licensees for value, the parties from whom appellant received the royalties may successfully contest any right which respondent may assert to manufacture or sell the patented device in any part of the United States. It thus will be seen that appellant, by his fraudulent conduct, has completely destroyed respondent's right as a co-owner of the letters patent. It follows, therefore, that the mere cancellation of the assignment which respondent executed to appellant, or even a reassignment by appellant of an undivided one-half interest in the patent, would be but the shadow of a victory for respondent; and unless appellant can be made to account to respondent for the latter's share of all royalties paid or agreed to be paid by the licensees, respondent, to all practical intents and purposes, will be remediless. Throughout the opinion in Blackledge v. Weir & Craig Mfg. Co., supra, there runs the implication that one wronged as was this respondent is entitled to an accounting. Thus in the concluding sentence of its opinion the court in that case says:

> "* * * It is not alleged that the defendant has intentionally and wrongfully so exercised its individual right under the patent as to destroy the value of the equal right possessed by the plaintiff."

This language implies that if the defendant in that case had intentionally and wrongfully destroyed the value of the equal right possessed by its co-owner, the latter would have been entitled to his share of the royalties and to an accounting therefor.

Our conclusion on this branch of the appeal is that appellant, by granting exclusive rights to innocent licensees at a time when he was the apparent owner of all the monopoly created by the reissued letters patent, undertook to and did exercise not only his own individual right as a co-owner but also the individual right which, in equity, belong to respondent as a co-owner, and that therefore appellant was properly held accountable for the profits which accrued to him by his wrongful exercise of respondent's right.

[3, 4] Appellant's next claim is that, irrespective of the fraud practiced by him upon respondent to induce the latter to execute the assignment, he was in any event rightfully entitled to such assignment by reason of respondent's failure to perform his agreement to manufacture and sell a minimum of twenty-five sets of windshields per month. We can perceive no merit in this claim. The provision in the contract whereby respondent agreed that if for any reason he should fail to sell a minimum of 25 sets of windshields per month he would "reassign his undivided one-half interest in said invention and in said patent * * * on demand, * * * said demand not to be made prior to a year from the date of this contract," partakes of the nature of an agreement for a forfeiture. It contemplates a loss of respondent's rights under the contract and a loss of his right in and to the patent should he fail to sell the stipulated number of windshields during the year following the execution of the contract. The only purpose which could be served by a formal written reassignment, in the event that respondent should so lose his rights, is that by such formal reassignment appellant could be furnished with written evidence that he had become reinvested with respondent's title as the result of the forfeiture of the latter's rights. But forfeitures are not favored in the law; and any inconsistent acts or dealings by the party claiming a forfeiture will be regarded as a waiver thereof. To constitute a waiver there need not be a new agreement nor a valuable consideration. Viele v. Germania Ins. Co., 26 Iowa, 9, 96 Am. Dec. 83; Roblee v. Masonic Life Ass'n, 38 Misc. Rep. 481, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1098. A simple voluntary relinquishment of a right with knowledge of all the facts—an expression of intention, by speech or conduct, not to demand a certain thing—is sufficient to constitute such a waiver.

[5, 6] Here the facts found by the court show conclusively that, by his speech and conduct, appellant waived the forfeiture and therefore his right to a reassignment. The year within which respondent was to sell the minimum number of windshields did not expire until July 18, 1918. The patent did not issue until November 12, 1918, or almost four months after the expiration of the year within which respondent was to put the windshields on the market. As we have stated, the court found that shortly after the execution of the contract of July 18, 1917, appellant, when requested to furnish respondent with the necessary samples wherewith to put the invention on the market, replied that he (appellant) did not want respondent to sell any of the patented articles until after the issuance of the letters patent. This alone was a waiver of appellant's right to a forfeiture. But more than this, appellant, as we have seen, falsely represented to respondent, prior to the issuance of the patent, that by reason of certain improvements which he claimed to have made the patent was rendered valueless to respondent. This representation was made for the very purpose of discouraging respondent and to induce him to abandon his contract. Such conduct on the part of appellant was wholly inconsistent with his right to claim a forfeiture, and unquestionably amounted to a waiver of any right to a forfeiture of respondent's rights as a co-owner of the patent. And even if the provision for a reassignment to appellant did not amount to a covenant for a forfeiture, respondent nevertheless would be excused from performance by that provision of section 1511 of our Civil Code, which reads:

> "The want of performance of an obligation, or of an offer of performance, in whole or in part, or any delay therein, is excused by the following causes, to the extent to which they operate: * * * (3) When the debtor is induced not to make it, by any act of the creditor intended or naturally tending to have that effect, done at or before the time at which such performance or offer may be made, and not rescinded before that time."

[7, 8] Appellant's positive assertion as a fact that the patent was rendered valueless to respondent by reason of the improvements made by the former was not the mere expression of an opinion, but was the representation of a material fact. It is, of course, generally speaking, true that in an action for deceit the representation must be of a fact as distinguished from a mere matter of opinion, which ordinarily is not presumed to deceive or to mislead. But to this general rule there are many qualifications and modifications which are as important as the rule itself. Thus when one of the parties possesses, or assumes to possess, superior knowledge or special information regarding the subject-matter of the representation, and the other party is so situated that he may reasonably rely upon such supposed superior knowledge or special information, a representation made by the party possessing or assuming to possess such knowledge or information, though it might be regarded as but the expression of an opinion if made by any other person, is not excused if it be false. Palladine v. Imperial Valley Farm Lands Ass'n, 225 Pac. 291; McDonald v. Smith, 139 Mich. 211, 102 N. W. 668; Grim v. Byrd, 32 Grat. 293; Turk v. Botsford, 70 Ore. 198, 139 Pac. 925; White v. Peters (Tex. Civ. App.) 185 S. W. 659; Allen v. Hart, 72 Ill. 104; Benolkin v. Guthrie, 111 Wis. 554, 87 N. W. 466; Schoefield Gear & Pulley Co. v. Schoefield, 71 Conn. 1, 40 Atl. 1046; Wilson v. Nichols, 72 Conn. 173, 43 Atl. 1052. "A matter of opinion may amount to an affirmation of fact, when the parties are not dealing upon equal terms, and one of them has, or is presumed to have means of information not equally open to the other." Boelk v. Nolan, 56 Ore. 229, 237, 107 Pac. 689, 691. As was aptly said by Judge Hand in Vulcan Metals Co. v. Simmons Mfg. Co., 248 Fed. 853, 161 C. C. A. 7:

> "We should treat very differently the expressed opinion of a chemist to a layman about the properties of a composition from the same opinion between chemist and chemist."

It has been said by an eminent jurist:

> "It is material to observe that it is often fallaciously assumed that a statement of opinion cannot involve the statement of a fact. * * * If the facts are not equally known to both sides, then a statement of opinion by the one who knows the facts best involves very often a statement of a material fact, for he impliedly states that he knows facts which justify his opinion." Lord Bowen in Smith v. Land, etc., Corporation, 28 L. R. Ch. Div. p. 15.

Schoefield Gear, etc., Co. v. Schoefield, supra, was an action against the fraudulent vendor of a patented article who had falsely represented to the vendee that there was a large demand for the article and that he had found the making of it "a good and profitable business." There the court said:

> "Whatever opinion he [the fraudulent vendor] communicates is so blended with the statement of the facts upon which it arises that it becomes itself a statement of fact. He could best tell whether his business was profitable, and his invention in demand, and these were points on which the execution of the contract turned. Opinions might differ as to what measure of profit might make a business profitable, or how many orders might suffice to constitute a large demand, but the conclusion arrived at was one as to the existence of a state of facts, and certainly 'related to matters of fact of which the defendant had knowledge.'"

[9] Appellant, when he stated that the patent was rendered valueless to respondent by reason of the improvements, possessed means of information not accessible to his vendor. He knew, but respondent did not know, the nature of the improvements. Indeed, the improvements, whatever they may have been, their nature, and their attributes, were sedulously concealed by appellant from respondent. Under these circumstances appellant's statement that his improvements upon the patented device rendered the patent valueless to respondent was not the expression of mere opinion and surmise not based on knowledge, but was the positive assertion of a fact claimed to be based on an intimate knowledge of facts from which an inerrant conclusion could be deduced with certainty. That appellant was fully cognizant of the falsity of his representation that his improvements would render the patent valueless to respondent is conclusively shown by the circumstance that at the very time when he was making the representation he was successfully negotiating with third parties for the payment to him of valuable royalties in exchange for the right to manufacture and sell the patented device. The foregoing authorities and sound principle justify our holding the representation to be actionable.

As his final point appellant urges that to entitle respondent to rescission and to a cancellation of his assignment it was not sufficient merely to make tender of the amount which was actually paid to respondent at the time when the assignment was fraudulently procured, namely, the sum of $100, but that it was necessary that respondent, before bringing his action, should also make tender of the several amounts which were payable by him under the terms of the original agreement, i. e., the sum of $20, the final payment due to the government upon the issuance of the letters patent, the sum of $250, the amount which respondent had agreed to pay appellant after the patent should be granted, and a sum equal to the total expense of putting the invention upon the market, the amount whereof, as found by the court, was $1,150. In other words, it is argued that to restore the status quo it was not sufficient to tender the $100 and revive respondent's obligations under the original agreement, but that it was necessary for respondent to offer to perform those obligations.

[10, 11] Without doubt, the party seeking to rescind a contract and to obtain a retransfer of property must, ordinarily, place or offer to place the other party in the same position he would have occupied if the contract of transfer had not been made. There are, however, exceptions to this rule of restoration. One is that a person attempting to rescind a transaction upon the ground of fraud is not required to offer to restore that which, in any event, he would be entitled to retain. Richards v. Fraser, 122 Cal. 456, 461, 55 Pac. 246; Gatje v. Armstrong, 145 Cal. 370, 374, 78 Pac. 872; Matteson v. Wagoner, 147 Cal. 739, 740, 82 Pac. 436. Another exception recognized by the courts is where the taking of an account is necessary for the ascertainment of the sum to be repaid.

"Where a plaintiff comes into a court of equity asking for the rescission in whole or in part of a contract, or to be relieved of a portion of a contract, and the taking of an account is necessary for the ascertainment of the sum to be repaid, or the sum is to be liquidated by an adjudication based on evidence of facts independent of the terms of the contract itself, an offer to refund such sum as shall be decreed is a sufficient offer to do equity. In such case the plaintiff cannot determine, in advance of the suit, the amount by him to be repaid, and is not required to make an actual tender of such amount before commencing his action." Sutter St. R. R. Co. v. Baum, 66 Cal. 52, 4 Pac. 916.

See, also, California, etc., Co. v. Schiappa-Pietra, 151 Cal. 740, 91 Pac. 593, and Billings v. Aspen Min., etc., Co., 51 Fed. 338, 2 C. C. A. 252.

[12] The case at bar comes clearly within this statement of the rule. While it is true that respondent's complaint does not contain a formal offer to refund such sum, if any, as the court might decree to be due from him after the taking of the account, he nevertheless does allege that he is "ready, willing and able to perform all the terms and conditions" of his original agreement. In the absence of a special demurrer, this allegation of willingness and ability to pay must be taken as the equivalent of a formal offer to refund such sum, if any, as might be decreed to be due from respondent after an accounting. In view of this allegation and the facts as found by the court—facts which establish beyond peradventure that there is no balance to be paid by respondent, but that, on the contrary, a net balance is due to him—a gross miscarriage of justice would result if the judgment should be reversed merely because the complaint does not contain a formal offer to pay any balance which might be found to be due from respondent after the taking of the account demanded by him in his complaint.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ELLENA. (Cr. 1077.)

1. Criminal law 🔑517(4)—Evidence held sufficient to establish corpus delicti to warrant admission of confession.

In prosecution for driving automobile on public highway while intoxicated, evidence held sufficient to establish corpus delicti so as to warrant admission of confession.

2. Criminal law 🔑532(1)—Admission of confession before corpus delicti fully proven held not error.

In prosecution for driving automobile while intoxicated, admitting evidence of defendant's confession that he was driving automobile at time of accident before commission of criminal offense had been fully proven held not error.

3. Criminal law 🔑532(1)—Rule stated as to order of proof of confession and corpus delicti.

Although as general rule before corpus delicti is established confession of defendant is inadmissible, order of proof in such circumstances is not important, if aside from such confession corpus delicti be established by independent evidence.

4. Highways 🔑186—Particular evidence held admissible in prosecution for driving automobile while intoxicated.

In prosecution for driving automobile while intoxicated, for purpose of showing that driver was intoxicated it was proper to show that all persons riding on front seat were intoxicated immediately after accident resulting from careless driving.

5. Criminal law 🔑1144(10)—In absence of argument, assumed that error of judge alleged generally in cross-examining witness not prejudicial.

Where no special error was charged, nor argument made, nor authority cited in support of accused's contention that trial judge erred in asking witness immaterial questions on matters fully covered by district attorney, it will be assumed that there was no prejudicial error.

6. Criminal law 🔑437—Map made by witness held admissible as against objection that he was not sufficiently qualified to make it.

In prosecution for driving automobile while intoxicated, map of scene of accident resulting from driving of defendant, made by witness who had been for seven years deputy county surveyor, and who had made map from notes taken by himself at place of accident, held admissible as against objection that he was not sufficiently qualified to make map.

7. Criminal law 🔑1169(4)—Alleged error in admitting map without being sufficiently identified held cured by subsequent evidence.

Any error in admitting map of scene of accident, resulting from alleged drunken driving of automobile by defendant because not sufficiently identified, held cured by subsequent evidence received on question of identity.

8. Criminal law 🔑1130(2)—Alleged error in rulings on evidence not considered because of indefiniteness of specifications and of failure to argue.

Specification of error in rulings on evidence, covering 8 pages of accused's brief entire testimony of witnesses, from which excerpts were copied covering 40 pages of reporter's transcript not considered, where counsel failed to point out rulings he considered erroneous or to argue any of the objections.

9. Criminal law 🔑763, 764(20)—Instruction held to constitute unwarranted charge on matter of fact.

Instruction that admission of accused, immediately subsequent to act charged as offense was not sufficient of itself to warrant conviction, standing by itself trenches upon Const. art. 6, § 19, forbidding judges to charge juries with respect to matters of fact.

10. Criminal law 🔑822(1)—Meaning of instruction ascertained by considering it as part of entire body of instructions.

In construing an instruction, it must be taken, not as separate statement of the law, but its true intent and meaning must be ascertained by considering it as part of entire body of instructions.

11. Criminal law 🔑823(11)—Instruction warranting inference that defendant had made certain admissions held not cause for reversal, in view of other instructions.

Instruction from which it might have been inferred that defendant had made certain admissions held not cause for reversal as likely to mislead, in view of other instructions as to province of jury as to facts.

12. Witnesses 🔑363(1)—Question as to payment of money to witness and bringing suit against defendant's family held proper.

In prosecution for driving automobile while intoxicated, questions to witness who was riding in automobile whether she had received money from accused's family, or whether settlement of her claim for damages against his family had been made, and as to proposed action against his family, were proper to show interest.

13. Criminal law 🔑317—Failure to call alleged impeaching witness held not to raise presumption of bad faith in laying foundation for impeachment.

Where district attorney asked witness question, in form complying with Code Civ. Proc. § 2052, as to whether witness at specified time and place and in presence of certain lawyer made certain statement, it could not be presumed from mere failure to call lawyer as a witness that district attorney was acting in bad faith in laying foundation for impeachment.

14. Criminal law 🔑730(10)—Comment on defendant's failure to testify held not cause for reversal in view of instruction to disregard.

Comment of district attorney in argument on fact that when accused was put on stand he was asked but single question, in view of direction of court to disregard statement, held not so prejudicial as to result in miscarriage of justice.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

Frank Ellena was convicted of driving an automobile when intoxicated, and he appeals. Affirmed.

E. W. Bartlett, of Colton, and Jesse R. Shafer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen. and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant was convicted of the offense of driving an automobile upon a public highway at a time when defendant was under the influence of intoxicating liquor. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

In brief, as shown by the evidence, the facts were that defendant and five other persons were riding in an automobile from which, by reason of the careless manner in which it was driven, three of them were thrown to the highway resulting in the death of one of such persons and the serious injury of one of the others.

[1] The first point made for reversal of the judgment is that the corpus delicti was not established. In this connection it is urged that the corpus delicti of the offense with which defendant was charged consists in the proof of the ultimate facts that the automobile in question was being driven on a public highway by some person who was then and there under the influence of intoxicating liquor. In this regard the only question which is raised goes to the sufficiency of the evidence tending to establish the fact that the driver of the automobile was under the influence of intoxicating liquor. The testimony of one of the witnesses was to the effect that immediately after the accident occurred he saw defendant and his brother get out of the front seat of the automobile, and that at that time each of them was under the influence of intoxicating liquor. Other evidence tended to show that of the party of six people, two men and a young woman, were riding on the front seat of the automobile at the time the accident occurred, and that all of them were intoxicated; from which it follows that the corpus delicti was established.

[2, 3] Before the commission of a criminal offense had been fully proven, testimony was introduced as to the admission or confession by defendant that it was he who was driving the automobile at the time the accident occurred. Some authorities are cited by appellant to the effect that, in the first instance, a confession cannot be used to aid the prosecution in its proof that a crime has been committed; or, in other words, that before the corpus delicti is established a confession of defendant that he committed the offense is inadmissible. While the broad general principle for which appellant contends is recognized as good law, it is also a well-settled rule that the order of proof in such circumstances is of no great consequence, provided that aside from such confession the commission of the criminal offense be established by independent evidence. Cal. Juris. vol. 8, 235, and cases cited. And the testimony of the several witnesses herein satisfactorily shows that with reference to any confession or admission by defendant all the facts necessary to the proof of the corpus delicti were introduced in evidence.

[4] Error is predicated upon the order of the court overruling an objection to a question asked a witness as to whether or not defendant and his brother and the young woman, who were riding on the front seat of the automobile, were intoxicated immediately after the accident occurred. As before indicated, in order to show that a criminal offense had been committed it was necessary to establish the fact that the driver of the automobile was under the influence of intoxicating liquor, which could properly be done by showing that all the persons riding on the front seat of the automobile were drunk at the time it was alleged that the automobile was being driven on a public highway.

[5] It is also urged that error was committed by the judge of the trial court in that he cross-examined one of the witnesses, and in so doing asked several immaterial questions on matters which had theretofore been fully covered by cross-examination by the district attorney. No specific error is charged, nor does appellant either argue the question or cite authority in support of his contention. In such circumstances, it must be assumed that at least no prejudicial error exists.

[6, 7] It is next contended by appellant that the trial court erred in allowing a witness to testify concerning the making of a map of the scene of the accident, and in permitting the map to be used as an exhibit in the case. At the trial defendant's counsel objected "to the map being put upon the board or shown to the jury at the present time until it is connected up in such a way so that it can be identified, if there is anything in regard to the accident or where it occurred; we object to it for the reason that the witness is not qualified for making the map on December 20th." With reference to the qualifications of the witness it was shown that at the time the map was made, and for about seven years preceding that time, his occupation was that of a deputy county surveyor in San Bernardino county, and that he had made the map from notes taken by himself at the place where the accident occurred. His qualifications, therefore, in the premises were satisfactorily shown. After defendant's objection to the introduction of the map was overruled, a great deal of evidence was received, without objection from any source, which clearly identified the map and authorized its use as an exhibit in the case. Whatever error existed when the map was first offered was not prejudicial to defendant's rights, and was certainly cured by evidence which was later introduced going to the point of defendant's objection.

[8] The trial court admitted in evidence certain statements made by defendant. In connection therewith appellant presents a further specification of error as follows:

> "Inasmuch as the aforesaid evidence and objections thereto are somewhat lengthy, and in the interest of space, we desire to call the court's attention to the said evidence, objections, and court's rulings thereon, as contained in this brief, beginning at page 10b, line 2, to page 12a, line 4."

An examination of appellant's reference to the matter discloses that such testimony covers 8 pages of the brief, in which may be noted many objections made by counsel for defendant to questions propounded to the witnesses, some of which objections were sustained and others of which were overruled. The entire testimony of the several witnesses from which excerpts are copied into appellant's brief, as heretofore noted, is contained in approximately 40 pages of the reporter's transcript of the evidence received at the trial. Appellant does not point out which of such rulings are considered by him as being erroneous, nor does he furnish this court with either argument or authority to sustain his position as to any of such objections, but contents himself with such a specification of error as is hereinbefore set forth. Such an unsupported generalization with reference to alleged error is not entitled to serious consideration.

[9] Appellant further complains of the action of the trial court in instructing the jury as follows:

> "I instruct you that the admission or admissions made by defendant at the time immediately subsequent to the act committed is not sufficient of itself to find the defendant guilty, and that such admission or admissions must be corroborated by evidence direct or circumstantial of the fact of the act having been committed as charged."

[10, 11] While it is true, as appellant urges, that there is an implied statement of fact contained within the foregoing instruction, in that it is indirectly stated therein that defendant made an admission "immediately subsequent to the act committed," the testimony given by three witnesses, which was not contradicted either by defendant or by any of his witnesses, was to the effect that at a time within two hours after the accident occurred defendant admitted that he was the driver of the automobile in question. The instruction, standing by itself, and without taking into consideration other instructions given by the court to the jury, trenches upon the constitutional provision (section 19, art. 6), which forbids judges to charge juries with respect to matters of fact. But it is a rule, supported by numerous authorities, that in construing a given instruction it must be taken, not as a separate statement of the law applicable to the case, but that its true intent and meaning must be ascertained by considering it as a part of the entire body of instructions. In the instant case, among other instructions, the jury was told that "the jury are the judges of the effect and value of the evidence"; that "the jurors are the sole judges of all questions of fact and of the credibility of witnesses." The jury was also instructed that "the burden of proof is with the plaintiff, and to sustain a verdict of guilty the defendant must be proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt"; and the jury was further twice instructed, in effect, that, if it believed from the evidence in the case beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant did operate and drive a motor vehicle at a time as alleged in the information, and while he was under the influence of intoxicating liquor, it would become the duty of the jury to find defendant guilty. Futhermore, the jury was given the instruction that—

> "You are the sole and exclusive judges of the weight of evidence and the credibility of witnesses, and it is your function to determine all questions of fact arising from the evidence in the case. With the facts the court has nothing to do. I have not expressed, nor intend to express, nor have I intimated or intend to intimate, any opinion as to what witnesses are, or are not, worthy of credence; what facts are, or are not, established; or what inferences are to be drawn from the evidence adduced. If any expression of mine has seemed to indicate an opinion relating to any of these matters, such expression must be entirely disregarded by you.
> "But while you are the sole and exclusive judges of the facts and of the weight of evidence, you are to judge of the facts upon the testimony and other evidence produced here in court. * * *"

It thus appears that, while by inference the judge told the jury that defendant had made certain admissions, the jury was also informed that the burden was on the people to establish such facts beyond a reasonable doubt, and that the jury was the sole judge of the degree of credit to be accorded the witnesses in the case. Moreover, that the court had nothing to do with deciding the facts, or with any inferences which might be drawn therefrom, and that if the court had given expression to anything which would seem to indicate that the court had any opinion with reference thereto, such expression was to be entirely disregarded by the jury. In such circumstances it would seem most improbable that the jury was misled by reason of the inference which might have been drawn by the jury from the criticised instruction to the effect that, as a matter of fact, defendant had made certain admissions.

[12, 13] It is charged that the district attorney who represented the people on the trial of the action was guilty of misconduct which prejudicially affected defendant's rights, and by reason of which a new trial should be granted. The first specification of alleged misconduct by the district attorney consists in the asking by him of a series of questions of one of the young women who was riding in the automobile at the time the accident occurred as to whether or not she had been receiving money from the Ellenas (supposedly referring to defendant's family); also as to whether or not a settlement of any claim by the witness for damages against the Ellenas had been made, or a lawyer had been employed to represent the witness in any proposed action for damages against the Ellenas; and finally whether or not, at a specified time and place in the presence of a certain lawyer, witness had stated that she and her sister and Mitchell (the man who was killed in the accident) were riding in the back seat of the automobile at the time the accident occurred. Manifestly, each of the questions relating to the payment of money to the witness, or the bringing of an action against the Ellenas, was proper for the purpose of showing interest on the part of the witness. The form of the remaining question regarding a statement supposedly contrary to what the witness had previously testified was in compliance with the requirements of the statute where the testimony of a witness is sought to be impeached. Section 2052, Code Civ. Proc. Defendant's principal objection is that the district attorney failed to follow said examination by calling the lawyer as a witness for the purpose of impeaching the witness of whom the district attorney had asked the question. It may be, however, that a very good reason may have existed for not calling such impeaching witness; for instance such witness may have been ill, or the district attorney may have been unable to subpœna him; or, in this particular case, in view of the fact that the proposed impeaching witness was an attorney at law, the district attorney may have concluded that the communication was privileged and consequently inadmissible. On the other hand, from the fact that the district attorney did not call the impeaching witness it need not necessarily follow that defendant was entirely helpless in the premises. Assuming that defendant had evidence supporting any suspicion which he may have had of bad faith in the district attorney in connection with the matter, it is probable that a record of such evidence tending to show such bad faith might have been made in the trial court and presented in this proceeding for examination by this court. However, there is considerable question as to the propriety of granting a motion for new trial because of misconduct of the district attorney, especially where such misconduct is not accompanied by some error of the trial court in connection therewith. People v. Amer, 151 Cal. 303, 90 Pac. 698; People v. Kromphold, 172 Cal. 512, 159 Pac. 599. But, in any event, although the district attorney in the instant case did not pursue the matter of impeachment by calling to the witness stand the person to whom the witness was supposed to have made the statement, it cannot be presumed from that fact alone that the district attorney was acting in bad faith in laying the foundation for the impeachment.

[14] Appellant next charges that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in that in the course of his argument to the jury he said:

> "We will look to the testimony to see whether or not the defendant is guilty of the charge made in the complaint. Counsel for the defense says that he is in favor of fairness and of the enforcement of this law; and I ask you, gentlemen of the jury, when he puts the defendant on the stand, in possession of all the facts, and he asks him but a single question, knowing that the rules of evidence and procedure clothe the defendant with protection so that we cannot further interrogate beyond the matter involved in that question—I ask you whether or not counsel is acting in good faith, when he says he is in favor of fairness and the enforcement of the law."

In response to an objection made by defendant's attorney to the foregoing statement and a request that it be stricken from the record, the trial judge in addressing the jury said:

> "Gentlemen of the jury, you will disregard that portion of the argument relative to the testimony of the defendant and the rule relative to his testimony, the same as though it had not been made."

The case of People v. Kromphold, 172 Cal. 512, 159 Pac. 599, is in point. It was there held that, while it was wrong for the district attorney to comment upon defendant's failure to testify upon a particular phase of the case, in view of the fact that upon objection thereto by defendant's counsel the trial judge informed the district attorney that he should not comment on the defendant's omission to testify to any particular fact, and suggested that he be extremely careful in that respect, the jury could not have been influenced to the prejudice of defendant by the statement of which complaint was made. And see, also, People v. Sansome, 98 Cal. 235, 33 Pac. 202; People v. Finali, 31 Cal. App. 479, 160 Pac. 850; People v. Diamond, 57 Cal. App. 162, 206 Pac. 1010. It will be noted that in the instant case, immediately upon the attention of the court being directed to the objectionable matter in the argument of the district attorney, the court instructed the jury to "disregard that portion of the argument relative to the testimony of the defendant * * * the same as though it had not been made." Following the rule laid down in the case of People v. Kromphold, supra, "we cannot hold that the statement (of the district attorney) 'has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.' "

The judgment and the order denying the motion for new trial are affirmed.

DOUSKOS v. GILMORE. (Civ. 4839.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 2, 1924.)

1. Work and labor 🔑28(4)—Testimony that bill represented reasonable value of services rendered was some evidence of reasonable value.

Testimony of defendant mechanic that his bill for repairs on plaintiff's truck absolutely represented reasonable value of services, labor, material, and supplies furnished held some evidence that prices charged were reasonable value of services, etc.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1012(1) — Appellate court cannot disturb trial court's conclusion as to preponderance of conflicting evidence.

The appellate court has no power to disturb the conclusion reached by the trial court in deciding the preponderance or weight of conflicting testimony.

3. Pleading ⚷=150—One sued for reasonable value of repairs held entitled to set off, without pleading it, expense of remedying defects in performance.

Where in replevin of truck, cross-complaining defendant claimed full performance of his contract with plaintiff to put truck in first class running order for reasonable value of services, and sought recovery on that basis, plaintiff was entitled, without pleading to that effect, to deduct from amount claimed by defendant reasonable charge necessary to put car in first-class running order.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by J. Douskos against J. J. Gilmore, who interposed cross-complaint. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Modified, and, as so modified, affirmed.

Lelia R. Leep, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Arthur Joel, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to obtain possession of an automobile. The defendant appeared and in his answer and cross-complaint set forth facts showing that he had a lien on the automobile for labor and materials supplied in the repair of the car. After a trial before the court sitting without a jury, the trial court fixed the amount of the defendant's lien in the sum of $551.30, the amount claimed in the defendant's answer and cross-complaint. From the judgment the plaintiff has appealed under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

On the trial of the case the plaintiff assumed the burden of proof. He brought forward a bill itemized, and which purported to show the hours of labor put in by the defendant and assistants in making the repairs, and also showing the articles furnished by the defendant and the price charged therefor. For the labor the defendant charged $1.80 an hour, and for the articles furnished he charged the list price thereof.

[1, 2] On his direct examination the defendant, as one of the witnesses called by the plaintiff, testified that the bill absolutely represented the reasonable value of the services, labor, material, and supplies furnished. There was testimony introduced on the cross-examination of the witness and on the examination of other witnesses to the effect that some persons charged $1.50 an hour and some charged $1.80 an hour. There was some testimony introduced to the effect that one engaged in the business of repairing automobiles obtains a discount of 50 per cent. on some of the parts used to replace worn-out parts in making repairs. The appellant makes the point that there should have been evidence introduced to the effect that the prices charged were the reasonable value. The point is not sustained by the record. The testimony given by the defendant was some evidence of reasonable value. The most that can be said in behalf of the appellant's contention is that there was other evidence in the record, which might be considered as breaking down the testimony given by the defendant. However, the conflicts in the testimony were for the consideration of the trial court, and, when it does not appear that the trial court has abused its discretion, this court has no power to disturb the conclusion reached by the trial court in deciding the preponderance or weight of the conflicting testimony.

[3] When the plaintiff sent his car to the defendant to be repaired he called on the defendant, and the oral agreement was afterwards stated by the defendant in giving his testimony. After the two had discussed the condition of the car, the defendant testified that the plaintiff stated to him, "All right, go ahead, and put the car in first-class condition, and when the truck is ready your check is ready." At the time the plaintiff commenced this action, he caused to be placed in the hands of the sheriff a writ authorizing the sheriff to take possession of the car. The sheriff executed the writ, and towed the car to a garage conducted by John Skrine. On the trial of the case the plaintiff called Skrine as a witness. He testified that, when the car was towed into his garage, they heard a noise in the rear end of it. He further testified that he and his assistants took the cover from the rear end, and found the master gear loose, and found some bearings broken in it, and that they replaced them, and also that they took off the old flat top, and that they also adjusted the generator. He further testified that the work which was done in his garage was necessary to put the car in running order. For the services which he performed Skrine charged $20, and there is no dispute but what the charge was reasonable. The appellant contends that the $20 should have been deducted from the amount of the claim of the defendant. To this point the respondent replies that the plaintiff did not plead a claim for the $20. There was no necessity for pleading it. The plaintiff had employed the defendant to put the car in first-class running order. The amount of his compensation was to be the reasonable value. The whole theory of the defendant's case is that he performed his part of the contract, and claimed the possession of the car to secure the charges made by him. But if he had not made the repairs as completely as he agreed to make them he was certainly not entitled to the full amount claimed.

The judgment should be modified by deducting the amount of $20 from $551.30, the sum found due the defendant, and it is so ordered. As modified the judgment is affirmed, and the respondent will be allowed his costs on this appeal.

Schools and school districts ⚷133—Election as principal of high school without designation of term held not to entitle him to retain office until removed for cause; "principal."

Plaintiff held not entitled to reinstatement as principal of high school on theory that, having been elected as principal without designation of term, he continued to be such unless removed for cause, in view of Pol. Code, § 1609, subd. 5, subsecs. (e), (j), as amended by St. 1921, p. 1664, construed as giving power to board of trustees in such case to elect successor at end of school year whether plaintiff occupied classification as principal as distinguished from teacher, or whether word "principal" includes meaning of word "teacher" as completely as though plaintiff were described as principal teacher; "principal" as an adjective meaning highest in rank, authority, character, importance, or degree.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Principal.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Application by William Bland for writ of mandate against the Board of Trustees of Galt Joint Union High School District and E. H. Barber and others, as trustees thereof. Judgment on demurrer for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. L. Gilmore, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Hughes, Bradford & Cross, of Sacramento, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. The plaintiff began this action seeking the mandate of the superior court commanding and requiring the defendants to permit the plaintiff to exercise and perform the services of and to reinstate the plaintiff in the use and enjoyment and occupancy of the position of principal of the Galt Joint Union High School. To the plaintiff's complaint the defendants interposed a general demurrer. This demurrer was sustained without leave to amend, and from the judgment entered thereupon the plaintiff has appealed.

The complaint alleges that the defendants above named constitute the board of trustees of the Galt joint union high school district; that for more than nine years last past the plaintiff has been and now is elected by and in the employ of said board of school trustees and their predecessors, and said Galt joint union high school district, as the principal of the Galt Joint Union High School; that said Galt Joint Union High School has been in existence during the said period of time and during the yearly term just preceding the commencement of this action; has employed seven teachers under a principal as the teaching force thereof; and that during the school year just past the plaintiff occupied the position as principal of said school at a salary of $2,800 per annum; that on or about the 27th day of August, 1923, the defendants wrongfully and unlawfully, and without cause, or probable cause, precluded and prevented the plaintiff from performing, and from the right to perform, the services and duties of principal of said high school, and ever since said date have so precluded and now preclude and prevent the plaintiff from performing the duties of said position; that at divers times since said date the plaintiff has demanded of the defendants permission to discharge the duties of said position, but that the defendants have refused and still refuse to permit the plaintiff so to do; that at no time prior to the 27th day of August, 1923, or at any other time, have the defendants, or any of them, preferred any charges against the plaintiff for immoral or unprofessional conduct, incompetence, evident unfitness for teaching, persistent violation of or refusal to obey the school laws of California, or any of the rules prescribed for the government of public schools, and also that the defendants did not on August 27, 1923, or at any other time, hold any public hearing on any charges against the plaintiff; and that said defendants did not and have not precluded nor prevented plaintiff from the use and enjoyment of said office and duties of principal because of abolishing said position or because of a reduction in the number of teachers employed in said high school. It is also alleged in the complaint that on the 27th day of August, 1923, and for many years next prior thereto, plaintiff was and still is the holder of a teacher's first grade state certificate of the state of California, and also of a high school life diploma of the state of California. Does such a complaint state a cause of action?

There is no allegation in the complaint showing that the plaintiff was employed as a teacher; the allegation simply being that he was at some time or other elected principal of the Galt Joint Union High School. There is no allegation as to the date of his election, nor is there any allegation as to the period of time for which he was elected, nor is there any allegation in the complaint that the plaintiff was employed as principal by the board of trustees of said high school district for any particular period, or that any contract was ever entered into between the plaintiff and the trustees of said district fixing or designating the term of the plaintiff's employment. There is no allegation in the complaint showing that the plaintiff was dismissed or removed from his position as principal of said high school during any school year for which he was employed. The allegation simply is that in the month of August, 1923, he was prevented from assuming the duties of such position, and further in the complaint that he had discharged the duties of principal of said high school, and performed the functions of said office during the preceding school year. Based upon the foregoing facts the appellant contends, in substance, that his term of office continues from year to year; that after once being elected as principal, there being no designation as to the term, or, at least, nothing being said in his complaint as to the term of his election, a cause of action is stated, and the plaintiff is entitled to continue teaching until he has been removed for cause, as set forth in subdivision (j) of the fifth subdivision of section 1609 of the Political Code. Section 1609, supra, provides that—

> "Boards of school trustees * * * shall have power and it shall be their duty: First—To employ a principal for each school under their control. * * * Second—To employ the teachers, as provided in part fifth of this section, * * * provided, that no board shall enter into any contract with such employees, other than teachers, to extend beyond the close of the next ensuing school year; except that teachers may be elected on or after May second for the next ensuing school year and each teacher so elected shall be deemed re-elected from year to year except as hereinafter specified; provided, that any teacher who shall fail to signify his acceptance within twenty days after notice of his election or employment shall have been given him by the clerk or secretary of the governing board of the school district, or shall have been mailed to him by such clerk or secretary by depositing such notice in the United States post-office, with postage thereon prepaid, addressed to such teacher at his last known place of address, shall be deemed to have declined the same."

Provision is then made in the section for making payment monthly during the current year instead of during the time when the teachers employed are actually engaged in such services. It will be noticed that in the provision relating to the election of teachers and that they shall be deemed re-elected from year to year except as hereinafter specified, the section, as it stands, amended by the act of the Legislature, approved June 3, 1921 (St. 1921, p. 1664), omits therefrom the following: "* * * Unless the governing body of the school district shall on or before the tenth day of June give notice in writing to such teacher that his services will not be required for the ensuing school year," leaving the section as it now stands amended, absolutely silent as to the exceptions in which the teacher should not be deemed to be re-elected. In other words, the language used in the section has failed to express the full intent of the Legislature concerning the circumstances under which a teacher may or may not be deemed re-elected from year to year.

By the section as now amended there appears an intent on the part of the Legislature to draw a distinction between a principal of a school and a principal teacher. In other words, it would seem to be a question of employment and not of designation under the statutes whether a person is employed as a principal of a school or whether he is employed as a principal teacher of a school. The first clause of the section referred to giving powers to the board of school trustees, provides, as above stated, that the board shall employ a principal for each school under their control. In many districts there manifestly would be only one teacher, and that teacher would necessarily be the principal of said school. Again, we know the practice has been in many schools where two or three teachers are employed, or, perhaps, more than that, one of the persons who also teaches in the school is designated as the principal thereof. The person so designated is called the principal of the school, and he is also a teacher in the school. On the other hand, we can readily conceive of a situation where the school would be so large that it would require the services of one person to act as principal, and that the duties of the position would be such as to reasonably occupy all of his time, and, under such circumstances and under the statute, the board would have authority to employ a person who did not devote any of his time to actual teaching but all of his time to supervision and direction. As the section now reads there is no expression therein from which we can reach the conclusion that a person once elected as principal, and as principal only, could be deemed re-elected from year to year, if, in fact, under the omission of the section which we have above noted, any person could be deemed re-elected to any position from year to year, after having been once so elected by the board of trustees. Again, under the fifth subdivision of the section of the Code with which we are dealing, the board of trustees is empowered to classify teachers as substitute teachers, probationary teachers, and permanent teachers. Subdivision (e) of the fifth subdivision of the section authorizes and empowers the classification of permanent teachers, provided that successful service shall have been performed as teachers in a district employing at least eight teachers, under a principal, who shall devote at least two hours per day to the school or schools under his control. The complaint in this case sets forth that only seven teachers had been so employed, and therefore, if that section is valid, no such classification could exist in the case at bar and the plaintiff is not aided thereby. The constitutionality of this subdivision is challenged by the respondent on the ground that it is special legislation, but, as we do not rest our opinion in this case on that subdivision, we express no opinion as to whether the subdivision challenged is or is not constitutional. Subdivision (j) of the fifth subdivision of said section 1609 grants power to the board of trustees to dismiss in the following language:

> "To dismiss permanent teachers, principals, or supervisors of special subjects, except as hereinafter provided, only for one or more of the following causes, after a fair and impartial public hearing. Causes for dismissal are immoral or unprofessional conduct, incompetence, evident unfitness for teaching, persistent violation of or refusal to obey the school laws of California, or reasonable rules prescribed for the government of public schools."

It is then provided that:

> "Dismissal for cause shall be made only after the following provisions shall have been complied with: The governing board shall give at least ten days notice in writing to any permanent teacher or principal or supervisor of special subjects against whom charges shall have been preferred. * * *"

The section then proceeds to prescribe the manner in which a permanent teacher may have a hearing, may introduce evidence in his own behalf, and then empowers the board of trustees to dismiss a permanent teacher. There is nothing said in the section, or in the subdivision which we are now considering, about dismissing principals or supervisors of special subjects other than simply giving power of dimissal as above stated. No procedure is provided for hearing charges against other than permanent teachers. The procedure set forth in the section relates only to permanent teachers. The subdivision also very carefully sets forth how teachers may be dismissed when the circumstances or conditions of the school no longer require their services. Unless we read into the section words not there used or an interpretation which does not appear in the literal language of the section, there is no procedure pointed out, or method indicated, by which a board of trustees may carry into effect its power to dismiss a principal, who is simply a principal, or dismiss a supervisor of special subjects. The evident intent of the framers of the section under consideration was to make secure the position of persons eligible to be classified as permanent teachers without regard to the tenure of persons classed as principal only and supervisors of special subjects. On the part of the appellant it is contended that in the silence of the section on the subject, or by reason of the omission to provide for the dismissal of a principal, that when once elected a principal the person so elected a principal of any school continues to be such until removed for cause, and for authority to support this contention cites the case of Kennedy v. Board of Education, 82 Cal. 483, 22 Pac. 1042. That case, however, is not based upon section 1609 of the Political Code, but rests upon the provisions of section 1793 of the Political Code, which differ materially in terms, and hence that case is not authority here. Section 1793, supra, provides:

> "The holders of city certificates are eligible to teach in the cities in which such certificates were granted, in schools of grades corresponding to the grades of such certificates, and when elected, shall be dismissed only for violation of the rules of the board of education, or for incompetency, unprofessional or immoral conduct."

There is nothing of that kind in section 1609 of the Political Code relating to principals, and from what we have said it is also very doubtful if there is anything of the kind which relates even to teachers. In the Kennedy Case the plaintiff was elected a principal teacher, and brought her action and prosecuted the same as a principal teacher, seeking a reinstatement as a principal teacher, and not simply as a teacher.

In 31 Cyc. 173, we find the definition of the word "principal," when used as an adjective, as meaning highest in rank, authority, character, importance, or degree. This is, in substance, also the definition by Webster, and this definition would apply where one was employed as the principal teacher, as appears in the Kennedy Case. From the facts alleged, the plaintiff in this case has no standing as a "permanent teacher," assuming that all of the provisions relating to permanent teachers in the section of the Code under consideration are constitutional. The school in which plaintiff has been engaged has not employed the requisite number of teachers. This brings us again to the subject of dismissal of his standing simply as a principal. As we have shown, there is nothing in the section from which he can be deemed to have been elected from year to year. The procedure for his dismissal is wanting in the section. The power to dismiss is therein given. The power to dismiss for cause is therein given. A reasonable interpretation of this provision of the Code would be that in the exercise of the power of dismissal the board is limited in removing a principal to the causes specified during the term for which he had been elected. In other words, a principal elected for a year, or other period of time, could only be removed for cause during the term and not arbitrarily. This does not mean that at the expiration of the year the board would not have the power to elect somebody else to such position. There being nothing in the statute from which a principal could be deemed re-elected, the reasonable inference would be that a principal might be elected for such period of time as might be agreed upon between the parties, and in the event no term or period has been agreed upon or prescribed, at the expiration of the school year the board of trustees would be at liberty to re-elect or elect a successor to the one who had previously occupied the position of principal of the school over which the board was exercising jurisdiction. It thus follows that whether the plaintiff in this action was occupying the classification as a principal, as distinguished from a teacher, or whether, as contended by respondent, the word "principal" includes the meaning of the word teacher as fully and completely as though the plaintiff were described as principal teacher, the complaint in this action does not set forth facts sufficient to justify a judgment in the plaintiff's favor. The demurrer, therefore, was properly sustained, and the judgment of the lower court is hereby affirmed.

LUITWIELER v. LUITWIELER PUMPING ENGINE CO. (Civ. 4207.)

Corporations ⚷316(4)—Corporation held estopped by long acquiescence and performance to deny validity of contract with director to exploit machinery patented by him.

Corporation, making agreement with former director by which it was to exploit machinery patented by him, held estopped to raise question that majority of directors did not vote therefor, by long acquiescence and performance of the contract, through use of the inventions and manufacture and sale of the products, resulting in acquisition by corporation of all the profit which there was any probability of obtaining thereunder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by S. W. Luitwieler against the Luitwieler Pumping Engine Company, a foreign corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. S. Taylor and E. W. Forgy, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. Prior to the year 1908 a corporation, hereinafter referred to as the California company, was incorporated pursuant to the laws of this state, bearing the same name as appellant, of which respondent was president and a director, and was engaged in the manufacture of pumps and their component parts. Said company then held and utilized the patent rights covering certain inventions of respondent, and a considerable amount of its capital stock was owned by him. In 1908 the corporation taxes were not paid as required by statute, and the charter of the California company expired. Respondent and others incorporated in the state of New York, by the same name, the appellant corporation, hereinafter called the New York company, in which shares of stock were exchanged equally for outstanding shares of the California company, and the respondent was president and a director of the new corporation. Its directorate, in accordance with its articles of incorporation and bylaws, consisted of five directors, and on November 5, 1909, a directors' meeting was held at Rochester, N. Y., at which time but four of said directors were present, which said meeting appears from the minutes to have been an adjourned regular monthly meeting.

Three of the directors present at such meeting, one of whom was respondent, voted in favor of adopting and executing a written contract with respondent—a director other than respondent voting in the negative—reciting that whereas the respondent was the inventor of certain valuable improvements in pumps and pumping engines and analogous apparatus, for which there had been issued five specified patents, and was possessed of certain other inventions for which he had applied for letters patent, all of which the New York company was desirous of acquiring, and the respondent had theretofore granted to the California company exclusive right to make, use, and vend apparatus embodying his several inventions for which letters patent had been issued or applied, it was therefore agreed that the respondent should grant and convey said five patents and other inventions, as well as all inventions which he might thereafter devise as improvements thereon. It is further recited that in consummation of said agreement respondent therewith delivered to appellant a license to be recorded at the patent office. In consideration of such sales appellant therein agreed to create a demand and a market for said apparatus, and to deliver to respondent 193 shares of stock in exchange for a like number of shares in the California company, and one share of common stock for each share of common or preferred stock sold from its treasury, "as payment pro tanto for the rights granted hereby to licensee." Respondent further agreed that he would from time to time file applications for patents on such future inventions as appellant might desire to have protected.

Respondent instituted this action for the collection of $7,421.52 alleged to be due him from the appellant corporation on account of dividends accumulated on shares and scrip certificates described in his complaint.

Appellant filed an answer and cross-complaint, alleging that on the 31st day of July, 1909, respondent was the owner of 549½ shares of said corporation, and that on November 5, 1909, respondent caused the appellant to enter into a contract with him that for each share of capital stock sold and issued to any person, firm, or corporation it would issue one share of common stock to respondent; that appellant was then the owner of the patents and rights described in the complaint, and that it entered into said agreement inadvertently and without consideration; that all of respondent's certificates of stock in excess of 549½ shares were thus illegally obtained, and he had been paid $10,500.36 in dividends on all stock held by him; that $1,458.24 was justly due respondent as dividends upon shares legally issued to him, and that he was entitled to a credit of $919.50 in redemption of 66 shares on January 1, 1921. Appellant prayed judgment against respondent for $8,122.42 alleged to have been overpaid him, and for cancellation of all certificates of stock issued to him pursuant to the agreement mentioned.

As a further defense appellant alleged that on the 5th day of November, 1909, and up to the 7th day of February, 1916, respondent dominated and controlled the affairs of said corporation, and its directors and officers, and that on the date of the contract he caused them to execute the same in consideration of the acquisition of patents which the corporation already owned, and in which respondent had no personal interest; that in pursuance of such agreement, and in payment of dividends to which respondent was not entitled, 859½ shares of common stock were illegally issued to him. Respondent filed an answer to appellant's cross-complaint, which embodied a copy of the contract in question, and denied each of the material allegations, alleging that said agreement was regularly executed, and was entire and complete for mutual and dependent considerations, and that he had at all times fully performed all the conditions and obligations thereof until prevented from so doing by action of appellant's officers on February 7, 1916.

At the trial appellant stated that in addition to failure of consideration, as alleged in its answer, it would further contend that, since only four of the five directors were present at the meeting of November 5, 1909, one voting against the adoption of the contract, respondent's vote was required to constitute a majority, but that, inasmuch as a contract between respondent and the corporation was involved, his vote was illegal, and that the motion therefore was not effectually carried, and the action of the board was void. An order was made that the answer be deemed to have been thus amended and denied.

The trial court found that all of the allegations of the complaint were true, and rendered judgment against the appellant corporation for $7,984.30.

Respondent testified that the California company never owned any of the patents in controversy, but held merely a license to use them; that upon the termination of said company's existence and the organization of the New York company a new contract was executed and operations began at Rochester, N. Y., where his patents were used in the manufacture of pumps; that thereafter he created a new piston and other apparatus, which he prosecuted to patent, and that the corporation received them, and continued to use them up to the time of the trial; he said that the company manufactured from eight of his patents many machines and parts, including a driving mechanism for triplex pumps, "and to the best of my knowledge are using it yet." It appears that in 1916 differences arose between respondent and the officers of the corporation, and that respondent then ceased to be president, but the foregoing testimony stands uncontradicted, and there is no evidence anywhere in the record tending to show that the agreement in controversy was ever questioned by any one until suit was filed. Respondent also testified that he acquired some shares of stock from other persons, and that certificates were sent him through the mails by the company's secretary as late as 1910. He and his transferees voted the shares of stock in question for about seven years, and the corporation has availed itself of the continued use and benefit of respondent's old and new inventions, so far as the record discloses, without interruption from November 5, 1909, during the years that respondent was active in its official management and since he severed connection with its board of directors in 1916.

Appellant's whole defense upon the trial, and its briefs upon this appeal, have been devoted to an attack upon the validity of the directors' meeting of November 5, 1909, and the contract alleged to have been adopted at that time, but aside from its assistance by way of detail we cannot say that the existence of this writing is vital to respondent's cause of action. The trial court found upon the evidence before it that respondent, "pursuant to said contract and at all times thereafter, continued to render and perform all of the services and the consideration in said contract provided"; and that appellant "at all times since has retained and held the same, and that the parties thereto have at all times since continuously acted upon the same as a valid and regular contract of said corporation."

In Standard Oil Co. v. Syle, 164 Cal. 435, 446, 129 Pac. 589, 593, it was said by the Supreme Court:

> "Under clear principles of estoppel that corporation may not now assert the invalidity of a corporate act regular upon its face. The courts have almost uniformly sustained contracts which litigants who have profited thereby have later sought to avoid on the ground that such agreements were executed without proper authority. Such has been the ruling in the following cases: Main v. Casserly, 67 Cal. 128, 7 Pac. 426; Gribble v. Columbus Brewing Co., 100 Cal. 71, 34 Pac. 527; Lawrence v. Johnson, 131 Cal. 176, 63 Pac. 176."

And the same rule was applied in McQuaide v. Enterprise Brewing Co., 14 Cal. App. 315, 111 Pac. 927, where it was said:

> "In other words, it is the policy of the law and the endeavor of the courts to hold corporations as well as natural persons to their contracts and make them liable for the obligations they have incurred. * * * The rule is based upon the strongest principles of justice and public policy, that a contract should be enforced against a corporation when it has received the consideration or the benefits of the contract."

It is not contended by appellant that the contract was unfair, or that any defect in the apparatus or the patents ever arose to cause dissatisfaction with its bargain; appellant has retained and benefited by the skill and efforts of respondent devoted to its interests in consideration of reciprocal covenants to which appellant took no exception for many years and until occasion seemed to demand an excuse for refusal to further compensate him.

Long acquiescence and the performance of the contract through use of the inventions, and the manufacture and sale of the products, resulting in the acquisition by appellant of all profit which there is any probability of obtaining thereunder, forbid that the corporation should now escape liability for obligations due under a consummated agreement.

The judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF GILROY v. KELL et al.
(Civ. 4780.)

1. Waters and water courses 🔑197—Deeds held admissible to show recognition of water rights possessed by city's predecessor in interest.

In a suit by city to restrain interference with plaintiff's prescriptive right to take water from certain creek, deeds executed by defendant's predecessor in interest 40 years before, transferring lands further up the creek and reserving the right of way and privilege of taking water to plaintiff's predecessor in interest, held admissible as showing recognition of the water rights, though not as furnishing notice to defendants.

2. Waters and water courses 🔑138—Pipe line held "usual improvements" as respected adverse possession.

Code Civ. Proc. § 325, which requires a substantial inclosure or "usual improvements," where adverse possession is made under claim of title not written, as applied to a prescriptive right to divert water from a stream, is satisfied by existence of a pipe line.

3. Adverse possession 🔑89—No necessity to pay taxes where no taxes levied and assessed.

Where no taxes are levied and assessed against property claimed adversely under claim of title not written, it is not necessary to show, as is ordinarily required by Code Civ. Proc. § 325, a payment of taxes.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑133—Water permit held not to interfere with vested rights.

A permit of the state water commission, allowing defendants certain water rights "subject to vested rights," did not interfere with the vested rights of plaintiff.

5. Waters and water courses 🔑190—Decree authorizing city to replace pipe line held to give owner no right to compensation.

A decree permitting city to replace its worn-out pipe for diversion of water from a stream with new pipe of the same size did not entitle riparian owner to compensation, where court found burden would be no greater than that already existing by prescription.

6. Waters and water courses 🔑191—Decree establishing city's prescriptive right to enter land to repair water system construed as right to reasonable exercise of license.

Decree establishing city's prescriptive right to enter defendant's land to make repairs on city's water system held not to give the city a right to roam over all of defendant's land, but only to enter at reasonable times, in a reasonable manner, upon a direct practical route and for the exclusive purpose mentioned.

7. Easements 🔑53—Easement by prescription implies right to make repairs not injuriously increasing burden upon servient tenement.

An easement by prescription implies the right to make repairs if such repairs do not injuriously increase the burden upon the servient tenement.

8. Easements 🔑53—Owner of easement may make repairs, improvements, or changes not affecting substance of easement.

An owner of an easement cannot change its character or materially increase the burden upon servient estate or injuriously affect the rights of other persons, but within such limits he may make repairs, improvements, or changes not affecting the substance of the easement.

9. Waters and water courses 🔑191—Use of teams to repair city's water system under prescriptive right held not dependent upon previous use of teams.

A city possessing an easement by prescription to enter defendant's land to make repairs on city's water system need not have previously entered the land with teams in order to so enter now.

10. Waters and water courses 🔑191—Owner of prescriptive easement to repair water system may make incidental changes.

A city with a prescriptive right to enter defendant's land to repair the city's water system held empowered to make repairs on a dam and erect a settling box where such changes are necessary for the enjoyment of the same and do not increase the burden upon the servient estate.

11. Waters and water courses 🔑197—Decree defining city's prescriptive right to replace worn-out water pipe held not indefinite.

Where a decree specifically stated that city was, by reason of its prescriptive water right, entitled merely to replace its worn-out pipe with new pipe of the same size, and in the same place and in same grade, it was not necessary that the findings and decree state the exact number of gallons of water which the city could take each day.

12. Waters and water courses 🔑190—That débris in water pipe lessened flow of water held not to preclude city from cleaning pipes.

A city which has a prescriptive right to water from a stream has the incidental right to clean away gravel and débris lodged in the intake water pipes, though the flow of water through its pipes is increased.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Suit by the City of Gilroy against Thomas P. Kell and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed in part and affirmed in part.

H. A. Blanchard, of San Jose, for appellants.

John P. Fitzgerald, of San Jose, Walter Fitzgerald, of Gilroy, and Rea & Caldwell, of San Jose, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a decree adjudging that the city of Gilroy is the owner of the right to take water from Uvas creek in the county of Santa Clara, state of California, at a point where it has erected a dam across the same upon certain real property described in the complaint and owned by the defendants. The further provisions of the decree will be discussed hereinafter.

Plaintiff alleged that it was the owner of said right to take water from Uvas creek and also of certain dams and pipe line beginning at the upper end of said dams and running down and along the westerly bank of said stream until it reaches the southerly line of said property belonging to said defendants, and thence to the city of Gilroy, together with the right to enter upon and pass over the lands of defendants for the purpose of maintaining and repairing said pipe line and dams in a clean condition and free from driftwood and obstruction to the flow of the water; that for more than 30 years the plaintiff has maintained said pipe line over the lands of defendants and has taken water from said creek at said point of diversion and has caused the same to run through said pipe line, and has traveled over and across the lands now claimed by said defendant for the purpose of maintaining and repairing said pipe line and dams, and has, during all of said time, entered thereon with teams whenever necessary for the purpose of hauling material thereon to repair said pipe line and dams and during said time has used the gravel from the bed of said creek for the purpose of making said repair; that said use and occupancy has been continuous, uninterrupted, peaceful, open, and notorious with the knowledge of the owner of said land under claim of right and adversely to the whole world; that the uses to which said water has been and now are being put is for irrigation, household, and domestic uses by the inhabitants of the city of Gilroy and that said plaintiff and said inhabitants thereof have no other adequate supply of water or means of obtaining the same; that at the time of the filing of the complaint the pipe line referred to therein was broken and required immediate repair; that defendants have driven and continue to drive the employees of plaintiff from said property and refuse to allow them to enter upon said property for the purpose of repairing said pipe line. It was also alleged that the defendants maintained corrals for hogs upon the borders of said stream, thereby polluting the waters thereof. An injunction was asked, restraining the defendants from interfering with said alleged rights of plaintiff.

Defendants filed an answer and cross-complaint, denying plaintiff's right to take the water of the creek, admitting its ownership of the dams and pipe line, but alleging that these were constructed upon the property by permission of the predecessors in interest of defendants; and denying that plaintiff had any right to enter upon said land for the purpose of maintaining or repairing said dams or pipe line, or for the purpose of keeping the stream in and about said dams and pipe line free from driftwood or any obstruction to the flow of the water, save and except by permission of defendants. It is alleged that the use and occupancy of the said land by the plaintiff has always been by permission of defendants and their predecessors and not adversely to said owners, and with the understanding that any water taken from said creek over and across said real property should be taken subject to the riparian rights of the owners of the land. The cross-complaint denies interference with the employees of plaintiff while engaged in the necessary repairing of the pipe line. It is also alleged that the plaintiff has never paid any taxes levied or assessed against said real property or any portion thereof, but that the defendants and their predecessors in interest have always paid the same; that plaintiff has never inclosed any portion of said real property with any substantial inclosure or any inclosure, and that plaintiff's entry upon said property was not under color or claim of title or founded upon a written instrument, but was with the permission of the owners of the land; that plaintiff is not the owner of any lands riparian to said Uvas creek and its use of the water of said Uvas creek is subject to the riparian rights of the defendants. It is also set forth that defendants are riparian owners along said Uvas creek and entitled to a reasonable use of the waters of said creek for household and irrigation purposes; that the state water commission of the state of California had issued to defendants its permit granting to defendants, subject to vested rights, "that the amount of water diverted by her should be on the basis of one cubic foot per second, continuous flow, to 80 acres of irrigated land, and that water may be diverted to the full capacity of the ditches to be constructed for such time during any thirty days period as to result in an amount equivalent to said continuous flow allowance"; that any and all rights of plaintiff, are subject and subordinate to the rights granted to defendants under said permit of the said state water commission of the state of California; that plaintiff threatens to change and alter the construction, course, level, grade, and location of its pipe line and dams now upon said property and thereby will take all the waters of Uvas creek, or far in excess of the amount of waters of said creek to which they may be entitled and will thereby deprive defendants of the waters of said creek, Defendants then set out various reasons why any change in the construction of the pipe line would irreparably injure them, and prayed that the court determine the rights of the respective parties to the action, declare that the rights of plaintiff are subject to the rights of defendants as set forth and alleged in the cross-complaint and that the plaintiff be enjoined from committing the acts complained of by defendants. The answer to the cross-complaint denied practically all of its allegations, and after hearing a large amount of evidence, the trial court found: That the rights of the plaintiff were, substantially, as alleged in its complaint and that for more than 20 years last past plaintiff has maintained said pipe line over said lands of defendants and has taken water from said creek at said point of diversion and has caused the same to run and flow through said pipe line and has traveled over and across the lands of defendants for the purpose of maintaining and repairing said pipe line and dam, and has, during all of said times, entered thereon with teams whenever necessary for the purpose of hauling materials thereon; that said use and occupancy has been continuous, uninterrupted, peaceful, open, and notorious with the knowledge of the owners of said land, under a claim of right and adversely to the whole world during all of said times; that during said time the said city of Gilroy used all the water of said Uvas creek with the exception that in flood times great quantities flowed over and across said dam, and in the summer months a small quantity of water seeped through the bottom of said dam and appeared in small pools at certain distances below the said dam; that in the year 1901 Catherine Dunne, the then owner of the real property now owned by defendants, and defendants' predecessor in interest, granted to plaintiff the right, in writing, to rebuild said dam as it is now constructed and the pipe line as it is now installed, with the express understanding and provision therein contained that nothing contained in said agreement should prevent the said city of Gilroy from diverting from the said Uvas creek a volume of water equal to the capacity diverted before the reconstruction of said dam and pipe line; that before said written instrument, and since about the year 1870, plaintiff had diverted and used all of the water of said Uvas creek, except that in flood time a large amount of water in said creek was not used by it, and during the summer months a small amount of water seeped down through the gravel of the creek in the bed of the dam as then constructed, and reappeared below in pools for a short distance below said dam; that at the present time the said upper dam and the said pipe line herein referred to are out of repair, and that unless the same are immediately repaired the city of Gilroy and the inhabitants thereof will be without an adequate supply of water and thereby irreparable injury will be occasioned to plaintiff; that the said pipe line is rusted and broken and that it is necessary to replace the same entirely as the same is now constructed through the property of said defendants; that plaintiff has the right to enter upon the lands of defendants for the purpose of replacing said pipe and laying new pipe for the entire length of said pipe line across the lands of defendant provided said pipe is replaced with the same size of pipe as is now laid on said land and in the same place and upon the same grade as the same is now laid, coupled with the right to do all necessary work and make all necessary excavations for accomplishing said purpose, and also has the right to repair the southerly end of said dam in the manner hereinafter set forth.

With reference to the dam, it was found: That the said upper dam across said Uvas creek has developed many leaks along the bottom and has been damaged at the southerly end thereof where the high water has washed away the dirt bank. The accumulation of gravel about the dam has rendered the valve in the clean-out pipe inoperative, and has recently greatly reduced the efficiency of the fourteen-inch diversion pipe from said dam. That it will be necessary, in order to remedy this condition and to allow plaintiff to divert the water to which it is entitled, to protect the free flow of water into its said diversion pipe immediately above said dam and to prevent the accumulation of sand and gravel and other obstructions to such free flowage, and it also has the right and it is its duty to protect the water taken from said Uvas creek for the use of its inhabitants from contamination and impurities, and to that end it is necessary to construct and maintain an open box around the intake of the clean-out pipe and also for the purpose of permitting the free operation of the valve in the clean-out pipe and also for the purpose of maintaining a body of clear and pure water around the intake of the diversion pipe; that in order to prevent the deposit of sand and gravel in the open box above described, it is necessary that the top of the box should be covered with heavy planking placed at the level of the bottom of the spillway in the dam so that all sand and gravel moving in the creek during flood waters will be carried through the spillway and deposited along the bed of the creek below the dam. That it is necessary to remove a part of the gravel bank which has accumulated immediately above the dam during flood waters; that it is necessary after the forebay has been cleared of said gravel that there should be constructed upon the bedrock on the up-stream side of said dam a settling box of redwood cribbing, with a concrete foundation eight inches at the top in the shape of an equilateral triangle each side thereof being sixteen feet in length. Further details relating to the construction of the settling box are then set forth in the findings of the court, and it is found: That said above repairs and replacements will cause no injury to defendants or their land and will be no greater or different burden upon said servient tenement than the dam and construction as it now exists and has existed during all the times mentioned herein; that said construction and said repair will not allow plaintiff to divert any more water than that to which it is entitled as herein found and will not prevent, and is not intended to prevent the water in summer time from seeping through the bed of the creek in and above the dam as it has done in the past; that after the making of said repairs the condition of the defendants' land and the amount of water available for defendants' use will not be materially changed from present and past conditions.

Appellants' first objection is to the finding that the city of Gilroy has a right to use the gravel of the stream for the purpose of making repairs and the portion of the decree based thereon. Appellants contend that the evidence does not justify this finding, and they are probably correct in this contention. However, the respondent has stated that it is willing to waive this right and will consent to an amendment of the findings and decree to this extent. It is unnecessary, therefore, for us to discuss the matter further.

[1] Appellants object to the introduction in evidence of two deeds from Catherine Dunne, their predecessor in interest, to Parr and McLeon, dated and recorded on February 19, 1881. At this time Catherine Dunne was the owner of the Kell property and the lands transferred were further up the stream. Mrs. Dunne reserved in both deeds the right of way and privilege of taking water from the Uvas creek to Gilroy Water Company, the predecessor in interest of the plaintiff. This was evidence that as early as 1881 it was recognized that Gilroy Waterworks had some rights and that Mrs. Dunne was protecting herself when deeding lands up stream to other parties. True, these deeds would not be in the chain of title to the Kell property and would not furnish notice to appellants of the contents thereof. They were immaterial for that purpose, but they serve another purpose in the record as before indicated, and their admission was not error.

[2] It is contended that the plaintiff could not establish its right to the water by adverse possession (section 325, Code Civ. Proc.) without proving that its pipe line was protected by a substantial inclosure, which it was found by the court did not exist; and without proving that it had paid all taxes levied and assessed against the property claimed by it.

Section 325, Code of Civil Procedure, requires a substantial inclosure or usual improvements, and it appears that the usual improvements connected with a right to take water from the creek were placed upon the premises in the form of a pipe line. The right to divert water from a stream, in its very nature, cannot be protected by a substantial inclosure, and if the usual improvements connected with the enjoyment of such an easement are made, the statute is satisfied. Daniels v. Gualala Mill Co., 77 Cal. 300, 304, 19 Pac. 519; Allen v. McKay & Co., 120 Cal. 338, 52 Pac. 828.

[3] As to the contention that the plaintiff should have paid the taxes upon its easement, it appears from the record that no taxes were ever levied or assessed against the same. The statute requires the payment of such taxes as are levied and assessed against the property, and where none are levied or assessed, there is no requirement to pay them to establish adverse possession. 1 Cal. Jur. p. 601, § 74; Frederick v. Dickey, 91 Cal. 358, 27 Pac. 742; Elliott v. McIntosh, 41 Cal. App. 763, 183 Pac. 692; Monroe v. Pleasants, 41 Cal. App. 139, 182 Pac. 330; Oneto v. Restano, 78 Cal. 374, 379, 20 Pac. 743; Humphreys v. Blasingame, 104 Cal. 40, 37 Pac. 804.

[4] Appellants rely upon the permit of the state water commission allowing her to take a certain quantity of water from Uvas creek for irrigating her land. This permit itself stated that it was given "subject to vested rights," and in the proceedings before us upon appeal it was found that the plaintiff had certain vested rights and the permit granted to defendants did not even purport to interfere with these rights.

[5] Appellants state their positon to be that they are entitled to compensation for any water taken by the plaintiff from Uvas creek in excess of what was diverted by the old dam in 1900. This contention is answered by the findings of the court that the repairs to the pipe line authorized by the findings and decree will cause no greater burden upon said servient tenement than the dam and construction as it now exists and has existed during all the times mentioned in the findings; that said construction and said repair will not allow plaintiff to divert any more water than that to which it is entitled; and that after the making of said repairs the condition of the defendants' land and the amount of water available for defendants' use will not be materially changed from present and past conditions. There is evidence in the record to support these findings, and the decree merely permits plaintiff to replace its worn-out pipe with new pipe of the same size as is now laid upon said land and "in the same place and upon the same grade as the same is now laid."

[6-9] Complaint is made of the finding that the plaintiff has the right to enter upon the land of defendants for the purpose of maintaining and repairing its pipe line and keeping the stream in and above the dam in a clean condition and free from driftwood and gravel; that said right to enter includes the right to enter with teams and wagons for the purpose of hauling materials thereon for the purpose of repairing and maintaining said dam and pipe line. It is contended that this finding is too general and uncertain and should have defined and limited the road that the plaintiff must take in entering to make its repairs, and also that the evidence does not show that the plaintiff ever did more than to enter and clean out leaves in the stream, and that the record does not disclose that it ever exercised a right to enter with teams upon the property. With reference to the first point, since the finding is that plaintiff has the right to enter for the purpose of making repairs, of course, plaintiff has no right to roam all over the property as the appellants seem to fear, but must be held to a reasonable exercise of the license. The finding does limit the entry when it provides for an entry simply to make repairs; that means an entry at reasonable times, in a reasonable manner, upon a direct practical route and for the exclusive purpose mentioned. We do not think it is necessary that the plaintiff should have entered previously with teams in order to maintain its right to so enter now. If the repairs heretofore required for the water system did not require the use of teams, that circumstance should not make it necessary for the plaintiff to send its men in on foot when the ravages of time make it necessary to use large amounts of material in making necessary and proper repairs. An easement by prescription implies the right to make repairs if such repairs do not injuriously increase the burden upon the servient tenement.

> "Every easement includes what are termed 'secondary easements'; that is, the right to do such things as are necessary for the full enjoyment of the easement itself. But this right is limited and must be exercised in such reasonable manner as not to injuriously increase the burden upon the servient tenement." North Fork Water Co. v. Edwards, 121 Cal. 662, 54 Pac. 69.

In the instant case, it was found that the exercise of this right as permitted by the decree would not increase such burden.

> "It is well settled that the owner of an easement cannot change its character, or materially increase the burden upon the servient estate, or injuriously affect the rights of other persons, but within the limits named he may make repairs, improvements, or changes that do not affect its substance." Burris v. People's Ditch Co., 104 Cal. 248, 37 Pac. 922.

See, also, Pico v. Colimas, 32 Cal. 578, 581.

[10] These authorities answer the objections made to the portions of the decree permitting repairs to the dam and the erection of the settling box. These are incidental changes which do not change the substance of the easement of the plaintiff and which are necessary for the enjoyment of the same and do not, according to the findings, increase the burden upon the servient estate.

[11, 12] Appellants call attention to pages of testimony of the city engineer indicating changes which he contemplated making in the grade and size of the water pipes, all of which is immaterial and utterly beside the questions involved upon this appeal, since the findings and decree specifically state that the plaintiff is entitled merely to replace its worn-out pipe with new pipe of the same size as is now laid upon said land and in the same place and in the same grade. We do not think it is necessary, as repeatedly urged by appellants, that the findings and decree should state the exact number of gallons of water which the plaintiff may take each day, in view of the facts found by the court. If the pipe line is replaced in every particular as it has existed for many years, obviously, the city will continue in the future to take the amount of water it has taken in the past, and it was so found by the court. True, if the intake pipes are allowed to fill with gravel and débris, the city will secure less water, and defendants rely upon this condition to increase their own rights; but we have seen from the cases herein cited that the city has a right to clear away these impediments to its water supply as it becomes necessary to do so, and having this right, it follows that the circumstance that at any particular time the gravel may have partially impeded the flow of water into the pipes cannot deprive plaintiff of its right to clean and protect its pipes merely because after the cleaning the flow of water is increased. Obviously, if the gravel did not interfere with the flow of water, and its removal did not increase the water supply, there would be no reason nor necessity for the incidental privilege attached to the easement of removing the same.

There are no other matters which require discussion. The portion of the decree which declared that the plaintiff is the owner of the "right to use gravel in said creek for repairing said dam and pipe line" is reversed; the remainder of the decree is affirmed, the respondent to recover its costs upon appeal.

PEOPLE v. JENKINS. (Cr. 1101.)

1. Arson 🔑37(3)—Evidence held insufficient to show ownership, as alleged in indictment, of house burned.

Evidence held insufficient to prove that defendant burned a house which was property of person named as owner in indictment or of any known person.

2. Criminal law 🔑517(4)—Admission of defendant's confession in prosecution for arson without proof of corpus delicti held error.

In prosecution for arson, admission of defendant's confession was error, where it was not proved that fire was of incendiary origin, or that house burned was property of person named in indictment.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Guy J. Jenkins was convicted of arson, and he appeals. Reversed.

Marcus W. Robbins and Edward H. Whelan, both of San Diego (A. Thomas Whelan, of San Diego, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant was tried before a jury and found guilty of arson in the second degree as charged in the information. By the judgment he was sentenced to be confined in the state prison. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The information charged that the defendant on the 5th day of October, 1923, in the county of San Diego, did, with intent to destroy, willfully, etc., set fire to and cause to be burned a certain building, to wit, a dwelling house known as 3290 Wabash avenue, situated in the city of East San Diego, in said county; said building being then and there the property of one Emma R. Jenkins. The evidence shows that the house was located on lot 7 of block H in Montclair addition in East San Diego. The defendant and Mrs. Jenkins were husband and wife. On the 18th day of September, 1923, in an action of divorce between said husband and wife, an interlocutory judgment was entered to the effect that the plaintiff, Mrs. Jenkins, was entitled to a divorce from the defendant; that at the expiration of one year from the entry of the interlocutory judgment a final decree be entered dissolving the marriage, "and that she be awarded the control and custody of * * * their minor child; that she be decreed that part of lot 9, block H, Montclair addition, East San Diego, Cal., belonging to defendant, and the equity belonging to Guy J. Jenkins, the defendant, in Pacific Building Company in lots 7 and 8, block H, Montclair addition, East San Diego, Cal." The evidence shows that at some time prior to the divorce action the defendant and Mrs. Jenkins had lived in said house, which was a one-room shack of the value of about $60. The evidence further shows that after said proceedings in the divorce action the house was occupied by the defendant alone. There is no evidence of the ownership of the house and lot or that, at the time of the entry of the interlocutory judgment, or at any other time, the defendant had any equity or other right or title to said premises. For aught that appears, he may have been a mere squatter on the land or a tenant at will of the owner; or his "equity," if any he had, may have expired before the time of the fire. We are of the opinion that the evidence is insufficient to prove that the defendant burned a house which was the property of Emma R. Jenkins, or, indeed, of any known person.

A sister of Mrs. Jenkins testified that about the last of September or the first part of October she had a conversation with the defendant, wherein the defendant said that he was going to set fire to the house and burn it down. It appears from the testimony of witnesses that at about noon of October 5th the defendant went with one C. J. Beach, who operated a Ford truck, and took from said house all of the personal property therein, except an old couch and two suit cases. The house did not contain electric wiring or any gas, kerosene, coal oil, or gasoline. Mr. Beach, called as a witness for the state, testified to these facts, and further stated that he remained with the defendant during all of the time while they were at the house, and that the defendant did not light any matches, nor burn any brush, nor start any kind of a fire while they were there. On leaving the premises they took to a second-hand store the furniture that had been put into the truck, and the defendant sold it to the second-hand dealer.

The second-hand dealer testified to the transaction with the defendant and stated that the defendant remained there at his store about three-quarters of an hour.

The time of the fire, as compared with the time when defendant and the drayman left the house, was established by two witnesses for the people. They lived in the neighborhood, and they agreed that it was about one hour after defendant left the premises when they noticed that the house was on fire. It was in flames, and burned down very quickly. There is no evidence that the defendant returned to the premises after he and Beach drove away in the truck.

Other than a so-called confession, to which we will now refer, the foregoing is substantially all of the evidence on which the state relies to prove that the fire was of incendiary origin, or that it was set by the defendant.

On the 12th of December, 1923, one Frank A. Wisler, a detective employed by the district attorney's office, arrested the defendant and took him to the detective's office. According to the testimony of Wisler and others Wisler there obtained from the defendant a statement which was reduced to writing. In that statement, signed by the defendant, it is said that after selling the goods at the second-hand store, the defendant went back to the house and set it on fire. The defendant objected to the use of this alleged statement or confession, and to the testimony that he had made such a confession, on the ground, among others, that there was no proof of the corpus delicti, and that there was no proper foundation laid. Wisler had testified that at the time of obtaining the statement no threats were used and no promises or offers of reward were made in order to secure the statement from the defendant. He admitted, however, that he told the defendant, among other things, that he had certain evidence, and asked the defendant "if he wanted to tell the truth about the matter, or if wanted his word to stand as it was." The defendant had denied that he knew anything of the burning of the house. "I told him if he thought better to lie to use his own judgment, and I showed him what evidence we had." Again: "I kept repeating about using his own judgment, if he thought best to lie, to lie; if he thought better to tell the truth, to tell the truth; that I was in a hurry, I could not wait for him, and I had to go." Thereupon, according to the witness, the defendant made the statement which was reduced to writing.

[2] Assuming, without deciding, that the evidence was sufficient to justify the court in determining that the confession was admissible as against the objection that it was not voluntary, we think that it should have been excluded, because there is no separate and independent evidence tending to establish the corpus delicti. It was not proved that the fire was of incendiary origin or that the house in question was the property of Mrs. Jenkins. People v. Vertrees, 169 Cal. 404, 408, 146 Pac. 890; People v. Simonssen, 107 Cal. 345, 40 Pac. 440; People v. Saunders, 13 Cal. App. 743, 747, 110 Pac. 825. It is true that in some of the cases it has been held that slight evidence is sufficient to overcome the legal presumption that the burning of a building was accidental. Such evidence, however, should be of more substantial character than that produced in this case.

REARDON v. SPRING VALLEY WATER CO.

(Civ. 4885.)

1. Courts 🔑91(1) — Limitations by Supreme Court on rule of turntable cases binding on District Court of Appeal.

District Court of Appeal is bound by limitations imposed by prior decisions of Supreme Court on scope of doctrine of "turntable" cases.

2. Negligence 🔑39—Death of child drowned in reservoir held not actionable.

Doctrine of turntable cases held not to impose liability on water company for death of 5 year old boy, drowned by falling from unfastened row boat, maintained by company in its unguarded reservoir, on its private property in populous part of city.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter C. Herzinger, Judge.

Action by C. W. Reardon against the Spring Valley Water Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; LAWLOR and SEAWELL, JJ., dissenting.

Edwin V. McKenzie, of San Francisco, for appellant.

H. S. Young, of San Francisco (B. F. Rabinowitz, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against him entered after a demurrer had been sustained to his complaint, without leave to amend. The complaint alleged that on March 8, 1923, the defendant, Spring Valley Water Company, owned and maintained a large and deep body of water contained in a large artificial reservoir in the immediate vicinity of Holly Park, in the city and county of San Francisco, Cal.; that the said reservoir and the sides and embankment thereof were at all of said times visible to passers-by in the street immediately surrounding same, and said reservoir is located in a residential neighborhood; that many hundreds of children reside in said neighborhood; that this reservoir was immediately surrounded by public streets and highways, contiguous and adjacent thereto, where children of tender years were accustomed to resort for play; that said reservoir and grounds were partly protected by a fence, but that said fence was inadequate to prevent children from entering said reservoir grounds, because said fence was dilapidated and contained many large holes and openings of sufficient size to permit ingress to and egress from said grounds of said children; that at said times defendant maintained on this reservoir a small rowboat which floated upon the water along the side of a platform or wharf and was unsecured by any means; that said reservoir, grounds, landing, and boat so floating on the water constituted an attraction of extreme danger to children of tender years; that at all of said times many children of tender years, not knowing or realizing the danger, made use of said holes and openings in the fence, entered the grounds, and played in, on, and about said rowboat; that the defendant well knew all of these facts, but, nevertheless, failed to protect or guard its grounds by a watchman or by any other means; that the defendant, in disregard of its duty, carelessly, negligently, willfully, and wantonly permitted said reservoir and grounds to remain unguarded and said attractive rowboat to remain unsecured and unprotected; that on said 8th day of March 1923, the minor son of plaintiff of the age of five years, by reason of said negligent acts and omissions of defendant, entered said grounds through a large hole and opening in the defective fence, and, being attracted to said unsecured boat, boarded it, floated out on said water, and fell from said boat and was drowned. A demurrer was sustained to the complaint and judgment entered for the defendant.

Appellant opens his argument by stating that the general rule is that the owner of real property owes no duty of ordinary care to a trespasser, but that a well-grounded exception to this rule exists in the doctrine relating to nuisances attractive to young children. This statement is concurred in by the respondent, which admits that the doctrine of the "turntable" cases has been adopted and consistently followed by the courts of this state. It is further agreed between the parties to this appeal that there is a conflict among the decisions of the courts of the different states in this country upon the question of how far this doctrine shall be extended, and as to the nature of the cases which should come within its proper scope.

[1, 2] Appellant maintains that the California cases do not restrict the doctrine of the "turntable" cases to accidents arising out of dangerous machinery. In the case of Barrett v. So. Pac. Co., 91 Cal. 296, 27 Pac. 666, 25 Am. St. Rep. 186, the court speaks of the doctrine as applying to "dangerous and attractive machinery." In the case of Cahill v. Stone & Co., 153 Cal. 571, 96 Pac. 84, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094, it was held that the rule of the "turntable" cases was not confined to turntables, "but applies to any attractive and dangerous machinery so placed." In the case of Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 345, 47 Pac. 113, 56 Am. St. Rep. 106, the court refused to extend the rule of the "turntable" cases to death by drowning, declaring that "the cases to which the rule has been applied, so far as our attention has been called to them, are nearly all cases where the owner of land had erected on it dangerous machinery." Loftus v. Dehail, 133 Cal. 214, 65 Pac. 379, refused to extend the "turntable" doctrine beyond the limits defined in Peters v. Bowman, supra. George v. Los Angeles Railway Co., 126 Cal. 357, 58 Pac. 819, 46 L. R. A. 829, 77 Am. St. Rep. 184, limits the doctrine to injuries caused by "dangerous machinery." Other cases have extended the rule somewhat. Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., 161 Cal. 176, 118 Pac. 700; Faylor v. Great Eastern, etc., Mining Co., 45 Cal. App. 194, 187 Pac. 101. However, it may be conceded that recovery may be had in cases where accidents occur to young children through attractive nuisances which are not, technically, "dangerous machinery," without aiding the appellant in the least in the instant case. Able counsel, upon both sides, have so clearly and exhaustively briefed this case that it is a temptation to discuss the abundance of material upon the subject which they have presented to us. It would seem idle, however, to indulge in a historical treatment of the doctrine involved and its ramifications in the various jurisdictions, or to enter into a discussion of the various situations embraced within the operation of the rule, because there has been, in this state, an express and definite exclusion from the operation of the rule of the case where a child of tender years meets death by drowning in a natural or artificial body of water upon unfenced and unguarded private property, and we are bound by the limitations of the rule in our own state clearly stated in two cases precisely in point. Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 345, 47 Pac. 113, 56 Am. St. Rep. 106, and Polk v. Laurel Hill Cemetery Ass'n, 37 Cal. App. 624, 174 Pac. 414.

In the case of Peters v. Bowman, supra, an artificial pond existed on defendant's land; children played upon it and the defendant had knowledge of these facts. The decedent a boy of 11 years, had frequently played on the pond, and on the particular occasion constructed a raft from which he fell into the water and was drowned. The court said:

> "It is not contended by appellant that the rule of the turntable cases has ever been applied to facts like those in the case at bar; his contention is that the reasoning and philosophy of the rule ought to extend it to a case like the one at bar. But the same reasoning does not apply to both sets of cases. A body of water—either standing as in ponds and lakes, or running as in rivers and creeks, or ebbing and flowing, as on the shores of seas and bays—is a natural object incident to all countries which are not deserts. Such a body of water may be found in or close to nearly every city or town in the land; the danger of drowning in it is an apparent open danger, the knowledge of which is common to all, and there is no just view consistent with recognized rights of property owners, which would compel one owning land upon which such water, or part of it, stands or flows, to fill it up, or surround it with an impenetrable wall. However, general reasoning on the subject is unnecessary, because adjudicated cases have determined the question adversely to appellant's contention. No case has been cited where damages have been successfully recovered for the death of a child drowned in a pond on private premises who had gone there without invitation; while it has been repeatedly held that in such a case no damages can be recovered."

On the direct authority of the case from which the foregoing quotation is taken, the court, in the case of Polk v. Laurel Hill Cemetery Association, supra, which likewise involved a death by drowning in an artificial pond on private property, declared that there was no liability, using the following language, which is pertinent here:

> "A pond of water, it may be conceded, is always attractive to youngsters, but the dangers connected with, and inherent in a lake or pond of water, natural or artificial, are obvious to everybody—even to a child old enough to be permitted by its parents to go about and play unattended upon the streets or in the public parks. It would not conform to the dictates of common reason to say that a child of the age of eight years, or even much younger, does not know and fully realize that a fall into a pond of water or a deep reservoir would result in injury to him, if not in his death. But there is no necessity for abstract reasoning upon the proposition, for we think it thoroughly settled by the decisions that a pond of water, whether natural or artificial, is not to be included in the same class with turntables and other complicated machinery, the inherent dangers of which are not obvious to a child."

The strongest case in his favor cited by appellant is the case of City of Pekin v. McMahon, 154 Ill. 141, 39 N. E. 484, 27 L. R. A. 206, 45 Am. St. Rep. 114. This case seems to be squarely opposed to the rule in this state, as expressed in the cases cited in this opinion. Not only is it without value here as a precedent, for that reason, but it has been called to the attention of our Supreme Court and rejected as contrary to the view of that tribunal. In the opinion denying a rehearing in the case of Peters v. Bowman, supra, it was said, referring to the case of Pekin v. McMahon, supra:

> "I can only say that the reasoning of the opinion in that case has failed to convince me, and that the decision stands alone and without other support than may be found in the turntable cases from which the Supreme Court of Illinois was unable to distinguish it. I think, however, that there is a distinction which relieves us of the necessity of extending an exceptionally harsh rule of liability to such a case."

Therefore, in the light of the precedents binding upon this court, there is only one possible theory upon which appellant can recover, and that is that the single additional feature of an unsecured floating boat entirely removes the case from the application of the settled rule in California. To take respondent's striking presentation of the matter: If a child of the age of appellant's son, while trespassing on private property, is attracted to an artificial pond and falls in and drowns, there is no liability; if the same child, attracted to the same pond for the purpose of fishing, loses his balance and falls into the water and is drowned, there is no liability; if the child, while swimming in the pond, is drowned, there is no liability; if he constructs a raft and uses it upon said pond and falls from it and is drowned, there is no liability under the authority of the California cases cited therein. Can it be that if he falls from a rowboat left upon the water by the owner of the property and is drowned a different legal principle is involved? We think there is no reason for a different rule in the instance last mentioned and an examination of the following authorities will indicate that there is no change in the principle to be applied, because a child was drowned after falling from a floating object placed in the water by the owner of the property. Blum v. Weatherford, 121 La. 298, 46 So. 317; Rallo v. Heman Construction Co., 291 Mo. 221, 236 S. W. 632; Richards v. Connell, 45 Neb. 467, 63 N. W. 915; Bowman v. Omaha, 52 Neb. 293, 72 N. W. 316, 40 L. R. A. 531, 66 Am. St. Rep. 506; Cooper v. Overton, 102 Tenn. 211, 52 S. W. 183, 45 L. R. A. 591, 73 Am. St. Rep. 864; Barnhart v. Chicago, etc., R. R. Co., 89 Wash. 304, 154 Pac. 441, L. R. A. 1916D, 443; Smith v. McGoldrick Lumber Co., 214 Pac. 819; Robbins v. City of Omaha, 100 Neb. 439, 160 N. W. 749.

The cases last cited involved situations where young children fell from rafts or logs into an unfenced body of water upon private property. We think that upon neither reason nor authority can the instant case be differentiated in principle from the cases of Peters v. Bowman, supra, and Polk v. Laurel Hill Cemetery Association, supra.

The judgment is affirmed.

COVINA UNION HIGH SCHOOL DIST. OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. McCLELLAN, Chairman of Board of Supervisors. (Civ. 4706.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 10, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 7, 1924.)

1. Schools and school districts 🔑97(4)—Ballots not marked as required not entitled to be counted as "votes" in determining whether bond issue carried; "vote cast."

Under Pol. Code, § 1745, providing that an election to create bonded indebtedness of a high school district shall be according to sections 1596–1601, and that voters shall mark cross after answer they desire to give, and section 1599, as amended by St. 1917, p. 15, and section 1883, relating to the manner of marking ballots, ballots in such an election, void because marked in violation of statute, were not valid for purpose of increasing total number of votes in determining whether the proposition received two-thirds of votes cast under section 1746, and Const. art. 11, § 18; void ballot, although being placed in box, not being "vote cast."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Votes Cast.]

2. "Void acts" defined.

Void, as distinguished from voidable acts are those which are of no legal effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Void.]

3. Elections 🔑186(4) — Statutory specifications of manner of expressing choice mandatory.

The specifications in Pol. Code, §§ 1745, 1883, and section 1599, as amended by St. 1917, p. 15, as to manner in which electors shall express their choice, are mandatory.

4. Schools and school districts 🔑97(4) — "Two-thirds of the votes cast" at bond election held to mean two-thirds of votes complying with law.

Provision of Pol. Code, § 1746, relating to elections to create bonded indebtedness in high school districts, and providing that, if "two-thirds of the votes cast at such election" were in favor of issuing bonds, they shall be deemed to have carried, means two-thirds of those votes which comply with law and are potent in expressing choice on subject of election.

Petition by the Covina Union High School District of Los Angeles County for a writ of mandate to be directed to R. F. McClellan as Chairman of the Board of Supervisors of Los Angeles County. Writ granted.

Edward T. Bishop, Co. Counsel, of Los Angeles, and J. H. O'Connor, Asst. Co. Counsel, of Hynes, for petitioner.

Thomas B. Reed, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. Petitioner seeks a writ of mandate requiring the respondent as chairman of the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county to execute certain school bonds authorized by the board pursuant to an election held October 11, 1923, in Covina union high school district, for the purpose of determining whether or not an indebtedness of $200,000 should be created, and such bonds issued therefor.

[1] The only question presented is whether or not eleven defective ballots, admittedly not entitled to be counted for or against the bonds, and which were rejected, should be included in the total number of votes cast. Fourteen hundred and ninety-three persons deposited in the boxes ballots furnished them at the election; each ballot was properly printed, and bore the words "Yes" and "No," with a small square space opposite each word, in which electors should "mark a cross with pencil, ink, or rubber stamp after the answer they desire to give," as required by section 1745 of the Political Code. One of the rejected ballots bore a cross in each space, and the other 10 contained no crosses, but the word "Yes" or "No" was written in the space provided for the cross. Nine hundred and ninety-one ballots properly prepared with the cross were cast in favor of the bonded indebtedness and 491 in the negative, amounting to the total number of 1,482 ballots, after excluding the 11 votes which the respondent concedes should not be counted on either side.

Petitioner's contention is that, inasmuch as the 11 ballots in controversy could not be included among the majority or the minority, they were ineffectual for any purpose. The respondent refused to execute the bonds upon the ground that, although 11 ballots were illegal, and did not express a choice either way, yet they were cast, and should be added to the 1,482 votes legally cast. Hence it is computed that 1,493 persons voted at the election, and that 998 affirmative votes were required to constitute the necessary two-thirds of the qualified electors voting at such election, as provided by section 18, article 11, of the Constitution.

Section 1745 of the Political Code provides that an election for the creation of a bonded indebtedness in a high school district shall be conducted in conformity with sections 1596 to 1601, inclusive, of that Code, and that "electors voting at such elections shall mark a cross with pencil, ink, or rubber stamp, after the answer they desire to give." Section 1599, as amended by St. 1917, p. 15, requires that "in casting his vote the elector must stamp or write a cross in the square space immediately following the name of the candidate. * * *" Section 1883 also provides that "Persons voting at such bond elections shall put a cross (x) upon their ballots, with pencil, or ink, after the words 'Bonds—Yes' or 'Bonds—No' (as the case may be) to indicate whether they have voted for or against the issuance of bonds." Section 1746, Political Code, provides that, "if it appears that two-thirds of the votes cast at said election were cast in favor of issuing such bonds," they shall be deemed to have carried.

It was expressly held by this court in City of Inglewood v. Kew, 21 Cal. App. 611, 132 Pac. 780, that:

> "The final deposit of a legal ballot in the box is the act of voting. It matters not that one sign the roster, take his ballot, repair to the booth, and formally present to the election officers what purports to be his ballot; nevertheless, if such ballot is not expressive of any wish or preference of the voter, which under the law may be considered and given effect, such person has not voted, and his vote should not be counted, even in the determination of the number of persons who voted at the election."

People v. Sausalito, 106 Cal. 500, 39 Pac. 937, held that ballots without marks to indicate the electors' wish in any particular were not votes in any sense, and should not be counted for any purpose, and in Sweetser v. Pacheco, 172 Cal. 137, 155 Pac. 639, it was said by the Supreme Court that a ballot not marked in compliance with the statute was simply "no vote." Murphy v. San Luis Obispo, 119 Cal. 624, 51 Pac. 1085, 39 L. R. A. 444, is to the same effect.

[2-4] Respondent attempts to distinguish these cases from the one at bar, in that they involve ballots rejected because of distinguishing marks, or because they were blank, or that the ballots were cast for candidates; but as we have said, section 1745, Political Code, expressly adopts the requirements of sections 1596 to 1601, inclusive, and while the facts of the different cases may be distinguishable, yet this precise point is decided in the language quoted herein. Citation of authority is unnecessary to sustain the rule that void, as distinguished from voidable, acts are of no legal effect. It follows that any number of ballots marked in violation of the statute and void, as affecting the decision of the question presented, would not be valid for the purpose of increasing the total, or for any other purpose. If a void ballot be placed in the box, it cannot be said that it is a "vote cast." The specifications in the Code, as to the manner in which electors shall express their choice, are mandatory. Pleasant Grove Union High School Dist. v. Algeo (Cal. App.) 215 Pac. 726. The logical conclusion is that by the expression "two-thirds of the votes cast at such election" is meant two-thirds of those which comply with the law, and are potent in expressing a choice upon the subject of the election.

The peremptory writ will issue as prayed.

1. Street railroads 🔑103(1)—Instruction on last clear chance doctrine held erroneous.

Instruction on last clear chance doctrine, stating that defendants' motorman and his employer were chargeable with knowledge that motorman should have had if he had been looking to front, when in fact he had his head to one side and was looking over his right shoulder when his car was 35 feet away, and decedent lay prostrate on street car track in front of motorman, held erroneous.

2. Trial 🔑243—Giving of two conflicting instructions on last clear chance doctrine held reversible error.

Where court gave two instructions on last clear chance doctrine, one of which was correct and the other, an oral instruction, incorrect, giving of them held reversible error, though correct one given first.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Mary Alcamisi and others, by Mary Lacono, their guardian ad litem, against the Market Street Railway Company and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; LAWLOR and SEAWELL, JJ., dissenting.

Wm. M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, and Walter H. Linforth, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Milton Marks and Marks & Cohen, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. [1, 2] On the 19th day of October, 1921, Gaetano Alcamisi was struck by a street car operated by the defendant, and the injury was so severe that he died soon after. Later his children, through their guardian, commenced an action against the defendants to recover damages. A trial was had, and the jury brought in a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs. Judgment was entered thereon, and from that judgment the defendants have appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

On the trial of the case it was the theory of the plaintiffs that the accident was the result of the negligence of the defendants, and that such negligence consisted of a failure to sound a gong, the operation of the car at an excessive speed, to wit, 20 or 25 miles per hour, and operating its cars with its fenders so high that the fenders did not function. The defendants controverted all of these charges, and claimed that the accident occurred by reason of the fact that the decedent, while drunk, suddenly stepped or fell in front of the defendants' car, and although the car was stopped almost instantly, nevertheless the accident had happened. Many witnesses were called and examined, and there was some evidence before the jury which tended to support each claim. Moreover, the plaintiffs claimed that the case came within the doctrine of the last clear chance, and they tendered instructions on the applicability of that doctrine, and the trial court gave some of them.

After the jury retired to deliberate on its verdict, it returned into court, and the following proceedings were had:

> "The Foreman: I would like to have this lady, Miss Steinman, ask the court.
> "Miss Steinman: If you think that the defendant is guilty, but you think that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in some degree, how does that influence your verdict?
> "The Court: Well, in that case, if you believe that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence, and that the defendant was also guilty of negligence, the plaintiff cannot recover, except, if you also believe that, notwithstanding the negligence of the plaintiff in placing himself in a position of danger, that the defendant, through its servant, the motorman, knew or should have known, by facts which would ordinarily come within the observation of an ordinarily reasonably careful man, that he was in a position of danger, and could, by the use of ordinary care, have saved him, notwithstanding his negligence, that is, notwithstanding the negligence of the decedent, then, under those circumstances, and under those circumstances only, can the plaintiff recover. Do I make that clear?
> "The Juror: Very clear."

Then, acting upon request of counsel, or the request of a juror, the trial court reread some of the other instructions, and also caused to be read the testimony of the motorman, Mr. Harrison, who was operating the street car. After these proceedings had been had the jury retired, and later it returned into court and announced that it had agreed upon a verdict. That verdict was in the sum of $2,500. Thereafter the defendants moved for a new trial, their motion was denied, and, as stated above, the defendants have appealed from the judgment.

The first point made by the appellants is that the statement made by the trial court in response to the question propounded by Miss Steinman was a misstatement of the law, because it purports to rest the doctrine of last clear chance on what the motorman should have known instead of on what he actually knew. And appellants claim that, because of what the motorman ought to have known, the defendants were not liable under the last clear chance doctrine, and they cite and rely on Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 Pac. 651; Thompson v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 Pac. 709. In reply the respondents contend that, if it be assumed that the instruction was erroneous, nevertheless it was not harmful, and they cite and rely on Collins v. Marsh, 176 Cal. 639, 169 Pac. 389. That case is not helpful. Marsh testified that he saw the buggy in the street, and drove up to the buggy and collided therewith. In its decision the court said:

> "Nor was it denied that the appellant saw the buggy in ample time to enable him to avoid striking it. His own testimony was that he noticed it when he was still 40 or 50 feet away."

Whereas, in this case, the witness Harrison, the motorman, was called as a witness, and was examined and cross-examined at length. As to when he first actually saw the deceased, the only evidence in the record was given by him. He testified:

> "I noticed a man come staggering out from behind the truck on my left. * * * I immediately began to make my stop, to stop the car, because I thought the man would continue right on across the way he was going, and possibly fall in front of the car, which he did. I began my stop, and first rang the gong."

The other testimony given in the case, which it is necessary for us to consider, was given by a young Italian boy, Tony Vellone. His testimony, pertinent to the matter under consideration, was as follows:

> "Mr. Marks: Q. Did you see the motorman from where you were standing where [when] this man fell down? A. Yes.

"Q. What was the motorman doing? A. The motorman was looking towards the west.

"Q. Suppose you were the motorman standing there as the motorman was, show the jury just how the motorman was looking. A. He was looking like this way all the time (showing).

"The Court: Q. Looking over his right shoulder, that is true, is it not, Mr. Linforth?

"Mr. Linforth: That is the position the witness took.

"The Court: That is what I meant to ask.

"Mr. Marks: Q. How far away was the car from Mr. Alcamisi at the time the motorman was looking over his right shoulder, how far away was the car when you saw the motorman do that? Just about. You don't have to give me the exact feet and inches. Can you show me in this courtroom? When you say that the motorman had his face that way (indicating), how far away was the car from the man that you saw? Show us in this courtroom about how far, from where to where in this courtroom. A. I don't understand.

"Q. You say you saw the motorman turn with his face over his right shoulder, his head over his right shoulder that way (indicating). When he had his face over his right shoulder, did you also see this man who was killed, was he on the track then? A. He was on the track.

"Q. How far away was the car from the man on the track when you saw the motorman with his head turned over his shoulder? A. About 35 feet."

If one reads the testimony last quoted, and if one then reads the instruction given orally in reply to the question propounded by Miss Steinman, the error is patent. In other words, as addressed to that testimony, the jury could fairly and reasonably assume that the trial court had instructed the jury that the motorman and his employer were chargeable with the knowledge which a motorman should have had if he had been looking to the front when, as testified by Vellone, the motorman had his head to one side and was looking over his right shoulder when his car was 35 feet away, and the decedent lay prostrate on the street car track.

As the record stood when the jury returned to the jury room to deliberate for the second time on their verdict, there were then before them two contradictory instructions, plaintiffs' instruction No. 5, which correctly stated the law defining the last clear chance doctrine, and the oral statement made by the court in reply to the juror, Miss Steinman, which statement, as we have just shown, was an incorrect statement of the law. It is impossible to say which of the two contradictory instructions the jury followed. When that is so, the giving of contradictory instructions is reversible error. In the case of Hesler v. California Hospital Co., 178 Cal. 764, at page 768, 174 Pac. 654, 655, the Supreme Court said:

> "The court below in other instructions stated the rule by which the defendants were bound, accurately and clearly. There is a clear conflict in the instructions. We are unable to determine which set of rules the jury followed. The case of the plaintiff on the merits, at best, is not strong. We cannot say that these instructions were not injurious to the defendant and did not improperly control the deliberations of the jury in rendering a verdict. A number of objections were made to rulings upon evidence which it is unnecessary to discuss."

In the case of Starr v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 187 Cal. 270, at page 280, 201 Pac. 599, 603, the same court said:

> "It is true, as respondent points out, that the instructions are to be construed together, but where the instructions are flatly contradictory, as is the case where the jury is instructed upon a specific state of facts to bring in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff or defendant and is elsewhere instructed in general terms not to do so, the instructions must be held to be conflicting and prejudicial, because it cannot be ascertained upon what theory the verdict was returned. The theory of the plaintiff and defendant were diametrically opposed and the evidence, as well as the instructions, was sharply conflicting. Under this condition it cannot be said that there is no miscarriage of justice when it cannot be ascertained from the record upon what theory the jury was authorized by the instructions of the court to render its verdict, or upon what state of facts shown in evidence the verdict was reached."

The effect of the error was not lessened because the instruction complained of was oral, nor because it was given at one time, and the instruction with which it conflicted was given first before the jury retired the first time, and again before it retired the second time.

The judgment is reversed.

GRANT v. GRANT. (Civ. 3952.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 28, 1924. Rehearing Denied July 28, 1924.)

1. Divorce 🔑37(19)—Offer of reconciliation by deserting party comes too late, if deserted party's action has ripened.

Under Civ. Code, § 102, providing for curing of desertion, an offer of reconciliation by deserting party comes too late, if made after deserted party's cause of action for divorce has ripened, in that it does not affect right to sue upon such cause of action, nor give deserting party a cause of action for desertion because of refusal of offer.

2. Husband and wife 🔑283(2)—Attempted reconciliation no defense to action for separate maintenance brought after cause of action for divorce for desertion has ripened.

Under Civ. Code, § 137, as amended in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 205), after an act of desertion upon part of husband has ripened into cause of action for divorce, wife has right to sue for separate maintenance which cannot be defeated by subsequent attempted reconciliation by husband.

3. Husband and wife ⚷283(2)—Right of wife to press cause of action for maintenance not affected by husband's ambiguous offer of reconciliation.

Right of wife to press her cause of action for maintenance was not affected by husband's attempted offer of reconciliation, irrespective of Civ. Code, § 137, where because of its ambiguous character and conditions stated therein she did not understand nature of offer.

4. Divorce ⚷37(19) — Offer of reconciliation not complete, unless offeree can comprehend its meaning.

An offer of reconciliation, whatever the spirit in which it is made, is not a completed offer, unless offeree can comprehend its meaning.

5. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Trial court's findings on conflicting evidence not set aside by appellate court.

Trial court's findings on conflicting evidence will not be set aside by appellate court.

On Petition for Rehearing.

6. Appeal and error ⚷835(2)—Attack on finding upon petition for rehearing held too late.

An attack on trial court's finding upon a petition for rehearing in appellate court comes too late, where no semblance of an attack has been made prior thereto, and finding has not been quoted or mentioned in brief of either party on appeal.

7. Divorce ⚷133(1)—Evidence held to sustain finding of desertion on certain date.

In an action for divorce, evidence held to sustain finding that husband deserted wife on certain date.

8. Divorce ⚷133(3)—Evidence held to sustain finding that letters offering reconciliation were ambiguous.

In action for divorce, evidence held to sustain finding that husband's letters offering reconciliation were ambiguous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by John Grant against Wilhelmina Grant, in which defendant cross-complained for separate maintenance. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
John H. Miller, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action for divorce in which defendant cross-complained for separate maintenance. Judgment passed against plaintiff under his complaint and in favor of defendant under her cross-complaint. Plaintiff appeals.

The appeal is prosecuted under what is known as the alternative method but neither of the counsel for the respective parties has complied with the provision of section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure to the effect that in the conduct of appeals pursuant to that method "the parties must * * * print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court." Fugitive portions of the record, indeed, are printed in each of the briefs, but they present no intelligible basis upon which to consider the points upon which it is contended that the judgment should be reversed. There are references by page to the typewritten transcript of the evidence, but even these instances of avoidance of the provision of the Code, when followed up, do not exhibit an adequate view of the litigation for the purposes of the appeal. As the cause is of grave importance to the parties, and as the transcript of the evidence consists of but 150 pages, we have concluded to waive in this instance the requirement of the Code, to the end that the parties may not be penalized because of the neglect of their counsel, and have read the transcript in full. We have also found it necessary to peruse the clerk's transcript of the pleadings, findings of fact, and judgment We cannot forbear to mention these circumstances in what we fear, after all, may be a vain attempt to induce the profession to observe more narrowly the rule we have mentioned. Violations of it are so frequent that they increase the labors and therefore impede the work of the courts of review of the state. We indulge the fond but perhaps delusive hope that these remarks may immerse the profession in a waive of reform.

Appellant and respondent separated in Chicago on December 26, 1909, in which city they had theretofore resided as husband and wife. Appellant then withdrew from the family home and his wife remained in it. The husband resided at another place in Chicago for sixteen months after the separation, at the end of which period he removed to California, where he has ever since remained. Some time after he arrived in this state he wrote to the wife a letter in which he invited her to come to him in order that they might take up again their marital duties and obligations, but she ignored the request. During the years intervening between the date of that letter and the commencement of this cause appellant wrote to his wife frequent missives of the same character. She continued, not actually to refuse his requests, but to ignore them, and this action was the result. The complaint consists of two counts. The first of these alleges acts of cruelty occurring at and before the time of the separation of December 26, 1909, while the second avers a desertion on or about January 1, 1912, which was at the time of the first letter in which the husband invited the wife to return to him. The trial court found against the allegation of cruelty. The nature of its finding as to the second count will immediately be stated.

Upon the issue of desertion, tendered by the complaint, the court found that the husband had in good faith endeavored to effect a reconciliation with the wife; that he had endeavored to invite her to resume the marital relation; and that he had provided for her a suitable home in California. To this matter we shall hereafter refer as the first portion of the court's finding. It was further found, however, that the husband's letters of invitation "were so ambiguous and contained so many expressed conditions that the defendant acting in good faith did not understand or believe said letters contained bona fide and good faith invitations" to become reconciled with him. Other facts which we need not mention were also covered by the finding. Appellant's first point is that he was entitled to a decree pursuant to the first portion of the finding, citing McMullin v. McMullin, 123 Cal. 653, 56 Pac. 554, notwithstanding the other facts found. Another point made is that "plaintiff was entitled to a decree of divorce upon the evidence, and there is no foundation in fact for the court's findings that defendant had any ground whatever in rejecting the offer of reconciliation." The third and last point presented is that, under Volkmar v. Volkmar, 147 Cal. 175, 81 Pac. 413, the trial court erred in awarding the wife separate maintenance on the ground that such an award cannot be made "when the wife refuses to live with her husband, unless she is justified by reason of his fault." We are not called upon to decide any of these three questions, although we shall at the close of the opinion consider two points closely related to the third, but a statement of them all is a necessary preface to the determination of a question which we shall now discuss.

[1] As a basis for her cause of action for separate maintenance the wife alleged a desertion by her husband on December 26, 1909. The trial court found upon conflicting evidence that this allegation was true, but the finding is neither quoted nor mentioned in the brief of either party. Under the finding the wife had a ripened and complete cause of action for divorce on December 26, 1910, Civ. Code, § 107. It is provided by section 102 of the Civil Code:

> "If one party deserts the other, and before the expiration of the statutory period required to make the desertion a cause of divorce, returns and offers in good faith to fulfill the marriage contract, and solicits condonation, the desertion is cured."

Under this statute the courts have naturally determined that an offer of reconciliation tendered by the deserting party is too late if made after the deserted party's cause of action for divorce has ripened, in that it does not affect the right to sue upon such cause of action, nor give to the deserting party a cause of action for desertion because of a refusal of the offer. See 9 Cal. Jur. title, "Divorce and Separation," § 43. It is apparent from the mere statement of this rule, in connection with the finding that appellant was guilty of desertion on December 26, 1909, that respondent did not desert him on January 1, 1912; that, obviously, his first and second points disappear; and that, equally obviously, his cause of action based on a desertion falls to the ground. The point arising thus under section 102 of the Code is argued by neither of the parties, but our attention is nevertheless startlingly attracted to it by expressions in the briefs. It is plainly brought into the case by appellant's statement of all three of his points, as we have set them forth above, and the first sentence of respondent's brief is: "The appellant and respondent were married in Chicago, Ill., on February 8, 1890, and lived together as husband and wife until December 26, 1909, when the appellant deserted his wife." Under these circumstances we are unable to avoid a decision of the question.

[2] Not only are appellant's first and second points answered by the finding that he deserted his wife in 1909, but his third point meets the same fate, as that point is stated, especially as the question he presents is based upon Volkmar v. Volkmar, supra, which was a divorce case. We must however, state another point for the benefit of appellant, even if it must come to naught. Although section 102 of the Civil Code has the effect which we have ascribed to it upon questions of divorce, it was once decided that the rule is different as to the wife's suit for separate maintenance. In a suit of the latter character the Supreme Court said:

> "Willful desertion must continue for one year before it is a ground for divorce (Civ. Code, § 107); and it is provided in section 102 preceding, that if, prior to the expiration of such time, the party deserting 'returns and offers in good faith to fulfill the marriage contract, and solicits condonation, the desertion is cured;' and in Benkert v. Benkert, 32 Cal. 467, it was held that an offer to return, made after expiration of the time necessary to give the ground for divorce, will not, if refused, defeat the action of the injured party for divorce. Plaintiff contends, in support of her appeal, that a rule like that in Benkert v. Benkert should obtain in this case, and that the defendant's offer to return came too late. The cases, however, differ materially. See Hardy v. Hardy, 97 Cal. 125, 130. In Benkert v. Benkert, dissolution of the marriage bond was sought; here the plaintiff, as she testified at the trial, and as her suit shows, desires no divorce, but insists that the marriage relation shall continue. Manifestly, to enforce the duty of support against defendant when, as the court finds, he seeks in good faith to fulfill his obligations, and at the same time to exonerate plaintiff from the correlative duty of living with defendant at some reasonable place of abode (Civ. Code, § 156), would be the granting of a limited divorce, for which our law makes no provision (Hagle v. Hagle, 74 Cal. 608, 612; Peyre v. Peyre, 79 Cal. 336). The cases touching this subject quite uniformly hold or imply that although the husband may have deserted the wife, yet the door for repentance is open for him, and is not necessarily closed by the fact of suit brought for maintenance; so, not because of any tenderness of the law for delinquent husbands, but because of its aversion to separation of the spouses." McMullin v. McMullin, 123 Cal. 653, 56 Pac. 554.

If the opinion from which this quotation is taken is still the law, appellant's attempted offer for reconciliation was not too late, as affecting the wife's cause of action for maintenance. The question whether McMullin v. McMullin is yet authority upon the point covered by the quotation is inspired by a comparison of the language of section 137 of the Civil Code as it has been since 1905 with its text as it stood when that case was decided in 1899 and had stood without material change for more than twenty years. In 1899 the section read, in part:

> "When the husband willfully deserts the wife, she may, without applying for a divorce, maintain * * * an action against him for permanent support and maintenance," etc.

This language was supplanted in the amended section of 1905 (St. 1915, p. 205) by the following:

> "When the wife has any cause of action for divorce as provided in section ninety-two of this Code, she may, without applying for divorce, maintain * * * an action against him for permanent support and maintenance," etc.

There seems little room for argument in considering the effect of this amendment upon the doctrine of McMullin v. McMullin. It is to us obvious that the language imported into the statute in 1905 gave to a wife the right to prosecute successfully her action for separate maintenance whenever an act of desertion upon the part of her spouse had ripened into a cause for divorce, and that his right to seek a reconciliation was cut off in so far as it could affect in any manner the prosecution to a successful issue of such a suit against him after the ripening of the cause of action. Strange to say, this question has never yet been passed on and can be resolved upon reason alone. By an amendment to section 137 adopted in 1907 (St. 1907, p. 82) the Legislature inserted a passage which was in part similar in form to the language which was eliminated by the amendment of 1905. It was, "When the husband willfully deserts the wife or when the husband willfully fails to provide for the wife or," and it was inserted in such a manner as to make the sentence which is of interest here read as follows:

> "When the husband willfully deserts the wife or when the husband willfully fails to provide for the wife or when the wife has any cause of action for divorce as provided in section ninety-two of this Code, she may," etc.

The effect of the amendment of 1907, as engrafted upon the language "when the wife has any cause of action for divorce," etc., can be nothing more than to create a right in the wife to prosecute her suit for maintenance upon a "desertion" less than a year old. That she may now maintain such a suit appears to have been conceded by the opinion in Gray v. Gray, 185 Cal. 598, 197 Pac. 945. It appears to us that the amendment of 1907 had no effect upon the amendment of 1905 as we have determined the latter to operate upon the question before us here and upon the doctrine of McMullin v. McMullin, supra. In short, and in response to a suggestion made in the opinion rendered in that case, it appears that section 137 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1905, provides, in effect, for the granting of a limited divorce.

[3-5] In addition to what we have said as to the effect of section 137 as it has stood since 1905, we now come to a consideration of the finding of the trial court which we have mentioned in connection with the statement of appellant's first point. It will be observed that the court found, substantially, that appellant endeavored in good faith to effect a reconciliation with his wife, but that because of the ambiguous character of his letters and the conditions stated in them she did not understand the nature of the offer. We are satisfied that this latter portion of the finding controls the portion touching upon appellant's good faith in making the offer. It is not too much to say that an offer of reconciliation, whatever the spirit in which it is made, is not really a completed offer, unless it is so couched that the offeree may comprehend its meaning. Suppose such an offer were transmitted to one in a language which he did not understand. Suppose it were spoken to one stone deaf. Under such circumstances could the offer bind the receiver to accept it or suffer the consequences of a refusal? Surely not, and we think the answer must be the same here. We think that, under the finding of the court, irrespective of the effect of section 137, the right of respondent to press her cause of action for maintenance was not affected by the attempted offer. It remains only to remark that the portion of the finding dealing with the ambiguous character of the offer and with respondent's inability to understand it was made upon conflicting evidence. It must therefore stand.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; CRAIG, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [6, 7] This cause is pending upon petition for rehearing. Before making formal disposition of the petition we deem it advisable to correct certain inaccuracies and misstatements and to meet arguments contained in it. It is said that appellant's "offer of reconciliation did not come too late. In this we have attacked and now attack the finding paragraph 4. * * *" The finding thus alluded to was the finding that appellant deserted respondent on December 26, 1909. No semblance of an attack has heretofore been made upon that finding, and we correctly stated in our opinion that the finding was "neither quoted nor mentioned in the brief of either party." The attack now made in the petition for rehearing comes too late, but we nevertheless shall pay some attention to it. Appellant says that the parties to the cause did not finally separate until December 26, 1911, and that there is no evidence to show a final separation, much less a desertion, on December 26, 1909. This point is made after a quotation of a statement which, strangely enough, appears in respondent's brief, and which was not overlooked by us in the preparation of our opinion. Respondent says in her brief that the parties "continued to live together until, as appellant testifies, * * * 'I left the 27th day of March, 1911,' and 'I left home the 26th day of December, 1911,'" etc., and, in truth, there is a statement to that effect in the record testimony of appellant. However, the insertion of the year as 1911 occurred either through an error of the stenographic reporter who was at the trial or through a slip of appellant's tongue. This is so apparent from the entire record in the cause that we did not deem the circumstance worthy of mention in the opinion. That the statement of the year as 1911 is a palpable error appears from the following, as well as from many other matters in the record: The son of the parties testified:

> "Q. You remember the time that your father left home on December 26, 1911 or 1912— A. December 26, 1909, yes, sir."

Not only does this interruption of counsel show, but the entire tenor of the examination of the witness shows, that he was testifying concerning the final separation of his father and mother. Appellant himself testified:

> "Q. * * * Before you came to California, where did you live? A. In Chicago. * * *
> "Q. And when did you leave Chicago? A. I left the 27th day of March, 1911.
> "Q. When did you separate from your wife? A. I separated from my wife in—the 26th day of December, 1909. * * *
> "Q. And did you write to your wife after coming out here? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. How long had you been here; about what date was it * * * that you wrote the first letter? * * * A. About May or June, 1911."

Appellant on December 20, 1911, six days before his counsel now contends the final separation occurred, wrote respondent the letter upon which appellant bases his charge of desertion as of January 1, 1912. The letter, as set out in the record, is quoted in full in appellant's brief and likewise in his petition for rehearing. It was postmarked, as shown in the petition for rehearing, as well as in the other places in which it appears, "Bell—Dec. 20, 1911—Cal." The letter begins, "As it is now about 2 years sins we have seen each other," etc. We need go no further in discussing the present point of appellant. So far as the factor of time is concerned the trial court could have made no finding other than that appellant deserted respondent on December 26, 1909.

[8] Appellant insists that "there can be no justification for the court's finding that the letter offering reconcilation was ambiguous, for three reasons." The reasons assigned are: First, that the letter of December 20, 1911, containing the offer, was on its face unambiguous; second, that there was no testimony that respondent did not understand the letter, and, third, that respondent testified that her only reason for not accepting the offer was that she did not think it was made in good faith, and that she believed appellant had left her without cause. This point we shall now consider at some length, as we decided it in our opinion by the mere statement at its close that the finding in question must stand for the reason that it was made on conflicting evidence. That the disposition thus made of the question was correct will be shown by a reference to a few circumstances disclosed by the record. In the first place, the court's finding was not alone that the offer was ambiguous, but that "the letters of invitation so written by the plaintiff were so ambiguous and contained so many expressed conditions," etc. Next, we state some features of the evidence. The letter of December 20, 1911, was written to respondent and to the son of the parties as joint addressees. It contained, in part, these statements:

> "* * * i for my part am willing to forgive all you wronged me, and we will forget all the old truble. * * * it is hard to have everything taken from me Home and Family when i am getting old and need you most. * * * My Son George, * * * bee good to your Mother, and help straignten her up—and if there is anything that I can do, please write me I am sending $10 by mail."

Judging from the phraseology of its finding the trial court looked to other letters which passed between the parties as an aid in determining in what light respondent viewed the letter of December 20, 1911, which was evidently delivered to her in due course of mail not far from January 1, 1912, the date of the desertion alleged against her. The consideration of the other letters for such a purpose was surely proper, especially as they were received without objection, and we follow the same course, it being understood that we refer to but a few of the missives which were written by appellant to his wife, many of which, indeed, were not preserved and do not appear in the record. In a letter of February 2, 1915, it is said:

> "Dear Minnie I love you and always did but the Devil stebbed in between and robbed your heart away from me, i stayed long and waited to se if I ever should get piece, but it onley got wurce. So Wife get rigthsainness pray to our Savior, that you have forgotten read does words carefully and think them over."

In a long letter of date December 15, 1919, appellant wrote in a joint missive to his wife and son: "* * * if you sometime want to make an trip to Los you are both welcome. * * *" In a letter undated as to year, but, judging from its context, written to respondent as late as 1919 or 1920 and perhaps as late as 1921, it is said:

> "Ecsept my indvetetion and come to live with me and be happy, but you must sureley keep pease with me no more like when I was with you it was hard blow to me to be acused for wath I never dare think for * * * but ve forget all in the past."

The punctuation and spelling in all the letters was very bad, the former often making it difficult for us to apprehend the meaning of the writer. Some such examples will be found in the excerpts above made. As to spelling we select the following instances, among many others, in addition to what is above set forth: Adtorny, altaugh, bierdday, tiered, cloce, adtencion, glatt, simpaty, fruight, ornameltel and pictuare. Considering now another matter, it is to be observed that the parties are both Danes. Two of the letters from appellant to respondent, in fact, were written in the Danish language. The trial judge had respondent before him, and thus had the opportunity to determine what knowledge of the English language was possessed by her and what ability she had to master letters written in such wretched English as are those now before us. In addition to all these circumstances, respondent gave testimony to the following effect concerning the letters:

> "Q. In no letter or card or communication of any sort that you had from him did he offer to provide money for your trip out here? A. No, sir, not once."

In response to a line of questions concerning her testimony in a cause in Chicago to the effect that appellant had not asked her to return to him, respondent concluded: "Well, he hasn't asked me, only for a visit." She testified later:

> "Q. * * * Now, you never wrote any letters to him at all? A. No, sir.
> "Q. You could write both English and Danish, couldn't you? A. Well, I could write Danish, anyway."

The condition of the record being thus exhibited, we are not to determine whether we should have made the same finding which was made by the trial court, but whether the finding actually made was based upon evidence in which there was a substantial conflict. Upon this score we are satisfied with the conclusion reached in our original opinion.

It is said in the petition for rehearing that "an examination of the answer herein discloses that it was in no sense a cross-complaint." Counsel would have done well to examine the cross-complaint, for a pleading of that character, separate and aside from the answer, appears in the record. The pleading is headed "Cross-Complaint for Maintenance," seems upon a cursory examination to state a cause of action, and closes with a prayer for a division of community property and for a permanent allowance for support and maintenance. Not only does a cross-complaint appear in the record, but there is also there shown an "Answer to Cross-Complaint" which is signed by appellant's counsel upon this appeal, the writer of the present petition for rehearing.

Rehearing denied.

PEOPLE v. MATTHEW et al. (Cr. 1085.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 8, 1924.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1159(2)—Verdict of guilty supported by sufficient evidence is final.

If the evidence against accused, considered by itself and without regard to conflicting evidence, is sufficient to support the verdict, the question ceases to be one of law and becomes one of fact, upon which the decision of the jury and the trial court is final.

2. Criminal law 🔑1144(13)—Scope of appellate review in passing on question of sufficiency of evidence to support verdict, stated.

In passing upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, the Court of Appeals must consider in its strongest light all evidence tending to support the verdict and disregard the testimony conflicting therewith.

3. Homicide 🔑234(5)—Evidence held to support conviction of homicide committed by others in prosecution of common design to rob.

Evidence held to support conviction of codefendants as parties to a homicide committed by others in the prosecution of a common design to rob deceased.

4. Homicide 🔑29—Commission by one conspirator in furtherance of common design to rob makes each coconspirator guilty of murder.

Where a number of persons conspire to perpetrate a robbery, and a homicide is committed by one of the conspirators in furtherance of the common purpose, each is guilty of murder.

5. Criminal law 🔑406(3)—Admissions not amounting to confessions held admissible without proof of voluntary character.

Statements of defendant which were not tantamount to a confession of guilt held admissible without proof of their voluntary character, though involving admissions incriminatory in character.

6. Criminal law 🔑427(3)—When acts and declarations of coconspirator are admissible before sufficient proof of conspiracy is given, stated.

Evidence of acts and declarations of a coconspirator is admissible before sufficient proof of the conspiracy is given, when convenience requires such method, as where the facts from which the conspiracy is to be inferred are so blended with other facts going to constitute the crime that it is difficult to separate them.

7. Criminal law 🔑824(5)—Failure to give instruction not requested held not error in view of instructions given.

Failure to instruct jury to disregard acts and declarations of a coconspirator unless they believed that a conspiracy was sufficiently proved held not error, where no request therefor was made and the court carefully instructed upon the law bearing upon the issues and correctly defined a conspiracy.

8. Criminal law 🔑406(1)—Extrajudicial admission admissible against party making it.

Any extrajudicial admission of a coconspirator was admissible against him.

9. Criminal law 🔑1036(1)—Accused could not object on appeal to admission of evidence not objected to below.

Accused could not object for the first time on appeal to the admission of declaration of conspirator after crime was committed, the admission of which was not objected to at the trial.

10. Witnesses 🔑282½—Restriction of further cross-examination on objection held proper, question asked having been answered.

Where a witness on cross-examination testified her car was not a "rent car" and that defendant had never used it to carry passengers for hire, and accused's counsel endeavored further to pursue that line of cross-examination, held, that the court properly sustained prosecution's objection that the question had been asked and answered.

11. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Improper questions and statements of attorneys held not ground for reversal unless they result in miscarriage of justice.

Judgments cannot be reversed for inadvertence of attorneys in asking improper questions and for unintentionally mistaking facts in the heat and zeal of a trial, unless such questions and statements cause a miscarriage of justice within Const. art. 6, § 4½.

12. Criminal law 🔑656(3), 1144(10)—Judge's expression in ruling upon objections to evidence held not error, jury being presumed uninfluenced.

In ruling upon objections to offered evidence, it is not improper for the judge to mention the fact to which the evidence relates or to state the reasons for his ruling; such remarks, though made in the presence of the jury, not being addressed to them who will not be presumed to have been influenced by such remarks.

13. Criminal law 🔑1166½(12)—Improper remarks of judge made when ruling on offered evidence held cured by instructions given.

If remarks of judge made when ruling upon offered evidence tended to indicate that he formed an opinion as to what the evidence showed and respecting the veracity of a witness, their prejudicial effect held entirely removed by the instruction given.

14. Homicide 🔑286(3)—Use of word in instruction defining murder held not to mislead jury.

Use of word "here," in instruction that, "where the killing is done in the perpetration of * * * some one of the felonies enumerated in the statute, here the occasion is made conclusive evidence of premeditation," held not to mislead jury as applying to instant case.

15. Criminal law 🔑824(1)—Omission to give charge not requested held not error.

If appellants deemed it essential to have jury particularly charged upon the question as to when a conspiracy terminates and the effect thereof upon the admissibility of the subsequent acts and declarations of a coconspirator, it was their duty to ask for such instruction, and the omission to give it was not error in the absence of a request.

16. Criminal law 🔑824(2)—Failure to give definition of robbery held not error, no request therefor having been made.

In a homicide prosecution based on theory that crime was committed in furtherance of a common design to rob deceased, failure of court to give definition of robbery held not error; no request therefor having been made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Murphy Williams and Colonel Pope, charged with murder jointly with Robert Matthew and others, were convicted of murder in the second degree, and they appeal from the judgment of conviction and from an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Samuel Rosenthal, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney and John W. Maltman, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This appeal is by the defendants Williams and Pope, who, with the defendants Matthew, Warmley, and Sinuel, were jointly charged with the murder of one Coleman Stone, the proprietor of a grocery at Bell station, near the city of Los Angeles. The defendant Warmley, it would seem, was not apprehended. The remaining four defendants were tried jointly. Matthew and Sinuel were convicted of murder in the first degree, the death penalty was imposd upon them, and they have taken an appeal to the Supreme Court. The defendants Pope and Williams were convicted of murder in the second degree, and now appeal to this court from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

The appeal to this court is based upon the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict against Pope and Williams, upon asserted errors of law in admitting and in excluding evidence and in giving and refusing certain instructions, and upon alleged misconduct of the district attorney.

[1, 2] It is, of course, well settled that if the evidence which bears against the accused, considered by itself and without regard to conflicting evidence, is sufficient to support the verdict, the question ceases to be one of law—of which alone this court has jurisdiction—and becomes one of fact, upon which the decision of the jury and the trial court is final and conclusive. People v. Emerson, 130 Cal. 562, 62 Pac. 1069. Accordingly, as a reviewing court it is our duty, in passing upon the question whether the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict, to consider in its strongest light all evidence which tends to support the verdict, to disregard such testimony as conflicts therewith, and to affirm the judgment if there be any substantial showing which tends to establish the guilt of the accused.

[3] The facts, as shown by the testimony which bears most strongly against the accused, are substantially these: At about 6:30 o'clock on the evening of October 30, 1923, the accused, all of whom are negroes, drove in a Winton automobile to a spot on Becker avenue, about half a block west of Stone's grocery. There the machine, with Pope at the wheel, was brought to a stop. The defendant Sinuel alighted from the car and proceeded to the grocery, presently followed by the defendant Matthew. After entering the store Sinuel asked Stone for a package of cigarettes, tendering a dollar bill in payment. About this time Stone's son-in-law, standing in the doorway and peering into the store, saw his father-in-law apparently looking down at his hand "making change," while Sinuel was seen to walk around the end of the counter, "pull a gun" from his overcoat, and walk behind the counter toward the unsuspecting grocer. At about the same instant Matthew was seen to "poke an automatic over the counter at Stone." Thereupon the son-in-law left the spot where he had been standing watching these proceedings. He left to get his "gun." An instant later Stone was heard to cry out, and then there came the muffled report of a pistol. The evidence shows that it was Sinuel who fired the shot. Stone was mortally wounded and died the next day. Sinuel and Matthew made admissions to the effect that they entered the grocery with the intention of committing robbery. The evidence for the prosecution discloses beyond all question that the killing was committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate robbery, and that it was a brutal murder. The real question, so far as the appellants Pope and Williams are concerned, is this: Was there sufficient evidence to justify their conviction upon the theory either that they were aiders and abettors of the homicide, or that they, together with Sinuel and Matthew, had entered into a conspiracy to commit robbery and that Stone's life was taken in the course of the prosecution of the common design?

The facts tending to establish that such a conspiracy was entered into are these: The Winton automobile in which the men were riding on the evening of the homicide belonged to a colored woman, a Mrs. Braxton, who lived at 620 Ceres avenue in the city of Los Angeles. She, it appears, had entered into some sort of an arrangement with Sinuel and with an agent of the concern from which she had purchased the car on credit, whereby Sinuel was given an opportunity to become the purchaser of the car if he so desired. It would seem, however, that notwithstanding this arrangement, whatever its nature may have been, Mrs. Braxton continued to treat the car as her own and to exercise all the rights of proprietorship. Pope was hired by her as her chauffeur, receiving as compensation for his services his board and lodging. Pope, Sinuel, and Matthew occupied rooms in Mrs. Braxton's house. At about 5 o'clock on the afternoon of the day of the homicide Mrs. Braxton, who had been using her car that afternoon, returned home, told Pope to put the machine in the garage, and strictly enjoined him not to take it out. It seems that on the preceding night Pope had taken the car without Mrs. Braxton's permission and had not returned with it until 3 o'clock in the morning. Late in the afternoon of the day on which the murder was committed, Sinuel, Matthew, and Williams went to a resort at Twenty-Sixth street and Boyle avenue, in the city of Los Angeles, where they procured and drank a quantity of intoxicating liquor. At about 6 o'clock in the evening Pope, disobeying his employer's order not to take the car out of the garage, drove up to the house on Twenty-Sixth street where the three other defendants were drinking. He was accompanied by Warmley. Upon the arrival of Pope and Warmley at this place with Mrs. Braxton's automobile, Sinuel, Matthew, and Williams entered the car and were driven by Pope in an easterly direction beyond the outskirts of Los Angeles. On their way back the five men passed through Bell station, where, as we have stated, the car was brought to a stop about half a block west of the grocery, when Sinuel and Matthew got out and the killing of Stone occurred. After alighting from the machine, Sinuel "snatched" from Warmley, who remained in the car, the revolver with which Stone was shot. When the shot was fired, Warmley exclaimed, "Those niggers [referring to Sinuel and Matthew] done shot somebody," and ordered Pope to drive back to town. Thereupon Pope put the transmission in gear—the engine had been left running while Sinuel and Matthew were in the grocery—and accompanied by Warmley and Williams drove back to the house at 620 Ceres avenue. Meanwhile Sinuel and Matthew made their escape from the scene of the shooting, walked some distance to a street car, and arrived at the Ceres avenue house some time after Pope and his two companions reached the same destination. During the comparatively short interval that the automobile was standing on Becker avenue about half a block from the grocery, and while Sinuel and Matthew were carrying out their plan to rob the proprietor, Pope got out of the car, and seeing another machine approaching from the east, stepped in front of it and raised his hand. Thereupon the driver of that vehicle, a woman, stopped her car. Pope looked at her but said nothing, and she then drove on. The driver of that machine, after she had driven about a quarter of a mile from the spot where she had been stopped, heard the report of the pistol.

After Pope, Sinuel, and Matthew had returned to the house at 620 Ceres avenue, they, with two other men—neither of the latter had any connection with the crime—entered the Winton machine at about 9 o'clock that evening and drove to Santa Ana, in Orange county, where Sinuel endeavored to find accommodations at some hotel. There Sinuel and Matthew left the machine, and the next day those two took a bus to San Diego. Pope and the other two men returned in the automobile to Los Angeles, arriving there at about 3 o'clock in the morning. While in Santa Ana, after Sinuel and Matthew had left the machine, Pope, who had gotten out of the car at a gasoline station, stood for a moment with drooping head, in an attitude of absorbed contemplation. Presently one of his companions said something to him, when he straightened up, got back into the car, and drove to Los Angeles.

The defendant Williams, who occupied a room at 1520 East Fourteenth street in the city of Los Angeles, returned to his quarters shortly after 9 o'clock on the evening of the day in question. Upon his return he engaged in conversation with a woman who also lived at the same place, in the course of which he said:

> "That fellow shot a man out to the store. I heard the report of a gun and we drove off and left them. I will bet it will be in the papers."

Williams took a blackjack from his pocket, showed it to the woman, and said that he took it from "one of the fellows who was out there"—referring to those who were his companions at the scene of the homicide. Williams told the officers, when questioned a few days subsequent to the shooting, that Matthew had the blackjack when he got out of the machine to follow Sinuel to the store, and that he (Williams) found it after the party had returned to Los Angeles.

We think the foregoing circumstances are sufficient to justify the inference that all of the defendants, Pope and Williams as well as Matthew and Sinuel, conspired to rob Stone, and that the latter's life was taken in the prosecution of the common design. As was said in People v. Lawrence, 143 Cal. 153, 76 Pac. 896, 68 L. R. A. 193:

> "It was not necessary to support proof of the conspiracy to show that the parties met and actually agreed to jointly undertake the perpetration of the robbery. From the secrecy with which unlawful undertakings of that character are adopted it would, in almost all instances, be impossible to make such proof, so that in prosecutions which involve proof of a conspiracy it may be proved by facts and circumstances sufficient to satisfy the jury of its existence, and the weight and sufficiency of that evidence to prove such a conspiracy is a matter for the jury."

Testimony was introduced on behalf of both appellants to show that they were without knowledge of the purpose of Sinuel and Matthew to rob. Indeed, there is throughout the case a sharp conflict in the evidence, as is usual in actions of this character. Pope claimed that he was acting as Sinuel's chauffeur, that he drove as he was directed by Sinuel, that he stopped the car near the scene of the attempted robbery because Sinuel ordered him to stop there, and that he was without guilty knowledge of Sinuel's unlawful intentions. But the circumstances strongly tend to refute any such claim of innocence. Pope was hired by Mrs. Braxton, who testified that she owned the car. In spite of her orders not to take the machine out of the garage, Pope, who is conceded to have been Mrs. Braxton's employee, stole away and joined his guilty companions. When Sinuel and Matthew left the machine to go to the grocery, Pope did not turn off the ignition, but allowed the motor to continue running in readiness for a quick escape. The fact that he stepped out of the car, held up his hand, stopped a passing motorist, and scanned her face tends to indicate that he was determined to chance no possible frustration of the plan to rob. Sinuel, as he was alighting from the car to make his way toward the grocery, scuffled with Warmley and "snatched" a pistol from him. It may well be inferred that this act was observed by Pope, and if so he must have had an inkling of Sinuel's sinister designs. Pope drove from the scene when the shot was fired and upon hearing Warmley exclaim, "Those niggers done shot somebody." It is not probable that had he believed Sinuel and Matthew went to the store for an innocent purpose, he would have hurriedly deserted those two companions, particularly if it were true, as he claimed, that he was hired by Sinuel to drive the car on this evening. On the contrary, it is more than likely that had he possessed no guilty knowledge of the evil intentions of Sinuel and Matthew he would have waited to see if either of them had been waylaid and shot by some malefactor—that he would have stayed to render such assistance, if any, as his comrades might require—instead of hurrying from the scene as though impelled by a guilty conscience. If he, Sinuel, and Matthew were not inseparably linked by the firm ties that bind conspirators, why should he have helped his fellows to escape by driving them with all haste to Santa Ana? Certainly he had every reason to know before that trip was undertaken that Warmley was not mistaken when he exclaimed, "Those niggers done shot somebody." While no single circumstance might be sufficient to create more than a suspicion of guilt, all of them, taken collectively, are of a sufficiently incriminating character to warrant the inference, as a reasonable conclusion, that Pope was a party to a conspiracy to rob the grocer.

Nor do the incriminating circumstances point any the less unerringly to the guilt of Williams. He admitted that he saw Matthew take with him the blackjack when the latter left the Winton automobile to join Sinuel in his mission to rob. He also must have seen Sinuel snatch the pistol from Warmley. Seeing these things and making no protest, the natural inference is that Williams knew what enterprise was on foot and acquiesced therein because he also had entered into the conspiracy to rob. Pope and Williams doubtless realized that if the machine had been stopped immediately in front of the grocery, and if all of the five men had entered the establishment at once, the proprietor, suspecting the possibility of foul play, would probably have been put upon his guard and so would have exercised greater vigilance. This consideration affords an explanation of why it was that but two of the men left the car to carry out the common design.

[4] If, as we hold, the testimony is sufficient to justify the conclusion that all of the defendants conspired to rob Stone, then the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict against these two appellants. The general rule is well settled that where a number of persons conspire together to perpetrate a robbery, and a homicide is committed by one of the conspirators in furtherance of the common purpose to rob, each is as accountable as though his own hand had intentionally fired the fatal shot or given the fatal blow, and each is guilty of murder. People v. Vasquez, 49 Cal. 560; People v. Lawrence, supra; People v. Raber, 168 Cal. 316, 143 Pac. 317.

[5] We come now to appellants' assignments of error in the admission of evidence. The prosecution introduced in evidence certain admissions made by Sinuel, Matthew, Williams, and Pope in the office of the district attorney. The learned trial judge was at considerable pains to instruct the jurors, at the time when this evidence was offered, that a statement by one defendant not made in the presence and hearing of the others was admissible only as against the defendant making it; also, that a statement by one defendant, though made in the presence and hearing of the others, was not to be considered as evidence against any of the other defendants who challenged the truthfulness of the statement at the time when it was made. But it is claimed that it was not shown that the statements were made freely and voluntarily. The point is destitute of merit. Williams waived the objection that his statement was not given freely and voluntarily. As to Pope, it is sufficient to say that his admissions were not tantamount to a confession of guilt, and therefore it was not necessary to lay a foundation before they could be received in evidence. In giving the officers his version of the facts Pope stoutly maintained that he was innocent of all wrong doing. In no part of his narrative did he state or admit that he had done any wrongful or unlawful act. None of the facts admitted by him imported guilt or involved a crime. True, his statement involves certain admissions of fact which, when taken in connection with other proved facts in the case, are circumstances of an incriminatory nature; but it is by no means a confession of guilt. His statement, therefore, was admissible without any preliminary proof that it was given freely and voluntarily. People v. Peete, 54 Cal. App. 333, 202 Pac. 51. Moreover, it was shown by the testimony of the deputy district attorney who was present when the admissions were made that each of the accused gave his statement freely and voluntarily, without duress, intimidation, or threat, or previous inducement, promise, or offer of leniency.

[6] It is claimed that, as to Pope and Williams, the court erred in admitting evidence of the acts of Matthew and Sinuel in the grocery before the prosecution had made out a prima facie case of conspiracy. It unquestionably is the general rule that proof of the existence of the conspiracy ordinarily should precede proof of the acts or declarations of a coconspirator made pending the conspiracy and in aid and furtherance of the common design. But the rule in this respect is not absolute and unyielding; and sometimes, for the sake of convenience, evidence of the acts and declarations of an alleged conspirator is admitted before sufficient proof of the conspiracy is given. Thus where, as here, the facts from which the conspiracy is to be inferred are so intimately blended with other facts going to constitute the crime that it is difficult to separate them, it is not essential to the introduction of evidence of the acts and declarations of one of the conspirators that evidence should first be introduced to establish prima facie, in the opinion of the court, the fact of conspiracy. People v. Fehrenbach, 102 Cal. 394, 36 Pac. 678; People v. Sing, 42 Cal. App. 397, 183 Pac. 865.

[7] Appellants complain that the court failed to instruct the jury to disregard the acts and declarations of a coconspirator unless they believed that a conspiracy was sufficiently proved. It is true that it would have been proper to give such an instruction, but since no instruction of that character was requested by any of the defendants, nor any intimation made that it should be given, appellants are not in a position to complain of its omission. The court carefully instructed the jury generally upon the law bearing upon the issues in the case, and gave a full and correct definition of conspiracy. The rule is that where the court has instructed generally as to the issues, if the defendant desires a particular instruction, or an instruction upon a particular phase of the case, he should submit it with a proper request that it be given; otherwise a failure to give it is not error. People v. Fowler, 178 Cal. 657, 663, 174 Pac. 892; People v. Rogers, 163 Cal. 476, 484, 126 Pac. 143; People v. Williams, 184 Cal. 590, 594, 194 Pac. 1019; People v. Fultz, 109 Cal. 258, 262, 41 Pac. 1040; People v. Findley, 132 Cal. 301, 306, 64 Pac. 472. In Allen v. Commonwealth, 82 S. W. 589, 26 Ky. Law Rep. 807, it was held that where a conspiracy to murder and the connection of each defendant therewith was shown, a failure to instruct as to the extent and circumstances under which evidence of the acts and declarations of coconspirators, not made in the presence of the others, were to be received by the jury was not error. There the court says:

> "We do not think such an instruction was necessary in this case, because the conspiracy was fully proved by the testimony of the commonwealth, and the connection of each of the appellants with that conspiracy also shown by competent evidence, and no act or declaration was proven for which the appellants were not each liable. The instruction defining a conspiracy that was given by the court contained all the law that was necessary for the guidance of the jury on that subject."

In the present case proof of the conspiracy was in point of fact supplied by the prosecution before it rested. It is evident, therefore, that upon the whole case the jury was not misled to the injury of appellants. See People v. Brotherton, 47 Cal. 388, 400, 401.

[8, 9] It is claimed that the court erred in admitting in evidence a statement of Williams, made after the commission of the crime, to the effect that all of the defendants were at the scene of the homicide, that somebody was shot, and that he (Williams) took a blackjack from one of his companions. Appellants invoke the well-established rule that statements made by one conspirator after the completion of the offense, and which are simply narratives of the events concerning the accomplished crime, are not admissible against a coconspirator unless made in his presence. A complete answer to this objection is that any extrajudicial admission which Williams may have made was unquestionably admissible against him, and that Pope cannot now complain of this evidence, since he did not object to it in the court below at the time when it was received. For reasons already indicated, no error was committed when the prosecution put in evidence the statements made by the four men in the district attorney's office. As we have pointed out, so much of Matthew's statement as was not made in the presence and hearing of his codefendants was admitted as evidence against Matthew only; and any statement made by one defendant in the presence and hearing of the others which was denied by any other defendant was not received as evidence against the defendant or defendants by whom it was denied.

[10] It is claimed by counsel for Pope that the court improperly restricted him in his cross-examination of Mrs. Braxton. That witness had testified on her cross-examination that her car was not a "rent car," and that so far as she knew Pope had never used it to carry passengers for hire. Counsel for Pope endeavored further to pursue this line of cross-examination, but the court very properly sustained the prosecution's objection that the question had been asked and answered.

[11] Appellants complain of alleged misconduct on the part of the prosecuting attorney in that, so it is claimed, he propounded improper questions and made statements of facts not in evidence. The record does not show that the prosecuting attorney willfully attempted to place before the jury any improper matter, either by questions asked or statements made. In the heat and zeal of a trial attorneys will sometimes ask improper questions and sometimes unintentionally mistake facts; but judgments cannot be reversed for inadvertences of this character unless upon an examination of the record, including the evidence, we reach the conclusion that they caused a miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½; People v. Loomis, 170 Cal. 347, 149 Pac. 581. The record in this case shows that appellants had a fair trial, and no miscarriage of justice appears.

[12, 13] What we have said respecting the alleged misconduct of the district attorney applies with equal force to the claim that the learned trial judge, when ruling upon certain objections, dropped expressions in the hearing of the jury which tended to indicate that he thought the evidence showed there was an attempt to commit robbery and that he entertained an opinion respecting the veracity of a witness whom it was sought to impeach. In ruling upon objections to offered evidence, it is not improper for the judge to mention the fact to which the evidence relates, or to state the reasons for his ruling. Such remarks, although made in the presence of the jury, are not addressed to them and will not be presumed to influence their conduct. 8 Cal. Jur. p. 252. Moreover, upon the final submission of the case the court instructed the jurors to the effect that they were the exclusive judges of the evidence and of the credibility of the witnesses, that it was their function to determine all questions of fact, that the court had nothing to do with the facts, and that if it had said anything during the trial which might seem to indicate that it had an opinion upon any of the facts, such expressions should be entirely disregarded by them. This was sufficient to remove all apprehension that the remarks of the court, would have any prejudicial effect upon the minds of the jurors. People v. Northey, 77 Cal. 618, 19 Pac. 865, 20 Pac. 129; People v. Mayes, 113 Cal. 618, 623, 45 Pac. 860.

[14] It next is claimed that the court erred in giving certain instructions and in omitting to give others. In a lengthy instruction defining murder and its degrees, the court gave the customary and time-honored definition of "murder in the first degree," in the course of what it is said:

> "There are certain kinds of murder which carry with them conclusive evidence of premeditation; these the Legislature has enumerated in the code definition already given you, and has taken upon itself the responsibility of saying that they shall be deemed and held to be murder in the first degree. These cases are of two classes: First: Where the killing is perpetrated by means of poison, etc. Here the means used is held to be conclusive evidence of premeditation. Second: Where the killing is done in the perpetration, or attempt to perpetrate, some one of the felonies enumerated in the statute, here the occasion is made conclusive evidence of premeditation."

It is argued by counsel for appellants, with all seeming seriousness, that the use of the word "here" in the part of the instruction just quoted was calculated to mislead the jury and to convey the impression that the reference was to the case at bar. It is not possible to believe that the jury could have been so misled. We do not see how a juror of ordinary mentality—and jurors must be presumed to possess at least the average of intelligence—could have placed upon the instruction the interpretation of which appellants claim it is susceptible. It is as plain as a pikestaff that the word "here" was not intended as a reference to the case at bar, but to those circumstances which the statute makes conclusive evidence of premeditation.

[15, 16] It is claimed that the court erred in not instructing the jury as to what constitutes the termination of a conspiracy and the effect of its termination upon the admissibility of subsequent acts and declarations of a coconspirator. While it was the duty of the court to so instruct if requested by any of the defendants, the record discloses that no such request was made. The court's entire charge to the jury fills many pages of the record, and seems to have covered almost every conceivable phase of the case. If appellants deemed it essential to their protection to have the jury particularly charged upon the question as to when a conspiracy terminates, and the effect thereof upon the admissibility of subsequent acts and declarations of a coconspirator, it was their duty to ask it. In the absence of such request, they will be deemed to have been satisfied with the charge as given, and the omission will not be held error. For the same reason the failure to give a definition of the crime of robbery was not error. See People v. Rogers, supra.

A consideration of the record convinces us that the trial of these appellants was in all respects fair and free from any substantial error, and that as to them the verdict was fully justified by the evidence.

As to the two defendants who have appealed to this court, Pope and Williams, the judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MATTHEW et al. (Cr. 2650.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 4, 1924.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1130(3)—Practice of making single brief serve in both the Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court held improper.

The practice of respective counsel for one set of defendants appealing to the Court of Appeals, and another set appealing to the Supreme Court, of making the same brief serve in both courts, held improper.

2. Homicide 🔑234(5)—Evidence held to sustain conviction of codefendants.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of codefendants.

3. Criminal law 🔑528—Statement of one defendant not made in presence of other defendants held admissible against him.

Where a proper foundation was first made, a statement made by one defendant held admissible against him, though it was not made in the presence of the other defendants.

4. Criminal law 🔑673(4)—Conversation witness had with one coconspirator after commission of crime held properly admitted when limited.

Admitting conversation witness had with coconspirator the day after the crime held not error, where the court ruled and charged that such evidence was admissible only against such coconspirator.

5. Criminal law 🔑427(5)—Existence of conspiracy need not be established by direct evidence.

It was not necessary that the existence of a conspiracy should be established by direct evidence to render acts and declarations of conspirators admissible.

6. Criminal law 🔑427(5) — Circumstantial evidence held to suffice as foundation for evidence as to acts and declarations of one conspirator against another.

Evidence, though in a measure circumstantial, but which was sufficient to warrant the inference a conspiracy to commit a robbery existed, held to suffice as a foundation for the admission of evidence as to the acts and declarations of one conspirator against another.

7. Criminal law 🔑1036(1)—Objection to testimony cannot be made for first time on appeal.

Whether or not testimony as to acts and declarations of conspirators was objectionable for lack of prima facie showing of conspiracy or because conspiracy had ended, its admission could not be objected to on appeal in the absence of an objection at the trial.

8. Criminal law 🔑1169(8)—Restricting admission of evidence of codefendant's statements to such statements as were not denied held not error.

In a homicide prosecution of four codefendants one of whom was W., defendants could not complain that court restricted a reading of W.'s statements to those matters which were not denied by each defendant when such statements were made in their presence.

9. Criminal law 🔑407(2)—Admission of statements of one defendant against another defendant, not denied by either, held not error.

Admission of evidence of statements made by one defendant against another defendant which were not denied by either of them held not error.

10. Criminal law 🔑824(5)—Failure to instruct on particular matter held not error in absence of request for such instruction.

Where no request was made for an instruction that statements made by one defendant in the presence of another defendant and not denied by the latter were admissible only to show that particular defendant's attitude and demeanor when the statements were made, failure to give such instruction held not error.

11. Criminal law 🔑1166½(12), 1171(1)—Question by district attorney and remark of trial judge intimating evidence showed robbery held not prejudicial.

In prosecution of four codefendants for a homicide committed in attempted robbery, question by district attorney whether codefendants had said anything to her about any robbery, objected to on ground that defendants were not charged with robbery, and trial court's remark, "the district attorney stated what he expected to prove and there is already proof in here as to what occurred at the time. That is before the jury," held not prejudicial, where the evidence already adduced warranted but one conclusion, that deceased was murdered in the attempted robbery.

12. Criminal law 🔑656(5)—Court's remark in ruling on objection held not to intimate witness was unworthy of belief.

Court's remark, when ruling upon objection to impeaching evidence, that "she has made statements somewhere else. They are not bound only by what she testified before the grand jury. Statements made anywhere may be referred to," held not to intimate belief that witness was unworthy of belief.

13. Homicide 🔑286(3) — Instruction defining acts raising conclusive proof of premeditation held not to mislead jury as applying to instant case.

An instruction that "where the killing is perpetrated by means of poison, * * * here the means used is held to be conclusive evidence of premeditation. Where the killing is done in the perpetration, * * * here the occasion is made conclusive evidence of premeditation," held not calculated to mislead the jury into believing that in instant case conclusive evidence of premeditation existed.

14. Criminal law 🔑824(2, 5)—Failure to give instructions not requested held not error.

Failure to instruct statements of several defendants not made in presence of one another should be disregarded if jury found a conspiracy to commit the robbery did not exist, or to instruct as to what constituted a termination of the conspiracy, or to give definition of robbery, held not error, in absence of a request for such instructions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Robert Matthew and another were convicted of murder in the first degree, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Samuel Rosenthal, Wm. Posey, and L. K. Beeks, all of Los Angeles, M. Carne, and C. W. Conlin and Franklin Padan, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney, of San Francisco, for the People.

LENNON, J. [1] The four defendants in this case were jointly indicted and jointly tried for the crime of murder. The defendants Matthew and Sinuel were convicted of murder in the first degree and sentenced to suffer the death penalty. The other two defendants, Pope and Williams, were convicted of murder in the second degree and sentenced to imprisonment for life in the state penitentiary. The appeal to this court is by the defendants Matthew and Sinuel. The other two defendants, Pope and Williams, appealed to the District Court of Appeal. 228 Pac. 417. Included and intermingled in the brief presented in support of the appeal to this court of the defendants Matthew and Sinuel are the points made in support of the appeal of the other two defendants which is now pending in the District Court of Appeal. Apparently it was the purpose of the respective counsel for all of the defendants to make the same brief serve a single purpose in both courts. This is a practice which is not to be commended and should not be resorted to again. Whatever may have been the necessity for a resort to such procedure, the confusion which results in the consideration of the law and facts applicable to the points presented in support of the appeal of one set of defendants, as distinguished from the points made in support of the appeal of the other set of defendants is an evil which more than counterbalances any necessity which may have prompted the procedure.

[2] As gleaned from the evidence, adduced upon the entire case, and succinctly stated, the salient facts of the prosecution's case upon which it relied for and secured a conviction of the defendants Matthew and Sinuel are these:

The four defendants on October 30, 1923, rode in an automobile owned by the defendant Sinuel, and driven by the defendant Pope, to Bell station in the county of Los Angeles. Pope was employed as the driver of the automobile by the defendant Sinuel. Upon arriving at Bell station some time about 6:30 o'clock of the evening in question, the defendant Sinuel directed the defendant Pope to halt the car. Sinuel then alighted. He went immediately and directly into the nearby grocery store conducted by the deceased, Coleman Stone. After the defendant Sinuel left the car the defendant Matthew got out of the car and followed the defendant Sinuel into the store.

Just prior to the time and at the time the defendant Sinuel entered the store, the deceased and his wife were seated in the kitchen adjoining the store counting the receipts for the day. Hearing the slamming of a screen door which opened from the street into the store, the deceased proceeded into the store to wait upon the ostensible customers, and he found the defendant Sinuel and the defendant Matthew there. Sinuel asked for a package of Camel cigarettes and tendered a one dollar bill in payment thereof to the deceased. Upon receiving the dollar bill, the deceased turned around and went to the cash register, which contained but a dollar and 50 cents, to make the required change. Shortly thereafter the wife of the deceased heard the report of a revolver. She ran to the door leading from the kitchen into the store. Upon opening the door she saw two negroes standing in the store. The one nearest to her, whom she identified as the defendant Sinuel, pointed a revolver at her. She slammed the door shut, ran into the kitchen and out onto the porch of her home, all the while screaming. Within a few moments she returned to the store which was well lighted, and found her husband, the deceased, lying on his side on the floor. Shortly thereafter the deceased was taken to the hospital, where he died a day later as the result of a gunshot wound inflicted upon him by the defendant Sinuel on the evening in question. While at the hospital the deceased in a statement, during the making of which he expressed the belief that he was about to die, declared that "one of the darkies had a slug in one hand and a revolver in the other," and that while he was in the act of making change one of the negroes said to him, "Give me your money," to which the deceased replied, "I will give you all I have got." Shortly after the shooting a daughter of the deceased ran to a door opening from a side room into the store and while standing there she saw one of the defendants, Sinuel, lean over and kick the deceased in the head and then proceed to search the deceased. The defendant Sinuel testified that the defendant Matthew stepped around the end of one of the store's counters and examined the cash drawer, saying, "There is only ten cents in this drawer." The two defendants Matthew and Sinuel then left the store. They did not walk out, "but sneaked out, just as low to the ground as they could run and run as fast as they could run." The automobile in which they had driven to the store was gone, the defendants Pope and Williams having driven it to a house at No. 620 Ceres street in the city of Los Angeles. The defendants Matthew and Sinuel after walking some distance boarded a street car and went to the same house where they resided. Sinuel, upon arriving at the house, directed Pope to drive him and Matthew to Santa Ana, which Pope did. Pope then returned with the automobile to Los Angeles. Matthew and Sinuel went to San Diego, and after two days started back to Los Angeles and were apprehended on the road.

It was the theory of the prosecution's case that the four defendants had come to the scene of the homicide for the purpose of committing the crime of robbery and that they were therefore guilty of the crime of murder committed in the execution of that common design and purpose. The evidence previously outlined was amply sufficient to justify the verdict as to the guilt of the defendant Sinuel. It was also sufficient to justify the verdict as to the defendant Matthew predicated upon the theory, as it evidently was, that he was engaged with the defendant Sinuel in the crime of robbery and was therefore equally guilty with Sinuel of the crime of murder, even though he did not fire the fatal shot.

[3] Subsequent to the apprehension of the four defendants, and while they were in custody, each of them made statements concerning the facts of the killing. These statements were read to the jury at the trial, it being stipulated by counsel representing Sinuel and Matthew that the statements were voluntarily made. The prosecution, while accepting the stipulation referred to, elected to and did make a sufficient showing that the statements in question were freely and voluntarily made, and, therefore, aside from any question of the right of counsel to enter into the stipulation, the statements in question, subject to the limitation which was put upon them by the court, were properly received in evidence. At the time the statement of Matthew was made, it seems he was questioned alone, and the trial court ruled and charged the jury, in response to objection, that the parts of his statement which were made in the absence of the other defendants and tended to incriminate them could not be made to apply to them. The trial court did not err in admitting this statement of Matthew, which related only to himself. A proper foundation for the statement was laid, and it was admissible against the defendant Matthew even though it was not made in the presence of the other defendants.

[4] There was no error in the ruling of the trial court in permitting in evidence the testimony of the witness Rachael Braxton, called to testify upon behalf of the prosecution, relating to a conversation which she had the day following the crime with the defendant Pope. While the conversation was admissible only as against the defendant Pope, the court so ruled and so charged the jury expressly and affirmatively.

[5, 6] There is no merit in the contention that the trial court erred in its ruling in admitting against each of the defendants the testimony of the prosecution's witness, Alphonso Riley, concerning the acts and declarations of some of the defendants made during the course of the journey which all of the defendants, together with Riley, made to Santa Ana in Orange county, after the killing. In this behalf it is argued that inasmuch as some of the acts and declarations were not committed or made in the presence of all of the defendants, the testimony complained of was inadmissible unless it was first shown prima facie that a conspiracy existed between all of the defendants who committed the crime of robbery which ultimately resulted in the crime of murder. And it is also contended that the court erred in admitting, without a prima facie case of conspiracy having been established, evidence against the defendants Matthew and Sinuel of acts and declarations of the other defendants not occurring or made in the presence of these particular defendants against whom the evidence was admitted.

[7] It is not necessary that the existence of a conspiracy should be established by direct evidence, and even though the evidence tending to show a common conspiracy on the part of the four defendants to commit robbery was in a measure circumstantial in its character, nevertheless it was sufficient to warrant the inference that a conspiracy to commit such crime did in fact exist and therefore sufficed as a foundation for evidence as to the acts and declarations of one conspirator against another. Moreover, no objection to the testimony complained of was made upon the ground that a prima facie showing of a conspiracy had not been made, and, therefore, even if it be conceded that such testimony was objectionable, objection thereto cannot be made for the first time upon appeal.

Complaint is made that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence against the defendants Sinuel and Matthew testimony concerning statements made by the other codefendants after the termination of the alleged conspiracy relative to what transpired during the progress and before the termination of the alleged conspiracy. The record does not show that any objection upon that ground was made to such testimony. In the absence of objection, the trial court was not called upon to rule upon the admissibility of the testimony, and, the same having been received without objection, its admissibility cannot now be questioned.

[8, 9] The record does not support the contention that the trial court admitted incriminatory statements of one defendant made in the presence of another defendant, the truth of which statements was denied by the latter. In making the statement to the district attorney concerning the killing and the circumstances attending it, the defendant Sinuel said that the defendant Matthew did the shooting. Matthew was present at the making of this statement, but he did not deny the accusation at the time it was made. Later, when he himself was questioned about the murder, Matthew denied doing the shooting and said that Sinuel was the man who fired the fatal shot. The defendant Sinuel, being present, did not deny this accusation. Later on, during the course of the trial of the case when the statement of Williams was read to the jury, all of the statements made by him which had been denied by Sinuel at the time they were made were stricken out, and the jury, upon the request of counsel, instructed to disregard these statements. Surely no complaint can be made of the ruling of the trial court restricting the reading of the statement to those matters which were not denied by each defendant, and clearly no error was committed in the admission in evidence of the statements made by one defendant against another defendant which were not denied by either of them.

[10] No request was made of the trial court that the jury be instructed that statements made by one defendant in the presence of another defendant and not denied by the latter were admissible only to show that particular defendant's attitude and demeanor when the statements were made and therefore the contention that the trial court failed to so instruct will not be considered now.

There was no misconduct on the part of the district attorney in asking the questions which elicited the testimony complained of from these witnesses concerning the statements made by them. Nor are we able to perceive any misconduct on the part of the district attorney appearing elsewhere in the record. On the contrary, the record shows that throughout the trial no attempt was made by the district attorney to place before the jury any improper matter either by questions asked or statements made, and that whenever objection was made to questions propounded by the district attorney the court, whenever the objections were well taken, sustained them and promptly instructed the jury to disregard whatever may have been said by way of answer to the questions. In short, the record of this case is particularly free of objectionable conduct, inadvertent or otherwise, on the part of the district attorney.

[11] Certain comments of the trial judge made when ruling upon objections are claimed to be misconduct, in this, that they amounted to an intimation by the court that the evidence showed an attempted commission of the crime of robbery. The comments complained of occurred in a colloquy between court and counsel concerning the sufficiency of an objection and were made at a point in the trial of the case when there had been admitted in evidence testimony of three different witnesses as to what took place at the store when the deceased was killed. The sum and substance of that evidence warrants but one reasonable conclusion, and that is that the deceased was murdered during an attempted robbery. The district attorney had asked Mrs. Lewis, a witness for the prosecution, if the defendant Murphy Williams had said anything to her about any robbery and counsel for defendants' objection was made upon the ground that none of the defendants were charged with robbery. The court, in reply to the objection, remarked:

> "The district attorney stated what he expected to prove and there is already proof in here as to what occurred at the time. That is before the jury."

It is evident that there was nothing in what was said either by the district attorney or the court which could have prejudiced the defendants in view of the state of the evidence as it existed at the time the question was propounded and the ruling upon the objection was made.

[12] The same may be said as to the remarks of the court made during an objection to the question propounded by the district attorney to the witness Alma Brown. This witness had testified to a conversation between herself and the defendant Sinuel. The district attorney attempted to lay a foundation for the impeachment of this witness by showing that she had made contradictory statements on a previous occasion, she having already testified before the grand jury. And when ruling upon an objection the court remarked:

> "She has made statements somewhere else. They are not bound only by what she testified before the grand jury. Statements made anywhere may be referred to."

Clearly this remark of the trial court did not intimate any belief in the mind of the trial court that this particular witness was unworthy of belief.

[13] In its instruction to the jury the trial court charged, among other things, as follows:

> "Where the killing is perpetrated by means of poison, etc., * * * here the means used is held to be conclusive evidence of premeditation. Where the killing is done in the perpetration, or attempt to perpetrate, some one of the felonies enumerated in the statute, here the occasion is made conclusive evidence of premeditation."

Counsel for defendants criticize this instruction because it is asserted the use of the word "here" in the instruction was calculated to mislead the jury and convey to them the impression that it referred to the case at bar and that in the case at bar there was conclusive evidence of premeditation. Obviously, the instruction complained of had to do and was dealing only with an abstract proposition of law, and presuming, as we must, that the jury were men of ordinary intelligence and fairly familiar with the English language, it cannot be said that they understood the instruction to mean that the trial court was expressing its opinion that in the instant case there was conclusive evidence of premeditation.

[14] If counsel for the defendants had desired an instruction to the effect that statements of the several defendants not made in the presence of one another should be disregarded if they found that a conspiracy to commit the crime of robbery did not exist, they should have made a request for such an instruction. And if counsel for the defendants deemed that the evidence adduced upon the entire case required an instruction to the jury as to what constituted a termination of the conspiracy or needed a definition of the crime of robbery, a request for such instructions should have been made, and in the absence of such a request the trial court did not err in failing to cover those subject-matters in its charge to the jury. See People v. Winthrop, 118 Cal. 85, 91, 50 Pac. 390; People v. Rogers, 163 Cal. 476, 126 Pac. 143.

The verdict and the judgment are not contrary to the law and the evidence. In so far as the defendants Matthew and Sinuel are concerned, the evidence sufficiently shows that they were guilty of murder in the first degree. They were accorded a fair and an impartial trial and were properly convicted. There being no error in the record, prejudicial or otherwise, the judgment must be and is affirmed.

GINOCHIO et al. v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 10522.)

1. Carriers ⚷318(8)—Evidence held insufficient to sustain judgment for death of intending passenger attempting to board moving car.

In action for death of intending passenger attempting to board moving street car, in which it was claimed that car slowed down to an almost imperceptible speed, and, as decedent stepped on platform, speeded up suddenly, loosening decedent's grasp on stanchion, evidence held insufficient to sustain a judgment for plaintiff.

2. Death ⚷31(5)—Adult sister of decedent not "heir," entitled to recover damages for death.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, giving right of action for death to heirs or personal representatives, adult sister of decedent was not an "heir" or pecuniarily interested in result of action, where decedent left two minor children, and instruction permitting recovery of her damages was erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Heir.]

3. Death ⚷77—Decedent's sister held not to sustain burden of showing damages.

In an action for death, decedent's adult sister held not to sustain burden of showing that she sustained any pecuniary damages by reason of her brother's death.

4. Carriers ⚷348(4)—Instruction denying plaintiff recovery, if decedent negligently attempted to board moving car, held required.

In an action for death, defendants were entitled to an instruction that plaintiffs could not recover, if decedent's death was caused because he negligently and carelessly attempted to board a moving street car, but instruction should not have exculpated operators of car from any negligence properly attributable to them.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by Ida M. Ginochio and others against the City and County of San Francisco. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

George Lull, City Atty., and Charles S. Peery, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Daniel A. Ryan and Vincent W. Hallinan, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. This is an appeal from a judgment awarding plaintiffs $20,000 as damages for the death of Angelo J. Ginochio, caused by injuries received while attempting to board a moving street car operated by defendant city. The case has been twice tried, and each time a jury found for plaintiffs. The judgment entered upon the first verdict was reversed by the District Court of Appeal, First District, Second Division, because of erroneous instructions given as to the duty a carrier owes to a passenger transferring from one line to another. Ginochio v. City and County of San Francisco, 206 Pac. 763. Upon a retrial the judgment here complained of was entered. This latest appeal was taken to this court, and was again transferred to the District Court of Appeal, First District, Second Division. The judgment was reversed upon this appeal, on the ground that the undisputed facts did not show negligence on the part of the defendant or its agents. 42 Cal. App. Dec. 395. A hearing was granted by this court, for the reason that we deemed it advisable to consider two assignments of error, neither of which was noticed by the District Court of Appeal, for the reason, doubtless, that it considered the ground upon which it placed its order amply sufficient to justify a reversal. The two assignments of error which we will notice consist in giving instruction No. XVII at the request of respondent, and the court's refusal to give instruction No. II, requested by appellant.

We feel entirely satisfied that the trial court committed prejudicial error in giving instruction No. XVII, and also that the defendant was entitled to have the jury instructed substantially in the language of instruction No. 11. The decedent, who was entitled to be carried on a Market street car by right of a transfer issued to him, received the injuries from which he died while attempting to board a westerly or out-bound car operated by defendant city on Market street, at about 2 o'clock Sunday afternoon, April 18, 1920.

At the time of the injury he was of the age of about 39 years, in good health, and the father of two motherless children, aged 14 and 16 years, respectively. He was a worker in leather, and was earning $30 per week. On the afternoon in question he boarded a Van Ness avenue car, southerly bound, and obtained a transfer to the Market street line with the intention of visiting friends. Market street runs in an easterly and westerly direction, and Van Ness avenue and Eleventh street each run in a northerly and southerly direction. Van Ness avenue has its southerly terminus in Market street, and Eleventh street has its northerly terminus in said Market street. Neither crosses Market street. The distance on Market street between the points of entrance of said respective streets into Market street, measured from the westerly boundary line of Eleventh street, if projected, and the easterly boundary of Van Ness avenue, is proximately 140 feet. A large bronze monument erected to the memory of the Spanish-American War veterans stands near the center of Van Ness avenue as it debouches into Market street. Paralleling the northerly boundary of Market street, and adjacent to the monument which affords a physical barrier of protection, a safety zone of considerable length is delineated upon the street for the protection of transfer passengers alighting from the Van Ness avenue street cars, and also for initial passengers intending to take passage on out-bound cars. A broad line painted white, commonly called a "check stop," extends across the bed of defendant's Market street track at a point about 160 feet east from said safety station and on a line with the easterly property line of Eleventh street if extended. Check stops are marked on the streets primarily for the guidance of the employees of the railway system. There is nothing upon the ground to indicate that it is intended as a safety zone, or that it is a regular stopping place to receive or discharge passengers. Cars moving northerly over Eleventh street cross Market street near this point and continue in a diagonal direction into Van Ness avenue. It is the rule of the street car system that all cars crossing intersecting lines must slow down, and, if the traffic or situation requires it, stop, before crossing. It is true that passengers are discharged from and received into the cars at the check stop line, if they manifest such a desire. The properly appointed safety zone, however, is adjacent to said monument, and approximately 160 feet from the point above described.

On the afternoon in question a fire in lower Market street had caused a blockade of traffic on Market street. The car which decedent attempted to board was the first to move westerly after the blockade had been raised. It was crowded with passengers, a number of whom were standing on the platform, and it is the claim of the motorman that the sign, "Take next car," was displayed. A large number of persons were assembled at the monument safety zone awaiting transportation. Decedent, upon alighting from the Van Ness avenue car, immediately walked away from the safety zone, and took a position on the sidewalk of Market street at a point not definitely fixed, where he waited the arrival of said car. His purpose in making this change was doubtless to avoid the throng which had gathered at the monument and to gain an advantage in boarding the car. He had formerly been a conductor in the service of the United Railways system. The conductor testified that, at the time his car was approaching and passing the check stop mark, five or six persons were standing in the street, which is made quite narrow by reason of four tracks being laid upon it, near the car track. The speed of the car had been reduced from 20 or 25 miles an hour to 8 or 10 miles before it reached the point in question. Both the conductor and motorman testified that the car was not to be stopped at this point, but it was the intention to pass by and stop at the regular safety zone. The conductor testified that he leaned away from his car and signaled to the five or six persons standing near the check stop mark by a motion of the hand to cross over to the safety zone. No other person than the decedent attempted to board the car. The motorman testified that he saw no one standing near the railway track, but that a small group of people were standing at the edge of the sidewalk. A passing automobile commanded his attention No one testified that the decedent was among the small group standing in the street near the car track. It is the testimony of the conductor that he first saw the decedent when he beckoned the passengers to cross to the safety zone. The decedent was then running towards the car, coming from behind, and making rather a diagonal course to the rear of said car.

When first seen he was 6 or 8 feet from the car. He succeeded in getting his feet upon the steps, but whether he was successful in grasping the stanchion no one was able to definitely state. At any rate he fell backward, striking the back part of his head upon the hard street pavement, was picked up unconscious, taken to a hospital, and died the second day thereafter. Respondents claim that the car slowed down to an almost imperceptible speed, and as the decedent stepped upon the platform it speeded up suddenly or moved forward with a jerk sufficiently violent to unloose decedent's grasp from the stanchion, and that this constituted the proximate cause of the death of decedent. This, of course, is the vital question in the case. On the other hand, it is the claim of appellant that deceased had not been accepted as a passenger, and the circumstances of the situation were not sufficient to justify a reasonable person to believe that the slowing down of the speed of the car to 8 or 10 miles per hour was to be regarded as an invitation to persons to board a car moving at such a rate of speed; further, that a positive warning had been given that the car would not come to a stop; and, finally, that the car was not operated in a negligent manner in any respect.

Notwithstanding the fact that the car contained more than 100 passengers, some of whom were riding upon the platform, and there were a number of persons within close proximity of the decedent at the time of his injury, not one of such number appeared as a witness at either trial. But two witnesses to the accident were called on behalf of the respondents, and a like number on behalf of appellant. The principal witness called by respondents had been a fellow passenger with the decedent on the Van Ness avenue car. Upon alighting from the car this witness stopped at the safety zone station with the intention of boarding the same car which decedent attempted to board. He was therefore directly in front of the approaching car, 160 feet from it, and was not in as good a position to judge of its speed as were those who viewed it as a passing car or who were actually passengers thereon. This witness fixed the speed of the car at the rate of 2 miles per hour at the time decedent stepped upon the platform, and testified that at that instant the car moved forward with a jerk. He was contradicted in this respect by the testimony given by him at the coroner's inquest shortly after the accident. His testimony upon cross-examination was left in an unsatisfactory state, and is in confusion with respect to important particulars, and does not appear to accord with the physical situation. The other witness called for respondents was standing on the outer edge of the sidewalk near the check stop mark at the time of the accident, intending to take the car next following. He testified that the decedent left the sidewalk and went in the direction of the approaching car as though to board it, and succeeded in placing his feet upon the step; but he was unable to say whether or not decedent secured a hold upon the stanchion, or to otherwise describe his position upon the step. While he testified that the car had slowed down very considerably, he would not say that its speed was increased with a jerk, but he thought it was sent forward with sudden and quickened speed. At the inquest he testified that there was nothing unusual in the movement of the car.

[1] Upon the state of the testimony as presented by the record, which we have carefully examined, we feel that the judgment should not be allowed to stand, and certainly not in the face of an erroneous instruction, which could have had none other effect than to have augmented the damages assessed by the jury.

[2] Instruction XVII reads as follows:

> "If your verdict be in favor of the plaintiffs in this case, it must be for such a sum as will compensate them for all the damages proximately caused them by the negligence, if any, of the defendant. In arriving at this sum you are entitled to take into consideration any damage that may be shown by the evidence to have been suffered by the plaintiffs by reason of the death of Angelo Ginochio. In estimating this damage, you have the right to take into consideration the loss of the society, comfort, support, services, and protection suffered by the plaintiffs through the loss of their father and brother, the probable pecuniary benefits to be derived by them, the expense to which they have been put for medical and funeral services for him, and any other evidence that may show pecuniary loss suffered by them through his death. You may take into consideration the expectancy of life of Angelo Ginochio at the time of his death, and his habits of life, whether industrious or otherwise, as may be shown by the evidence. The amount of your verdict, however, if you render one in favor of the plaintiffs, must be reasonable under all the circumstances of the case."

The action could only have been maintained under section 377, Code of Civil Procedure. The above instruction had no applicability to section 377, and could be relevant only to an action brought under the authority of section 1970, Civil Code, which provides for the allowance of indemnity to an employee from an employer for injuries received in consequence of the ordinary risk of the business in which he is employed under the circumstances therein described. In such cases it is provided that "the personal representatives of such employee shall have a right of action therefor against such employer, and may recover damages in respect therefor, for and on behalf, and for the benefit of the widow, children, dependent parents and dependent brothers and sisters, in order of precedence as herein stated, but not more than one action shall be brought for such recovery." No claim is here made that the relation of employer and employee existed between the decedent and appellant. Therefore the action cannot be maintained under section 1970, Civil Code. The action must be relegated, therefore, to the provisions of section 377, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that—

> "When the death of a person not being a minor is caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, his heirs or personal representatives may maintain an action for damages against the person causing the death, or if such person be employed by another person who is responsible for his conduct, then also against such other person. In every action under this and the preceding section, such damages may be given as under all the circumstances of the case may be just."

Under the foregoing section, supported by authority from this and many other states, it is quite clear that the adult sister of the decedent (who left surviving him two minor children of his body) is not an heir in the sense that she is pecuniarily interested in the result of the action. In the Estate of Watts, 179 Cal. 20, 175 Pac. 415, this court, in defining the word "heirs" said:

> "The word 'heirs' is a technical term, and is used to designate 'the persons who would by the statute succeed to the real estate (or, in California, estate of any kind) in case of intestacy.' Clarke v. Cordis, 4 Allen (Mass.) 466, 480. 'The "heirs" of a person,' said this court in Hochstein v. Berghauser, 123 Cal. 681, 687 (56 Pac. 547, 549), 'are those whom the law appoints to succeed to his estate in case he dies without disposing of it by will.' This is the ordinary meaning of the word, used in an instrument of any kind. Where a will makes a gift to the 'heirs' of a person, section 1334 adds the sanction of statutory definition to the interpretation."
> "The word 'heirs' * * * means the persons who would be entitled to succeed at his death to his estate in case of intestacy, by virtue of our statutes relative to succession." Estate of Wilson, 184 Cal. 63, 193 Pac. 581.

The rule of law which refutes the claim that the sister suffered a pecuniary loss by the death of her brother is thus stated in Estate of Riccomi, 185 Cal. 458, 461, 197 Pac. 97, 98 (14 A. L. R. 509):

> "It is the pecuniary loss to an heir by reason of the death that is recoverable, and that only. See generally on this subject, Simoneau v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 159 Cal. 494, 505, 509 (115 Pac. 320). It follows, inevitably, that there can be no substantial recovery on account of any heir who has not suffered substantial pecuniary injury. This was in effect decided by this court in Burk v. Arcata, etc., R. R. Co., 125 Cal. 364, 73 Am. St. Rep. 52, 57 Pac. 1065, where the syllabi correctly state the questions decided as follows:
> "'In an action for a death brought by the adult collateral heirs of the deceased, the mere fact that they are such heirs does not tend to show pecuniary damage; and in the absence of other proof tending to show actual damages or at least, probable loss, resulting to them from the death, the jury should be instructed that their recovery must be limited to nominal damages.'
> "'Mere speculative or conjectural possibilities of benefits to the parties complaining are not a proper basis for an estimate of damages resulting from a death.'
> "In the light afforded by the views expressed in our decisions, it is obvious that the distribution among 'heirs' of damages recovered by the statutory trustee must be upon the basis of the pecuniary loss of each, rather than upon his rights under our succession statutes with regard to property constituting the estate left by the decedent. How perfectly absurd it would appear to be to hold that where the whole amount of a recovery is given solely on account of the pecuniary injury to the surviving wife, one-half thereof must go to a surviving father or mother or brother or sister of decedent who has suffered no pecuniary injury whatever. Yet such would be the effect of appellant's construction of the section. Her contention is based almost solely on the use of the word 'heirs,' and the meaning of that word as used in the law of this state. Appellant is undoubtedly right in her claim as to the meaning of the word 'heirs.' It denotes, as said in Redfield v. Oakland, etc., Co., 110 Cal. 277, 290, 42 Pac. 822, 825, all 'those who are capable of inheriting from the deceased person' under our statutes of succession, or, as said in Estate of Watts, 179 Cal. 20, 22, 175 Pac. 415, 'the persons who would by the statute succeed to the real estate [or in California estate of any kind] in case of intestacy.' But, as said in the Redfield Case, supra, 'The recovery is for the injury inflicted upon the plaintiffs personally, and not for injuries inflicted upon her [the deceased]; and the word "heirs" in the statute is intended to limit the right of recovery to a class of persons who, because of their relations to the deceased, are supposed to be injured by her death.' (Italics are ours.) In other words, the plain design of the statute is to give solely to the members of a certain class the opportunity to recover damages for such pecuniary loss as they had suffered by reason of the death of the decedent, and to recompense, in so far as the law can do so, each of such class who has suffered pecuniary loss."

See Ruiz v. Santa Barbara Gas, etc., Co., 164 Cal. 188, 128 Pac. 330; Gonsalves v. Petaluma & Santa Rosa Ry. Co., 173 Cal. 264, 159 Pac. 724; Taylor v. Albion Lumber Co., 176 Cal. 347, 168 Pac. 348, L. R. A. 1918B, 185.

It is the claim of respondents that, inasmuch as the appellant demurred generally to the complaint, but failed to demur specially on the ground that there was a defect or misjoinder of parties plaintiff, such defect or misjoinder appearing upon the face of the complaint, it should be estopped from raising the point for the first time in this court, citing O'Callaghan v. Bode, 84 Cal. 489, 24 Pac. 269; Slaughter v. Goldberg, Bowen & Co., 26 Cal. App. 318, 147 Pac. 90; Kippen v. Ollasson, 136 Cal. 640;[1] Bailey v. Prime Western

Co., 83 Kan. 230, 109 Pac. 791; El Paso & N. E. Ry. Co. v. Gutierrez (Tex. Civ. App.) 111 S. W. 159; St. Louis S. W. Ry. Co. v. Henson, 58 Fed. 531, 7 C. C. A. 349.

[3] We do not understand why the complaint was not demurred to on the ground of defect or misjoinder of parties plaintiff. No cause of action is stated in favor of the sister, Ida M. Ginochio. The allegations of the complaint show that she was not an heir. The defect was permitted to go through two trials without attack by demurrer and without any objection being made at the trial. The only allegation of the compaint, however, attempting to bring the sister into the action was met with denials by the answer. The complaint alleges:

"That the said Angelo J. Ginochio was the sole support of the plaintiff, Ida M. Ginochio, and that she was dependent upon him for her support. * * *"

No other facts are pleaded showing what her pecuniary relations were with decedent or to what extent she was dependent upon him. The answer denies on information and belief:

"That the said Angelo J. Ginochio was the sole or only support of the plaintiff, Ida M. Ginochio, and denies that she was dependent upon him for her support, or otherwise. * * *"

This denial raised an issue of fact, and, if the issue was necessary to her cause of action, she failed to sustain the burden cast upon her by showing what pecuniary damages she had sustained by the death of her brother, if any. The only evidence found in the record is the following:

"Q. What relation did he [Angelo J. Ginochio] bear to you, other than a sister at that time? A. His wife died and left two little children, the youngest one a baby two months old, and I was working, and he asked me if I would give up my work and keep house for him and his children, and he would keep me, because he wanted the children to be raised with him and not put away in a home. Q. When was that? A. That was about 12 years age."

She further stated that she had kept house for him about 10 years. He brought his money home to her every Saturday, and she gave him change for his needs, and presumably the balance would go for household expenses. She received no wages, and had been formerly employed in some capacity not stated, but very commendably quit it to take the place, so far as she could, of a mother. Whatever change that was wrought in her life was brought about many years prior to the death of the brother. The children, being the recognized heirs of the decedent, are the only persons legally or compensably injured. Therefore, whatever sum the jury awarded to the sister is not only without warrant of law, but also without evidentiary support. The instruction complained of was given at the request of respondents, and of course appellant had no opportunity to object to it until after the damage had been done. It is clearly a misstatement of the law on an important issue, and it cannot be said that it did not influence the jury to assess a greater sum than it would have assessed had it not been given.

[4] The refused instruction was as follows:

"If the decedent attempted to board a moving car, he may or may not be guilty of contributory negligence according to all the circumstances of the case, but I instruct you that a person attempting to board a moving car assumes all the risk arising from the fact that the car was moving, and, if decedent was injured and died from injuries he received solely by reason of the fact that he negligently and carelessly attempted to board a moving car, then and in that case plaintiff cannot recover, and your verdict must be for the defendant."

Appellant was entitled to have the jury instructed upon the principle of law contained in the proposed instruction. While this is so, the proposed instruction is open to criticism. It does not set forth the principle of law which it was offered to illustrate either as elaborately or as clearly as it should be stated. No doubt all that was intended thereby was to tell the jury that, if the car was moving so rapidly that it would have constituted negligence to have attempted to board it, or if the circumstances were such that a person of ordinary caution would have been deterred from attempting to board it, in such case the plaintiff would have been guilty of negligence in making the attempt. The instruction should not exculpate the operators of the car from any negligence properly attributable to them. Graff v. United Railroads, 178 Cal. 171, 172 Pac. 603, is not an authority in conflict with anything we have said here.

CITY OF OAKLAND v. GARRISON, as Auditor of Alameda County. (S. F. 11097.)

1. States 🔑119—Rule for determining whether use of public funds constitutes gift.

Where question arises as to whether or not a proposed application of public funds is to be deemed a gift within Const. art. 4, § 31, fundamental subject of inquiry is as to whether money is to be used for a public or private purpose.

2. States 🔑114—Appropriation for a public purpose not generally regarded as a gift.

If an appropriation is for a public purpose within jurisdiction of appropriating body, it is not generally speaking to be regarded as a gift.

3. Counties 🔑153½—Appropriation by county for public street in city of Oakland held not a gift.

Appropriation by the county of Alameda for paving a public street in city of Oakland held not a gift; such improvement constituting a public purpose.

4. Counties 🔑153½—Appropriation by county in improving a city street held not unconstitutional, as authorizing gift.

Appropriation by county of Alameda for paving a public street in city of Oakland, under St. 1923, p. 123, held not unconstitutional under Const. art. 4, § 31, forbidding Legislature to authorize making of a gift to any municipal corporation, such improvement being a matter of general county interest.

5. Evidence 🔑5(2)—Common knowledge that improvement of city street is of more than local interest.

It is a matter of common knowledge that improvement of a city street may well be of much more than local interest in benefit.

6. Appeal and error 🔑909(6)—Supreme Court will assume that finding of board of supervisors that improvement of particular street is of general county interest is correct.

In absence of a showing to contrary, Supreme Court will assume that determination of board of supervisors that improvement of a particular city street is of general county interest is in accordance with facts.

7. Constitutional law 🔑63(2)—County appropriation for improving municipal street held not unconstitutional as a delegation of power.

Appropriation by county of Alameda, under St. 1923, p. 123, for paving a public street in city of Oakland, held not to involve a delegation of power in violation of Const. art. 11, § 13, such section not including a "municipal corporation."

In Bank.

Application by the City of Oakland for a writ of mandate to compel E. F. Garrison, as Auditor of the County of Alameda, to draw a warrant upon county good roads fund in favor of petitioner for certain street work. Writ granted.

Leon E. Gray and Robt. M. Ford, both of Oakland, for petitioner.

Ezra W. Decoto and Earl Warren, both of Oakland, for respondent.

MYERS, C. J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent as county auditor to draw his warrant in favor of the petitioner, pursuant to a resolution adopted by unanimous vote of the board of supervisors of Alameda county, declaring that the improvement by paving same with oil macadam of a described portion of Skyline boulevard, a public street of the city of Oakland, in which said city has the usual easement for street purposes, is of general county interest, and appropriating to the city of Oakland for such improvement the sum of $5,000 from the funds received by the county from the vehicle act and constituting the county good roads fund, and directing the respondent as auditor to draw his warrant in favor of petitioner for said sum. A demand was duly made by petitioner upon respondent, who refuses to draw such warrant. The respondent admits the truth of all the facts alleged in the petition and files as his return thereto a general demurrer. He does not contend that the form of the complaint herein is insufficient or that the resolution of the board of supervisors or any other act preliminary to the issuance of the warrant fails in any respect to conform to the provisions of the statute under which these proceedings were taken, to wit: "An act authorizing counties to improve or assist in the improvement of streets lying in municipalities." Stats. 1923, p. 123. His sole contention is that said act, and particularly section 1 thereof, under which these proceedings were had, is in violation of section 31 of article 4 and section 13 of article 11 of our Constitution. Said section 1 provides as follows:

> "The board of supervisors of any county may by a four-fifths vote determine by resolution that the proposed improvement of a street or portion of street within an incorporated city is of general county interest and that county aid should be extended therefor. Such resolution must refer to the street or portion of street, the general nature of the improvement proposed and the nature of the aid to be furnished by the county and the fund from which it is to be paid.
> "Thereafter and in accordance with such resolution the county may give aid in one or more of the following ways; viz. it may contribute money, acquire material and deliver the same, furnish engineering services or labor, or loan its road building machinery. The expense of such aid may be paid from the general fund, the general road fund or the fund composed of moneys received from the state pursuant to the vehicle act.

"All moneys, materials and other aid so received by the city must be used by it in the improvement described in the resolution and any portion thereof not used shall be returned to the county."

Respondent's contention is that the foregoing section, in so far as it purports to authorize the county of Alameda to appropriate to the city of Oakland any of its funds to be expended by and under the supervision of said city, violates the constitutional provision prohibiting a county from making a gift of public money or thing of value to a municipal corporation (article 4, § 31), and also the provision which, according to respondent's construction thereof, prohibits counties from delegating the spending of or supervision over public money to any commission, corporation, or person other than the county itself and the regular county officers elected or appointed for that purpose (article 11, § 13).

[1-3] Respondent, in support of the first contention, relies upon and quotes from the case of Conlin v. Board of Supervisors, 99 Cal. 17, 21, 33 Pac. 753, 754 (21 L. R. A. 474, 37 Am. St. Rep. 17), wherein it is said that—

> "The 'gift' which the Legislature is prohibited from making is not limited to a mere voluntary transfer of personal property without consideration, which Civil Code, § 1146, gives as the definition of a gift; but the term, as used in the Constitution, includes all appropriations of public money for which there is no authority or enforceable claim. * * *"

That statement of the law was sufficiently accurate and comprehensive for all the purposes of the case which was in before the court for consideration, but it is not to be regarded as necessarily determinative of the question here presented. That case involved the single question of the power of the Legislature to authorize and direct a municipality to make a payment of public moneys from the city treasury to a private individual who had no valid or enforceable claim against the city therefor. There was no claim or suggestion that the moneys so directed to be paid were to be devoted to any public purpose. On the contrary, it was contemplated and intended that they should be paid to the private individual for his sole use and benefit. There was not and could not be in that case any question whether the proposed appropriation of public funds was for a private or public purpose. The purpose thereof was necessarily and admittedly private and this court held that such a use of public funds would constitute a gift such as is prohibited by the Constitution. In other decisions, both prior and subsequent to the Conlin Case, supra, this court has pointed out that, where the question arises as to whether or not a proposed application of public funds is to be deemed a gift within the meaning of that term as used in the Constitution, the primary and fundamental subject of inquiry is as to whether the money is to be used for a public or a private purpose. If it is for a public purpose within the jurisdiction of the appropriating board or body, it is not, generally speaking, to be regarded as a gift. The case of Sinton v. Ashbury, 41 Cal. 525, involved the validity of an act of the Legislature directing the auditor of the city and county of San Francisco to draw his warrant against the general fund in the treasury of the city for the payment to certain commissioners of compensation for preliminary work performed by them incident to the opening and extension of certain streets within the city. This court, having first determined that the Legislature had power to direct and control the affairs and property of a municipal corporation for municipal purposes, then said:

> "It remains only to inquire whether the appropriation in this case was for a municipal or for a purely private purpose."

The court then pointed out that the opening and extension of a principal street through a city was a matter of concern to the people of the entire municipality and concluded that the act in question was clearly valid. In Conlin v. Board of Supervisors, 114 Cal. 404, 46 Pac. 279, 33 L. R. A. 752, the first Conlin Case, supra, was reviewed and construed as holding that "the Legislature holds the public moneys in trust for public purposes, and under this limitation of the Constitution can make no disposal of these funds except in accordance with such purposes," and it was further pointed out that, "even if it be conceded that the Legislature has any control over municipal funds, the only circumstances under which it could direct their payment would be for some municipal purpose, or in satisfaction of some valid claim against a municipality." In Veterans' Welfare Board v. Riley, 188 Cal. 607, 206 Pac. 631, it was said that "the fundamental question involved * * * is the question as to whether or not such moneys are expended for a public purpose." A like conclusion was reached and expressed in varying terms in Ingram v. Colgan, 106 Cal. 113, 38 Pac. 315, 39 Pac. 437, 28 L. R. A. 187, 46 Am. St. Rep. 221, (payment of bounties for the destruction of coyotes); O'Dea v. Cook, 176 Cal. 659, 169 Pac. 366 (payment of police pensions); Macmillan Co. v. Clark, 184 Cal. 491, 194 Pac. 1030, 17 A. L. R. 288 (furnishing free textbooks), and Allied Architects' Ass'n v. Payne (Cal. Sup.) 221 Pac. 209 (expenditure for a memorial hall for the use of veteran soldiers and sailors). It cannot be doubted that the proper improvement of a public street is a public purpose, and in the light of the foregoing decisions we have no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the appropriation here in question is not to be regarded as a gift in the sense that it is to be devoted to a private purpose as distinguished from a public one.

[4-6] But this conclusion does not entirely dispose of the question raised by respondent's first contention. Section 31 of article 4 of the Constitution provides in effect that the Legislature shall have no power to authorize the making of any gift of any public money to any municipal corporation. It may reasonably be concluded, and we shall assume for the purposes hereof, that this provision would prevent the appropriation of county funds to a municipal corporation even for a public purpose, if that purpose were purely municipal and of no interest or benefit to the county as a political subdivision. As was said in the second Conlin Case, supra:

> "While the funds in a municipal treasury are in a certain sense public, they are so only for the limited public which has contributed them. * * *"

It is not sufficient, therefore, that the appropriation here in question be for a public purpose. It must also be for a purpose which is of interest and benefit generally to the people of the county of Alameda. The question, then, is whether the improvement of this particular street within the city of Oakland is a matter of such general county interest that the county funds may properly be expended therein. We think this question must be answered in the affirmative. To begin with, we have the express finding, determination, and declaration by the board of supervisors that the proposed improvement "is of general interest to the said county of Alameda and that aid of the said county of Alameda should be extended therefor. * * *" We need not pause to inquire whether this finding and determination is conclusive upon us in the absence of fraud or mistake, for the reason that its verity is in no way attacked or questioned by respondent herein. In Sinton v. Ashbury, supra, it was taken for granted that the opening of a single street within the city of San Francisco was a matter of interest and concern to the entire municipality. In Reclamation Board v. Chambers, 46 Cal. App. 476, 189 Pac. 479, it was held that the reclamation of certain lands within the Sacramento and San Joaquin reclamation district was of statewide interest and benefit such as to justify the appropriation of state funds in aid thereof, notwithstanding the fact that an assessment had been levied upon the lands benefited thereby to pay the cost thereof. In these days of the almost universal use of motor vehicles for the transportation of passengers and freight, it is a matter of common knowledge that the improvement of a street within a city may well be of much more than local interest and benefit. This is particularly noticeable in those cases where such a street connects with a county boulevard or state highway. It is not alleged that such is the situation here, but neither is the contrary alleged, and in the absence of any showing or suggestion to the contrary we must assume that the finding and determination of the board of supervisors that the improvement of this particular street is of general interest to the county of Alameda is in accordance with the facts.

[7] We find no merit in respondent's contention to the effect that the appropriation herein involved a delegation of power in violation of section 13 of article 11 of the Constitution. That section prohibits the Legislature from delegating such power "to any special commission, private corporation, company, association or individual. * * *" Petitioner does not come within any of the classes enumerated therein, and no reason has been suggested to us why we should read into that section by implication the words "municipal corporation" which seem to have been purposely omitted therefrom.

The foregoing conclusions render it unnecessary to consider other contentions made by petitioner in support of its application.

It is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed for herein.

PARKE et al. v. FRANCISCUS.

1. Statutes ⚷115(3)—Section of Motor Vehicle Act, making transfer invalid unless certain conditions complied with, held not void as being beyond declared purposes of act.

Title to Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1919, p. 191), amending 1915 act (St. 1915, p. 397) to provide for regulation of use and occupation of public highways by vehicles, and for their registration and identification, does not violate Const. art. 4, § 24, providing that every act shall embrace but one subject, which shall be expressed in its title, and section 7 of the act, making a transfer of a motor vehicle invalid unless certain conditions are complied with, is not void as being beyond declared purposes of the act.

Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1919, p. 191), requiring registration and indorsement of certificate as an essential to complete title, is not beyond power of Legislature, in view of fact that enforcement of act is dependent on fact of title and ownership.

3. Records 🔑9½, New, vol. 12A Key-No. Series—Failure of transferee of ownership in car to procure registration certificate renders sale incomplete.

Under Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1919, p. 191), declaring that, until transferee of ownership in a car has received original certificate of registration and properly indorsed it, such transfer will be deemed incomplete and invalid for any purpose, failure of transferee to procure registration certificate properly indorsed does not make sale void ab initio, but renders it incomplete.

4. Records 🔑9½, New, vol. 12A Key-No. Series—Failure of transferees to obtain certificate of registration properly indorsed, held to render their title invalid as against purchaser.

Where owner of motor vehicle assigned a conditional contract of sale, assignees became transferees of "ownership" thereof, within Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1919, p. 199) § 8, par. 3, and their failure to obtain a certificate of registration properly indorsed, and to forward it with an application for re-registration within 10 days, rendered their title invalid as against subsequent purchaser in good faith from conditional vendor and vendee.

5. Replevin 🔑8(3)—Claimant not required to establish ownership in action of claim and delivery.

In an action of claim and delivery, claimant is not required to establish ownership; a right to possession of the thing being sufficient.

6. Estoppel 🔑119—Existence is a question of fact.

Existence of an estoppel is a question of fact.

7. Estoppel 🔑52—Fraud is one of the essential elements of estoppel.

One of the four essential elements of estoppel is fraudulent intent; that is, there must be circumstances and conduct which would render it a fraud for party to deny what he had previously induced or suffered another to believe and take action upon.

8. Estoppel 🔑52—Negligence will satisfy element of fraud necessary to an estoppel.

Negligence is as a matter of law equivalent to intent to deceive, and will satisfy element of fraud necessary to an estoppel.

9. Estoppel 🔑96—Neglect must be in respect to same duty.

Neglect to operate as an estoppel must be in respect to some duty owing to party asserting it.

10. Estoppel 🔑75—Transferees of conditional auto sales contract held estopped to deny innocent purchaser had obtained title and could not recover possession.

Transferees of a conditional auto sales contract, by allowing conditional vendor and vendee to keep certificate of registration, indorsed alone by original owner, thus enabling them to dispose of property to an innocent purchaser, were estopped to deny that such innocent purchaser had obtained title, and could not recover possession thereof in claim and delivery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by H. M. Parke and A. J. Browne, copartners doing business as Parke & Browne, against F. G. Franciscus. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. W. Hindman, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Woodruff & Shoemaker, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an action in claim and delivery for the possession of one Buick automobile, motor No. 179804.

In April, 1920, Robert J. McNabb purchased and received possession of the Buick automobile from John Waterfield. A bill of sale was executed by Waterfield, and with a registration certificate required by the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1919, p. 191) was delivered to McNabb, who drew a draft in favor of Waterfield on the Coast Securities Company for the amount of the purchase price of the automobile. On May 10, 1920, McNabb sold this same automobile to J. D. Green, his employee, upon a conditional sale contract for $1,050. No money was paid down, but an offset of $350 was allowed Green, in consideration of the cancellation of an indebtedness of that amount due him from McNabb. A registration certificate was not delivered to Green. Possession of the automobile was delivered to him and he agreed to pay the balance of $700 in monthly installments of $58 each. The contract was in writing and provided that:

> "The title to the said property, and parts and accessories added thereto, shall be and remain in the first party until all of said payments are made, and all of the conditions herein contained fully complied with. * * * But it is expressly agreed that this contract is a conditional contract of sale and does not transfer to the party of the second part any right or title in or to said automobile until the full performance of all payments and conditions named herein by the party of the second part. This agreement shall inure to the benefit of, and be binding upon, the heirs, executors, administrators, and successors of the respective parties hereto, and the assigns of said first party."

It was also provided that upon any default in payment of any installment when due the conditional vendor might at his option, without previous demand or notice, retake possession of the machine, with or without process of law. Parke & Browne, plaintiffs, through an independent broker, L. L. Baxter, purchased this contract from McNabb on May 11, 1920, for $644.15. No bill of sale was delivered to Parke & Browne, nor was the registration certificate indorsed over or delivered to them. Green filled out a blank attached to the conditional sale contract, giving his name, address, and two references, and reciting that the automobile was to be used by him privately and for business; also stating that it would be stored at 26 Virginia street, the address of McNabb's place of business in Lamanda Park, Los Angeles. Parke & Browne wrote Green that they had purchased said contract from McNabb; that all payments should thereafter be made directly to their office, advising him that within a short time before each payment became due he would be given notice thereof; that the car had been insured against fire and theft, and that they would like to insure him against collision. The notices were sent to Green for the installments due on the 10th days of June, July, and August. On July 8th and August 20th, respectively, Parke & Browne received the stipulated installments of principal and interest. Green testified that he kept the car at McNabb's place of business and used it for demonstration purposes, and occasionally when he went home to lunch.

About May 20, 1920, Green sold the car to defendant F. G. Franciscus. The price was $1,000; $550 of the purchase price was paid by check, and a Ford automobile was "turned in at $450." A bill of sale was not given to Franciscus. He took possession of the car and retained it until the commencement of this action, November 19, 1920. Franciscus asked both Green and McNabb for the registration certificate, but he was not permitted to testify as to what response was made. However, L. D. Nolan, another salesman for McNabb, sent it to the motor vehicle department, together with an application blank for re-registration and $1 in payment for such transfer. The certificate was indorsed at the time on the reverse side by Franciscus. Green testified that he cashed the $550 check he received from Franciscus and delivered the money to McNabb, and that he never took possession of the Ford automobile. About three weeks after the delivery of the Buick to Franciscus, he received by mail the new certificate of registration.

Parke & Browne instituted these proceedings in claim and delivery against Franciscus, alleging that they were the owners, and entitled to immediate and exclusive possession of the automobile in question; that Franciscus had without their consent come into possession of the automobile unlawfully; that they made demand for possession of the car, but that Franciscus refused to deliver it to them, and still unlawfully withholds possession thereof. A supplemental complaint was filed by Parke & Browne, alleging that since the commencement of said action Franciscus had executed a redelivery bond and taken possession of the car. Franciscus, in his answer, denied these allegations, and further alleged that prior to May 20, 1920. Green and McNabb were in possession of said automobile, with the right to dispose thereof, and that Franciscus was a buyer in good faith for value in the ordinary course of business, without notice of ownership or any claim of Parke & Browne; that he was the owner and entitled to possession of the machine, and that if Parke & Browne ever had any right or title in the car they conferred upon McNabb and Green apparent title and power to sell, and are now estopped from asserting any title to or right of possession in it as against Franciscus; that he was an innocent third party and purchaser for value, who dealt with the apparent owner without knowledge of any alleged claim on the part of Parke & Browne and that they negligently allowed the sale to be made to him.

The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and judgment went for defendant. Parke & Browne appeal from the judgment. The court found that Parke & Browne were not, and that they had not been, the owners or entitled to possession of the automobile in controversy, and that Franciscus was the owner and entitled to possession thereof. The findings continue:

> "That on and prior to the 20th day of May, 1920, one Robert J. McNabb and Jack Green were in possession of the said automobile at their place of business as used car dealers at Lamanda Park, Los Angeles county, Cal.; that at said time and place the said Robert J. McNabb was the owner of and conducting said business, and the said Jack Green was employed by said Robert J. McNabb as a salesman in selling and disposing of secondhand or used automobiles; that at said time and place the said Robert J. McNabb and Jack Green were possessed of the power to dispose of the automobile above described; and that the defendant bought the said automobile on the 20th day of May, 1920, at said place * * * in the ordinary course of business."

It is further found that Parke & Browne neglected to take any precautions in having the automobile registered in their name or in showing any transfer of record in their favor, and that they negligently permitted the certificate of registration, indorsed in blank by McNabb and Green, to be where it was available to inspection by innocent purchasers, and that they carelessly put it in the power of McNabb and Green to dispose of said automobile to an innocent purchaser, in the belief that he obtained valid title thereto.

The first question presented is whether the failure to comply with the requirements of section 8 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1919, p. 191), as to the transfer of ownership in motor vehicles which are registered under the act, precludes the passage of the title to such vehicle. The said provision of the Motor Vehicle Act reads as follows:

> "Until said transferee has received said certificate of registration and has written his name upon the face thereof in the blank space provided for said purpose by the department, delivery of said motor vehicle shall be deemed not to have been made and title thereto shall be deemed not to have passed and said intended transfer shall be deemed to be incomplete and not to be valid or effective for any purpose: Provided, that where such transfer is made to a manufacturer or dealer to whom has been assigned a general distinguishing number and who intends to resell or otherwise retransfer said vehicle the provisions of this act relative to the joint statement of transferor and transferee indorsed thereon, shall be complied with upon such sale or transfer." Section 8.

Appellants contend that this requirement of the statute creates merely a duty of owners and operators of motor vehicles towards the state; that registration under the act is not proof of ownership, but simply prima facie a claim of right or representation which a person in actual physical possession cannot successfully assert to divest the legal title of rightful owners of personal property. In support of their position, appellants mention other provisions of the act such as that:

> "The department shall also furnish with each number plate for motorcycles and with each pair of number plates for automobiles, and on each annual renewal of registration, a certificate of registration which shall contain upon the face thereof the following data: The name of the registered owner of the motor vehicle, his post office address, the name and address of the legal owner, and the make of the vehicle, the year model denoted by the manufacturer, the model or letter denoted by the manufacturer, if any: * * * Provided, however, the name and address of the legal owner shall appear on the bottom line of the certificate of registration. * * * Such certificate shall contain a blank space for the signature of the registered owner and shall be signed by such owner. The reverse side of said certificate shall contain forms (a) for notice of transfer of ownership, as hereinafter required, and (b) for application to the department by the transferee, in case of transfer of said motor vehicle, for registration thereof in his name, said application to be in the form of a joint statement to be signed by both transferor and transferee, and the legal owner, and to contain in addition to such other particulars as may be required by said department, a statement of the post office address of the transferee so applying for registration."

It is argued from this that the Legislature was not concerned with the transfer of legal title; that the term "registered owner" has reference to the person registering the vehicle, and that "transferee" is the designation used only by such party, but that the "legal owner" takes no part in the transfer until asked to sign the certificate, permitting transfer by the registered owner.

Respondent contends that, since the court found it was not true that appellants were or had been the owners of the vehicle in question, they are concluded, and that in any event respondent is protected as an innocent purchaser from Green, who had possession and control of the property, as against previous transfers which are pronounced fraudulent by section 3440 of the Civil Code. Appellants insist that any attempt by the Legislature to curtail the powers of purchase and sale of personal property would be unconstitutional, and that this was not the intention of the Motor Vehicle Act, since the registration of vehicles is not required, unless they are to be operated on public highways. Furthermore, it is pointed out that the title of the act does not purport to affect rights in personal property, that it aims only to regulate the operation of motor vehicles and to provide a revenue.

[1, 2] The title to the act of 1919 provides that it is to amend the 1915 act, "said amendments to provide for the regulation of the use and occupation of the public highways by vehicles and otherwise and for the regulation of traffic and travel over such highways for the registration and identification of motor and other vehicles. * * *" There is no doubt that the constitutional provision (article 4, § 24) that "every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title" is not violated, and section 8 of the Motor Vehicle Act, which purports to make a transfer invalid for any purpose unless certain conditions in the act are complied with, is not therefore void, as being beyond the declared purpose of the act. The nature of motor vehicle traffic requires that there be a more certain indicia of ownership than mere possession, for the protection of the general public in case of accidents or violations of the law and to prevent fraud upon innocent purchasers. In order to effectuate this purpose, registration and identification of motor vehicles is required. the "legal owner" and the "registered owner" upon the face of the certificate identify the vehicle. Upon the sale and transfer of "ownership" in a vehicle already registered, the act requires the transferor and transferee to enter into a joint statement of the transfer, indorsed upon the reverse side of the certificate of registration. It is also provided that the legal owner sign such statement which shall be forwarded to the department, and upon the payment of a fee the vehicle shall be registered in the name of the transferee. This provision is evidently for the purpose of identifying the vehicle in the hands of transferees. The identity and ownership of cars operated upon the public ways is of concern to the state. It cannot be said to be beyond the power of the Legislature to require such registration and indorsement as an essential to complete title in a motor vehicle, when the enforcement of the police regulations contained in the act and the revenue measures therein is dependent upon the fact of title and ownership. We quote from Huddy on Automobiles (5th Ed.) 113:

> "The reason assigned for the necessity of registration and licensing is that the vehicle should be readily identified in order to debar operators from violating the law and the rights of others, and to enforce the laws regulating the speed, and to hold the operator responsible in cases of accident. The Legislatures have deemed that the best method of identification, both as to the vehicle and the owner or operator, is by a number or a tag conspicuously attached to the vehicle. In case of any violation of law this furnishes means of identification, for, from the number, the name of the owner may be readily ascertained and through him the operator. Such acts are not passed merely for the purpose of revenue but have for their object the protection of the public."

[3] The provision in question declares that, until the transferee of the "ownership" in the car has received the original certificate of registration and has written his name upon the face thereof in the blank space provided for that purpose by the department, the delivery of said motor vehicle shall be deemed not to have been made and title not to have passed, and said intended transfer shall be deemed to be incomplete and not to be valid or effective for any purpose. The provision does not make compliance therewith prima facie evidence of the ownership of the property in a car so registered and transferred, that is, the certificate of registration does not so declare in terms. However, the words of the act are clear, plain, and unambiguous, and the meaning is not open to question. The failure of the transferee of the "ownership" in the car to procure the registration certificate properly indorsed does not make the sale void ab initio, but in the terms of the statute it is incomplete. This interpretation of the intent of the Legislature would seem to find support in the Motor Vehicle Act of 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 517). This act provides for both a certificate of ownership and a certificate of registration. It is declared that both shall contain upon the face thereof the date issued, the registration number assigned to the owner and to the vehicle, the name and address of the owner and legal owner in typewriting, and the description of the vehicle. The reverse side of the certificate of ownership only shall contain forms for notice to the division of a transfer of the title or interest of the owner or legal owner and application for registration by the transferee. Section 45 of the act provides for the transfer of title or interest in the vehicle:

> "(a) Upon a transfer of the title or interest of a legal owner or owners in or to a vehicle registered under the provisions of this act as hereinbefore required, the person or persons whose title or interest is to be transferred and the transferee shall write their signatures with pen and ink upon the certificate of ownership issued for such vehicle, together with the address of the transferee, in the appropriate spaces provided upon the reverse of said certificate.
> "(b) Within ten days thereafter, the transferee shall forward both the certificate of ownership so indorsed and the certificate of registration to the division, which shall file the same upon receipt thereof."

It is declared in subdivision (c) that the provisions of (b) shall not apply to a transferee who does not intend to drive the vehicle upon the public highways, "but every such transferee shall upon transferring his interest or title to another give notice of such transfer to the division and indorse the certificate of ownership as herein provided and deliver the certificate of ownership to the new legal owner and the certificate of registration to the new owner." Subdivision (d) provides for the issuance of the new certificate of ownership and registration, respectively, and subdivision (e) declares that until such certificates are issued "delivery of such vehicle shall be deemed not to have been made and title thereto shall be deemed not to have passed and said intended transfer shall be deemed to be incomplete and not to be valid or effective for any purpose." Subdivision (g) declares that the legal owner may assign his title or interest without the consent of the holder of the certificate of registration, but that the indorsed certificate of ownership must be filed with the division and a new one issued to the legal owner, and that the division send a notice of such action to the registered owner. It will be noted that the only change made in the act of 1923 is to require separate certificates of registration and ownership. By the act of 1919 the certificate of registration contained all the information required in the two certificates by the act of 1923 and served the purposes of both. This was done apparently to facilitate transfers of title or interest which, in cases where the legal owner and the registered owner are not identical, do not affect the registered owner. It is clear that the term "transfer of ownership" in the 1919 act means the same thing as transfer of title or interest in the 1923 act.

[4] In the case at bar it is clear that the certificate of registration, which serves the purpose of the certificate of ownership and the certificate of registration provided for in the act of 1923, must have been properly indorsed upon the reverse side thereof by the transferee of the "ownership" or title or interest in the car, filed with the motor vehicle department, and a new certificate of registration issued in the name of appellants before title was completely vested in them, and before the transfer could be effective or valid for any purpose.

When McNabb purchased the automobile in question from Waterfield, he received possession thereof and obtained the registration certificate. He did not apply for the re-registration of the vehicle. It was not required by the proviso in section 7 of the Act of 1919 that he do so, but he was required to join with Waterfield in a statement of the transfer upon the reverse side of the certificate of registration. While the requirement of such a statement by a "dealer" is mandatory, a failure to comply therewith does not make the sale incomplete or invalid. So far as the certified copy of the original certificate of registration issued to Waterfield shows, the "ownership" or title and interest in the automobile appears to have passed to respondent directly from Waterfield, the original legal and registered owner. Green, the vendee under the conditional sale contract, did not acquire ownership, that is to say, title to the car; therefore he was not required to make application for re-registration in his own name. McNabb still retained the ownership of the car; that is, the legal title which he transferred to appellants by the assignment of the conditional sale contract. Appellants are the transferees of the "ownership" of the automobile within the meaning of the third paragraph of section 8. Therefore the failure of appellants to obtain the certificate of registration properly indorsed by themselves and McNabb and to forward it, together with an application for re-registration, to the department within 10 days renders their title invalid as against the respondent.

We have shown in answer to the first proposition that compliance with section 8 is essential to the transfer of title. This leads to a second proposition—whether in this action of claim and delivery appellants have shown a right of possession, in spite of their failure to comply with the requirements of the above section.

[5] In an action of claim and delivery the claimant is not called upon to establish ownership, merely a right to the possession of the thing, and since the transfer to appellants was not void ab initio, in an action of claim and delivery, they might be entitled to recover. An Oregon statute of 1919, in section 9 (Oregon Laws, p. 2074), provides that no sale or transfer of any motor vehicle registered in accordance with the act shall be valid without compliance with the provisions of the section concerning the report of a sale of a registered vehicle. The authorities in that state hold that the effect of the statute is to attach to every sale a contingent condition subsequent under which the sale may become abortive on failure to comply with the statutory requirement with reference to registration. Swank v. Moisan, 85 Or. 662, 166 Pac. 962. In Briedwell v. Henderson, 99 Or. 506, 195 Pac. 575, the court said:

> "The court properly held that plaintiffs were bound by the terms of the statute, in this: That the sale of the vehicle was invalid. Nevertheless, they had such a special interest in the car that the law authorizes them to maintain an action for its possession. The vehicle was not cast out from the protection of the law by reason of the plaintiffs' failure to observe the statute. The car was property when it was sold; property when the action was instituted; it is property now. Although plaintiffs' title became defective, they came into possession of the car by lawful means. In acquiring its possession, they committed no act of omission or commission that suggests crime or wrong. In an action of claim and delivery under an allegation of general ownership, the plaintiff may prove a special property entitling him to possession."

In Wiedeman v. Campbell, 108 Or. 55, 215 Pac. 885, it was held that the failure to comply with the statute in that state does not bar the purchaser of an automobile from recovering possession of the automobile, after default on a conditional sale contract with a third party. The Oregon statute does not declare the sale shall be invalid for any purpose, which are the words in the provision here involved. There is no authority in this jurisdiction on the point whether a claimant in an action for claim and delivery must show compliance with the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act. The cases in which the section is involved assume that the effect of the provision is to preclude the passage of title, but refuse to allow it to be invoked where the facts justify the application of estoppel. Boles v. Stiles, 188 Cal. 304, 204 Pac. 848; Chucovich v. San Francisco Securities Corp., 60 Cal. App. 700, 214 Pac. 263. In the former case the court held that, although one of the partners of a dissolved partnership failed to obtain a new registration certificate in his own name, the original certificate having been in the partnership name, he had shown sufficient property, coupled with a right to the immediate possession, to enable him to maintain an action for the recovery of the possession of the automobile from the other partner, who had unlawfully obtained possession thereof. It was said:

> "The appellant, by his own act and agreement having placed the plaintiff in the immediate and exclusive possession of the automobile, is not in position to invoke the provision of the statute referred to."

In the latter case a conditional sale contract was assigned to the securities corporation, and the conditional vendee having defaulted, the conditional vendor, under instructions of the securities corporation, repossessed itself of the truck and sold it to an innocent purchaser. The decision was put upon the ground that the assignee of the conditional sale contract was estopped to deny the authority of the conditional vendor to convey a valid title to an innocent purchaser. An argument was made, however, that the innocent purchaser had not received title, because he had not complied with the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act. The court held that the assignee of the conditional sale contract was in no position to raise such a question, having by his own act placed the automobile in the possession of the conditional vendor. Under the authorities in this jurisdiction and elsewhere, it would seem that the appellants have shown sufficient property in the automobile to prevail in an action of claim and delivery, where the rights of innocent third persons are not involved.

[6-10] This brings us to a consideration of the rights of respondent. The trial court based its judgment on the issue raised by the defense set up by respondent, that is, that he had acquired title by estoppel. The existence of an estoppel is a question of fact. Di Nola v. Allison, 43 Cal. 106, 76 Pac. 976, 65 L. R. A. 419, 101 Am. St. Rep. 84. And assuming that the trial court followed the correct rule of law, the next question is whether the evidence establishes all the elements of estoppel. One of the four essential elements of estoppel is fraudulent intent, that is, there must be circumstances and conduct which would render it a fraud for the party to deny what he had previously induced or suffered another to believe and take action upon. 10 Cal. Jur. 634. It is well settled that negligence, that is, careless and culpable conduct, is as matter of law equivalent to an intent to deceive and will satisfy the element of fraud necessary to an estoppel. Venice v. Short Line Land Co., 180 Cal. 447, 181 Pac. 658. Of course, the neglect to operate as an estoppel must be in respect to some duty owing to the party asserting it. The question is whether the appellants, by allowing the conditional vendor and vendee to keep the certificate of registration, indorsed alone by the original owner, thus enabling them to dispose of the property to an innocent purchaser in the belief that he was obtaining valid title thereto, are estopped to deny that such innocent purchaser has obtained such title. This is such a failure to perform the requirements imposed by law as to constitute culpable negligence upon which an estoppel may be founded. It follows that, as the registration certificate is a prerequisite to the passing of title, and that appellants failed to obtain such certificate and negligently allowed it to remain outstanding, they cannot recover possession of the automobile in an action of claim and delivery, since respondent as an innocent purchaser acquired lawful possession thereof. We are not, however, passing on the relative rights of appellants, or of McNabb and Green, in the automobile.

Judgment affirmed.

ARENA v. BANK OF ITALY et al.

(S. F. 10332.)

1. Attachment 🔑299—Third party must present verified claim setting out his right to possession before attaching officer can demand indemnity bond.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 689, as amended in 1891 and 1907, made applicable to attachment proceedings by section 549, a third party claimant must present to the officer a verified claim showing on its face that he claims the property and setting out a right to its possession before the officer is entitled to demand an indemnity bond of plaintiff.

2. Attachment 🔑299—Third party's claim to attached property held defective and not to give attaching officer right to demand indemnity bond.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 2888, 2913, 2924, 2927, 2957, 2989, 3440, a third party claim to attached goods under Code Civ. Proc. § 689, alleging that claimant became owner by an assignment to secure payment of a note, showed upon its face that the claimant was not the owner of the property, and gave the attaching officer no ground for demanding an indemnity bond or releasing the property when it was not given.

3. Chattel mortgages 🔑1—Pledges 🔑1—Only liens created by assignment of personal property as security for a debt are pledge and mortgage.

The only forms of lien which can be created by an assignment of personal property as security for a debt are a pledge and a mortgage.

4. Attachment 🔑299—Claim of third party to attached property failing to set up right of possession furnished no basis for demanding indemnity bond.

Where a claim of a third party to attached goods omitted to expressly assert any right of possession, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 689, it furnished no basis entitling the attaching officer to demand an indemnifying bond from the plaintiff or justifying him in releasing the attached property when such bond was not given.

5. Attachment 🔑299 — Amendment of claim of third party to attached property held not to validate demand for indemnity.

Where a claim of a third party to attached property, under Code Civ. Proc. § 689, was so defective as to furnish no basis for the sheriff's demand for an indemnifying bond, and so ineffectual as to give him no right to release the property for failure to give such bond, an attempted amendment could not give validity to the sheriff's void act in making the demand.

6. Sheriffs and constables 🔑137(1)—Allegation of ownership of attached property held sufficient as against general demurrer.

In an action for wrongful release of an attachment, a complaint alleging that pursuant to a writ of attachment defendant attached goods belonging to a certain person, describing the property so taken, was sufficient, as against a general demurrer, in its allegation of ownership.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1040(10)—Overruling special demurrer to allegations of ownership of attached property not prejudicial.

In an action for wrongful release of an attachment, where the complaint alleged that the goods attached belonged to a certain defendant, overruling a special demurrer, held not prejudicial error, where defendants were not misled, but knew at all times the rights of the defendant in the property, and the court found that the goods belonged to the named defendant and were in his exclusive possession and control.

8. Sheriffs and constables 🔑137(1)—Complaint held to show trial of issue whether sheriff made demand for indemnity bond.

In an action for wrongful release of an attachment, complaint, evidence, and findings held to show that the issue whether the sheriff made a renewed demand for an indemnifying bond after service of the amended claim by a third party was tendered and tried, and found in plaintiff's favor.

9. Judgment 🔑200—Findings held sufficient to entitle attachment plaintiff to judgment for release of attached property.

In an action for wrongful release of an attachment, findings held sufficient to justify a judgment for plaintiff.

On Petition for Rehearing.

10. Chattel mortgages 🔑187—Claim under trust receipt held void on face as against creditors.

Under Civ. Code, § 3440, where owner assigned and delivered goods to third party, who restored possession of the goods to such owner, and took from him trust receipts, the third party's claim of ownership was void as against creditors.

11. Chattel mortgages 🔑187—Trust receipts resting on no prior ownership are void as against creditors.

Where a person takes trust receipts for property resting on no prior ownership of the property by the creditor for whose benefit the so-called trust is created, and leaves the property in possession of the one giving the receipt, such arrangement is void as against creditors.

12. Attachment 🔑313—Third party claimant securing release of an attachment liable to attaching creditor.

Where a third party claimant secured a release of attached goods by a sheriff by a claim on trust receipts which were void as against creditors, under Civ. Code, § 3440, he is liable to the attaching creditor for damages sustained by the unlawful release of the attachment.

Louis Ferrari, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in the defendants' favor in an action instituted by the plaintiff to recover damages arising from the alleged wrongful release of an attachment. The facts, as shown upon the trial and found by the trial court, in so far as they are necessary to a decision of this cause, are the following: For some time prior to July 22, 1919, one Luigi Dellaira had been doing business under the name of "California Grape Association," and under that name had come into the possession of certain merchandise consisting of 204 barrels of olives, 11 crates of empty half-gallon cans, 349 cases of tomato purée, and 72 cases of Grinola oil, which said merchandise was of the value of about $8,000, and was on said above date situate in certain premises on Front street in San Francisco, which prior to and at said date were rented and occupied by said Luigi Dellaira and constituted his store and salesroom while doing business under said name; that on July 22, 1919, the plaintiff in this action commenced an action against said Luigi Dellaira, under both names, to recover upon an alleged indebtedness of $3,328.83, and on said date procured a writ of attachment proper in form to be issued directing the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco to attach the said property of said Dellaira to cover and secure said claim; that pursuant to said writ the said sheriff did duly levy upon, attach, and take into his possession the aforesaid merchandise; that on said July 22, 1919, and while the said sheriff so held the said property and the whole thereof under said attachment, the Bank of Italy presented to and served upon the said sheriff its third party claim to the whole of said property, together with its demand for the release thereof, supported by the affidavit of one of its officers, wherein was set forth the corporate character of said bank, the authority of its said official to make said affidavit, the fact of the levy of said attachment, the description of said property and its location, and which affidavit then proceeded to state:

> "That the following goods in said store are the property of the Bank of Italy, viz.: 204 barrels of olives; 11 crates of empty half-gallon cans; 349 cases of tomato purée; 26 cases of tomato oil; 46 cases of Grinola oil. * * * That said goods hereinabove described are of the value of about $30,000. That the Bank of Italy became owner of said goods by an assignment given by the defendant L. Dellaira and the defendant California Grape Association to the said Bank of Italy to secure the payment of a promissory note in the sum of $30,000."

That upon receiving said third party claim the said sheriff notified the plaintiff thereof and demanded that said plaintiff indemnify the said sheriff against said claim. That upon receiving such notice and demand the plaintiff did not file or appear to file any indemnifying bond, but did immediately notify said sheriff in writing that said claim was invalid and insufficient for the reason that it affirmatively showed upon its face that said Bank of Italy had no ownership of or right to the possession of said attached property, and in so doing directed the attention of the sheriff to certain sections of the codes and to certain decisions of this court which were cited as sustaining the plaintiff's contention as to the invalidity on its face of said claim. Thereupon, and on July 24, 1919, the Bank of Italy filed with the said sheriff an amended affidavit in support of its said claim, wherein it undertook to set forth as the source and foundation of its title and claim to said property certain transactions between itself and said Dellaira antedating said attachment, and which may be briefly stated as follows: That on and prior to June 4, 1919, the said merchandise had been pledged by said Dellaira to said bank to secure a certain indebtedness due by him to it, but that on said June 4, 1919, the said bank, pursuant to certain agreements then entered into between himself and it, had permitted the said Dellaira to take and have the possession of said merchandise, and to remove the same from the warehouse wherein said merchandise had been stored pursuant to said pledge, and to take the same to his said premises on Front street in order to sell and dispose of the same; that the arrangement under which the said Dellaira was thus given possession of said merchandise was embodied in certain so-called "trust receipts," which were set forth in full in said amended affidavit, and which, in substance, provided that said merchandise was the property of said Bank of Italy, and that said Dellaira agreed to take and hold said goods in trust for said bank and as its property and with liberty to sell the same for its account, but with the right in the Bank of Italy at any time to cancel the trust and take possession of the goods and of the proceeds thereof. Upon receiving this amended affidavit and claim the sheriff released said goods without any further demand upon the said plaintiff for an indemnifying bond, and without any further notification other than a telephone message to the attorney for the plaintiff to the effect that the said sheriff had received said amended affidavit and was on his way to release said property, which he immediately proceeded to do. Thereupon the plaintiff, after demanding of the Bank of Italy and of the sheriff redelivery of said property to said sheriff, and after their refusal to comply with such demand, and after prosecuting his action against said Dellaira to judgment, and vainly attempting to satisfy an execution issued thereon, commenced the present action. The trial court upon its findings of the foregoing facts gave its judgment in the defendants' favor, whereupon the plaintiff took and prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The primary question presented for our determination relates to the sufficiency of the third party claim presented to the attaching officer in its original form by the bank of Italy as forming a basis for the demand made by such officer upon the plaintiff for an indemnifying bond under the provisions of section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Said section reads as follows:

> "If the property levied on is claimed by a third person as his property by a written claim verified by his oath or that of his agent, setting out his right to the possession thereof, and served upon the sheriff, the sheriff is not bound to keep the property unless the plaintiff, or the person in whose favor the writ of execution runs, on demand, indemnifies the sheriff against such claim by an undertaking by at least two good and sufficient sureties in a sum equal to double the value of the property levied on; and the sheriff is not liable for damages for the taking or keeping of such property to any such third person, unless such a claim is made."

By virtue of the provisions of section 549 of the Code of Civil Procedure this section is made applicable to attachment proceedings. It would appear from the language of the above-quoted section, and from the fact of its insertion in the Code of Civil Procedure in the title in which it appears, that the right of an officer levying a writ of attachment or execution in an action at law to demand and receive an indemnifying undertaking from the plaintiff in such action as a condition of retaining the property levied upon by virtue of such writ depends upon and can only be set in motion by the presentation of a written and verified claim by the third party claiming such property as his property and setting out his right to the possession thereof. Prior to the adoption of the Code of Civil Procedure the Practice Act provided that, when property levied upon was claimed by a third person as his property, the sheriff should summon a jury to try the validity of the claim, and, if such jury decided in favor of the claimant, the sheriff was entitled to relinquish the levy, unless the attaching or judgment creditor gave him sufficient indemnity for proceeding thereon. This provision of the Practice Act was carried into section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure upon its original adoption, and was continued therein in substantially that form until the year 1891, when the said section was amended so as to read substantially as the section now reads, except that it contained the requirement that the third party claimant, in addition to claiming the property levied upon as his property and setting out his right to the possession thereof, should also in his verified claim set out "his title thereto" and state "the grounds of such title." These latter requisites to the sufficiency of a third party claim under this section of the Code were omitted from it by the amendment thereto adopted in 1907, enacting the section in its present form, wherein, however, the requirements that the claimant must claim the property "as his property" and must set out "his right to the possession thereof," were retained. While it is true that under the English procedure, and also under the procedure of the older states which fell heirs to that procedure, the courts were disposed to protect public officers required to seize property under writs of attachment or execution of the extent that when it was brought to the attention of such officer even before making the levy that the title to or right of possession of the property was disputed, such officer might, before proceeding further with such levy, demand an indemnifying bond. Robey v. State, 94 Md. 61, 50 Atl. 411, 89 Am. St. Rep. 403. The notes to said citation show that in some jurisdictions the rule was even extended so far as to hold that, if the attaching officer entertained a reasonable doubt as to the title to the property, he would have a right to demand indemnity before levying upon or retaining the property under the writ. See supra, page 415 et seq. In the early case of Long v. Neville, 36 Cal. 455, 95 Am. Dec. 199, it was declared to be the rule that, when an attachment or execution was placed in the hands of an officer to be executed upon property in the possession of third parties claiming to be the owners thereof, he could not be required to seize such property until upon demand he was indemnified by the plaintiff seeking the execution of the writ, and the court in that case indicated that whenever the case afforded reasonable grounds for the sheriff to entertain doubts as to the lawfulness of his levy he would be entitled to demand indemnity before making or continuing the same. In that case, however, the question did not arise in an action involving the levy of a writ of attachment or execution, but arose upon the levy of a writ of possession as against third parties already in possession of the property claiming to be the owners thereof, and hence cannot be held to be controlling upon the court. But, even if it be conceded that the rule as approved in other jurisdictions and as expressed in the case last above referred to was to be held persuasive as to the proper attitude of the courts toward public officers charged with the duty of executing writs of attachment or execution, it must be held that the Legislature of this state, in its amendment to section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure, made in 1891, intended to adopt and apply to officers making levies of writs of execution or attachment a more rigid rule than that prevailing in other jurisdictions as to the right of such officers to demand and be given indemnifying bonds in order to insure the retention of property levied upon by them. The section in its amended form, as enacted in 1891, sets forth as the necessary basis of the right of such an officer to demand indemnity the service upon him of a verified claim by any third party claiming the property, setting forth not only his claim thereto but also his right to the possession thereof and his title thereto, stating the grounds of such title. It would be idle to argue that the Legislature in thus stating the specific requirements of a third party claim, the service of which upon the officer should supply the basis for his demand for indemnity, did not intend a substantial compliance with its terms as a prerequisite to such demand; and while it may be still held to be true that the policy of the courts should be to protect public officers in the exercise in good faith of their function in relation to the levy of process upon the property of litigants, it must also be held that the courts in so doing must have some reasonable regard for the express provisions of the statute regulating and limiting their powers and duties in respect to such levies.

In other words, we interpret the intention of the Legislature in the adoption of section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure in the form of its enactment in 1891 and of its later modification in 1907 to have been that of requiring that a third party claimant shall have presented to the officer a verified claim showing on its face substantially that he claimed the property subjected to the levy to be his property, and setting out his right to the possession thereof before such officer would become entitled to demand of the plaintiff in the action an indemnifying bond. The absence of either or both of the foregoing requirements from such verified third party claim as might be presented would have the result of failing to furnish the officer any basis for a demand upon the plaintiff for an indemnifying bond.

[2] Having in mind these conclusions, let us look to the substance of the third party claim presented to the sheriff as shown by the pleadings and findings in the instant case. It sets forth, it is true, that the goods in question "are the property of the Bank of Italy," describing the same; but it immediately thereafter proceeds to set forth as the basis for its claim of ownership thereof the fact that it "became owner of said goods by an assignment given by the defendant * * * to the said Bank of Italy to secure the payment of a promissory note." This statement shows upon its face that the Bank of Italy was not the owner of the property in question, and had no other right of property in it than that which would arise from the alleged assignment thereof to it as security for a debt. Section 2924 of the Civil Code provides that:

> "Every transfer of an interest in property, other than in trust, made only as a security for the performance of another act, is to be deemed a mortgage, except when in the case of personal property it is accompanied by actual change of possession, in which case it is to be deemed a pledge."

Section 2888 of the Civil Code provides:

> "Notwithstanding an agreement to the contrary, a lien, or a contract for a lien, transfers no title to the property subject to the lien."

From these provisions of the Civil Code it follows that the utmost right of property which the Bank of Italy could have had or asserted with respect to the merchandise in question by virtue of the alleged assignment thereof from Dellaira to it would have been a lien of some sort upon said property.

[3] There are only two forms of lien which under our law can be created by an assignment of personal property as security for a debt. These are (1) a pledge and (2) a mortgage. As to the lien of a pledge, it is dependent on possession (Civ. Code, § 2989), and in case such possession has been taken by the creditor under such form of transfer it is provided in section 2913 of the Civil Code that—

> "The voluntary restoration of property to its owner by the holder of a lien thereon dependent upon possession extinguishes the lien as to such property, unless otherwise agreed by the parties, and extinguishes it, notwithstanding any such agreement, as to creditors of the owner and persons subsequently acquiring a title to the property, or a lien thereon, in good faith, and for value."

The only other form of lien which can be created by an assignment of personal property to secure a debt is that of a mortgage, and a mortgage, of personal property not only does not entitle the mortgagee to possession, unless so authorized by the express terms of the mortgage (Civ. Code, § 2927), but a mortgage of personal property is void as against creditors of the mortgagor, unless executed with the formalities required by the terms of section 2957 of the Civil Code. In addition to the foregoing provisions of the Civil Code bearing directly upon whatever right of property the Bank of Italy could have had or asserted in the property in question by virtue of its alleged assignment thereof of it from Dellaira there is also section 3440 of the Civil Code, which declares that—

> "Every transfer of personal property, other than a thing in action, or a ship or cargo at sea or in a foreign port, and every lien thereon, other than a mortgage, when allowed by law, and a contract of bottomry or respondentia, is conclusively presumed, if made by a person having at the time the possession or control of the property, and not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things transferred, to be fraudulent, and therefore void, against those who are his creditors while he remains in possession. * * *"

[4] It would appear beyond question that the third party claim of the Bank of Italy was in its original form fatally defective in so far as it attempted to assert any right of property in the said bank which would give it a superior right thereto as against the right of the attaching creditor. But it was fatally defective for still another reason. Section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the third party claim required by that section to be served upon the officer must also set out the claimant's "right of possession thereof." The claim of the Bank of Italy as originally set forth and served upon the sheriff in this case entirely omits to expressly assert any right of possession in it or to set out anything from the statement of which any implication or reference of a right of possession in the Bank of Italy could arise. It follows necessarily that said third party claim in its original form and content furnished no basis whatever which would entitle the attaching officer to demand an indemnifying undertaking from the plaintiff or which by any process of reasoning could be held sufficient to justify such officer in releasing the attached property when such bond was not given.

[5] It is contended, however, by the respondents herein that the service upon the attaching officer by the Bank of Italy of its amended and verified claim, which they assert to have been sufficient in form and substance to satisfy the terms of the statute, was such as to entitle the bank to a release of said property and as to entitle the sheriff to give such release without any further or renewed demand upon the plaintiff for an indemnifying bond and without any such delay as would have enabled the latter to have procured and tendered such bond. We discover no merit in this contention, since, if, as we have held, the original claim of the bank was so fatally defective as to furnish no basis for the sheriff's demand for an indemnifying bond, and if his said demand therefor was so utterly ineffectual as to give him no right whatever to release such property on account of the failure or refusal of the plaintiff to give such bond, it must follow that no attempted amendment of such original claim could be held to give any validity to the sheriff's void act in making such demand. Conceding, though not deciding, that the amended claim of the bank would have been sufficient in form and substance to have justified the attaching officer in the making of a new demand of the plaintiff for an indemnifying bond, the undisputed evidence in the case discloses, and the findings of the trial court show, that without the making of any such renewed demand, and, so say the findings, "without notice to the plaintiff of the filing of said amended affidavit," the sheriff at once released said attached property, and delivered the same to the Bank of Italy; and thereafter, and upon the protest of the plaintiff against such unauthorized release of said property and his demand that the said sheriff retake possession of the same, refused and neglected so to do. We have not thus far decided the question as to whether or not the amended and verified claim of the said bank would have been sufficient to have justified the sheriff in demanding an indemnifying undertaking under the provisions of section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure, nor do we, for the reasons above set forth, find it necessary to so decide.

[6-8] The respondents herein make certain other contentions which may be briefly noted: It is insisted by the respondents that the plaintiff's complaint is insufficient in its averments of ownership of the attached property in Dellaira at the time of such attachment. The averments of the complaint are that the writ of attachment directed to the said sheriff required him to attach and safely keep all the property of the defendant Luigi Dellaira; and that "pursuant to said writ of attachment defendant Thomas Finn, as such sheriff, duly levied upon, attached, and took into his custody certain goods, wares, and merchandise belonging to the defendant Luigi Dellaira," describing the property so taken. We think a complaint in this form, though inartificial in its recital of the ownership of the attached property by Dellaira, would be sufficient as against a general demurrer. The defendants, however, also presented a special demurrer to the effect that the complaint was uncertain, in that it did not appear therefrom "how or in what manner the goods attached belonged to the defendant Luigi Dellaira." This special demurrer might as a matter of strict pleading be held to furnish sufficient basis for the claim of prejudicial error on the part of the trial court in overruling the same were it not for the fact, as fully shown by the record, that the defendants were in no wise misled thereby, but were at all times fully advised as to what the rights of ownership of the said Dellaira were in said property; and for the further fact that upon the trial of the cause upon its merits the trial court found that at the time of the levy of said attachment the said Dellaira "was the owner and was in the exclusive possession and control" of said property. Under these conditions we think that the complaint formed a sufficient basis for the issuance of the writ of attachment, and that the defendants were not prejudicially injured by the overruling of their special demurrer to said complaint. The respondents further contend that the complaint does not sufficiently aver that no demand was made upon the plaintiff by the sheriff for an indemnity undertaking after the presentation to him of the Bank of Italy's amended claim. The complaint in that behalf avers that the sheriff released the said property without giving any notice to the plaintiff as to the filing of said amended claim. The evidence in the case sufficiently shows that no such second demand was ever made. The trial court follows the averment of the complaint in its express finding that the sheriff released the property in question "without any notice to plaintiff of the filing of said amended affidavit." We think the pleadings, the evidence, and the findings are sufficient to show that the issue as to whether the sheriff ever made a renewed demand upon the plaintiff for an indemnifying bond after the service upon him of the amended claim of the Bank of Italy was tendered and tried, and that upon that subject the findings of fact of the trial court were in the plaintiff's favor.

[9] The appellant herein urges that this is a proper case for this court in reversing the judgment of the trial court to order that court to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff herein upon the findings. The trial court found that the attachment was duly issued and levied by the defendant Thomas F. Finn, as sheriff, etc., and as attaching officer, and that the defendant Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company was the surety upon the said sheriff's official bond; that the property taken under said attachment was the property of Luigi Dellaira, doing business as "California Grape Association," and that at the time of such levy he was the owner and in the exclusive possession, custody, and control thereof; that upon the levy of said attachment and to procure its release the defendant Bank of Italy presented to and filed with the defendant Thomas F. Finn, the attaching officer, its third party claim, a copy of which is set forth in said findings; that thereupon the said attaching officer made demand upon the plaintiff to indemnify him against said original third party claim; that thereupon said plaintiff notified said attaching officer that said third party claim was invalid and insufficient, and that it affirmatively showed upon its face that said Bank of Italy had no right to the possession of said attached property; that thereupon the said Bank of Italy filed with said attaching officer its amended affidavit in support of its said claim; that upon the filing of said amended affidavit in support of its original third party claim the said attaching officer, without notice to the plaintiff of the filing of said amended affidavit, released said attached property and delivered the same to the defendant Bank of Italy; that at the time of levy of said attachment, and at all times subsequent thereto, said attached property was of the value of more than $8,000; that the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint as to the amount of the plaintiff's claim and demand against said Luigi Dellaira and that the same amounted to the sum of $4,923.84, for which judgment was prayed for in this action, are true, and also that the plaintiff's judgment for the same against said Luigi Dellaira remains and is wholly unsatisfied. The aforesaid findings of fact were, and under our interpretation as to their legal effect as above set forth are, sufficient to have entitled the plaintiff to a judgment in his favor against the defendants herein for the sum demanded in his said complaint, with legal interest thereon from November 22, 1920, and for his costs of suit. In view of these facts we can see no reason for a retrial of this action.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment herein be and the same is hereby reversed, with direction to the trial court to enter judgment for the plaintiff in accordance with the foregoing opinion.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [10, 11] The petition for rehearing is denied. It is urged upon petition for rehearing herein that the court should have also considered and disposed of the question of the validity of the claim of title asserted by the Bank of Italy in its amended third party claim in determining the latter's liability for damages for the conversion of the property through its wrongful release from attachment, based upon its assertion of a third party claim and through the delivery to it of such property upon such claim of ownership thereof by it. The trial court found "that on July 22, 1919, and at the time of the levy of the writ of attachment referred to in the complaint, Luigi Dellaira, doing business as California Grape Association, was the owner and in the exclusive possession, custody and control of certain merchandise," describing the property in question. Whatever claim of ownership the Bank of Italy at any time asserted to said property had its origin in transactions between itself and Dellaira antedating said date. These transactions as shown by the evidence thereof deduced by the Bank itself in connection with its original and amended third party claim sufficiently show Dellaira to have been, prior to June 4, 1919, the owner and in possession of the property in question; that he made an assignment of the same to the defendant Bank of Italy as security for an indebtedness to it, and delivered the same to the bank as a pledge with said assignment; that thereafter the bank restored the possession of said goods to Dellaira, and thus destroyed said pledge; that it then took from Dellaira the trust receipts in question, leaving the latter in full possession and control over said property; that its claim of ownership of said property, as set forth in its original and amended third party claim, rests wholly upon the aforesaid state of facts. The conclusion is irresistible that such a claim of ownership is void upon its face as against creditors, for the reason that it is violative of the provisions of section 3440 of the Civil Code. George v. Pierce, 123 Cal. 172, 55 Pac. 775, 56 Pac. 53; People v. Martin, 53 Cal. App. 671, 200 Pac. 808. Trust receipts of this character, resting upon no prior ownership of the property by the creditor for whose benefit the so-called trust is created, have quite uniformly been held to be void as against creditors. In re Fountain (C. C. A.) 282 Fed. 816, 25 A. L. R. 319; Jordan v. Fed. Tr. Co. (D. C.) 296 Fed. 738, and cases cited. Both of these recent cases refer with approval to an instructive article upon "Trust Receipts" in volume 22, Columbia Law Review, p. 395 et seq. After quoting copiously from said article and commenting upon the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States upholding its views, the court, in the case of In re Fountain, supra, sums the whole matter up as follows:

> "Every trust receipt decision cited by the Supreme Court in connection with the remarks we have quoted falls within the foregoing limitation. See Commercial Bank v. Canal Bank, 239 U. S. at page 524, 36 Sup. Ct. 194, 60 L. Ed. 417, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 25. Any such extension of the rights of the holders of trust receipts as is sought to be established here would, if consistently applied, enable every money lender, by employing a trust receipt, to preserve a secret lien, and would virtually destroy the efficacy of the Chattel Mortgage Act. We regard the contention as untenable and unsupported by authority. The only cases where the holders of trust receipts have been allowed by this court to prevail against the ultimate purchaser or his trustee in bankruptcy have been those where the title of the holder of the trust receipt was derived from some one other than the debtor. In re Cattus, 183 Fed. 733, 106 C. C. A. 171; In re Coe, 183 Fed. 745, 106 C. C. A. 121; In re Marks & Co., 222 Fed. 52, 137 C. C. A. 590. The same is true of the decision of the Supreme Court in Dows v. National Exchange Bank, 91 U. S. 618, 23 L. Ed. 214, a case which arose in the Southern District of New York. The federal courts in the Third Circuit have adopted the same view. Century Throwing Co. v. Muller, 197 Fed. 252, 116 C. C. A. 614; Assets Realization Co. v. Bank, 210 Fed. 156, 126 C. C. A. 662; Roth v. Smith, 215 Fed. 82, 131 C. C. A. 390; In re Dunlap Carpet Co. (D. C.) 206 Fed. 726; and In re Killian Mfg. Co. (D. C.) 209 Fed. 498. We have discovered no decision of any court extending the above doctrine, and this court has refused to extend it to a case like the present. In re Gerstman, 157 Fed. 549, 85 C. C. A. 211. See, also, American & British Sec. Co. v. Am. & British Mfg. Co. (D. C.) 275 Fed. 121."

[12] In the case of In re Fountain, supra, the court had also before it another matter entitled "In re Carl Dernburg & Sons, Inc.," wherein the identical situation was presented which is present in this case, and wherein the court held that the trust receipts taken by the preferred creditor in that case were void as against creditors of the putative trustee or their representative, the trustee in bankruptcy. The reasoning of these cases has exact application to the facts of the case at bar, and leave no doubt in our minds as to the insufficiency of the trust receipt taken by the Bank of Italy in the instant case to support its claim of ownership of the attached property. This being so, and said bank having been a co-actor with its codefendant, the sheriff, in procuring an unlawful release of the property in question from the lien of said attachment and the delivery thereof to itself, it must be held liable for whatever damages the plaintiff sustained from the conversion of said property accomplished thereby.

1. Licenses 🔑42(3)—Information in prosecution for violation of Corporate Securities Act held to charge public offense.

Information in a prosecution for violation of Corporate Securities Act, § 14, charging that defendant, in filing an application for a permit to issue securities of a corporation, falsely represented its earnings, held to state public offense, though alleged act was not within letter of section 3; such statement being material, and section 14 making it public offense for applicant to include any false statement in application for permit.

2. Criminal law 🔑112(1)—Prosecution for violation of Corporate Securities Act held brought in proper county.

Under Pen. Code, § 781, defendant was properly prosecuted in Sacramento county for violation of Corporate Securities Act, § 14, in filing false statement with commissioner of corporations to secure permit to sell securities, though application was filed in branch office of commissioner of corporations in San Francisco, and filing fee paid there, where it was subsequently and in due course forwarded to principal office in Sacramento, and finally filed there.

3. Licenses 🔑42(5) — Whether false statements in application for permit to sell securities result of typographical errors held for jury.

In prosecution for violation of Corporate Securities Act, § 14, in filing false statement in an application to sell securities, whether misstatements in application were result of typographical errors held for jury.

4. Criminal law 🔑1159(2)—Conviction sustained if any substantial evidence in record tending to support it.

If there be any substantial evidence in the record tending to support a verdict, a judgment based thereon should be sustained.

5. Licenses 🔑42(4)—Evidence held not to so overwhelmingly support conviction as to enable appellate court to disregard errors occurring during trial.

In a prosecution for violation of Corporate Securities Act, § 14, for filing a false statement as to earnings in application to sell securities, evidence held not to so overwhelmingly support conviction as to compel conclusion that jury's verdict would have been the same, regardless of errors and irregularities occurring during trial.

6. Criminal law 🔑449(1)—Opinions of nonexpert witnesses admissible on great variety of unscientific questions.

Opinions of nonexpert witnesses are admissible on many unscientific questions arising every day and in every judicial inquiry.

7. Criminal law 🔑452(1)—"Opinion evidence" defined.

"Opinion evidence" is that which is given by a person of ordinary capacity, who has by opportunity acquired a particular knowledge, which is outside limits of common observation, and which may be of value in elucidating matter under consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Opinion Evidence.]

8. Criminal law 🔑452(1)—When opinions of nonexpert witnesses are admissible stated.

Opinions of nonexpert witnesses are admissible, when they have by their experience gained an acquaintance with a particular subject-matter not common to others, and which may aid jury in coming to a conclusion, and are not to be rejected because witness may be engaged in other occupations than particular business to which testimony relates, and though they are based on experience acquired in operation generally of a business, rather than in detailed operation thereof.

9. Criminal law 🔑452(1)—Refusal to permit nonexpert to testify as to relative costs of treating low-grade ore and high-grade ore held erroneous.

In prosecution for violation of Corporate Securities Act, § 14, refusal to permit a witness possessing knowledge based on observation and experience to testify whether it would cost any more per ton to treat low-grade ore or high-grade ore, unless he had some knowledge of cost of production at mine in question, held error.

10. Criminal law 🔑450—Difference in cost of treating high and low grade ore not matter of common knowledge.

The difference in cost of treating high and low grade of ore is not a matter of such common knowledge that jury may be assumed to know what difference is without receiving evidence thereon.

11. Criminal law 🔑1169(9)—Error in rejecting opinion evidence as to certain matter held prejudicial, notwithstanding similar evidence by defendant.

Error in refusing to permit nonexpert, having knowledge based on experience and observation, to testify as to relative cost of treating high-grade and low-grade ores, held prejudicial, though defendant testified on same subject; his testimony having been radically discredited by personal interposition of trial judge.

12. Licenses 🔑42(4)—Admission in evidence of minutes of organization meeting, not showing falsity of statement on which defendant was informed against, held erroneous.

In prosecution for violation of Corporate Securities Act, § 14, for filing false statement in application to sell stock in a mine, admission in evidence of minutes of organization meeting of company operating mine was erroneous, where they had no tendency to show falsity of defendant's statement, or that he knew or had reason to believe that such statement was false.

13. Criminal law 🔑695(2)—Documentary evidence held improperly admitted over general objection, though containing some relevant matters.

In prosecution for violation of Corporate Securities Act, § 14, for filing false statement in application to sell stock in mine, that minutes of organization meeting of company operating mine showed relevant fact that defendant was officer of such company did not render them admissible as against objection which went to their irrelevancy and immateriality; such fact not being in dispute, and objection being plainly directed to exclusion of immaterial matters, which might be used in argument to defendant's prejudice.

14. Criminal law 🔑695(2)—General objection to evidence will not fail, where all parties, including court, understand its purpose.

While ordinarily an objection to evidence must be sufficiently specific to inform court of its scope, where records show that all parties, including court, must have understood its purpose, it will not be said that objection failed of its purpose.

15. Licenses 🔑42(4)—Report filed by defendant as receiver held not to show knowledge of falsity of application to sell stock.

In prosecution for violation of Corporate Securities Act, § 14, for filing false statement in application to sell stock in mine, admission in evidence of report filed with superior court by defendant as receiver of mine held not to show knowledge of falsity of statement, so as to be admissible to show such knowledge.

16. Criminal law 🔑384—Ordinarily objection to remoteness of evidence goes to its weight.

Ordinarily an objection to remoteness of evidence goes to its weight.

17. Criminal law 🔑384—Admission of evidence in face of objection for remoteness ordinarily left to trial court's discretion.

Admissibility of evidence in face of an objection on the ground of its remoteness is ordinarily left to sound discretion of trial court.

18. Licenses 🔑42(4)—Admission of certain evidence over objection of remoteness held abuse of court's discretion.

In prosecution for violation of Corporate Securities Act, § 14, for filing a false statement in application to sell stock in a mine. court abused its discretion in permitting witness to testify as to low quality of quicksilver taken from mine, where such testimony related to a situation existing some 16 years subsequent to time mentioned in alleged false statement, and no showing was made that existing conditions on which evidence was based were identical or substantially similar to conditions existing 16 years before.

19. Criminal law 🔑656(9)—Remarks of trial court, constituting comment on particular piece of evidence, held erroneous.

In prosecution for violation of Corporate Securities Act, § 14, for filing false statement in application to sell stock in a mine, trial court's remarks on report of mine submitted by defendant, which constituted a comment on that particular piece of evidence, and which doubtless tended to lead jury to believe that court was suspicious of defendant, held erroneous.

20. Witnesses 🔑246(1)—Court may facilitate direct and cross examination of a witness.

It is trial court's duty, if exigencies of occasion require it, to facilitate, by one or more interrogatories, direct and cross examination of a witness.

21. Witnesses 🔑246(1)—Court's conduct in taking defendant as witness from his counsel held improper.

Court's conduct in repeatedly taking defendant as a witness from the hands of his counsel, who was competent and conscientious in conduct of his case, and proceeding along independent and extensive line of examination and cross-examination, held improper.

Myers, C. J., and Waste, J., dissenting

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

R. A. Boggess was convicted of making a false statement to secure a permit to sell stock, and he appeals. Reversed.

George E. Foote, of Sacramento, and E. S. Bell, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LENNON, J. The defendant was convicted of an alleged violation of section 14 of the Corporate Securities Act, which provides that:

> "Every officer, agent, or employee of any company, * * * who, with knowledge of its falsity, files or causes to be filed in the office of the commissioner any false statement or representation concerning such company or the property which it then holds or proposes to acquire, or concerning its officers or its financial condition or other affairs, * * * is guilty of a public offense and shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years, or in a county jail not exceeding two years, or by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by both such fine and imprisonment." Stats. 1917, § 14, p. 680.

The charging part of the information filed against the defendant is that:

> "The said R. A. Boggess on the —— day of April A. D. 1920, in the said county of Sacramento, in the said state of California, and before the filing of this amended information, did then and there willfully and unlawfully and feloniously file and cause to be filed in the office of the commissioner of corporations of the state of California, an application of Alpha Quicksilver Company, a corporation, for a permit to issue securities; that in said application was contained and embodied the following statement concerning the property held by such company, 'During the time Boggess had absolute charge of the operations at the mine in 1900, 1901, and 1902, he made it pay net over $7,000.00 per month, net over all mine operating expenses, quicksilver selling at an average of $45.00 per flask;' that said statement so contained and embodied in said application as aforesaid, is and was false, and that said defendant so made said statement in said application with knowledge of its falsity; that at the time said statement was filed or caused to be filed as aforesaid the said R. A. Boggess was an officer, agent, and employee, of said Alpha Quicksilver Company—contrary to the form, force and effect of the statutes in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California."

Upon behalf of the defendant it is contended at the outset that the amended information does not state a public offense in this; that the alleged false statement was a matter that was entirely immaterial because it was not required by the provisions of the Corporate Securities Act, which provides that:

> "Such application shall be in writing, shall be verified as provided in the Code of Civil Procedure for the verification of pleadings, and shall be filed in the office of the commissioner. In such application the applicant shall set forth the names and addresses of its officers, the location of its office, an itemized account of its financial condition, the amount and character of its assets and liabilities, a detailed statement of the plan upon which it proposes to transact business, a copy of any security it proposes to issue, a copy of any contract it proposes to make concerning the same, a copy of any prospectus or advertisement, or other description of such securities, then prepared by or for it for distribution or publication, and such additional information concerning the company, its condition, and affairs as the commissioner may require." Stats. 1917, § 3, p. 675.

It is argued that the amended information does not state an offense because there is nothing within the requirements of the section of the statute just above quoted, which calls for any statement of the past resources and past production of any mine or any other property upon which an application is made for the issuance of securities. It is insisted that the fact that the mine in the instant case may or may not have produced $7,000 per month net at a period 20 years or more before the filing of the application in the instant case was a matter entirely immaterial to the application, and, therefore, foreign to any consideration required to be given to the application, and consequently did not in any way tend to affect or influence the corporation commissioner in his judgment, based upon such application, as to whether or not the permit to issue securities should be granted.

[1] Although the alleged act was not within the letter of the provisions of section 3 of the Corporate Securities Act by reason of the fact that such statement of past production is not specifically required by said section, still section 14 of the Corporate Securities Act, which defines the crime and declares the penalty, is very broad in its scope, in that it declares the filing of any false statement to be a public offense. The fact that the alleged false statement was not required by section 3 of the Corporate Securities Act does not relieve the defendant from the penalty prescribed by section 14 thereof. The conclusion to be reached by the commissioner of corporations as to the propriety of granting or refusing the permit to issue securities would, of course, be based upon all of the facts contained in the application for the permit. The false statement charged against the defendant was obviously included in the application to influence the commissioner of corporations in his action upon the application. True, it was a statement of past conditions, but it was evidently included in the application, in order that, from such past condition, the future performance of the mine might be favorably inferred, and therefore be made the basis for a favorable consideration of the application. That it was material cannot be doubted, for it tended to show that under proper management, and particularly under the management of the defendant Boggess, the mine could still be made to pay net $7,000 per month. That it had done so once, and that it could be made to do so again was the effect of the statement. This statement would undoubtedly tend to influence the corporation commissioner in passing upon the application. Clearly it was the purpose of section 14 of the statute to prevent the inclusion in the application of any false statement by reason of which an erroneous conclusion as to the granting of a permit might be reached by the commissioner. Both the language and the evident purpose of the statute indicate that it was intended by the provisions of section 14 to make it a public offense for an applicant to include any material false statement in the application for a permit. The amended information in the instant case therefore stated a public offense.

[2] It is also urged by defendant as a ground for the reversal of the judgment rendered that the offense of filing the false statement with the commissioner of corporations was committed in the city and county of San Francisco, and therefore the superior court in and for Sacramento county had no jurisdiction to try the case. It is an undisputed fact in the case that the application was taken by an attorney for the mining company, at the request of the defendant, to the branch office of the commissioner of corporations in San Francisco on the 3d day of April, 1920, and delivered by him to the party in charge of the branch office, and that the filing fee was paid by said attorney at the same time at the branch office of the commissioner of corporations in San Francisco. The evidence also shows, however, that the application was subsequently and in due course forwarded by the deputy in charge of the branch office in San Francisco to the principal office in Sacramento, and finally filed there.

Whether or not the court had jurisdiction to try the instant case depends upon a determination of the question of whether or not the act of filing or causing to be filed a false statement in the office of the commissioner of corporations was completed, when the application was left at the branch office of the commissioner of corporations at San Francisco. The fact that the application was left at the branch office at San Francisco in charge of a deputy, and the filing fee paid there, coupled with the fact that, at the time the application was filed, it was customary for applications to be acted upon, and permits granted either by the principal office at Sacramento or the branch office at San Francisco does not compel the conclusion that the application, as a matter of law, was finally filed in the San Francisco office.

A final filing may consist of the mere physical act of the person leaving a paper at the proper office with the person in charge thereof to be filed. This is the character of the filing referred to by those cases fixing the time of the accrual of certain rights in civil matters dependent upon the filing of certain papers. In such cases it is of course but proper that the right arising from the filing of certain papers should accrue as soon as the person filing the papers has done all in his power to perfect the filing; that is to say, as soon as he has left the papers with the proper officer for filing. Estate of Carroll, 190 Cal. 105, 210 Pac. 817. Obviously, a filing, however, is not fully completed as a foundation for a right, where the paper filed, before it is acted upon, must or may be forwarded for filing and consideration to another office of the same or some other governmental or ministerial department of the state or a political subdivision thereof.

The main office of the commissioner of corporations, as provided by law, was in Sacramento, and the application in the instant case, relating as it did to mining matters, required the attention and approval of a Mr. Miller, the special mining deputy, whose duty it was to make a special investigation of the mine before the permit could be issued. Stats. 1917, p. 682.

Mr. Miller, at the time the application was presented to the branch office in San Francisco, was in Sacramento, and therefore the application was forwarded by the deputy commissioner in San Francisco to Sacramento for filing in the main office, and it was so marked as having been finally filed in the main office at Sacramento. We need not decide what the legal situation would be if Mr. Miller had been present in the San Francisco office when the application was presented, and had considered the matter of the application then and there, and thereupon had made and issued his approval without the application having been filed in the Sacramento office. Suffice it to say, for the purpose of a discussion and a decision of this case, that the application was ultimately caused to be filed in the Sacramento office. In other words, even though the application may be treated as having been filed first in the San Francisco office, nevertheless the fact remains that it was ultimately and properly filed and caused to be filed by the defendant in the Sacramento office, at which office it was examined and considered. Section 781 of the Penal Code provides that—

> "When a public offense is committed in part in one county and in part in another, or the acts or effects thereof, constituting or requisite to the consummation of the offense, occur in two or more counties, the jurisdiction is in either county."

This section, we think, governs and controls the situation presented in the instant case. The filing of the application in question, although initiated in the branch office at San Francisco, not having been completed until it was filed in the main office at Sacramento, there is no escape from the conclusion, it seems to us, that when the defendant presented the application to the deputy in the branch office at San Francisco for filing his liability in the matter did not stop there, for the reason that by his act of presenting the application to the deputy in control of the branch office in San Francisco he caused the deputy in the course of the performance of his duty to forward the application for filing to the general office at Sacramento. This being so, the defendant was properly prosecuted in Sacramento county where the crime was in part committed and ultimately consummated.

It is the claim of the defendant here, and it was his defense in the court below, that the application in question, when read and considered in its entirety, was not intended to be understood as containing a representation that the defendant had made the mine pay $7,000 net per month for the entire period of the three years, "1900, 1901, and 1902." The alleged false statement was contained in a letter written by the defendant, addressed to an attorney for the Alpha Quicksilver Company, which letter was incorporated by the defendant in, and made a part of, the application for the desired permit. The letter contained a general history of the mine, including a history of the various transfers of title and a general history of the production of said mine for a period of 20 years prior to the filing of the application. It also set forth a description of all of the land, which would be bound by the issuance of the securities, for which application was made. The following are the paragraphs containing specific reference to the profits of the mine, and which bear on the alleged false statement:

> "In the winter of 1898–99, this mine was acquired by R. A. Boggess, and associates, and over $200,000 spent in equipping and developing it. Boggess had sole charge of all the construction and development, and in 1900 put it on a net paying basis of over $7,000 per month. This mine sold for $1,000,000 in 1901; $200,000 being paid on account. It was then clearing seven thousand dollars ($7,000) net per month over all operating expenses. (Supreme Court Records of California prove this fact.) During this period quicksilver averaged $45 per flask. The ores at that time were treated in a Scott furnace of a daily capacity of 40 tons."

The final paragraph of the letter, which contains the statement charged in the amended information to be a false statement, is as follows:

> "During the time Boggess had absolute charge of the operations at the mine in 1900–1 and 2, he made it pay net over $7,000.00 per month—net over all mine operating expenses, quicksilver selling at an average of $45.00 per flask. He is so absolutely confident with the proper funds required, as indicated herein, and at prevailing prices for quicksilver, and without interference with his management at the mine, he can make it pay from $12,000.00 to $15,000.00 net per month for 10 to 15 years."

It was the defendant's defense that the only period of time intended to be covered by the statement alleged to be false was that particular period of time in which he was in absolute charge of the mine. In this behalf it is argued that, while the particular statement alleged to be false, standing alone, is perhaps susceptible to the construction that the defendant was in absolute charge of the mine during the entire period of the years "1900, 1901, and 1902," nevertheless, in determining the scope and effect of the statement alleged to be false, resort may not be had only to the language of the particular statement, separated from, and without regard to the context of the entire application in which said statement was embodied. The meaning of the alleged false statement, it is argued, can be ascertained only by construing it in conjunction with other statements and declarations contained in the application, which may be properly said to be related to, and connected with, the particular alleged false statement. So construed, it is insisted that the application as a whole shows, not that the defendant was in absolute charge of the mine throughout the entire time of the specified years, but that he was in such absolute charge only during a portion of those years. In this behalf attention is directed to a consideration of those other portions of the application wherein the defendant stated that "in" the year 1898–99, when the mine was acquired by him, he had sole charge of the "construction and development" work, and "in 1900" he put it on a net paying basis of $7,000 net per month. Of course, the words and phrases employed in the statement, in its entirety, must be taken in their ordinary meaning, and so taken the word "in," as used in the application with reference to the operation of the mine in the year 1900, may be said to indicate "inclusion within the limits of the time expressed. * * * 'In' is * * * common in the sense of 'during the course of.'" Webster's New International Dictionary. Therefore that portion of the application may be read and understood as meaning that he put the mine on a net paying basis of $7,000 per month some time during the course of the year 1900, rather than during the entire period of that year.

In support of the contention immediately under consideration, reference is also made to another statement contained in the application that the mine was sold in 1901 to a New York syndicate. From this it is argued that the application shows that the defendant was not in absolute charge of the mine at any time in the year 1902, nor after the sale of the mine to the syndicate in 1901, until the year 1916, "when," as the application reads, "the present owners acquired it.'" It is insisted that the two statements last above referred to, preceding, as they do, and being closely connected with the subject-matter of the alleged false statement, tended to clarify the ambiguity, if any, of said statement, and therefore may be rightly resorted to as a mark and measure of the particular time when the defendant was in absolute charge of the mine.

[3] Incidentally it may not be amiss to say at this point that the defendant testified at the trial that he was in absolute charge of the mine only from September, 1900, to May, 1901, and that he did not have "absolute charge" in any part of the year 1902, and that the reference in the alleged false statement to the year 1902 was a typographical error, which was the result of a misunderstanding of the stenographer to whom the application was dictated amid the noise and confusion of a hotel lobby. This, of course, was a question for the jury to determine, but it should be noted that the application itself shows other admitted typographical errors in the statement of material dates which escaped correction. Thus it appears that the real date of the application was January 20, 1920, but the typist typed it 1919. Another obvious typographical error appears elsewhere in the application, where "1919" was typed instead of the year 1917.

We are not to be understood in this discussion of the defendant's defense as holding that his construction of the application, as above outlined, is correct, nor that his testimony concerning typographical errors in the application should have been accepted by the jury. Our reference to this phase of the case is purely for the purpose of illuminating the remaining points presented in support of a reversal of the judgment, which will be discussed later in this opinion.

It was the theory of the prosecution that the alleged false statement was intended to cover every month during the three years referred to in the application. No evidence was offered by the prosecution tending to show specifically what the actual production of the mine was during any one month of those years. The case of the prosecution consisted largely, if not entirely, of evidence as to what was the yearly production of the mine, from which its monthly production was arrived at by dividing the total production of the year by the number of months in the year. Part of the evidence of the prosecution, as to the production of the mine, was embodied in a bulletin of the state mining bureau containing statistics showing the quicksilver production of the state as a whole for the years 1900, 1901, and 1902, together with statistics of the quicksilver production of the individual counties in those years. The production shown by these statistics was a yearly production, and not the production per month. The evidence shows that the statistics in this bulletin were compiled from the reports of the various mine owners for each year as to the quantity and value of the production. The statistics for Lake county, where the mine in question is located, shows a production in 1900 of 3,165 flasks, valued at $127,345; in 1901 of 4,395 flasks, valued at $211,324; and in 1902 of 3,611 flasks, valued at $161.568. These statistics did not purport to show the individual production of any mine situated in Lake county. It was shown in evidence, however, that the statistics in this bulletin were based in part upon a report sent in by the defendant, as to the production of the mine in question in the years 1900 and 1901. This report showed a production of the mine in question for the entire year 1900 to be 1,300 flasks, without stating the value thereof. It was the defendant's claim that, in the early part of the year 1900, while he was using an 8-ton furnace, the production was, on account of the limited capacity of the furnace, much lower than at a later period of the same year, when he was using a 40-ton furnace, and that he put the mine upon a net paying basis of $7,000 net per month after the installation of the larger furnace in September, 1900. The report for the year 1901, during which time the larger furnace was in operation, shows a production of 2,000 flasks, worth $100,000.

There is evidence in the record, elicited by the testimony of a Mr. Roeth, a witness for the defendant, showing the amount of quicksilver handled, for the mine in question, during several of the months in which the defendant had absolute charge of the mine, by a quicksilver selling company, known as the Eureka Company, which bought and sold quicksilver from all the quicksilver mines in California. This is the only direct evidence as to the production of the mine in question for any one month. This evidence, covering, as it did, practically the period of time in which the defendant was in absolute charge of the mine, shows the production of the mine after the installation of the 40-ton furnace to have been as follows: In 1900: November, 273 flasks; December, 304 flasks; in 1901: January, 257 flasks; February, 265 flasks; March, 255 flasks, and May, 188 flasks. This testimony, coupled with defendant's testimony that the cost of production was $10 to $12 per flask, and the admitted fact that quicksilver was selling at the time in question at $45 per flask, shows a net profit of $7,000 or more for several of the months during the period stated. And a showing of the same profit would also result if, in lieu of the defendant's estimated cost of production per flask, resort is had to his general estimate of the operating expenses of the mine, as testified to by him, or from $3,000 to $4,000 per month. This is so because, during the several months referred to, there was produced at the mine the sum total of 1,542 flasks of quicksilver, which, at a selling price of $45 per flask, would make a gross return of $69,309, and deducting from this the sum of $24,000, the operating expenses estimated at $4,000 per month for a period of six months, a net profit is left of $45,390 for the period of six months, or an average net profit of $7,565 per month.

In corroboration of this claimed production from September, 1900, to May, 1901, there is the testimony of the defendant's witness O'Bryant, who hauled the quicksilver from the mine for shipping during that period, to the effect that he hauled on an average of 280 to 300 flasks per month. It is to be noted that the testimony of this witness covers practically the period of time during which the defendant claims to have been in absolute charge of the mine. The testimony of another witness for the defendant, one Buchanan, tended to corroborate O'Bryant's testimony. So, also, did the testimony of one Dunfield, a witness for the defendant, who was in charge of the condenser at the mine in question for five or six months commencing in the fall of 1900. This witness further testified that there was an enormous big run of quicksilver during the time he was there, which time coincides with the time in which the defendant claimed that he was in absolute charge of the mine. There is other evidence in the case that in 1901 the mine in question disclosed a formation which indicated a considerable amount of valuable quicksilver ore.

The evidence offered by the prosecution, as to the cost of the production of quicksilver at the mine in question, which, of course, was necessary in order to determine the net profit, consisted in a large measure of general estimates to the effect that the average cost of production was about $30 per flask, throughout the quicksilver mines of the state, but this evidence did not relate to, nor purport to bear directly upon the actual cost of labor, fuel, and other operating expenses of the mine in question. It was an undisputed fact in the case, that the cost of quicksilver production varies greatly at different mines throughout the state, and to such an extent that the cost of production at one mine may be twice as great as at another mine. True, there is other evidence, consisting of general estimates of the cost of production at the mine in question, based upon the probable number of men employed, the probable amount of cordage consumed as fuel, and a general assumption of a sum of money to be added for necessary development work. But it was shown by the testimony of several witnesses, testifying without contradiction upon behalf of the defendant, that the actual number of cords of wood consumed as fuel in the production of quicksilver at the mine in question, from September, 1900, to May, 1901, was only two cords per day, which amount is only one-third of the number of cords estimated by the witnesses for the prosecution to be necessary to the operation of the furnace. There is also evidence, uncontradicted, on behalf of the defendant that many men employed at the mine received but $2.50 per day, whereas the prosecution's witness estimated the probable cost of labor at the mine at $3 per day for all of the men employed. There was further evidence to the effect that the mine was comparatively dry, very little timbering was necessary, and that it was favorably located for cheap mining, in that it was not far removed from rail transportation; that wood for fuel grew in abundance, and that there was plenty of water for domestic purposes, steam, etc.

Upon behalf of the defendant, there was offered and received in evidence an excerpt from "Mineral Resources of the United States, Department of Interior, United States Geological Survey," which stated that, "under ordinary circumstances, quicksilver could be produced in California at a cost of $3 per ton of ore mined and smelted." And the defendant himself testified that the maximum cost of producing quicksilver at the mine in question, under the conditions existing there, was $3 per ton of ore, and that the cost of production per flask of quicksilver was but from $10 to $12 per flask.

In short, there is direct and positive evidence in the record adduced upon behalf of the defendant tending to show that, during several months of the years designated in the application, the mine did actually pay over $7,000 net per month over operating expenses. On the other hand, there is evidence consisting of general estimates tending to show that, during the said years, the mine did not pay $7,000 net per month. It is apparent, from a perusal of the evidence adduced upon the entire case, that the guilt or innocence of the defendant hinged upon the solution of a perplexing problem, which necsarily depended in a large measure upon a close consideration of a hypothetical situation developed by the evidence of the prosecution, as against an actual situation developed by the direct evidence of the defense.

[4, 5] We are not unmindful of the rule that, if there be any substantial evidence in the record tending to support a verdict, the judgment based thereon should be sustained. And, had the record before us disclosed no errors or irregularities occurring during the course of the trial, operating to the prejudice of the defendant to the extent that in all likelihood they contributed to the verdict, we might, in the instant case, be constrained to hold that the evidence adduced upon the entire case suffices to support the verdict. We are also not unmindful of the fact that judgments in criminal cases have been affirmed in spite of serious errors and irregularities occurring during the course of the trial, but in those cases the errors and irregularities were evidently the result of inadvertence, and the evidence of the guilt of the defendant so overwhelming that it could not be said that the result of the jury's deliberations would have been different had not the errors and irregularities intervened. On the other hand, there are cases in the books similar to the one at bar, where the evidence of the defendant's guilt was not overwhelming, which were reversed because of pronounced, persistent, and pernicious misconduct during the course of the trial, which obviously intervened to deprive the defendant of a fair and impartial trial, and which warranted the conclusion that, if the case had been fairly tried, the result may well have been different. See People v. Edgar, 34 Cal. App. 459, 167 Pac. 89.

The case as presented by the prosecution is not so overwhelming as to compel the conclusion that the verdict of the jury would have been the same, regardless of the errors and irregularities urged in support of a reversal. We are satisfied from a close consideration of the evidence pro and con that the said errors and irregularities tended to the prejudice of the defendant and the defendant's case to such an extent that they proved an important factor in the determination by the jury of the guilt of the defendant.

Numerous specifications of errors in the rulings of the trial court, relating to the reception of evidence offered on behalf of the prosecution and the rejection of evidence offered on behalf of the defense, are urged in support of a reversal of the judgment. In some instances the objections interposed by the defense were not well taken. These particular objections need not be discussed.

[6-8] Apparently it was the theory of the defense, in part, that the relative cost of treating high-grade ore was less than the cost of treating low-grade ore. In other words, the richer the ore the lower would be cost of production per flask, and conversely, of course, the lower the grade of ore the higher the cost of production. There is evidence in the case tending to show that the mine in question was a "high-grade ore" mine, and in keeping with the theory of the defense there was propounded to one of the witnesses the question, "From your experience, would you say it would cost any more per ton to treat low-grade ore or high-grade ore?" This question was objected to upon the ground that "the witness is not qualified as an expert, and, secondly, that according to his own testimony his experience is confined largely to one mine." It was not necessary, in order to render this witness' testimony admissible, that he should qualify as an expert in the strict sense of the term. It is the generally recognized rule that the opinions of nonexpert witnesses are admissible upon a great variety of unscientific questions arising every day and in every judicial inquiry. These opinions are not admitted in evidence as testimony of experts, strictly so-called, but rather upon the theory that they depend upon knowledge which any one may acquire, but which the jury may not have, and are the most satisfactory, and oftentimes the only obtainable, evidence of the fact to be proved. Opinion evidence is that which is given by a person of ordinary capacity, who has by opportunity acquired a particular knowledge which is outside the limits of common observation, and which may be of value in elucidating a matter under consideration. Accordingly it is the rule that the opinions of nonexpert witnesses may be received in evidence, when the witnesses have, by their experience, gained an acquaintance with a particular subject-matter not common to others, and which may aid the jury in coming to a conclusion. And if a witness has had ample opportunity of acquiring particular knowledge with reference to a particular process employed in a particular business, his opinion is not to be rejected because, perchance, he may be engaged in several other separate and distinct occupations, nor is his opinion to be rejected even though it is based upon observation and experience acquired in the operation generally of a business, rather than in the detailed operation of that business.

[9] Doubtless, if an answer to the question objected to had been permitted, it would have been followed by other interrogatories, which would have elicited the difference in the cost of the treatment of the different grades of ore. The trial court, however, sustained the objection upon the ground that "unless he [the witness] says he has some knowledge of the cost of production—of what the cost of production was at the Abbott mine [the mine in question], his testimony would be immaterial." Clearly the question objected to was not directed to the cost of production at the mine in question, but related solely to the question, as to what was the difference in the cost of the production of high-grade and low-grade ore, and therefore the ruling of the trial court was made and based upon a ground which was clearly at cross-purposes with the fact sought to be elicited by the question. The ruling of the trial court was tantamount to a declaration that, regardless of the qualification of the witness to give his opinion concerning the fact involved in the question objected to, he would not be permitted to testify unless it were shown that his opinion was based upon his knowledge and observation of the situation existing at the mine in question. It is obvious, therefore, that, no matter what the qualification of the witness may have been, the trial court would not, under its ruling, have permitted him to testify. It therefore cannot be correctly said, we think, that the trial court gave a wrong reason for a correct ruling. Clearly the ruling and the reason for the ruling were wrong.

The record shows, upon this phase of the case, that the witness, in addition to being engaged in various commercial enterprises, was also the principal owner of a quicksilver mine in California which, although now dormant, he "run with other parties since 1887." To "run" means "to conduct; manage; carry on." Webster's New International Dictionary. In addition to his intimate association with the operation of that mine, the witness had occasion to investigate and inspect a great many other quicksilver mines. He testified he "would look at * * * and class them" with his mine "from that time on." This witness was also a member of the Eureka Company, a corporation composed of all the quicksilver mines of the state, including the mine in question, which was organized for the purpose of selling the output of the quicksilver mines of the state, and keeping up the price of their products. His experience, we think, was sufficient to show that he was possessed of knowledge, based upon observation and experience, of the fact sought to be elicited by the question objected to, and therefore a proper and sufficient foundation was laid for the introduction of his testimony. Such a foundation, having thus been laid, he should have been permitted to answer the question.

[10, 11] We are not prepared to say that the difference in the cost of treating high and low grade ore is a matter of such common knowledge that the jury might well be assumed to know what that difference was without receiving evidence upon the subject. While it is true that the defendant himself testified as to the relative cost of treating high-grade and low-grade ore, still the defendant's testimony was so radically discredited by the personal interposition of the trial judge as to seriously impair, if not utterly destroy, its value as evidence. And in such a situation the refusal to receive in evidence the testimony of a disinterested witness concerning that subject-matter clearly redounded to the disadvantage of the defendant.

[12-14] The prosecution was permitted to have in evidence, over the objection of the defendant, a copy of the minutes of the organization meeting of the Alpha Quicksilver Company, which was operating the mine in question, dated March 27, 1917. The objection was that such minutes were irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, and did not pertain to any of the issues of the case. A reading of these minutes shows that they are immaterial and irrelevant to the issue raised by the plea of "not guilty," in that they did not show or tend to show the falsity of the statement upon which the defendant was informed against, or that he knew or had reason to believe that said statement was false. The purpose of the introduction of these minutes is not apparent. Its tendency was to incumber the record, confuse the jury, and cloud the issue by conveying to the jury, by innuendo, the thought that the defendant was unlawfully engaged, in some manner, in manipulating the stock and property of said Alpha Quicksilver Company. The defendant, however, was not charged with any fraud in connection with his dealings with the Alpha Quicksilver Company, and the minutes in question, failing to throw any light upon the truth or falsity of the statement upon which the defendant was informed against, should have been rejected. We are unable to find anything in these minutes which warrant the contention that the defendant represented at that meeting that the Abbott mine was actually worth in excess of $750,000. These minutes merely show that the Alpha Quicksilver Mining Company was to be organized with a capital stock of $750,000, to be divided into 150,000 shares of the par value of $5 each. And while there is evidence that the defendant did deraign title, prior to the organization meeting, through the medium of a sheriff's deed for the sum of $6,500, nevertheless it is not disputed that, as testified to by the defendant, some $200,000 had been expended, by the defendant and others associated with him, in the promotion of the mine for the operation, development, and equipment of the mine. In the situation thus presented, we are unable to perceive how it can be said that the minutes in question showed or tended to show any representation, false or otherwise, which had any material bearing upon the alleged false representation for which the defendant was tried and convicted. It is argued in support of the ruling of the trial court that, inasmuch as these minutes did incidentally show that the defendant was an officer and agent of the Alpha Quicksilver Company, they were relevant to that portion of the information which charged him with being such an officer, and that therefore a general objection, which went to the irrelevancy and immateriality of the said minutes, was properly overruled. It was an established and undisputed fact in the case that the defendant was an officer of said Alpha Quicksilver Company, and plainly the objection to the minutes was not directed to the fact that they showed the defendant was an official of said quicksilver company, and it appears just as plainly that the objection was directed to the exclusion of the text of the minutes which bore upon immaterial matters, and which might be used in the argument to the jury to the prejudice of the defendant. While it is true ordinarily that an objection to evidence must be sufficiently specific to inform the court of the scope of the objection, nevertheless, where the record shows, as it does in the instant case, that all the parties, including the court, must have understood the purpose of the objection, it will not be said that the objection failed of its purpose. People v. Shattuck, 109 Cal. 673, 42 Pac. 315; People v. Yee Fook Din, 106 Cal. 163, 39 Pac. 530.

Moreover, the record shows that, after the minutes in question were offered and marked for identification, the district attorney announced that he offered "such portions thereof" as he had marked with a blue pencil, which he desired to thereafter read in evidence. Thereupon counsel for the defendant again interposed the objection that the reading of those portions of the minutes was "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not pertaining to the issues of the case."

This objection was also overruled. Surely this objection was sufficiently specific to direct the court's attention to the many immaterial matters embodied in the minutes in question.

[15] The prosecution, in an endeavor to show that the defendant knew that his statement that he had made the mine pay a certain specified sum in the years 1900–1 and 2, was false, offered, and succeeded in having received in evidence a report made to and filed with the superior court of Lake county, February 19, 1904, by the defendant, as receiver of the mine in question. This particular piece of evidence was objected to upon the ground that it was immaterial, in that it did not purport to represent the condition and operation of the mine during the years mentioned in the alleged false statement. Responding to the objection thus made the district attorney declared that the report "goes to show that the defendant, at the time he made the application to the commissioner of corporation knew—it is a question of the knowledge of the defendant." The trial court, after examining the report, overruled the objection, and ordered that the evidence "be admitted for the purpose of showing knowledge, if any, on the part of the defendant." We fail to find anything in that report which shows or tends to show that the defendant knew or must have known that his statement that he had placed the mine, when under his absolute control in the years 1900, 1901, and 1902, upon a paying basis of $7,000 net per month, was false.

The report in effect shows, as declared in the application filed by the defendant with the corporation commissioner, that, after the mine was sold to a New York syndicate, dissension arose among the new owners, which in the year 1903 resulted in litigation; that the operation and output of the mine was at a very low ebb during a portion of that particular year because of the fact, among other things, that the mine was being operated only for the purposes of a "clean-up," which is made by means of closing down the furnace, cooling the same, and cleaning the flues and condensers, and the fact that the ore at hand, which was being used in the process of the "clean-up," was found not to possess the richness of the ore developed prior to that year; and that "all of the bodies" of ore which had been theretofore "blocked out for extraction and reduction had become exhausted," and that practically no ore of commercial value remained "developed" in the mine. (Italics ours.) Of course the report was evidence of the fact that the mine, under the conditions narrated in the report, was being operated at a great loss during the latter portion of the year 1903. And if the report had shown the operating conditions to be the same during that portion of the year of 1903 as they were in 1900, 1901, and 1902, then it might well be said that the defendant must have known that the mine could not have been made to pay $7,000 net per month in the three years last mentioned, and that therefore he knew that his statement in that particular was false. But it cannot be said in the absence of a showing of similar operating conditions—and the report shows upon its face that the conditions were different—that the admission by the defendant in the report in question, to the effect that the mine was a liability rather than an asset in the year 1903, showed that the defendant knew that the mine was being operated at a loss rather than a profit in the years 1900, 1901, and 1902. The admission in evidence of the report in question, for the purpose stated, was error, and doubtless redounded to the prejudice of the defendant.

[16-18] A witness for the prosecution was permitted to testify as to the low percentage of quicksilver extracted from the tonnage mined at the mine in question in the years 1916 and 1917, which percentage he learned upon an examination of the mine made in the year 1919. Counsel for the defendant first objected to the testimony sought to be elicited from this witness upon the specific ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, "not pertaining to the issues in this case," "as hearsay," that the examination was not made at the request of the defendant, and that it was "too remote." This particular objection the trial court overruled, upon the ground that "it did not necessarily have to be at the request of the defendant. If a man finds a state of affairs existing there, it may have been as the defendant represented to the state, or he may have found different conditions." Counsel for the defendant then interposed the further objection that "the examination is not confined to the time; should be limited to the time alleged in this information." This objection was overruled. In support of these rulings it is insisted that the only objection made to this particular testimony worthy of consideration was that which went to its remoteness, and it is argued that the testimony in question, even though it related to a time some 16 years subsequent to the time mentioned in the alleged false statement, was not too remote. With this contention we cannot agree. Although the objection as made did not in terms specify as one of its grounds that no showing was made that the conditions at the mine were the same in 1919, when the witness examined it, as they were in the years 1900, 1901, and 1902, nevertheless the objection, as made, apparently was sufficient to direct the trial court's mind to the necessity of such a showing, for the court in one of its rulings upon the objection indicated clearly enough that the admissibility of the evidence depended upon a showing of the existence of similar conditions. And clearly, unless it were shown that the result of the examination of the mine by the witness was based upon similar existing conditions, it could not have been material or relevant to the issue involved in the instant case. The objection that the evidence tended to show a situation too remote from the time involved in the alleged false statement was, we think, well taken, and should have been sustained. True, there is no hard and fast rule relative to the admission of evidence claimed to be too remote. Ordinarily an objection to remoteness of evidence goes to the weight of the evidence, but there may be instances in which the remoteness will be so great as to render the proffered evidence utterly unsatisfactory and immaterial. This must depend largely upon the circumstances of each particular case, and as the law does not fix any particular limitation of time which will render evidence too remote, the admissibility of evidence in the face of objection upon the ground of its remoteness, ordinarily should be left to the sound discretion of the trial court. Estate of Akers, 184 Cal. 514, 194 Pac. 706; Coates v. Sulau, 46 Kan. 341, 26 Pac. 720; Snow v. Grace, 29 Ark. 131; Holliday Bros. v. Cohen, 34 Ark. 707; Cline v. State, 51 Ark. 140, 10 S. W. 225. But in view of the fact that the evidence complained of related to a situation existing some 16 years subsequent to the time mentioned in the alleged false statement, and that no showing was made that the existing conditions upon which the evidence was based were identical with, or substantially similar to the conditions existing some 16 years before, it must be held that it was an abuse of discretion for the trial court to admit the evidence complained of, and there can be no doubt but that such evidence tended to the prejudice of the defendant.

It is suggested that "the case presented by the prosecution was undoubtedly legally sufficient to support a verdict of conviction. The case thus made by the prosecution was strengthened rather than weakened by the evidence produced by the defendant, and especially by the cross-examination of the defendant himself." In support of this suggestion, excerpts from the defendant's testimony are referred to, and reference is also made to other evidence which, it is claimed, is in itself sufficient to compel and confirm the conclusion of the guilt of the defendant. We are not satisfied that this is so, and therefore feel constrained to comment upon those portions of the evidence which are relied upon to support the suggestion. Thus we are unable to concur in the contention that the defendant upon cross-examination was compelled to admit the falsity of the statement contained in the application to the commissioner of corporations that $200,000 was paid by the Empire Consolidated Quicksilver Mining Company on account, when the mine was sold in 1901 by the Empire Quicksilver Mining Company. The record, as we read it, shows in this particular that the defendant, upon his cross-examination, testified substantially that $200,000 was paid by the Empire Consolidated Quicksilver Mining Company to the Empire Quicksilver Mining Company for the mine in question, but that out of this money there was paid by the Empire Quicksilver Mining Company to the Abbott Quicksilver Mining Company of Illinois, predecessor in interest of the Empire Quicksilver Mining Company, the sum of $86,000, and that in addition a bond issue of $60,000 of the Abbott Quicksilver Mining Company of Illinois was assumed by the Empire Quicksilver Mining Company. The fact that the Empire Quicksilver Mining Company paid $86,000 and assumed a bond issue of $60,000 does not show that the Empire Quicksilver Mining Company did not receive $200,000 from the Empire Consolidated Quicksilver Mining Company, as claimed by the defendant in his application.

Nor can we concur in the contention that the defendant was compelled to admit that the statement in his application that "the Supreme Court records of California prove this fact"—referring to the fact that the mine paid $7,000 net per month—was false. The defendant explained that, when he made the statement in his application, he was referring to the briefs filed in the Supreme Court in the case of Continental Building & Loan Association v. Boggess. A perusal of Exhibit R, attached to the application to the commissioner of corporations, which contains excerpts from the briefs in the case referred to, shows that the defendant had in mind, when referring to the records of the Supreme Court, that the briefs of the attorneys in the case constituted a part of that record. Those briefs contained the statement that the mine was making $7,000 net per month, and they being the record to which the defendant doubtless referred in the application, it cannot be fairly said that his statement of what the record showed was willfully false.

As we read and understand the record, it does not show that the defendant declared under oath in the case of Continental Building & Loan Association v. Boggess that the profits of the mine from November, 1900, to May, 1901, amounted only to about $32,000. True, he did say that "the profits" of the mine went into the hands of Mr. Corbin as treasurer of the company, and that "these profits" amounted to about $32,000 over the actual operating expenses from November to May. But he explained further that this particular $32,000 was the residue of the profits of the mine, which actually came into the hands of Mr. Corbin as treasurer after there had been dispersed to other persons a sum aggregating $22,000, which would make a sum total of $54,000, and figure a net profit of over $7,000 per month.

It is asserted that the defendant made three different written statements as to the amount spent in reopening the mine in 1916 and 1917, in one of which he placed it at $135,000, in another of which he placed it at $165,000, and in the third at $60,000, and he testified on the stand that he thought it was close to $100,000. A close consideration of the evidence upon this phase of the case shows that the defendant when referring to the $165,000, was referring to the amount of money spent in regaining title to the mine, and not to the amount of money expended in re-equipping the mine, which obviously are totally different expenditures, and that when referring to the $60,000 he had in mind the amount of money expended in 1916 only. The only discrepancy therefore is between the $135,000 and the $100,000, and, inasmuch as the $100,000 referred to the amount of actual cash expended, and the $135,000 included the interest on the money expended, it cannot be said that there was any substantial variation in the defendant's statements as to the amount expended in reopening the mine.

It is contended that the evidence shows that the defendant "had endeavored to induce William Forstner, a mining expert, to make a false report on this mine for use in connection with the defendant's application to the corporation commissioner." The record in this behalf shows no more than that the defendant did forward to Forstner, who had previously made an investigation of the mine, a statement concerning the geological formation of the mine, its condition, and the cost of its operation and development. Forstner did not adopt the statement furnished him by the defendant in its entirety, but amended it in some particulars to conform to his observation and opinion of the mine, but in most particulars the report conformed with the statement furnished by the defendant, and in one instance was more favorable than the original statement of the defendant. The difference between the statement submitted by the defendant and the report of Forstner rested upon a difference of opinion existing between Forstner and the defendant as to the cost of production and an estimate of the cost of needed repairs to the mine. A perusal of the letter to Forstner indicates that the defendant intended that Forstner should rely upon his own judgment in making his report rather than upon the particulars of the statement furnished to him. It shows, in one instance at least, that Forstner was to make his choice of one of two statements. Forstner forwarded the statement as modified to the defendant, who filed it as modified with his application to the corporation commissioner.

We do not understand that the defendant in a letter written by him in 1918 to one Theo Smith, and offered and received in evidence upon behalf of the prosecution "represented that the mine cleared a net average of $7,000 per month until 1904." This letter reads:

> "A reduction plant, installed 1900, was then operated with this plant until 1904. It cleared net over all operating expenses an average of $7,000 per month."

This statement did not necessarily mean that the mine averaged that amount continuously until it was closed down in 1904, and when read and considered in conjunction with other evidence adduced upon behalf of the prosecution, it cannot be said that the statement in question was radically and willfully false. There is testimony in the case of the prosecution to the effect that the mine produced approximately 200 flasks of quicksilver as the clean-up of March of 1903, which at the defendant's estimated cost of production, would show a profit of $6,600 for that month. There is also evidence introduced by the prosecution that 192 flasks per month were produced by the mine during all of 1902 and part of 1903, which would show a net profit of $6,336 per month. There is in addition other evidence, as previously indicated, which shows that during several months of the time included in those years the mine produced over $7,000 per month.

It is true that the defendant in a letter to Theo Smith did state that "12 years' time and over $1,000,000 in cash were spent by the interests I represented in regaining title to the mine." The defendant admitted that this statement was not correct, and in explanation thereof stated that it was a typographical error, and in support of this contention cites the obvious and undisputed fact that in the same letter "$20 a month" was erroneous, and should have been written $20,000 a month. If it be conceded that the subject-matter of this letter was material to the issue of the defendant's guilt of the charge for which he was informed against, still, assuming the statement in question to be false, that fact alone would not suffice to warrant the jury in finding the defendant guilty as charged, and while it might be resorted to, in conjunction with the evidence adduced upon the entire case, the defendant was entitled to have it go to the jury free and clear of the many immaterial and prejudicial matters which were erroneously admitted in evidence. In short, we are not prepared to say that the jury, in the face of evidence which tended strongly to support the defendant's claim that, while he was in absolute charge of the mine, the mine did pay on an average of over $7,000 net per month, would have found the defendant guilty as charged merely because of the fact that he had made a misstatement as to the amount of money expended in regaining title to the mine.

[19] Complaint is seriously and properly made of the misconduct of the trial judge occurring during the trial of the case. In the preliminary report of the defendant as receiver of the mine in question was contained the following statement:

> "During the month of September, 1903, 31 flasks of quicksilver were shipped to Langley-Michaels Company. Referring to the August report, error was made in the last paragraph in stating that no quicksilver was shipped in that month. As a matter of fact 65 flasks were shipped during that month and duly accounted for in the August report under the head of 'Cash received $2,600.00, being an advance of $45.00 per flask on the 65 flasks.'"

When this portion of the report of the receiver was read to the jury, the court interrupted and, as the record shows, "speaking to the jurors," said—

> "Do you understand that it says that during August there were 65 flasks shipped, but that they had erroneously stated that no quicksilver had been shipped in that month—failed to report that amount; and it stated that there was 65 flasks shipped in the month of August, and 31 in the month of September?"

Manifestly, the report spoke for itself, and, if it were properly receivable in evidence, should have been submitted to the jury without any comment from the court which tended to accentuate any particular portion thereof, and it would seem that the purpose of the interruption and comment of the court was to emphasize the fact that the defendant had made a false statement in his August report, and was endeavoring to avoid the effect of that misstatement by the latter report. The remarks of the trial court, in this particular instance, constituted a comment upon a particular piece of evidence in the case, which doubtless tended to lead the jury to believe that the court was suspicious of the defendant, and naturally must have been understood by the jury as an argument against the defendant. This the court was not privileged to do. People v. Adams, 143 Cal. 208, 213, 76 Pac. 954, 66 L. R. A. 247, 101 Am. St. Rep. 92; People v. Patterson, 124 Cal. 102, 105, 56 Pac. 882; Thomas v. Gates, 126 Cal. 1, 4, 5, 58 Pac. 315; People v. Gordan, 103 Cal. 568, 576, 37 Pac. 534; People v. Lonnen, 139 Cal. 634, 637, 73 Pac. 586.

Frequently throughout the course of the trial, without apparent need, the trial court interrupted the examination of the defendant, when testifying as a witness in his own behalf, to the extent of practically taking the examination of the defendant out of the hands of his counsel, and indulged in an extensive course of examination and cross-examination of his own. This was done despite the objection of the attorney for the defendant, the trial court giving as a reason when overruling one of the objections that "the court is trying to facilitate the examination. He is trying to figure it from the blackboard, and if he knows I want him to tell the jury, and if he doesn't know, I want to find out." Conceding that there may have been times during the cross-examination of the witness by the district attorney, when it seemed that the defendant was evasive and nonresponsive in his answers, and that in such a situation the trial court may have been justified in endeavoring to elicit direct answers to the questions propounded, still that situation did not obtain during the direct examination of the defendant by his own counsel, and so far as we are able to glean from the record there was no need for the intervention of the trial court.

[20, 21] There can be no doubt that it is the duty of the trial court, if the exigencies of the occasion require it, to facilitate, by one or more proper interrogatories, the direct and cross examination of a witness. But for the court to repeatedly take the defendant as a witness out of the hands of his counsel, who, as the record before us shows, was apparently competent, conscientious, and expeditious in his conduct of the case, and proceed along an independent and extensive line of examination and cross-examination, is not only not commendable, but highly irregular, and for the sake of due and orderly administration of justice should not be indulged in. Ordinarily the proper course, and the one generally pursued, is to allow the examination by counsel—direct, cross, redirect, and recross—to conclude, and then, if anything in the judgment of the trial court remains obscure, which may be material for the jury to know, and it seems desirable that an examination of the witness should be further pressed, then, with perfect propriety, the trial court may, and indeed should, intervene, so that the ends of justice may be subserved. This, however, should be done with care, particularly where the witness is the defendant in the case, lest the jury should, because of the court's intervention, and because of that fact alone, indulge in adverse inferences and conclusions from the testimony of the witness.

In view of the situation of the evidence in the instant case, considered with reference to the erroneous rulings hereinbefore referred to, and the adverse impressions which the jury undoubtedly received from the court's intervention in the examination of witnesses in the manner indicated, we are of the opinion that said rulings and intervention, taken together, contributed materially to the conclusion reached by the jury.

Judgment is reversed.

MYERS, C. J. I dissent.

I concur with the conclusions of the majority opoinion that the information herein states facts sufficient to constitute a public offense, that the same was properly triable in the superior court of Sacramento county, and that the evidence is legally sufficient to sustain the verdict of conviction. But I do not think that any error was committed at the trial to the substantial prejudice of the defendant. The opinion evidence offered by the defendant to prove that the cost of producing quicksilver from high-grade ore was relatively less than in the case of low-grade ore was, in my opinion, properly excluded, because the witness was not shown to have had any special knowledge or experience in the treatment of the two grades of ore. Moreover, assuming that this ruling was erroneous, I do not think that it could have prejudiced the defendant, because any intelligent juror would reason that, if the cost of producing quicksilver was $3 per ton of ore, the relative cost of production would be less in the case of high-grade ore, which produces more quicksilver per ton, and the same reasoning would apply equally to any other assumed figure as the cost per ton of ore. I do not think that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence, over the objection of the defendant, the minutes of the organization meeting of the Alpha Quicksilver Company, or the report made by the defendant while in charge of the mine as receiver, or the testimony of the witness who examined the mine in 1919. It was defendant's contention at the trial that he did not mean what he said in a portion of the statement, which was charged in the information to be false, and that the falsity of that portion of his statement was solely the product of a typographical error made by the stenographer. The three items of testimony, which the majority opinion holds were erroneously admitted, had a legitimate tendency to contradict and rebut this claim of defendant, in that they tended to show that other statements made by the defendant in the same application were also false, and must have been known by the defendant to be false when he made them.

I agree with the majority opinion that the trial judge should have refrained scrupulously from the making of any suggestion to the jurors as to the weight of the evidence or credibility of a witness, either by commenting thereon in the presence of the jury, or by the manner in which he cross-examined the witness. It appears from the record that the trial judge did in several instances overstep the bounds of propriety, but I am loathe to characterize his action in this respect as misconduct. However, even though entirely inadvertent on his part, it would nevertheless entitle the defendant to a reversal if it operated to his substantial prejudice to an extent which deprived him of a fair trial, but I do not think that such was the case herein. An examination of the entire evidence in the case convinces me that the statements charged in the information here were false and that they were made by the defendant wilfully, and with a design to deceive the corporation commissioner.

Under these circumstances I cannot concur in a reversal of the judgment.

I concur: WASTE, J.

STEGE et al. v. CITY OF RICHMOND et al.
(S. F. 10503.)

Rehearing Denied Sept. 8, 1924.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑266—Right of city to proceed under improvement bond act not abrogated by constitutional amendment.

Right of city to proceed under Improvement Bond Act of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1441) and amendment thereto (St. 1917, p. 142) was not abrogated by constitutional amendment of 1914 (article 11, §§ 6, 8), where municipality had failed to avail itself of right conferred by such amendment to amend its charter so as to render general laws inapplicable.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑269(1)—Improvement of street municipal affair.

Improvement of a public street is a municipal affair, as respects the power of city of Richmond under its charter. (St. 1909, p. 1263).

3. Municipal corporations 🔑293(1)—City of Richmond held to have properly issued bonds for street improvement.

City of Richmond had right to issue serial bonds for street improvements, pursuant to Improvement Bond Act of 1915 and article 2, § 1, subd. 22, of its charter (St. 1909, pp. 1265 and 1281), where a resolution of intention was adopted, reciting that "this resolution of intention is adopted under provisions of Improvement Act of 1911 and Improvement Bond Act of 1915."

4. Municipal corporations 🔑907—Improvement bonds held not general obligation of municipality.

Omission in amendment of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 212) of the provision in original section (St. 1915, p. 1445) that "neither municipality nor any officer thereof is to be holden for payment" of any improvement bond did not make improvement bonds general obligation of the city.

5. Municipal corporations 🔑298—Council held to have jurisdiction to order improvement, where it rescinded former resolution on objection.

Municipal council had jurisdiction to order improvement of a street under St. 1911, p. 730, where, upon objection of owners to term of bonds to be issued under St. 1915, p. 1441, it rescinded its former resolution of intention and started anew by adoption of another resolution of intention to which no protests or objections were interposed.

6. Municipal corporations 🔑575—Sale of lot in groups for assessment held unauthorized.

Sale of lots assessed for street improvements by municipality under St. 1915, p. 1447, § 12, which were separately assessed, but in delinquent roll and in notice of sale, were grouped, resulting in sale of each lot in a particular group to satisfy lien on other lots, held unauthorized.

7. Municipal corporations 🔑870—Improvement bond act held not unconstitutional as pledging credit of city.

Improvement Bond Act of 1915, prescribing a form of bond, and specifying manner of its payment, is not violative of Const. art. 4, § 31, prohibiting Legislature from pledging the credit of any city bonds issued under the act not constituting direct and primary obligation of the city.

8. Municipal corporations 🔑870—Ordinance requiring municipality to purchase property sold for improvements held not unconstitutional as gift to bondholders.

Ordinance of the city of Richmond, requiring it to purchase property sold for street improvements, held not unconstitutional as constituting a gift to improvement bondholders in contravention of Const. art. 4, § 31; improvement of streets being for a public purpose.

9. Municipal corporations 🔑578—Property owners held not entitled to decree quieting title without paying assessment for improvements.

That sale of owners' property for street improvements was invalid did not entitle them to a decree quieting their title, where council had acquired jurisdiction to order work performed, and lands had been benefited by improvement and expenditure incident thereto, and owners sought to relieve lands from burden of assessment without paying their just portion of cost of improvements.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by Edith Stege, etc., and others against the City of Richmond, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, for appellants.

D. J. Hall, of Richmond, and Kirkbride & Gordon, of San Mateo, for respondents.

SHENK, J. This is an action to quiet title. From a judgment in favor of the defendants the plaintiffs appeal. The appellants are the owners of certain lots in the city of Richmond. The respondents claim an interest in said lots by reason of certain assessments for street improvements. On the 21st day of August, 1916, the council of the city of Richmond adopted a resolution No. 281–2 declaring its intention to grade, curb, sidewalk, and pave certain portions of Forty-Seventh street in said city. The proceedings were taken under the Improvement Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 730) and amendments thereto (Stats. 1915, p. 1464), and the Improvement Bond Act of 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1441) and amendments thereto (Stats. 1917, p. 142). Said resolution of intention contained, among other things, a provision for the issuance of serial bonds to represent the assessments, the same to mature in five years, and gave notice of the time and place for hearing objections to said improvements. In due time the appellants signed and filed with the city clerk a document protesting and objecting to the proposed improvement proceedings in this: That at a prior meeting of the council when said proposed improvements were considered it had been agreed that the work should be carried out as proposed, but that the serial bonds to represent the assessments should mature in nine years; that because of the fact that the objectors were large property owners in the district they would be unable to pay their assessments within the five-year period. The communication concluded as follows:

> "Wherefore the undersigned pray that this honorable body correct and amend its resolution of intention or republish the same so as provide that the bonds under which the work is to be paid for shall mature nine years from and after a date to be fixed by your honorable body."

This document was presented to the council and during a consideration thereof appellant W. C. Dohrman appeared and stated that the protestants had no objection to the proposed work, but that they did object to the term of the bonds. The council thereupon rescinded said resolution, abandoned all proceedings taken thereunder, and immediately adopted a resolution of intention to perform said work, No. 281–3, in all respects the same in form as resolution No. 281–2 except that in the second resolution it was provided that the bonds to be issued to represent the assessments should mature in nine years as requested by appellants. Thereafter proceedings were taken pursuant to the second resolution of intention; the contract was let; the work was performed and accepted; the assessments were levied to pay the cost and expenses of the work; and bonds were issued to represent the assessments levied on the lands of the appellants. For delinquency in the payment of certain installments of said bonds and accrued interest the said property was sold to satisfy said assessments. No protests or objections were interposed by the appellants or any of them at any stage of the proceedings under the second resolution of intention until after the sale for delinquency, when this action was brought.

The complaint is in the ordinary form of a suit to quiet title, and the purpose of the action is to relieve said property from the burden of the assessment by a decree in this proceeding. The purpose is apparent from a stipulation made at the trial that the validity of the proceedings taken under the street improvement laws and resulting in said assessments was the only matter in dispute, and that whatever interest the city might have in said land by reason of taxes levied for general municipal purposes was not involved herein.

[1] 1. It is first insisted that the Improvement Bond Act of 1915 was not available to the city of Richmond by reason of the amendment in 1914 of sections 6 and 8 of article 11 of the Constitution. Prior to the amendment of section 6 in 1914, and after its amendment in 1896, a charter framed and adopted under the authority of the Constitution was subject to and controlled by general laws except in municipal affairs. In accordance with the construction placed upon the amendment of 1896, especially in Fragley v. Phelan, 126 Cal. 383, 58 Pac. 923, and subsequent cases (see Clouse v. City of San Diego, 159 Cal. 434, 114 Pac. 573), it was deemed necessary to enumerate in such a charter or in an amendment thereto the specific powers which the city might exercise in relation to municipal affairs in order to remove the city in its control of such affairs from the operation of general laws. That portion of the amendment of 1914 material to this contention reads:

> "Cities and towns hereafter organized under charters framed and adopted by authority of this Constitution are hereby empowered, and cities and towns heretofore organized by authority of this Constitution may amend their charters in the manner authorized by this Constitution so as to become likewise empowered hereunder, to make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in their several charters, and in respect to other matters they shall be subject to and controlled by general laws."

Section 8 was amended so as to make it harmonize with the amendment to section 6. One of the purposes of these amendments was to obviate the necessity of specifically enumerating in the charter all powers relating to municipal affairs in order to remove the city as to such matters from the operation of general laws. City of Long Beach v. Lisenby, 175 Cal. 575, 166 Pac. 333. It does not appear that the city of Richmond has availed itself of the right granted by the amendment of section 6 to bring the city charter within its terms, but the appellants urge that the construction placed upon the amendment in Civic Center Ass'n v. Railroad Comm., 175 Cal. 441, 166 Pac. 351, and Morgan v. Los Angeles, 182 Cal. 301, 187 Pac. 1050, has abrogated the right of the city of Richmond to proceed under the act of 1915. We do not so construe those cases. In the Civic Center Case it appeared that the city of Los Angeles had by an amendment to its charter in 1917 availed itself of the privilege granted by the amendment of section 6 in 1914. With reference to the effect of this amendment on the city of Los Angeles the court said, at page 448 (166 Pac. 354):

> "The result is that the city has become independent of general laws upon municipal affairs. Upon such affairs a general law is of no force with respect to Los Angeles. If its charter gives it powers concerning them, it has those powers; if its charter is silent as to any such power, no general law can confer it. Whether such powers heretofore conferred upon it by general law, if any there be, are now abrogated or suspended, is a question we need not decide."

It is observed that, even where the city had elected to amend its charter pursuant to the amendment of section 6, the question of whether powers conferred upon the city by general law prior to such amendment had been abrogated or suspended was expressly left open and not decided. Nor is that question involved in this case. With reference to the status of the city charter after the constitutional amendment of section 6 in 1914 and before the Los Angeles charter amendment of 1917, the court further said, at page 447:

> "In December, 1916, when this proceeding was begun in this court, the city of Los Angeles had not availed itself of the privilege given to it by the aforesaid amendments to sections 6 and 8. Consequently, so far as its charter provided for municipal affairs, it was paramount to general laws, but upon municipal affairs for which it did not provide and upon affairs not municipal, it was still subject to the operation of general laws."

There is nothing in the Morgan Case inconsistent with that declaration, and it must be concluded, in view of the fact that the city of Richmond has failed to avail itself of the right conferred by the constitutional amendment of 1914, that the city is in the same situation as it was prior to that amendment. In other words, if it had authority to proceed under the Improvement Bond Act prior to 1914, it still has that power. An examination of the Richmond city charter is therefore deemed necessary. The charter was adopted in 1909 (Stats. 1909, pp. 1263, 1281). Section 1 of article 2 thereof enumerates generally the powers vested in the city. In subdivision 4 of that section the city is granted the power to purchase and dispose of property of every kind and description for municipal purposes. In subdivision 7 power is given to levy and collect taxes and assessments. Subdivision 11 grants power to improve streets and to levy special assessments to defray the whole or any part of the cost of such works or improvements. Under subdivision 22 the city is granted the power to "exercise such other powers as may be hereafter granted by the Legislature to municipalities within the state," and under subdivision 23 "to exercise all other needful powers for the efficient administration of the municipal government, whether such powers are herein expressly enumerated or not." In section 1 of article 3 of the Charter it is provided that all powers vested in the city are, with exceptions not here applicable, to be exercised by the council, with power to fix and establish the method and manner in which the vested powers shall be exercised. The Charter does not prescribe the method of procedure for the levying of assessments for street improvements and the issuance of street improvement bonds, and the council has not adopted a procedural ordinance on the subject.

[2, 3] It will be noted that the city in its original charter in 1909 was granted authority to exercise "such other powers as may be hereafter granted by the Legislature to municipalities within the state." This is especially true with reference to municipal affairs, and it is well settled that the improvement of streets such as is here involved is a municipal affair. Byrne v. Drain, 127 Cal. 663, 667, 60 Pac. 433; Civic Center Ass'n v. Railroad Comm., 175 Cal. 441, 445, 166 Pac. 351, and cases cited. Under the Improvement Bond Act of 1915 the Legislature authorized any municipality in the state to determine that serial bonds shall be issued in the manner therein provided to represent assessments for street improvements and by its terms specified that the assessments levied under the Improvement Act of 1911 may be the assessments for which such serial bonds shall be issued. Pursuant to the authorization so granted by the Legislature and by said subdivision 22 of section 1 of article 2 of the Charter said resolution No. 281–3 was adopted, incorporating therein the following clause:

> "This resolution of intention is adopted under the provisions of the 'Improvement Act of 1911,' and the 'Improvement Bond Act of 1915.'"

From the foregoing it is clear that the city had the right to proceed and did properly proceed in the issuance of said serial bonds under the Improvement Bond Act of 1915.

[4] 2. It is next contended that, assuming power in the city to proceed under the Improvement Bond Act of 1915, the said bonds as issued are nullities because they impose a direct liability on the city to pay the same and were not issued in conformity with the requirements of section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution and the municipal indebtedness act of 1901 (Stats. 1901, p. 27). The argument is based on the form of the bond as prescribed in section 6 of the act of 1915 as amended in 1917. The form of the bond as required by the original section (Stats. 1915, p. 1445) contained a provision with reference to the payment of the bond from the redemption fund provided for in the act as follows:

> "It is payable exclusively out of said fund, and neither the municipality nor any officer thereof is to be holden for payment otherwise of its principal or interest."

The amendment of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 212) provides that the bond "including principal and interest is payable exclusively out of said fund," and it is urged that by reason of the omission in the amendment of the clause "and neither the municipality nor any officer thereof is to be holden for payment," it was attempted to make and did make the bond a general obligation of the city. We find no merit in the contention. The form of the obligation was not changed by the amendment. The general plan of the act providing a method whereby bonds to represent the assessments could be issued, a redemption fund created for the payment of the principal and interest thereof and payment exclusively from said fund, remained the same. The bonds were still "payable exclusively from said fund," and the fund under the act was to be replenished only by payments on account of assessments or by sale for delinquency. The case of Union Trust Co. v. State of California, 154 Cal. 716, 99 Pac. 183, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1111, involved the validity of improvement bonds issued by the city and county of San Francisco for the opening of Montgomery avenue in said city. The form of the bond was on its face a direct promise on the part of the city to pay the same. It did, however, contain a statement that it was issued "in conformity with an act" of the Legislature authorizing its issuance. After commenting on an earlier case involving the same bonds (Liebman v. San Francisco [C. C.] 11 Sawy. 158, 24 Fed. 705), which decided that the holders of the bonds could look to no other source of payment than the special assessments provided in the act, this court used language very appropriate to the subject in the case at bar:

> "This view comports with the entire scheme of the act, which contemplates, not the creation of an indebtedness to be paid by funds raised by a general taxation of property in the city, or the state, but the creation of a special improvement district and the payment of the cost of the proposed improvement by means of assessments levied exclusively on lands within this district. These lands, which in the contemplation of the Legislature would be benefited by the opening of the avenue, were to be made to pay, to the extent of the benefit received, the expense incurred in such opening. It was not anticipated by the framers of the law that any other source of payment would or could be resorted to."

[5] 3. It is next claimed that the council never acquired jurisdiction to order the work done under resolution of intention No. 281–3, for the reason, as counsel contends, that the record does not disclose that the objections filed by the appellants on September 8, 1916, to the proceedings as contemplated by resolution No. 281–2, were properly disposed of. It may be observed that under section 6 of the act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 734) the protests which the property owner may file are "against the proposed work or against the extent of the district to be assessed, or both." The communication filed by the appellants raised no objections to the proposed work nor to the extent of the assessment district, but objected only to the time of the maturity of the bonds. The issuance of such bonds is discretionary with the council under the bond act (Stats. 1915, p. 1441), and no opportunity for objection or protest to the issuance thereof is provided for by the terms of the act. But, if it be assumed that an objection to the term of the bonds in a broad sense might be included within an objection to the "proposed work," still the record discloses that the objections and petition of the appellants were acceded to and granted by the council, for it immediately rescinded the resolution of intention No. 281–2 and started anew by the adoption of resolution of intention No. 281–3. No valid reason has been suggested by the appellants why the council did not have full power to so proceed, and, as no question of a statutory stay of further proceedings is involved, it is idle for appellants now to contend, having obtained the result which they sought, that the council should have made a formal order granting or denying their request. The proceedings taken under the second resolution of intention were independent and complete in every detail. No protests or objections were interposed thereto by the appellants on any ground whatsoever, and the council acquired jurisdiction to order the work performed.

4. It is further contended that the sale of the lots was invalid for the reason that they were not sold separately, but were sold in groups. Section 12 of the act of 1915 provides that upon default in payment of said bonds or of any installment of principal or interest thereof the lands securing such installments and assessments shall be sold and be subject to redemption in the same manner in which real property in said city is sold and redeemed for nonpayment of general municipal taxes. This section also provides that the city may be the purchaser at any delinquent sale in like manner in which it may become the purchaser of property sold for nonpayment of general municipal taxes. As hereinbefore noted, the city is authorized by its charter to levy and collect taxes and assessments and to fix the method and manner in which such powers shall be exercised. In June, 1916, the council adopted ordinance No. 405, entitled:

> "An ordinance providing a system for the assessment, levying, and collection of all city taxes in the city of Richmond."

By this ordinance the city fixed and established a complete scheme for the levying and collection of municipal taxes. As to the assessment of property for municipal purposes the ordinance requires in section 17 thereof that the assessor prepare an assessment book with appropriate headings, in which must be listed all taxable property within the city, and in which must be specified in separate columns, under appropriate headings, (1) the name of the person, if known, to whom the property is assessed; (2) lands by metes and bounds, etc., sufficient for identification, (3) city lots, numbers of lots and blocks, tract names and improvements thereon, and (6) the cash value of city lots. Section 52 requires the tax collector to publish the delinquent list, which must contain the names of the persons and a description of the property delinquent, and the amount of the taxes, penalties, and costs due opposite each name and description. Under this section the tax collector is also required to publish with the delinquent tax list a notice that, unless the taxes delinquent, together with the costs and penalties, be paid, the property upon which such taxes are a lien will be sold to the city of Richmond. Section 57 provides for a redemption within five years from the date of the sale, and section 61 provides that the city auditor shall make an estimate of the amount required to redeem on application of any person desiring to redeem and deliver to such person a certificate specifying the several items in the amount to be paid. It is apparent from the procedure outlined in this ordinance that the lots and lands in the city must be separately assessed for municipal purposes as therein provided, and that each of such lots or parcels of land should be sold separately. It may be said that the requirements of said section 17 providing that the assessor list the several parcels of land for purposes of general municipal taxes has no direct bearing upon the method of assessment under the act of 1911, for the reason that the assessments involved herein were made under the resolution of intention, and could only be made under that act. But the general plan of the city ordinance, including the method of assessment, is of assistance in determining what method should be followed by the city in the sale of lands assessed for street improvements under section 12 of the act of 1911. If the method provided by the city for the sale of property for delinquent municipal taxes requires that the several lots and lands be sold separately, it must necessarily follow that any lots and lands sold by the city to satisfy delinquent assessments for street improvements must also be sold separately in order to satisfy the requirements of section 12 of the bond Act that "upon default in payment, the lands securing such installments and assessments shall be sold in the same manner in which real property in such city is sold, for the nonpayment of general municipal taxes." It must be concluded that the method provided by the city for the sale of property to satisfy unpaid taxes for municipal purposes contemplates that the same be separately advertised and sold.

[6] The record in this case shows that the several lots of the plaintiffs were located in a tract known as "East Shore Park," and were separately assessed under the Improvement Act. Each item specified the lot, block, assessment, number, and amount of the assessment in cash. But in the delinquent roll and in the notice of sale the lots were not so separately designated, but were grouped. For example: Lots 23, 24, and 25 of block M were grouped and sold as one item; lots 33, 34, and 35 in the same block were grouped and sold as one item; lots 1 to 3 and 6 to 12 in block N were grouped and sold as item, and so on. This plan was followed throughout, and resulted in the sale of each lot in a particular group to satisfy the lien on each of the other lots in the same group. We think the method thus pursued by the city was unauthorized. In Brady v. Kelly, 52 Cal. 371, which was an action to enforce a street assessment, the court said:

> "Where two or more lots are assessed for the expenses of work on a street, each lot is chargeable only with the amount assessed upon it, and not for the amount assessed against another lot. * * *"

In Gillis v. Cleveland, 87 Cal. 214, 218, 25 Pac. 351, 353, the court said, with reference to a lien against lots which were required to be "separately assessed" under the Vrooman Act (Stats. 1885, p. 174):

> "It is obvious that the lien here referred to is one for the particular amount assessed against each lot, and not the whole amount of several assessments against all the lots of one owner, without regard to the proportion properly chargeable to each."

See, also, Knox v. Higby, 76 Cal. 264, 18 Pac. 381.

[7] 5. It is urged that the Improvement Bond Act of 1915 prescribing the form of the bond and in specifying the manner of its payment violates the provisions of section 31 of article 4 of the Constitution prohibiting the Legislature from pledging the credit of any city in the state. But the contention is based upon the false assumption that the bonds when issued are direct and primary obligations of the city. As has been pointed out, they were not under the original bond act of 1915 and the legal effect so far as the obligation of the city is concerned was not changed in form prescribed by the amendment of 1917. Hence no difficulty with reference to the applicability of the form prescribed by such amendment to the proceedings theretofore commenced can arise herein, and the rights of the appellants were not affected by the amendment.

[8] 6. Several objections to the validity of the tax ordinance No. 405 are raised. In the main they relate to the method followed by the city in advertising for sale and selling the property of the appellants, but, inasmuch as we have decided that the sale under the ordinance was irregular and appellants' contentions in that regard have been sustained, we deem it unnecessary specifically to enumerate or pass upon them. But the contention that the provisions of said ordinance to the effect that the property when sold shall be sold to the city is unconstitutional should be determined. It is the position of the appellants that the ordinance adopted by the city requiring the city to purchase the property at the sale is imposing a burden upon all of its taxpayers for the benefit of the bondholder who holds the same in private ownership, thus constituting a gift to the bondholder in contravention of section 31 of article 4 of the Constitution. The argument assumes that in the improvement of streets the work is a private matter. On the contrary, such work is for a public purpose. The city might have expended its general funds for that purpose. It was not compelled to do so, and when it elected to proceed under the general street improvement laws it simply adopted the means provided by law whereby it might in accordance therewith exercise a public function without incurring a contractual liability such as is contemplated under section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution and the bond act of 1901. When the city elects to proceed under said act, it assumes the burden of discharging its duties thereunder to the end that the assessment may be enforced. See Federal Construction Co. v. Wold, 30 Cal. App. 360, 158 Pac. 340. We discover no reason from this or any point raised by the appellants why the city may not properly proceed under its tax ordinance to enforce the assessments for delinquency in the payment thereof.

[9] But the fact that the sale of appellants' property was invalid would not necessarily entitle the appellants to a decree quieting their title under the circumstances here shown. By appropriate proceedings the council acquired jurisdiction to order the work performed. In fact, all the proceedings leading up to and including the issuance of the bonds were valid. The work has been performed and the lands have been benefited by the improvements and the expenditure incident thereto. The plaintiffs in this equitable action seek to relieve the lands from the burden of the assessment for such benefits without praying or offering to pay their just portion of the cost of the improvements. In the early case of Weber v. City of San Francisco, 1 Cal. 455, it was said:

> "An assessment was laid for the purpose of improving a street, and thereby benefiting the property of the plaintiff in common with the property of other persons owning lots on the same street. The work has been completed; and after the plaintiff has derived all the benefit and profit therefrom, and after the contractors with the city have expended their labor and money to improve the plaintiff's lots, he comes into court, when he is called upon to pay his proportion of the expense, and asks, in effect, that he may be exempted from the general burden imposed for the common benefit of himself and others, on the ground that there are some irregularities in the mode of making the assessments. I think that should not be permitted. The plaintiff asks for the equitable interposition of the court to prevent a sale of his land by the defendants; but, every principle of equity and justice demands that the plaintiff should pay; and it is one of the first maxims of equity jurisprudence, that he who asks equity must do equity."

The rule thus announced has been approved and consistently followed in this state. Estabrook v. O'Brien, 98 Cal. 671, 33 Pac. 765; Ellis v. Witmer, 134 Cal. 249, 66 Pac. 301; Couts v. Cornell, 147 Cal. 560, 82 Pac. 194, 109 Am. St. Rep. 168; Savings & Loan Society v. Burke, 151 Cal. 616, 91 Pac. 504; Holland v. Hotchkiss, 162 Cal. 366, 123 Pac. 258, L. R. A. 1915C, 492. The later case of Hayne v. San Francisco, 174 Cal. 185, 162 Pac. 625, was an action to quiet title. The defendant asserted a lien on the land by virtue of certain special assessments levied to pay the costs of the construction of a tunnel. The plaintiffs did not pay or offer to pay the assessments. The court said:

> "As we find the assessment to be valid, the property of the plaintiffs is justly liable for its due proportion thereof. In such cases the plaintiff is not entitled to any relief in a court of equity unless he shall pay, or offer to pay, the amount actually due upon the assessment against his property. As was said in Ellis v. Witmer, 134 Cal. 253 [66 Pac. 303], 'this being the case they cannot successfully invoke the assistance of a court of equity against the irregularities in the sale complained of, unless on the condition of paying what is due from them. Here no such condition has been imposed by the court, nor is there an offer in the complaint to pay what is due. The plaintiffs were therefore not entitled to relief.'"

Such is the situation of appellants in this case.

The judgment is affirmed.

194 Cal. 320

Ex parte DAEDLER. (Cr. 2669.)

1. Constitutional law 🔑313—Infants 🔑12—Jury 🔑21(2)—Juvenile Court Law is constitutional.

Juvenile Court Law 1915, is not in violation of Const. art. 1, § 7, relative to trial by jury, or section 13, relative to due process of law, as proceedings thereunder are not penal, but reformatory.

2. Infants 🔑16—Failure of judge committing minor under Juvenile Court Law to find that parents were incapable held immaterial.

In proceedings under Juvenile Court Law of 1915, and acts amendatory thereof, that, in ordering minor's removal from custody of his parents, judge of juvenile court made no finding that parents were incapable or had neglected to provide for his proper maintenance was immaterial, where court found that minor's welfare required that custody be taken from his parents.

3. Infants 🔑16—Removal of minor from parent's custody warranted by commission of felony.

That minor had committed the crime of willful murder was not only sufficient, under Juvenile Court Law 1915, § 1, subd. 13, to require minor to be made a ward of court, but furnished some evidence that he had passed beyond parental control, so as to be taken from parents' custody.

4. Jury 🔑21(6)—Minor not entitled to jury trial, when proceeded against under Juvenile Court Law.

In proceedings under Juvenile Court Law of 1915, against a minor for commission of a felony, minor was not entitled to a jury trial.

In Bank.

Habeas corpus by Paul Daedler, a minor, directed against Margaret Bullen, Superintendent of Juvenile Hall, Los Angeles County, to secure his release from custody. Writ denied.

E. D. Martindale, of Los Angeles, and Daniel Riordan, of Pasadena, for petitioner.

J. W. Joos and E. W. Widney, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioner herein, Paul Daedler, a minor, appearing by his natural guardians, L. O. Daedler and Pauline Daedler, applies for a writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of securing the release of said minor from the custody of one Margaret Bullen, superintendent of the juvenile hall of Los Angeles county, who is alleged to be detaining said minor under and by virtue of an order of the juvenile court of the said county of Los Angeles, and which detention the petitioner alleges to be illegal for the reasons set forth in his petition. The facts upon which the petitioner predicates his reasons for asserting that his said detention is illegal are those embraced in certain judicial proceedings, the record in which is embodied in certain exhibits attached to his said petition, and as to the correctness of which there is no present dispute. It sufficiently appears therefrom that on the 7th day of December, 1923, a criminal complaint was presented by one Salvador Martinez to one Kenneth C. Newell, a justice of the peace of Pasadena township, county of Los Angeles, wherein it was charged that on the 5th day of December, 1923, at Pasadena, in said county, a felony was committed by said Paul Daedler, who at that time and place did willfully and with malice aforethought kill and murder one Arthur Martinez, a human being. That thereupon a warrant was issued by said magistrate for the arrest and detention of said Paul Daedler upon said charge; that by virtue of said complaint and warrant said Paul Daedler was arrested and brought before said magistrate on the 7th day of December, 1923; that it was then made to appear to said magistrate that said Paul Daedler, charged with the commission of said felony, was a minor of the age of a little over 14 years, upon ascertaining which fact the said magistrate made an order that the proceedings against said minor upon said charge be and they were thereby suspended, and that said minor be taken before the juvenile court of said county for its consideration and proceeding under the Juvenile Court Law. The order and direction thus made in the proceeding then pending against said minor was, it is conceded, in substantial conformity with the provisions of section 6 of the Juvenile Court Law, as amended in 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 799). Thereupon said minor was brought before Edwin F. Hahn, judge of the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, sitting as judge of the juvenile court at a special session of said court upon the charge of being within the provisions of subdivision 13 of section 1 of the Juvenile Court Law, approved June 5, 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1225), and the acts amendatory thereof, which said section of said Juvenile Court Law provides that it shall apply to any person under the age of 21 years "who violates any law of this state * * * defining crime." A hearing was had upon said charge after due notice to the above-named parents of said minor, who were present at said hearing, and testimony being taken without objection of any kind at that time being made, it was found, by the judge of said juvenile court that said minor was of the age of 14 years; that a felony had been committed by him in the unlawful killing of Arthur Martinez; that said minor should be a ward of said court within the meaning of section 1, subdivision 13, of the Juvenile Court Law; that the welfare of said minor required that he be taken from the custody of his said parents. An order was accordingly made declaring and adjudging said minor to be a ward of the juvenile court, appointing W. H. Holland, probation officer, to be in charge of said minor, and committing him to the care and custody of such officer until further order. By a further order of said judge the said minor was committed to the Preston School of Industry until he attained the age of 21 years, when he was to be returned to the jurisdiction of said juvenile court for further proceedings. After a brief period spent there the said minor was returned to the custody of Margaret Bullen, superintendent of the juvenile hall of Los Angeles county, in whose care and custody he was when this writ was sought and issued.

[1] The petitioner herein, both in his petition and through his counsel, concedes that the proceedings by which said minor was committed to the care and custody of the officers of said juvenile court and to the Preston School of Industry were in all respects regular, as being in conformity with the Juvenile Court Law; the only contention of the petitioner and his counsel being that relating to the constitutionality of the sections and subdivisions of said statute under which the foregoing proceedings were taken. The particular contention of the petitioner, his parents, and his counsel in that regard is that said minor, having been arrested upon a charge of murder made in a complaint before a magistrate having jurisdiction to entertain such complaint, and having been brought before such magistrate upon such charge, he was entitled to the right of trial by jury upon said charge under those certain constitutional and statutory guaranties, to be later noted, upon which he relies, and that the proceedings of the Juvenile Court Law under which, without such trial, he has been committed to the care and custody of the officers and representatives of the juvenile court and to the Preston School of Industry, are unconstitutional in so far as their effect has been to deny and deprive him of such right of trial by jury and of vindication by said means of such charge. The particular sections of the Constitution upon which the petitioner and his counsel rely in making this contention are section 7 of article 1 of the state Constitution, which reads, in part, as follows:

> "The right of trial by jury shall be secure to all, and remain inviolate. * * * Trial by jury may be waived in all criminal cases not amounting to felony, by the consent of both parties, expressed in open court."

He also relies upon the provisions of section 13, art. 1, of the Constitution, which reads, in part, as follows:

> "In criminal prosecutions, in any court whatever, the party accused shall have the right to a speedy and public trial. * * * No person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense; nor be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law."

The petitioner also cites and relies upon section 811 et seq. of the Penal Code, defining the procedure in cases of any person charged with a felony. In order to a determination of these contentions, it will be necessary to review briefly the history and philosophy of juvenile court laws.

The theory that the state and its instrumentality, the court, is the guardian of all such minors as require its care and protection is ancient of origin, looking back to the feudal times in England when the crown, through the inquisitio post mortem, had the matter of the supervision over the estates of minors, in order to realize the fruits of tenure and of livery to the overlord. This was succeeded by the Court of Wards and Liveries in the time of Henry VIII (33 Hen. VIII, c. 22), and which continued to exercise such jurisdiction until the year 1660, when, the feudal system having run its course, the jurisdiction of this court was transferred to the Court of Chancery, through which the king, as we are told by Blackstone, in his capacity of parens patriæ, assumed the general protection, not only of infant tenants, but of all infants in his kingdom, through the keeper of his conscience, his chancellor (3 Blackstone, 427, 428). The development of the English law investing the crown as parens patriæ with the supreme guardianship and supervision over infants and of the investiture of courts of equity with jurisdiction over the persons and estates of minors is fully set forth in the leading case of Eyre v. Shaftsbury (1722) 2 Peere Williams, 103. The doctrine that the state was parens patriæ of the people who compose it, for the purpose of the care, protection, discipline, and reform of those of its citizenship, whether dependents, lunatics, minors, or criminals needing these offices, thus became a part of the British system of government and of jurisprudence, and the jurisdiction of courts of equity over minors thus firmly established in the English law passed to this country upon the establishment of courts of law and equity in its various states, and came regularly into our system of jurisprudence upon the consolidation of these courts.

With the modern development of more merciful methods of dealing with the delinquencies of minors, various statutes came into being in the several states, which provided for special proceedings in the cases of such delinquents, and for particular institutions in the nature of detention homes and schools of industry for the discipline, education, and reform of the delinquents, with a view to their restoration to a higher grade of character and a better quality of citizenship. The efforts of the earlier laws in these directions were variously interpreted by the courts of the several states, depending somewhat upon the form of enactments, and upon the diverse views of the courts as to how far they invaded the constitutional rights of those charged with crime. In the state of California, however, the more enlightened view of the purpose of the law in thus attempting to deal with the cases of juvenile dependents or delinquents was early adopted by this court. In the case of Ex parte Ah Peen, 51 Cal. 280, the action of a police magistrate in committing a minor child to an industrial school for his training and reformation was upheld by this court, in the face of the express contention that the proceedings resulting in his detention were in conflict with the provisions of section 3 of article 1 of the Constitution of 1849, which provided that the right of trial by jury should be secured to all, and also with the provisions of section 8 of the same article, providing that no person should be deprived of his liberty without due process of law. The court said:

> "It is obvious that these provisions of the Constitution have no application whatever to the case of this minor child. The action of the police judge here in question did not amount to a criminal prosecution, nor to proceedings against the minor according to the course of the common law, in which the right of trial by jury is guaranteed. The purpose in view is not punishment for offenses done, but reformation and training of the child to habits of industry, with a view to his future usefulness when he shall have been reclaimed to society, or shall have attained his majority. Having been abandoned by his parents, the state, as parens patriæ, has succeeded to his control, and stands in loco parentis to him. The restraint imposed upon him by public authority is in its nature and purpose the same which, under other conditions, is habitually imposed by parents, guardians of the person, and others exercising supervision and control over the conduct of those who are by reason of infancy, lunacy, or otherwise, incapable of properly controlling themselves. Ex parte Crouse, 4 Whart. 1; Prescott v. The State of Ohio, 19 Ohio, 184."

The principles thus early announced have, with one exception, been reaffirmed and followed by the later decisions of this court in dealing with the underlying purpose of our later enacted juvenile court laws. Speaking of the Juvenile Court Act of 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 213) this court said:

> "The main purpose of the act is to provide for the care and custody of children who have shown, or who from lack of care are likely to develop, criminal tendencies, in order to have them trained in good habits and correct principles. To accomplish this it gives additional jurisdiction and power to the superior courts of the state and provides the officers necessary for the execution of that jurisdiction and power. It is an exercise of the police powers of the state, through the judicial department. It is a matter which concerns the whole state as much as any other extension of the judicial system." Nicholl v. Koster, 157 Cal. 416, 108 Pac. 302.

Commenting upon this case, and quoting its foregoing language, this court further said in the case of Matter of Maginnis, 162 Cal. 200, 121 Pac. 723:

> "The statement might perhaps be broadened to the extent of saying that the act aims, as its principal object, at the proper custody and education of children who lack the care and control deemed essential to their right development, whether or not their situation be such as to be likely to lead them to actual crime. This is the purpose declared by the opening words of the title, viz. 'An act concerning dependent and delinquent minor children, providing for their care, custody and maintenance.' * * * It needs no argument to show that the existence of dependent or delinquent children is detrimental to the best interests of the community. Ultimately, of course, the act seeks to prevent such dependency or delinquency. One method of doing this is to take the child out of the custody of the person who has caused or permitted it to become dependent or delinquent."

In the case of Moore v. Williams, 19 Cal. App. 600, 127 Pac. 509, in which a petition for hearing in this court was denied, that court, citing the foregoing decisions of this court, held that:

> "These juvenile courts, which are in fact but an extension of the jurisdiction of the superior courts, are the creation of modern philanthropic endeavor, and are designed to and in fact do provide a most excellent means of restraining and reforming wayward persons who, unchecked, may become a menace to society."

The single exception to this current of authority above referred to is the case of In re Becknell, 119 Cal. 496, 51 Pac. 692, in which this court in a brief opinion and without any citation of authority held that an order of the superior court, based upon the recommendation of a grand jury, after evidence taken before it sufficient to show that a minor of the age of 13 years had committed the crime of burglary, should be sent to Whittier State School, was void for the reason that said minor had not been accorded a trial by jury. The court in that case had before it the provisions of the particular statute (Stats. 1893, p. 332), under which the above procedure had been followed, and evidently treated the proceeding in question as penal in character, and the order as in effect a judgment imposing imprisonment for a crime. The decision is entirely out of line with the earlier ruling of the court in the Ah Peen Case, and also the later holdings of the court as to the nature and purpose of reformatory legislation, and hence cannot be taken or followed as authority upon the interpretation to be placed upon our later juvenile court legislation.

When we turn from these decisions of our own courts dealing with the objects and purpose of juvenile court laws, we find a wealth of learning grouped and still growing around the statutory efforts of nearly every state in the union to adequately deal with the problem of juvenile dependence and delinquency through the establishment and operation of juvenile courts; and while, as we have stated, there was some disposition in the earlier decisions of the courts of certain states to give strict application of the constitutional safeguards of trial by jury and due process of law to proceedings before the juvenile courts, and to hold that the proceedings in the cases of minors brought before such courts were criminal in their nature, the main trend of modern authority has been away from this viewpoint, and has been distinctly and almost universally in the direction pointed out by this court in the early Case of Ah Peen, supra, and emphasized in its later decisions above noted. It would be impractical to comment upon or even to cite all of the cases within this increasing volume of authority, but a few of the more recent apt and striking cases involving almost the precise situation and contentions presented in the instant case may well be referred to.

In the case of Ex parte Januszewski (C. C.) 196 Fed. 123, the facts were almost identical with those of the case at bar, and the questions presented were the same except that the contention in that case was that the Juvenile Court Law of the state of Ohio was unconstitutional, as contravening the provisions of the federal Constitution relating to the right of trial by jury and to due process of law. The court, upon quite a full review of the decisions of the various states interpreting juvenile court laws, held that there was no merit in the contention, since the delinquent child was not being charged or tried before the juvenile court with the commission of a crime, but merely with being a delinquent minor, whose incorrigibility consisted in the fact that he had shot at another with intent to kill. The court said:

> "He was not charged with, or tried for, or convicted of, or imprisoned for the crime of shooting with intent to kill. The evidence offered in the juvenile court must have shown that he shot as charged in the affidavit, but as he was charged with and tried for a species of delinquency only, such evidence could not by any known rule be used in such hearing to convict him of the crime of shooting with intent to kill. The only office which it could perform was to establish the particular kind of delinquency alleged. His commitment was not designed as and is not a punishment for crime, but to place him under suitable guardianship for proper care and discipline until he is reformed, or arrives at the age of majority. Nor is the industrial school a prison (Prescott v.

State, 19 Ohio St. 184, 2 Am. Rep. 388), or the purpose of juvenile act punishment [citing numerous cases]. The object of the industrial school is the reformation of those committed to its charge. * * * Its inmates receive such education and are instructed in such branches of industry, agricultural or mechanical, or otherwise, as the board of trustees may determine; the reformation of such inmates and their preparation for usefulness being always kept in view. * * * The purpose of the statute is to save minors under the age of 17 years from prosecution and conviction on charges of misdemeanors and crimes, and to relieve them from the consequent stigma attaching thereto; to guard and protect them against themselves and evil minded persons surrounding them; to protect and train them physically, mentally, and morally. It seeks to benefit, not only the child, but the community also, by surrounding the child with better and more elevating influences and training it in all that counts for good citizenship and usefulness as a member of society. Under it the state, which through its appropriate organs is the guardian of the children within its borders (Van Walters v. Board, 132 Ind. 569, 32 N. E. 568, 18 L. R. A. 431), assumes the custody of the child, imposes wholesome restraints, and performs parental duties, and at a time when the child is not entitled, either by the laws of nature or of the state, to absolute freedom, but is subjected to the restraint and custody of a natural or legally constituted guardian to whom it owes obedience and subjection. It is of the same nature as statutes which authorize compulsory education of children, the binding of them out during minority, the appointment of guardians and trustees to take charge of the property of those who are incapable of managing their own affairs, the confinement of the insane, and the like. The welfare of society requires and justifies such enactments. The statute is neither criminal nor penal in its nature, but an administrative police regulation."

This comprehensive view of the scope and purposes of juvenile court laws is fully in harmony with the most enlightened views of the various state courts upon the same subject. An example of this is to be found in the case of Commonwealth v. Fisher, 213 Pa. 48, 62 Atl. 198, 5 Ann. Cas. 92, wherein the same contentions were made as to the unconstitutionality of the Pennsylvania statute, providing courts for the care, treatment, and control of juvenile delinquents under the age of 16 years. In disposing of the question as to whether the act in question is violative of the provisions of the Pennsylvania Constitution providing that "the right to trial by jury shall remain inviolate," the court says:

"There was no trial for any crime here, and the act is operative only when there is to be no trial. The very purpose of the act is to prevent a trial, though, if the welfare of the public require that the minor should be tried, power to try it is not taken away; * * * but, as already stated, the act is not for the trial of a child charged with a crime, but is mercifully to save it from such an ordeal, with the prison or penitentiary in its wake, if the child's own good and the best interests of the state justify such salvation. Whether the child deserves to be saved by the state is no more a question for a jury than whether the father, if able to save it, ought to save it. * * * The act is but an exercise by the state of its supreme power over the welfare of its children."

And in conclusion the court says:

"Every statute which is designed to give protection, care and training to children, as a needed substitute for parental authority and performance of parental duty, is but a recognition of the duty of the state, as the legitimate guardian and protector of children where other guardianship fails. No constitutional right is violated, but one of the most important duties which organized society owes to its helpless members is performed just in the measure that the law is framed with wisdom and is carefully administered. The conclusions above expressed are in accordance with adjudications elsewhere with but very few exceptions" (citing many cases).

In the case of State ex rel. Olsen v. Brown, 50 Minn. 353, 52 N. W. 935, 16 L. R. A. 691, 36 Am. St. Rep. 651, the Supreme Court of that state, in commenting upon the case of People v. Turner, 55 Ill. 281, 8 Am. Rep. 645, which is strongly relied upon by the petitioner herein, shows that it is one of the few exceptional cases upon the subject under review, and that it is contrary to the main current of authority upon the subject, and is expressly disapproved in that case. In the case of Mill v. Brown, 31 Utah, 473, 88 Pac. 609, 120 Am. St. Rep. 935, certain other of the cases cited and relied upon by the petitioner herein are commented upon and shown to be contrary to the main current of modern authority. Without further citation of cases, it may be stated that the almost universal trend of modern cases is in the direction of upholding the constitutionality of juvenile court laws as against assaults upon their validity based upon the grounds urged by the petitioner and his counsel in the instant case.

[2-4] But one remaining contention of the petitioner herein requires attention. It is that the judge of the juvenile court made no finding to the effect that the parents of the minor were incapable of providing for, or had failed or neglected to provide, proper maintenance, training, and education for such minor, and that such finding is required by the provisions of section 9b of the Juvenile Court Law, and that, in the absence of such finding, no ward of the juvenile court shall be taken from the custody of his parent or legal guardian. An examination of that section of the act, however, shows that such finding is by its express terms rendered unnecessary if the court shall find "that the welfare of such person requires that his custody be taken from said parent or guardian." The judge of the juvenile court, in this case, did expressly make this latter finding, and if it be claimed that there was no evidence before the said magistrate to support such finding, the answer is twofold: First, that we have not the evidence taken by such magistrate before us; second, that it is expressly found by said magistrate that there was testimony before him showing that the minor had committed the crime of willful murder, which in itself would not only be sufficient, under the terms of subdivision 13 of section 1 of said act to require that said minor be made a ward of said court, but would suffice to furnish some evidence that said minor had passed beyond parental control. To the argument of counsel for the petitioner that the said minor is entitled to a trial by jury in order to vindicate his character and good name, it may be answered that a minor has in that regard no other greater right than an adult has; and that an adult has no inherent right to a trial by jury until such time as the penal processes of the law are put in motion toward his punishment for an alleged crime. The processes of the Juvenile Court Law are, as we have seen, not penal in character, and hence said minor has no inherent right to a trial by jury in the course of the application of their beneficial and merciful provisions to his case.

MARR et al. v. MARR et al. (L. A. 8223.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 21, 1924. As Modified Aug. 30, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑277—Order denying new trial deemed excepted to as final decision.

Order denying motion for new trial is deemed excepted to, under Code Civ. Proc. § 647; such order being a final decision and determining rights of parties so far as they were involved in that particular proceeding, and word "decisions," as used in section 646, including both orders and rulings.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Decision.]

2. Appeal and error 🔑780(1) — Appeal not dismissed because limited to order denying motion for new trial.

That appellant by his bill of exceptions saw fit to limit scope of review on appeal to order denying a new trial presented no grounds for dismissal thereof, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 956.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Winifred F. Marr against the Southern California Gas Company and others, in which the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank and others intervene. Judgment for defendants and interveners, and plaintiff appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Motion denied.

Winifred F. Marr, in pro. per.

O'Melveny, Milliken, Tuller & Macniel, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the appellant has not filed her transcript upon appeal within the time allowed by law. In support of the motion respondents show by affidavits and by the certificate of the clerk of the trial court that the time has elapsed for the preparation and filing of a transcript under the so-called alternative method, and that no proceedings have been instituted by the appellant therefor, and they show further "that no bill of exceptions to said judgment or to any proceeding at said trial has been settled or filed, and that no proceeding for the settlement of any such bill of exceptions is now pending or has ever been instituted." In response thereto appellant contends that a bill of exceptions for use upon this appeal has in fact been settled, and that the time allowed her by law for the filing of a transcript thereafter had not expired at the time this motion was made.

The record before us shows that a paper purporting to be a "bill of exceptions on order denying plaintiff's motion for new trial" was in fact settled and allowed by the trial court herein as a bill of exceptions, and if this does constitute in fact and in legal effect a bill of exceptions, which may properly be used upon this appeal from the judgment, the appellant is not in default, and the motion must be denied. The purported bill of exceptions is very brief. It recites the coming on of the case for trial, the trial thereof before the court without a jury, the making and filing of findings of fact, conclusions of law, and judgment thereon against the plaintiff, the service and filing by plaintiff of notice of intention to move for a new trial, with a copy of the notice of intention, the setting of the same for hearing, the making of said motion for new trial and argument thereof, and that the same was argued and denied; the minute order thereon being as follows:

> "Motion for new trial comes on for hearing, plaintiff appearing in propria persona, and Paul E. Schwab et al. for defendant. Motion for new trial is argued and denied."

It recites the service of notice of the order denying the new trial, an order extending plaintiff's time within which to prepare and serve a bill of exceptions to be used upon appeal from the judgment, the preparation and service of this proposed bill of exceptions, and the certificate of the trial judge certified that "the foregoing bill of exceptions is settled and allowed as correct."

As stated above, the sole question necessary to be decided upon this motion is whether or not this constitutes a bill of exceptions, and such a bill as may properly be used upon this appeal from the judgment. It is respondents' contention that the so-called bill of exceptions is not in fact a bill of exceptions at all, and should be disregarded, for the reason that there is nothing in the alleged bill showing that the appellant excepted to the order denying the motion for a new trial. Respondents contend that since the amendment of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 209) to section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which took away the right of appeal from an order denying a motion for new trial, it has been necessary for the party against whom such an order was made, if present at the making thereof, to expressly except thereto in order to have the correctness thereof reviewed upon appeal. Section 646, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that "the exception must be taken at the time the decision is made, except as provided in section six hundred and forty-seven," which provides that "the verdict of the jury, the final decision in an action or proceeding, an interlocutory order or decision, finally determining the rights of the parties, or some of them, an order or decision from which an appeal may be taken, * * * are deemed to have been excepted to."

[1] Respondents say that prior to the 1915 amendment an order denying a motion for new trial was deemed excepted to solely because of the circumstance that it was an appealable order. But we are of the opinion that it is also comprised within the phrase "the final decision in an action or proceeding." A motion for a new trial is a new and independent proceeding in a sense collateral to the action which terminated in the judgment. 1 Hayne on New Trial, § 2. The order denying such motion, when duly made and properly entered in the minutes of the court, is the final decision in that proceeding, and is one which finally determines the rights of the parties, in so far as they are involved in that particular proceeding. Nothing else remains to be done thereafter, either by the court or the parties, in so far as the finality of that proceeding in the trial court is concerned. It is true that this court, in Railroad Co. v. Superior Court, 105 Cal. 84, 38 Pac. 627, held that an order denying a new trial is deemed to have been excepted to for the reason that an appeal might be taken therefrom. But the court did not thereby decide that such an order was not at the same time a final decision in a proceeding. Having found that the circumstance that the order was appealable was in itself sufficient to preserve the exception the court had no occasion to examine the remaining provisions of section 647.

It is true that in sections 951, 952, and 963, Code of Civil Procedure, the ruling upon motion for new trial is referred to as an order, but that the final decision in a proceeding may be embraced in an order is witnessed by the fact that such is usually if not invariably the case in proceedings for the writs of habeas corpus, mandamus and prohibition. The word "decisions," as used in section 646, Code of Civil Procedure, plainly includes both orders and rulings. It is true that it has been repeatedly held that an order granting a motion for nonsuit cannot be reviewed upon appeal, unless excepted to and assigned as error. But the cases so holding were, with one exception, decided prior to the amendment in 1897 (St. 1897, p. 98) to section 581, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that such an order, when entered upon the minutes of the court, is "effective for all purposes." Prior to that amendment an order granting a motion for a nonsuit did not terminate the action unless and until it was followed by a judgment of dismissal. The case of Hanna v. DeGarmo, 140 Cal. 172, 73 Pac. 830, which was decided since the adoption of that amendment, followed the rule of the previous decisions; the significance of the amendment not having been brought to the attention of the court.

[2] Nine years have elapsed since the amendment to section 963, which took away the right of appeal from an order denying a motion for new trial, and, so far as we are advised, this is the first time that the contention has been made that one of the effects of that amendment was to require the express reservation of an exception to such order. This circumstance is, of course, in no way conclusive, but it is strongly persuasive to the conclusion that the bar of the state has with practical unanimity placed a construction upon section 647, Code of Civil Procedure, which is at variance with respondents' contention. We conclude therefore, that the bill of exceptions herein forms a sufficient basis for the review of the order denying appellant's motion for a new trial. Such order may be reviewed upon an appeal from the judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 956. The fact that appellant has seen fit to thus limit the scope of the review upon appeal presents no ground for a dismissal of her appeal.

The motion is denied.

PEOPLE v. BAENDER. (Cr. 1155.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 1, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 28, 1924.)

1. Forgery 🔑15—Title held not in defendant, so as to prevent deed constituting forgery.

Where defendant intended that property should be conveyed to his brother-in-law, and represented that title was in the brother-in-law, and though, as claimed, he intentionally had the brother-in-law's name misspelled, he was never known by the name as so misspelled, and never pretended it was his name, the title was not in him under a fictitious name, so as to permit him to execute a deed in that name, or have another do so without the deed being a forged deed, within Pen. Code, § 115.

2. Forgery 🔑15—Deed signed by persons impersonating grantee and wife held "forgery" within penal statute.

Where grantor had land deeded to his brother-in-law, who knew nothing about it, a deed reconveying the property, signed and acknowledged by persons impersonating the grantees, the woman using a fictitious first name for the wife, constituted a forgery, within Pen. Code, § 115, making it a felony to offer for filing, a false or forged deed, in view of section 470, defining forgery.

3. Forgery 🔑12(1)—Of instrument void on its face is impossible.

There can be no forgery of an instrument void on its face.

4. Forgery 🔑12(3)—Deed subject to forgery, though purporting to convey land not owned by grantor.

A deed valid on its face may be the subject of forgery, though it purports to convey property to which named grantor had no title.

5. Forgery 🔑14—That grantee be actually defrauded by forged deed is unnecessary.

That grantee should be actually defrauded is unnecessary, if in fact a forged deed might possibly deceive another and was prepared with intent to deceive and defraud another.

6. Divorce 🔑254—Life estate, awarded wife by interlocutory decree, becomes operative, if decree is not reversed or modified on appeal.

While entry of interlocutory decree of divorce awarding life estate in property to wife vests no present interest, the life estate being merely inchoate, such estate becomes operative, if the decree is not reversed or modified, on appeal.

7. Forgery 🔑15—Defendant held to have procured forged deed to be recorded.

Where escrow instructions signed by defendant authorized title company to record forged deed placed by him in escrow when agreement for exchange was complied with, and he gave oral instructions to the same effect, he offered or procured the forged deed to be recorded, within Pen. Code, § 115.

8. Forgery 🔑44(1)—Evidence held to show defendant's knowledge that deed offered for filing was forged.

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 115, for offering forged instrument for record, evidence held to show that defendant knew the deed in question was false or forged.

9. Forgery 🔑15—Statute held to apply to deed properly acknowledged and expressing consideration, regardless of defective form.

Pen. Code, § 115, making offering of forged instruments for filing a felony, when instrument, if genuine, might be filed or registered, held applicable to a deed properly acknowledged in form, expressing valuable consideration, regardless of defective form or certification.

10. Forgery 🔑37—Forged deed is admissible in prosecution for offering for record.

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 115, for offering forged deed for record, the deed, which was false and forged, and the subject of the prosecution, was admissible.

11. Forgery 🔑38—Witnesses 🔑191—Judgment in divorce decree, and letter to wife after forgery, held admissible to show intent to defraud.

In prosecution for offering a forged deed for record, judgment and findings in divorce decree awarding wife a life estate in the property involved, and defendant's letter to her shortly after the crime, joking about trouble she would have over her life estate, held admissible to show intent to defraud the wife.

12. Witnesses 🔑52(1, 2)—Letter from husband to wife not inadmissible.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, relative to testimony by wife for or against husband, did not render inadmissible letter from husband to wife in connection with testimony of third person, where the wife did not testify concerning the letter.

13. Forgery 🔑15—Whether deed vested title in grantees held immaterial.

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 115, for offering a forged deed for record, whether the deed passed or vested title in the grantees held immaterial, and instructions on that question properly refused.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

Charles L. Baender was convicted of offering for filing a false and forged deed, and he appeals from the judgment and order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Milton E. D'Askquith, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Ezra W. Decoto, Dist. Atty., and Chas. Wade Snook, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Oakland, for the People.

KNIGHT, J. The defendant, Charles L. Baender, was charged by indictment with having knowingly procured and offered for filing in the office of the county recorder of Alameda county a false and forged deed. Upon that charge he was tried and convicted, and from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial he has appealed.

The indictment was drawn under, and the appellant was prosecuted for a violation of, section 115 of the Penal Code, which provides that:

> "Every person who knowingly procures or offers any false or forged instrument to be filed, registered, or recorded in any public office within the state, which instrument, if genuine, might be filed, or registered, or recorded under any law of this state or of the United States, is guilty of a felony."

Section 470 of the Penal Code defining forgery, in so far as it applies to this case, provides that:

> "Every person who, with intent to defraud, signs the name of another person, or of a fictitious person, knowing [at the time] he has no authority so to do, * * * is guilty of forgery."

One of the main contentions of appellant on this appeal is that the deed in question was not a false and forged instrument within the meaning of said Code section defining forgery. The facts disclosed by the record are as follows:

The real property described in the deed in question had been the community property of Baender and his wife for a number of years. In 1919 the property was about to be sold under execution by the sheriff, and in order to save it Baender requested one Schyler, with whom he had been and was then associated in a business transaction, to bid in said property at the sheriff's sale. This was done, and when the business relation existing between Schyler and Baender was ended Baender requested Schyler to convey the property to his brother-in-law, G. F. Gillelen, of Los Angeles; the latter being married to Baender's sister, whose name was Matilda A. Gillelen. Schyler executed the deed accordingly, except that the surname of the grantee was misspelled at Baender's request, for reasons which will hereinafter appear. The Gillelens of Los Angeles paid no consideration for the property, and in fact knew nothing about this transaction; but Baender's wife had full knowledge thereof. The deed was delivered to Baender. Thereafter, on August 11, 1921, Mrs. Baender was granted an interlocutory decree of divorce, by the terms of which the property in question was declared to be community property, and upon stipulation Mrs. Baender was awarded a life estate therein. Subsequent to the date of the granting of said decree, Baender, without the knowledge of his wife, opened negotiations with a real estate firm, named Faustina & Pelton, for an exchange of properties. An agreement was eventually reached whereby Baender agreed to exchange the property in question for other real property and a cash bonus of $700. During the course of those dealings Baender represented several times to Faustina & Pelton that his property stood in the names of his brother-in-law and sister of Los Angeles, and that they would come from Los Angeles to sign the deed.

On the morning of November 22, 1921, Baender appeared before J. F. Holm, a notary public in Oakland, accompanied by a man and woman, whom he introduced to Holm as Mr. and Mrs. Gillelen from Los Angeles. He requested Holm to prepare for their execution a deed to said property. Holm declined to draw the deed, and the parties left with the understanding that they would have the deed drawn elsewhere and return to Holm's office that afternoon to execute the same before him as notary public. That afternoon Baender returned to Holm's office, accompanied by the man, but not by the woman. He explained to Holm that the woman whom he referred to as Mrs. Gillelen was ill, and requested that Holm take her acknowledgment over the phone; she having already signed the deed in the name of "Ada M. Gillelen." Holm did so, and thereupon the man signed the deed and acknowledged the same as "G. F. Gillellen." By that deed said property was at the request of Faustina & Pelton conveyed to one Charles Baumann. The deed was then delivered to Baender. Pursuant to the exchange agreement Baender on December 1, 1921, delivered said deed, together with the Schyler to Gillellen deed and with certain written escrow instructions to the Alameda County Title Company, who were acting also in the matter for the other parties to the exchange. When the transaction was ready to be concluded, the title company upon the strength of the representations made by Baender, supported by the recitals in the notarial certificate to the effect that the Gillelens of Los Angelos had signed the deed, issued title insurance upon the Baender property, and thereafter, pursuant to said escrow instructions, carried out the necessary legal requirements to consummate the exchange of the properties, including the filing for record on December 5, 1921, of the Gillellen to Baumann deed. The evidence further shows that on or about January 31, 1922, about seven weeks subsequent to the attempted disposal of the property in question, the appellant mailed Mrs. Baender the following letter:

> "Lately.
> "Mrs. Baender: I have this day deposited for you $30.00 in the State Savings Bank, 13th and Franklin streets, for the children.
> "I hear that you and your lawyers are having a little fun all to yourselves over some property on 20th street. Am I right?
> "Well, enjoy yourself while you are still young. I really believe that life estate of yours can be made the source of a real and constant pleasure for you, Albert, and your lawyers. You will have entertainment for several years. Charlie."

Following the receipt of that letter it was discovered that the man who executed the deed to Baumann was not Gillelen, the brother-in-law of Baender, and that the woman who also signed said deed was not Baender's sister. They were strangers whose services were procured by Baender for the very purpose of impersonating his relatives in the matter of effecting a transfer of the title to said property. The Gillelens of Los Angeles, as a matter of fact, knew nothing about the transaction until some time after it had occurred. Baender's indictment and arrest followed.

We are of the opinion that the evidence above narrated, when considered along with the additional evdence which will be hereinafter set forth, establishes a violation of the Code section under which the appellant was charged and is sufficient in law to sustain the judgment of conviction. Section 115 of the Penal Code was obviously designed to prevent the recordation or registration of spurious documents, which were knowingly offered for record with intent to defraud. The evidence here briefly stated shows that, in order to avoid the demands of creditors the appellant, with full knowledge on the part of his wife, with whom he was then apparently on friendly terms, caused the title to their community property to be placed in the name of his brother-in-law, and thereafter, and after the wife had obtained an interlocutory judgment of divorce, and had on stipulation by that interlocutory judgment been awarded a life estate in said community property, he endeavored to defeat said life estate by disposing of the property, and in order to accomplish that purpose he procured strangers to impersonate his brother-in-law and his sister in the execution of the deed by which the disposal was made.

[1] Appellant's contention that said deed was not false and forged is based upon the assertion that Schyler conveyed the property to him, that at his request he took title under the fictitious name of "G. F. Gillellen," and that having thus taken title in such name he was vested with full authority to use that name in divesting himself of title, either by signing that name personally, or by procuring another to sign it for him. In this respect appellant testified that in spelling the name of his brother-in-law it properly contained but three "ls"—G-i-l-l-e-l-e-n—but that he purposely caused the name of the grantee in said deed to be spelled with four "ls," so that such grantee would in fact be a fictitious person, thereby allowing him, the appellant, as the fictitious Gillellen, to reconvey the property in that name. In support of such contention appellant cites the cases of Emery v. Kipp, 154 Cal. 83, 97 Pac. 17, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 983, 129 Am. St. Rep. 141, 16 Ann. Cas. 955, and Wilson v. White, 84 Cal. 242, 24 Pac. 114, which he claims legally justified the course adopted by him in transferring the title to such property. Those cases hold to the doctrine that if a person is in existence and ascertained, a conveyance to or by him by a fictitious name passes title. But upon examination of those cases, and the cases cited by them, it will be seen that the doctrine there applied is founded upon the established fact that the particular person named as grantee was known and identified by such fictitious name, either by having voluntarily assumed the same or by having been generally known by such name. In other words, the doctrine contended for by appellant is applied where there is a concurrence of identity in person and in name. For instance, in Wilson v. White, supra, it is said:

> "It is involved in the very conception of a deed that there must be a grantee, to whom delivery is made, and in whom the title can vest. If there be no grantee, and the deed is to a mere fictitious name, it is obvious that it is a nullity. But if there be a person in existence, and identified, and delivery is made to him, it makes no difference by what name he is called. He may assume a name for the occasion, and a conveyance to and by him under such name will pass the title."

And again, in Blinn v. Chessman, 49 Minn. 140, 51 N. W. 666, 32 Am. St. Rep. 536, quoted approvingly in Emery v. Kipp, supra, the court says:

> "The name is not the person, but only a means of designating a person intended; and where one assumes and comes to be known by another name than that which he properly bears, that name may be effectually employed for the purpose of designating him."

That is not the situation here. The evidence in the case at bar proves beyond question, we think, that the grantee specified in said deed was intended to be and in fact was G. F. Gillelen of Los Angeles, the brother-in-law of appellant, and not the appellant, and it further shows that throughout this entire transaction appellant consistently so claimed and represented to all of those with whom he was dealing. According to the undisputed facts, appellant never was known as, nor did he pretend to be, G. F. Gillellen, the party named as the grantee in the Schyler deed. They were always known and treated as separate individuals. He was personally known to all of the parties to this transaction—Schyler, Holm, Faustina & Pelton, and the representatives of the title company—as Baender. Schyler testified that Baender instructed him to deed the property to "Mr. Gillelen, his brother-in-law in Los Angeles." The deed was executed accordingly, describing the grantee as a resident "of the city and county of Los Angeles." During the negotiations for the exchange of the properties Baender represented to Faustina & Pelton that the property stood in the names of his brother-in-law and sister of Los Angeles. When Baender appeared in the office of Holm for the purpose of having him prepare and as notary acknowledge the deed to Baumann, he presented to Holm that the property stood in the names of his brother-in-law and sister of Los Angeles, and he introduced the strangers to Holm as his brother-in-law and sister of Los Angeles, and the deed to Baumann designated "G. F. Gillellen, and Ada M. Gillellen, his wife, of the city of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles," as grantors. After the deed was executed Baender represented to Faustina & Pelton and to the title company that said deed had been signed by the Gillelens of Los Angeles.

[2] That it was the intention of the appellant to transfer the title to the name of his brother-in-law, Gillelen, of Los Angeles, and not to himself, is further supported by appellant's own testimony, wherein he stated that he deposited the Schyler deed in his desk and attached to it written instructions to the effect that in the event of his (appellant's) death, the deed should be delivered to his brother-in-law, G. F. Gillelen, for the purpose of making him trustee to handle the property as he might deem best, and he further explained that he believed that in that situation his brother-in-law, in divesting himself of title, might spell his name both ways, and thereby overcome the misspelling of the name in the Schyler deed. It will therefore be seen that because of the dissimilarity in facts, as above pointed out, between those cases relied upon by appellant and the facts of the instant case, the doctrine of those cases is not available to appellant. And it being manifest that the person named as grantee in the Schyler deed was intended to be and in fact was G. F. Gillelen, of Los Angeles, the brother-in-law of appellant, the signing of the latter's name by another to the deed in question, and the impersonation of him in the acknowledgment thereof, constituted said deed a false and forged instrument, within the meaning of the Code section above quoted. Even were it possible to reach a conclusion different from the one stated, so far as the name of the grantor in the deed is concerned, we are still confronted with the situation that the appellant also procured a woman to impersonate the wife of G. F. Gillelen and had her sign and acknowledge said deed in the fictitious name of "Ada M. Gillellen." The name of appellant's sister was Matilda A. Gillelen. The conveyance was not made to Ada M. Gillelen, nor was there any one identified with the transaction known by that name. Therefore the signing of that fictitious name to said deed for a fraudulent purpose clearly constituted forgery. People v. Chretien, 137 Cal. 450, 70 Pac. 305.

[3, 4] Appellant endeavors to make the question of the investiture of title in Gillelen the pivotal point upon which the commission of the act of forgery turns, claiming that if title was not at any time vested in Gillelen, conceding him to be the person who was named as grantee in the Schyler deed, the crime of forgery was not committed. This contention is based upon the theory that no title was ever acquired by Gillelen, for the reason that the Schyler deed was never delivered to or accepted by him, and he paid no consideration for the property; that if Gillelen possessed no title he consequently had none to convey, and that therefore any deed which Gillelen might have made purporting to convey title would have been void. To this state of facts appellant attempts to apply the rule that there can be no forgery of a void instrument.

We are of the opinion that the question of the investiture of title in Gillelen is not material. The respondent does not claim that Gillelen even acquired title, and we think it matters little whether or not he did. It is doubtless the law that there can be no forgery of an instrument which is void upon its face. People v. Tomlinson, 35 Cal. 506. But this was not such a deed. Upon its face this deed was valid. It purported to be the deed of Gillelen who by virtue of the Schyler conveyance had become the record owner of the property, and whose deed, if genuine, would have formed a material link in the chain of title from Schyler through Gillelen to Baumann. That being so, Gillelen's deed would be the subject of forgery, even though it may have conveyed no title, for the rule is well established that "a deed may be the subject of such a crime [forgery], and in that case it is immaterial that the deed purports to grant land to which the grantor named had no title." People v. Van Alstine, 57 Mich. 69, 23 N. W. 594; Abston v. State, 134 Tenn. 604, 185 S. W. 706. To the same effect are West v. State, 22 N. J. Law, 212; Henderson v. State, 14 Tex. 503, and authorities therein cited.

[5] Nor was it necessary, in order to establish forgery, to prove that Gillelen or any other person was actually defrauded, if in fact it be shown that said deed might possibly deceive another, and was prepared with the intent to deceive and defraud another. People v. Turner, 113 Cal. 278, 45 Pac. 331; Henderson v. State, supra. In Henderson v. State, supra, it was said:

> "The intent to defraud, it is true, is of the essence of the crime. But it is not essential that any person be actually defrauded, or that any act be done towards the attainment of the fruits of the crime other than the making of the instrument. And the very fact of the forgery iself will be sufficient to imply an intention to defraud, or at least it will be sufficient if, from the circumstances of the case, the jury can fairly infer that it was the intention of the party to utter the forged instrument (3 Greenl. Ev. § 103; 3 Arch. Cr. Pl. 546; 2 Russ. on Cr. 361 [7th Am. from 3d London Ed.]), and a fortiori if, as in this case, there is proof that he did utter it. It is well settled, it is true, as held in a case cited by counsel (People v. Shall, 9 Cow. [N. Y.] 778), that the forging of an instrument which on its face is void is not indictable. But that is not this case. The deed on its face appears to be a valid, legal conveyance of land. And it is sufficient that it is such a character of instrument as that the consequences of the forgery would necessarily or possibly be to defraud some person. It is sufficient if it appear that by possibility either the state or some person might be defrauded. Act above cited; 3 Greenl. § 103; 2 Russ. on Cr. 361, note; 2 New Jer. 212."

That the spurious deed in question did actually deceive the title company, and that by its execution appellant intended to defraud his wife of her life estate, is obvious. Acting upon the belief that it was the genuine deed of the Gillelens, the said title company insured the title, and in view of the letter hereinabove set forth, written by appellant to his wife, less than two months after the transaction in question was concluded, there can be but little doubt of his intention to defeat his wife's interest in the property which he had previously stipulated should be awarded to her by said judgment of divorce.

[6] While the entry of such interlocutory decree vested no present interest in the property in Mrs. Baender, the life estate thereby awarded being merely inchoate in character, nevertheless said decree would have become final if not reversed or modified on appeal. The said life estate would have then become operative. Remley v. Remley, 49 Cal. App. 489, 193 Pac. 604, and cases cited. For the reasons stated it must be held that said deed was a false and forged instrument within the meaning of said Code sections.

[7, 8] Appellant further urges that the evidence fails to show that the appellant offered or procured the deed to be recorded or that appellant knew that the deed was false or forged at the time he procured it to be recorded. We find no merit in either point. The written escrow instructions signed by appellant authorized said title company to record said deed when the agreement for exchange was complied with by the other parties to the transaction. These escrow instructions were supplemented by oral instructions given by the appellant to the representatives of the title company to the effect that the representatives of the title company were at liberty to record the deed to the Oakland property when the appellant received from the other parties the money due and the deed to the property to be taken in exchange. The transaction was afterwards consummated accordingly and the Gillelen to Baumann deed was recorded. The evidence already narrated is sufficient answer, we think, to the other point made, that the appellant did not know that the deed in question was false or forged.

[9] The contention made by appellant that there is no proof that the "genuine" counterpart of the alleged forged deed might be recorded, is disposed of by the case of People v. Webber, 44 Cal. App. 120, 186 Pac. 406, where it is held that section 115 of the Penal Code, under which this indictment was brought, "simply seeks to cover as coming within its terms the various classes of instruments entitled under our law to be recorded, such as deed, mortgages, etc. without any regard whatever, whether the particular instrument is defective in form or certification. The instrument in question on its face was a deed properly acknowledged in form expressing a valuable consideration and therefore an instrument which if genuine was entitled to be recorded under the laws of this state."

[10-12] Appellant also complains of the rulings of the trial court in admitting in evidence the deed in question, the letter from Baender to his wife, and the judgment and findings in the Baender divorce proceeding. The deed, being false and forged and being the very subject of the prosecution, was clearly admissible in evidence, and the other exhibits referred to were properly admitted as evidence upon the subject of intent to defraud. The provisions of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure do not operate to exclude said letter from evidence in connection with the testimony of A. T. McDonald, the attorney for Mrs. Baender. Mrs. Baender did not testify concerning said letter. People v. Swaile, 12 Cal. App. 195, 107 Pac. 134.

There was no error committed by the court in the impanelment of the jury, for the reason that the record does not show that any of the jurors who tried said cause had been discharged as such within a year.

[13] The final contention of the appellant is that the court's instructions to the jury were erroneous and that it erred in refusing to give certain instructions proposed by the appellant. Appellant's objections cover some 24 instructions, and for that reason it is impracticable in this opinion to discuss the rulings of the court on each separate instruction. We have examined the court's charge, and also the instructions offered by the appellant, which were by the court refused, and it is our opinion that the jury was fairly, fully, and clearly instructed on all legal matters involved. Many of the instructions proposed by the appellant, and which were by the court refused, related to the question of the passing and vesting title in connection with the delivery of deeds. As heretofore stated, that question was not material in determining the guilt of the defendant, and those instructions were therefore properly refused. The other instructions refused either misstated the law or assumed facts not in evidence. The indictment conforms to all requirements of the law, and the demurrer was properly overruled.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

I concur: TYLER, P. J.

BURKS v. WEAST. (Civ. 2766.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷1170(3)—Court's refusal to strike amended complaint, filed without leave, held harmless error.

Court's refusal to strike amended complaint filed without leave of court, if error, held not to authorize reversal, under Code Civ. Proc. § 475, and Const. art. 6, § 4½, where defendant had notice of real cause of action, and amended complaint was filed in ample time to enable him to make complete defense.

2. Appeal and error ⚷1041(2) — Filing of amended complaint, without notice to defendant, held not ground for reversal.

Defendant is not prejudiced by failure of plaintiff to give notice of filing amended complaint, if it appears by record that motion for leave to file such complaint should have been granted.

3. Judgment ⚷577(1) — Judgment against corporation after it has ceased to exist held a nullity.

Judgment against corporation, after it had ceased to exist, for amount of supplies furnished it, was a nullity, and did not bar action against president of board of directors on same cause of action.

4. Associations ⚷16 — Persons associating without formality held personally liable for supplies purchased by manager, irrespective of interest to become so liable.

Defendant and others, who simply proceeded to conduct restaurant and reading room without any formality whatsoever, were subject to liabilities of voluntary association and were severally liable to creditors for such obligations as might be incurred by manager in purchase of supplies, even though creditors gave credit to name of association, and defendant and his associates did not agree or intend to become personally liable.

5. Interest ⚷47(1)—Interest on account for goods sold held allowable only from beginning of suit, where no demand made prior thereto.

In an action for balance due on goods sold defendant, court erred in allowing interest from date of delivery of last item of goods, instead of from commencement of suit, in view of Usury Law, ratified November 5, 1918, § 1, where no demand was made for amount claimed until beginning of suit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by J. R. Burks against F. A. Weast. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Leslie K. Floyd and E. H. Zion, both of Modesto, for appellant.

J. M. Walthall and Edward T. Taylor, Jr., both of Modesto, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. The plaintiff's cause of action is based upon an assigned claim of the Modesto Package Company against the defendant for the sum of $1,521.79, alleged to be the balance due for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered to the Modesto Coffee Club during the year 1920. Plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant appeals.

The cause of action is set forth in an amended complaint containing two counts, in which it is alleged that L. C. Black, doing business under the fictitious name of Modesto Package Company, sold and delivered to the defendant, operating under the name of the Modesto Coffee Club, goods, wares, and merchandise of the value of the sum above stated. The assignment of the claim by the Modesto Package Company to the plaintiff is properly set forth in the amended complaint.

[1, 2] In the original complaint filed by the plaintiff it is alleged that the plaintiffs, operating under the name of the Modesto Package Company, sold goods, wares, and merchandise to the defendant in the sum of $1,521.79. After a demurrer had been interposed to this complaint and overruled, the plaintiff filed an amended complaint setting forth his cause of action, as hereinabove stated, and correcting his complaint so as to conform with the actual facts of the transaction. This amended complaint was filed without leave of the court first had and obtained. Thereupon the defendant moved the court to strike said amended complaint from the files in the said action. This motion was denied, and such ruling is assigned by the appellant as his first ground for a reversal herein. The record shows that the defendant had notice of the real cause of action. There is nothing in the record to show that the defendant was in any wise injured by the action of the court. The amended complaint was filed a sufficient length of time preceding the trial to enable the defendant to make a full and complete defense, if any he had. The defendant was served with the amended complaint on the 22d day of September, 1922.

The cause of action did not come on for trial until the 10th day of November, 1922, thus showing that the defendant had ample opportunity to meet all the issues tendered by the amended complaint. It may be further stated that no attempt was made by the defendant in the trial court to set forth other than mere technical objections to the amended complaint, and the chief objection now is that it was filed without notice, and while, apparently, the amended complaint seems to state a different cause of action, in truth and in fact, the record shows that such was not the case. Under such circumstances, we think that the ruling of the Supreme Court in the case of Baker v. S. Cal. R. Co., 114 Cal. 501, 46 Pac. 604, is applicable. It is there stated that, if it appears by the record that motion for leave to file amended complaint should have been granted, defendants are not prejudiced by failure of plaintiffs to give notice. We also think that section 475, Code of Civil Procedure, is determinative of this question. That section sets forth, in substance, that "the court must, in every stage of an action, disregard any error, * * * or defect, in the pleadings or proceedings which, in the opinion of said court, does not affect the substantial rights of the parties." An examination of the record shows that the ruling of the court, even if admitted to be error, did not result in a miscarriage of justice, and therefore does not authorize or warrant a reversal of the judgment. See section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution.

It appears from the transcript in this case that some time during the year 1909 a number of citizens, residents of the city of Modesto, organized a corporation, named the Modesto Coffee Club, for the purpose of establishing, maintaining, and operating restaurants, coffee clubs, lunch places, reading rooms, and other places of recreation where refreshments may be served, and people allowed to congregate, etc. This corporation began business in the city of Modesto and continued to operate as such, and continued to function as a corporation, until some time during the month of March, 1915, when by reason of failure of said corporation to pay the franchise tax levied against it by the act, approved on April 1, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 530), said corporation forfeited its charter and ceased to exist as a legal entity. It also further appears from the transcript that pursuant to a notice, by way of advertisement to all people interested in the coffee club, a meeting was had, at which the defendant and six others were elected directors of the Modesto Coffee Club. The date of this election is not definitely fixed, but appears to have been at some time in 1918. The board so elected proceeded to employ one Mrs. Walters as manager of the coffee club, and thereafter proceeded to conduct a restaurant, reading room, and place where people might congregate under the name of the Modesto Coffee Club, and continued to do so during the times mentioned in plaintiff's complaint, and in the conduct of said business the said Walters who had been employed by the defendant and the six other persons constituting the so-called board of directors, bought the goods, wares, and merchandise constituting the cause of complaint in this action, and used said supplies in the conduct and management of the business of said coffee club. The defendant in this action acted as president of the board of directors and appears to have taken the most active part in the management of the business of said coffee club, so far as the board of directors was concerned. A portion of the time checks was issued by the coffee club, signed only by the manager, and a portion of the time checks issued by the coffee club was countersigned by the defendant, as president thereof. The business of the club did not prove to be self supporting, and various suits were begun to collect the amounts due for supplies furnished thereto.

[3] It appears from the transcript that the plaintiff in this action first sued the Modesto Coffee Club as a corporation and obtained judgment by default for the identical sum sued for in this action, and it is now claimed by the appellant that that judgment is a bar to this proceeding. The record, however, shows that the action was not begun until long after the Modesto Coffee Club had ceased to exist as a corporation and therefore the judgment obtained against it by default was simply a nullity, or, as stated in the case of Cal. Nat. Sup. Co. v. Flack, 183 Cal. 124, 90 Pac. 634:

> "A judgment obtained against a corporation in an action on a promissory note after the corporation has failed to pay its taxes is not a bar to a subsequent action against the directors as trustees, since such nonpayment ipso facto terminates the corporate existence. A judgment rendered against a defunct corporation in an action brought after the forfeiture of its charter is void."

This case cites a number of other cases in which the same points were involved and where the same holding was had. This effectually disposes of appellant's contention, relative to the judgment had against the Modesto Coffee Club as a corporation. After the discovery by the plaintiff of the noncorporate existence of the Modesto Coffee Club, the present action was instituted against the defendant to obtain judgment against him upon his personal liability for the goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered to him and to his so-called codirectors, doing business under the name of the Modesto Coffee Club. In this behalf it is insisted on the part of the appellant that the goods were sold to the Modesto Coffee Club, and not to the defendant.

[4] It does not appear from the transcript that the defendant and the others with whom he was associated entered into any agreement or contract between themselves relative to the business they were about to conduct, but that they simply proceeded and continued to conduct a restaurant and place of business under the name of the Modesto Coffee Club, without any formality whatsoever. This, we think, places them in a position and subjects them to the liabilities of a voluntary association, irrespective of whatever name they may assume in the conduct of their business, or whether the business is conducted without formally assuming any name. Nor does it matter whether they agreed to or intended to become liable for the costs and expenses of maintaining the club in question. When they assumed to conduct a club and manage it, under the name above designated, we think they severally became liable to creditors for such obligations as might be incurred by the manager selected by them in the purchase of supplies wherewith to conduct the business they had undertaken, and this is true, even though the parties selling and delivering the supplies gave credit to the name of the association under which the business was being conducted.

This very question has been decided in a number of cases. In Bennett v. Lathrop, 71 Conn. 613, 42 Atl. 634, 71 Am. St. Rep. 222, the Supreme Court of Connecticut holds:

> "The members of a voluntary association are individually liable for an indebtedness incurred in the business for which it was organized, * * * although they did not agree to become, nor did they hold themselves out as, partners, or as personally responsible, and although the creditors gave credit to the associate name."

In Nolan v. McNamee, 82 Wash. 585, 144 Pac. 904, the Supreme Court of Washington holds that:

> "The liability of the members of an association is joint and several, and each member is individually liable for all the debts of the association."

In 5 C. J. 1362, the question of liability is thus stated:

> "While, as between the members of an unincorporated association, each is bound to pay only his numerical proportion of the indebtedness of the concern, yet, as against the creditors, each member is individually liable for the entire debt, provided, of course, the debt is of such a nature and has been so contracted as to be binding on the associates as a whole."

Further on it is stated:

> "An unincorporated association organized for business or profit is in legal effect a mere partnership, so far as the liability of its members to third persons is concerned, and accordingly each member is individually liable as a partner for a debt contracted by the association. * * * This liability for the debts of the association is imposed on each member by law. It arises out of his membership as a necessary incident thereto. It does not depend upon any stipulation in the laws of the society making him thus liable, upon his assent to the contract out of which the debt arises, nor is it necessary that the member should have held himself out as a partner, or that the credit should have been extended to him rather than to the association. But, on the contrary, by becoming a member, he subjects himself to liability for all debts contracted by the association, within the scope of its object and during the period of his membership."

See, also, 3 Cal. Jur. 348.

In Leake v. City of Venice, 50 Cal. App. 462, 195 Pac. 440, 441, the court approved the rule just stated, and on page 465 of the report cited states the law as follows:

> "Each member of an association is liable for the debts thereof incurred during his period of membership, and which have been necessarily contracted for the purpose of carrying out the objects for which the association was formed."

The court also approved of the statement of the law that, where parties are associated and conduct business as an unincorporated association, they are regarded as partners, so far as affects the question of liability for the debts necessarily incurred by the association.

In the case of Webster v. San Joaquin Fruit, etc., Ass'n, 32 Cal. App. 264, 162 Pac. 654, this court had an occasion to pass upon the questions herein involved, and it was there said, in substance, as follows: As against creditors, each member of such an association was individually liable for the entire debt, if the debt were contracted in the course of the business of the association, and, also, that such an association organized for business or profit was in legal effect a mere partnership, so far as liability to third persons was concerned. In that case the defendants, members of the association, were held liable for goods, wares, and merchandise issued to the association during the course of its business. There is no question in the case at bar but that the goods, wares, and supplies furnished by the assignor of the plaintiff were such as were necessary for the conduct of the business of the Modesto Coffee Club and were purchased by the person employed by the defendant and his coassociates to manage the business of said club. The fact that the defendant and his coassociates did not expect to reap any personal profit out of the enterprise in which they were engaged does not in any wise affect their liability. They were engaged in business and had appointed a manager to conduct that business for them, and, to a greater or less extent, exercised supervision over the business being conducted under the name of the Modesto Coffee Club, and in so doing, under the authorities which we have cited, rendered themselves individually liable for all supplies necessarily purchased in the conduct of the business in which they were engaged.

[5] We agree with the appellant that the court erred in the allowance of interest. It appears by computation that interest was allowed from the date of the last item of goods delivered by the assignor of the plaintiff. In so doing we think the court accepted the wrong date for beginning the allowance of interest. On November 5, 1918, the electors of this state ratified and approved what is commonly known as the Usury Law (see St. 1919, p. lxxxiii). Section 1 of that initiative measure reads as follows:

> "The rate of interest upon the loan or forbearance of any money, goods or things in action or on accounts after demand or judgments rendered in any court of this state, shall be seven dollars upon the one hundred dollars for one year. * * *"

No demand is shown to have been made for the amount claimed by the plaintiff until the beginning of suit. It has been frequently held that the beginning of suit constitutes a demand. This action was begun on February 20, 1922. By correcting the computation and taking this date as the period from when interest should be allowed, we find that the judgment allowed the plaintiff was $165.40 in excess of what it should be. It is therefore ordered: First, that the judgment herein be and the same is hereby modified, by deducting therefrom the sum of $165.40; second, that in all other respects the judgment of the trial court be and the same is hereby affirmed.

It is further ordered that the appellant be allowed his costs on appeal.

MADERA SUGAR PINE CO. v. ADAMS et al.

(No. 2749.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 8, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 4, 1924.)

1. Payment 🔑65(6)—Burden on defendant to prove payment where plaintiff proves creation of debt within statute of limitations.

Generally where a plaintiff has proved creation of a debt within period of the statute of limitations, burden is on defendant to prove payment thereof.

2. Payment 🔑68—Burden of proving a particular application of payment is on party claiming that such application was made.

Burden of proving a particular application of a payment by either debtor or creditor is on party claiming that such application was made.

3. Payment 🔑68—Burden of proving facts warranting application of payment on obligation held to rest on claimant.

Where lien claimant had received payment during existence of obligation for which his claim of lien was thereafter filed, without applying it to any particular obligation, burden of proving facts warranting application to some other obligation, in accordance with Civ. Code, § 1479, was upon him, especially where evidence thereof was under his control.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1170(3)—Appellate court unauthorized to reverse judgment for error in defendant's pleadings, where plaintiff not prejudiced thereby.

Appellate court held unauthorized to reverse judgment in a suit to foreclose a lien, because answer was insufficient to support finding that certain payments should be applied to claim sued on, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, where plaintiff's demurrer was not directed specially to objection urged, and case was tried on theory of nonpayment, and both parties produced evidence bearing thereon.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)—Court's failure to find what items of general account were earliest in date of maturity in suit to foreclose lien held not prejudicial.

In a suit to foreclose a lien involving question of application of payments, court's failure to find what items of general account were earliest in date of maturity was not prejudicial, where there was no evidence bearing upon that question, and hence, any finding would necessarily have been against plaintiff; it having burden of proof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by the Madera Sugar Pine Company against David Preston Adams and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fee & Ring, of Madera, for appellant.

Sherwood Green and J. W. Maloy, both of Madera, and Oliver Dibble, of San Francisco, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff sued to foreclose its lien for the value of materials furnished for and used in the construction of certain buildings upon town lots belonging to defendant D. P. Adams. It was given judgment against Adams in the sum of $751.71, which was $1,000 less than the amount claimed to be due, and plaintiff prosecutes this appeal from the judgment.

Munson constructed the buildings in question under an oral contract with Adams, and was paid the full contract price therefor before plaintiff's notice of lien was filed. At different times as needed, from July 6 to October 9, 1922, plaintiff sold Munson materials for and which were used in the construction of the buildings of the total value of $1,751.71. Munson had buildings under construction for four other persons during the same time that he was carrying out the Adams contract, and purchased materials for all of them from plaintiff. Plaintiff entered all charges for materials in a single general account with Munson, designating therein the particular job for which each item was furnished. Payments made by Munson were credited to his account generally, without applying the same to any particular item or to charges for material furnished for any particular job. Munson deposited the moneys received under all his contracts in one general bank account, and drew thereon in payment of bills incurred on any job, regardless of the source from which the moneys then on deposit were received.

The evidence does not show when or in what amounts the plaintiff furnished materials for buildings other than those of Adams, or whether such materials were furnished prior or subsequent to the time that the greater part of the materials for the Adams buildings were furnished. The evidence shows that Munson was indebted to plaintiff prior to the furnishing of any material for the Adams job, but it does not appear in what amount, or whether such indebtedness was subsequently paid prior to the particular payments hereinafter mentioned. In the latter part of July Munson was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of about $3,000; more than $1,000 of which was for materials used on the Adams job, and plaintiff requested Munson to reduce the amount of such indebtedness. The latter replied that he could probably pay something in a few days. On the 1st day of August Adams paid Munson something over $500 on the contract, and thereafter, on the same day, Munson paid plaintiff on account the sum of $500, without stating the source from which the money was derived. Adams paid Munson an additional sum of $500 on August 23d, and thereafter, on that day, Munson made plaintiff an additional payment of $500 on account. Neither Munson nor the plaintiff applied either payment to the extinction of any particular item or items of the account, and the question to be determined is the proper application of such payments.

Section 1479 of the Civil Code provides that, where neither party makes such application, "the performance must be applied to the extinction of obligations in the following order: * * * (1) Of interest due at the time of the performance. (2) Of principal due at that time. (3) Of the obligation earliest in date of maturity. * * *" This section would afford an easy solution of the question if the evidence showed what items of plaintiff's general account with Munson were "earliest in date of maturity." Since the record is silent in that regard, the issue must be resolved against the party having the burden of proof.

[1] It is the general rule that, where a plaintiff has proved the creation of a debt within the period of the statute of limitations, the burden is on the defendant to prove the payment thereof. Melone v. Ruffino, 129 Cal. 514, 518, 62 Pac. 93, 79 Am. St. Rep. 127. This rule has been held applicable in a suit against an owner to foreclose a lien for materials furnished his contractor. Barrett-Hicks Co. v. Glas, 14 Cal. App. 289, 300, 111 Pac. 760. Similar rulings under somewhat different circumstances, have been made in other states. Jones v. Mansfield Lumber & Mercantile Co., 97 Ark. 643, 132 S. W. 1004; Flexner University v. Strassel Gans Paint Co. (Ky.) 112 S. W. 686. A contrary rule is laid down in the state of Oregon. In Bartels v. McCullough, 102 Or. 66, 201 Pac. 733, it is said:

> "Contrary to the rule in other cases, the burden of proof of nonpayment is upon the person asserting the lien, and this is particularly the case where the contract out of which the lien arose was made with some one not the owner of the property upon which it is sought to fasten the lien."

[2, 3] "The burden of proving a particular application of a payment by either the debtor or creditor is on the party claiming that such application was made." 30 Cyc. 1267. "The burden is on the creditor where he claims to have applied a payment to a debt other than the one in suit to prove both debts, and the application of payments thereon." 21 R. C. L. 114. In Davis v. Hall, 70 Neb. 678, 97 N. W. 1023, it was held that while the burden was on defendant to prove payment of the notes there sued on, the burden was on plaintiff to show that an admitted payment was properly applied on a note not in suit. In Gunther v. McCormick, 60 Cal. App. 350, 212 Pac. 715, the plaintiff sued to foreclose a lien for work under three separate contracts. A payment on account had been made prior to the time the notice of lien was filed, but the record on appeal did not show whether the payment had been applied to any particular contract or to all of them. The lien was invalid as to work under two of the contracts, because not filed in time, and valid as to the third. It was held that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show what application was made of the payment, and, in the absence of evidence on the question, the appellate court applied the payment to the contract under which the plaintiff had a valid lien.

Where a lien claimant has received payment during the existence of the obligation for which his claim of lien is thereafter filed, without applying it to any particular obligation, in a suit to foreclose his lien in which he claims that such payment was properly applicable to some other obligation, it is logical to place upon him the burden of proving facts warranting such application, especially so where, as here, the evidence of such facts, plaintiff's book account with

Munson, is in the possession and under the control of the plaintiff, and not accessible to the defendant. By simply producing such book account the plaintiff would have enabled the court to apply the admitted payments in accordance with the provisions of section 1479 of the Civil Code. Having failed to produce such evidence, or any evidence upon the question, the plaintiff is not in a position to complain of the application of such payments to the claim in suit.

[4] It is urged that the answer is insufficient to support the finding that Adams was entitled to have the two $500 payments applied to plaintiff's claim. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff furnished Munson materials for the Adams buildings to the value of $1,869.10, and "that the same has not been paid except the sum of $25.20 credited thereon on account of materials returned to plaintiff by said Munson, and the balance of said sum, $1,843.90, together with interest, * * * is past due and unpaid after deducting all just credits and offsets." The answer of D. P. and Lena Adams contains the following:

> "These defendants further allege that they have no information or belief as to the sums that have been paid, if any, upon said alleged account, by said C. R. Munson, and therefore deny that the sum of $1,843.90 or any sum with interest thereon * * * remains unpaid upon said account, or otherwise or at all."

The plaintiff demurred generally and specially to the answer, but the demurrer was not directed specially to the objection here urged. The case was tried upon the theory that the question of nonpayment was in issue, and both parties produced evidence bearing thereon. Appellate courts are forbidden to reverse a judgment "for any error as to any matter of pleading * * * unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." Const. art. 6, § 4½. An examination of the record in this case shows that plaintiff suffered no possible prejudice from the error complained of.

[5] Appellant contends that the findings are insufficient to support the judgment. The argument made in support of such contention is sufficiently answered in what has been said relative to the application of the two payments made by Munson to the plaintiff. The court found that both of those payments "were made by defendant Munson from payments made by defendant David Preston Adams to defendant Munson on the contract between" them and "were by plaintiff applied upon a general account only of defendant Munson with plaintiff, and that said general account included items upon which said action is based, together with items on account of other jobs, viz.: Jobs for strangers to this suit, and that no direction was ever given plaintiff as to what application any portion of either of last two mentioned payments of five hundred dollars each should be given; and that plaintiff never made any application of any portion of either of last two mentioned payments to any specific items of said general account." The court did not find what items of the general account were earliest in date of maturity. Since there was no evidence bearing upon that question, any finding thereon would necessarily have been against the plaintiff; it having the burden of proof, and therefore it suffered no prejudice from the failure of the court to find upon the question. Hersom v. Hersom, 60 Cal. App. 383, 212 Pac. 717.

The judgment is affirmed.

H. MOFFATT CO. v. HECKE, Director of Agriculture. (Civ. 4645.)

1. Animals 🔑15—Constitutional law 🔑318—Cattle Protection Act held unconstitutional, in not providing for notice to owner.

Cattle Protection Act 1917, and St. 1919, p. 542, amendatory thereof, providing for inspection for purpose of determining ownership of cattle about to be slaughtered, and that inspector may take such cattle as are found not belonging to shipper and deal with them in accordance with rules of board, is unconstitutional, as denying due process of law, in that no provision is made for notice, actual or constructive, to owner.

2. Constitutional law 🔑278(1)—Statute authorizing seizure of property in possession of one under claim of right must itself provide for notice and hearing; "due process."

One who is in possession of property under claim of right cannot be deprived of its possession without due process of law, and to constitute "due process," statute authorizing deprivation of such possession must itself provide for notice of time and place of hearing, giving to parties right of presenting in deliberate, regular, orderly manner issues of fact and law.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Due Process of Law.]

3. Constitutional law 🔑318—That authorities may provide for notice and hearing not sufficient to uphold statute, otherwise invalid as not providing therefor.

That authorities may provide for notice and hearing is not sufficient to overcome objection to Cattle Protection Act 1917 and St. 1919, p. 542, authorizing inspector to seize cattle in possession of one not able to prove ownership, as unconstitutional, in that no provision is made for notice to owner.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by the H. Moffatt Company against G. H. Hecke, as Director of Agriculture of the State of California. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Leon French, Deputy Atty. Gen. (Edward E. Leighton, of Los Angeles, and George A. Clough, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

W. E. Cashman, of San Francisco (R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Complaint in equity for permanent injunction. Plaintiff is a corporation engaged in the wholesale butcher business. In the conduct of such business it ships cattle from various points in the state to its slaughterhouse situated in San Francisco. The complaint alleges that its business is interfered with by defendant, the state director of agriculture, who, it is charged, enters upon plaintiff's premises for the purpose of inspecting cattle shipped thereto to be slaughtered. The cause of action is based upon the theory that the defendant is without power either to make such inspection or to charge fees therefor. A perpetual injunction against such acts, together with general relief, is prayed for. To this complaint a general denial was interposed. The case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, which shows that the dedefendant, under threat of prosecution of plaintiff in case of refusal, did enter upon the plaintiff's premises for the purpose indicated. Defendant sought to justify his right so to do by virtue of the provisions of chapter 678, Statutes 1917, commonly known as the Cattle Protection Act, and chapter 325, Statutes 1919, pp. 542–546, amendatory thereof.

Plaintiff claimed below, and does here, that the statutes upon which the defendant relies for his authority contravene the due process of law clause of the federal Constitution, and are therefore void. Various other constitutional objections are urged. The trial court found in accordance with the agreed statements of facts. It entered judgment as prayed for by which the defendant was enjoined from entering the plaintiff's premises in San Francisco to inspect "such cattle as are shipped to said plaintiff's premises for the slaughtering of them when such cattle belong to the plaintiff and are owned by it from the time they are originally shipped at points in this state outside of the city and county of San Francisco," and also enjoin the defendant "from inspecting any cattle whatsoever shipped by the plaintiff for slaughtering purposes at or from any point in California," where the right to make such inspection is claimed under chapter 678, Statutes 1917 (Cattle Protection Act) or chapter 325, Statutes 1919 (act creating the department of agriculture, and transferring to the said department the duties of the cattle protection board and other governmental bodies or commissions).

[1] The decision of the lower court was based entirely upon the theory that the acts under which the defendant operated are unconstitutional as denying to the plaintiff due process of law. The court quotes the provision of the act of 1917, "If upon such inspection cattle shall be found not belonging to the shipper, all such cattle shall be taken by the inspector and dealt with in accordance with the rules of the board in such cases made," and concludes that, as no provision is made for notice, actual or constructive, to the owner of the action to be had the act is void. We are of the opinion that the trial court was correct in its conclusion. For a full understanding of the situation a review of the statutes in question becomes necessary.

> Section 1: "That there be and is hereby created a cattle protection board. * * * Said board is hereby authorized, and it is made its duty, to exercise a general supervision over and protect the cattle of this state from theft and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes and intent of this act."
> Section 5: "Upon the sale or transfer of any range cattle in this state, the actual delivery of such cattle shall be accompanied by a written bill of sale, giving the number, kind and marks and brand of each animal, which bill of sale shall be signed by the party giving the same."
> Section 10: "No cattle, except cattle shipped for slaughter and which have been inspected as herein provided prior to shipment, shall be slaughtered until they shall have been first inspected and certified to as being the property of the person slaughtering the same or causing same to be slaughtered: * * * Provided, that any person licensed hereunder to slaughter cattle after 24 hours' notice in writing, addressed to the local inspector demanding his presence at a specified time and place for the purpose of inspecting such cattle for slaughtering, may, without the certificate of inspection of said inspector slaughter said cattle."
> Section 12: "It shall be the duty of inspectors to inspect all cattle for marks and brands which are offered for transportation to any common carrier at the loading stations thereof. If upon such inspection cattle shall be found not belonging to the shipper, all such cattle shall be taken by the inspector and dealt with in accordance with the rules of the board in such cases made. Inspectors must inspect all cattle subject to inspection immediately, and when inspected, the one in charge thereof shall pay to the inspector therefor the sum of five cents per head, whereupon the inspector shall certify that such cattle have been inspected."

The second act, that of 1919, contains the following provisions bearing upon this case:

> Section 1: "A department of the government of the state of California to be known as the department of agriculture is hereby created.

The department shall be conducted under the control of an executive officer to be known as the director of agriculture."

Section 5: "The director of agriculture may make investigations. * * * In connection therewith he shall have the right to inspect books and records and to hear complaints, administer oaths, certify to all official acts, and to issue subpœnas for the attendance of witnesses and the production of papers, books, accounts, documents and testimony in any inquiry, investigation, hearing or proceeding pertinent or material thereto in any part of the state."

Section 8: "The director of the department of agriculture shall succeed to and is hereby vested with all the duties, powers, purposes, responsibilities and jurisdiction of [naming various bodies, including] the cattle protection board and of the several officers of such bodies. * * * Said bodies, offices and officers whose duties, powers, purposes and responsibilities are so transferred to and vested in the director of the department of agriculture, are and each of them is hereby abolished, and shall have no further legal existence, but the statutes and laws under which they existed and all laws prescribing their duties, powers, purposes and responsibilities and jurisdiction together with all lawful rules and regulations established thereunder, are hereby expressly continued in force. * * *"

[2, 3] From a reading of the statutes in question it is manifest that they were designed for the protection of owners of range cattle from theft. It will be noticed that the original act, referred to as the Cattle Protection Act, provides for inspection for the purpose of determining ownership of cattle about to be slaughterd for the market. It will be further noticed that section 12 of the original act makes no provision for the giving of notice either to the apparent owner or to any other person. The appellant contends that as the law presumes that a public officer will act lawfully a presumption is raised that such rules and regulations as will be made by the defendant will be duly promulgated and will provide a lawful method for the disposition of cattle taken from the possession of a shipper or slaughterer. Whether the board has or has not made rules covering the situation we do not know, for none are before us. However this may be, we do not consider that there is any merit in this contention. One who is in the possession of property under a claim of right cannot be deprived of its possession without due process of law. To constitute due process the statute itself must provide for notice of a time and place of hearing, giving to the parties an opportunity to present in a deliberate, regular and orderly manner issues of fact and law. It is essential to the validity of the statute that it furnish the means whereby one may enforce his constitutional rights. It is no answer that the authorities may provide for a notice and hearing, for the right of a person to have his day in court must rest upon something more substantial than favor or discretion. The essential validity of the law is to be tested not by what has been done under it but by what may by its authority be done. Modern Loan Co. v. Police Court, 12 Cal. App. 582, 108 Pac. 56. See, also, Suckow v. Alderson, 182 Cal. 242, 249, 187 Pac. 965; Hewitt v. Board of Medical Directors, 148 Cal. 590, 84 Pac. 39, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 896, 113 Am. St. Rep. 315. The law itself must provide for notice and give a right of hearing. Lacey v. Lemmons, 22 N. M. 54, 159 Pac. 949, L. R. A. 1917A, 1185. The vice of the acts in question is that no notice, either actual or constructive, is required to be given.

An extended discussion of this subject is not necessary, for the Legislature, evidently recognizing the infirmity of the acts, amended the same in 1921 by enacting what is known as the hide and brand law, wherein it is provided that cattle found in the possession of a person unable to produce indicia of ownership are to be dealt with as estrays. Stats. 1921, c. 725. No further interference with plaintiff's business, therefore, will occur in the future under the two acts here considered.

From what we have said it follows that the trial court properly enjoined the defendant from the acts complained of. The judgment is affirmed.

SHEARER v. FLANERY, County Auditor.*

(Civ. 2810.)

1. Statutes 🔑166—Amendatory statute operates as repeal of omitted parts of amended statute not re-enacted.

Under Const. art. 4, § 24, providing, "No law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title; but * * * re-enacted and published at length," amendment of statute or section operates as repeal of those parts of statute or section which are not re-enacted.

2. Counties 🔑74(5)—Salary provision for county surveyor held repealed by omission from amendatory statute.

Pol. Code, § 4277, subd. 12, as amended by St. 1919, p. 114, which fixed salary of county surveyor at $900 yearly, by omitting from its list, showing salaries of county officers in certain counties, that of county surveyor, repealed such salary provision for surveyor, in view of Const. art. 4, § 24.

3. Constitutional law 🔑48—Presumption that Legislature determined that change in compensation did not result in increase invoked to sustain statute fixing compensation.

Contention that St. 1923, p. 1139, amending Pol. Code, § 4270, by fixing compensation of county surveyors in counties of forty-first class at $2,100, increases compensation of incumbents over that previously allowed under Pol. Code, § 4044, providing per diem for such officers, and therefore violates Const. art. 11, § 9, cannot be sustained; section 4044 not showing on its face that compensation of surveyors thereunder does not equal or exceed $2.100, and conclusive presumption in such case being that Governor and Legislature, after investigation, have determined that charge has not resulted in increase.

4. Officers 🔑100(1)—Statute fixing compensation after term begins not violative of constitutional prohibition against increase during term, if previously no compensation fixed.

Const. art. 11, § 9, prohibiting increasing compensation of any officer after his election or during his term of office, does not prevent Legislature from fixing compensation after term begins, if prior thereto no salary or compensation had been fixed at all.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Petition for writ of mandate by William Shearer against H. C. Flanery, Auditor of Sutter County, to compel issuance of warrant for salary. Judgment for defendant, and petitioner appeals. Reversed, with direction.

A. H. Hewitt and Loyd E. Hewitt, both of Yuba City, for appellant.

Arthur Coats, of Yuba City, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This proceeding was instituted to compel the defendant, as auditor of Sutter county, to issue a warrant for salary alleged to be due petitioner as county surveyor under the provisions of section 4270 of the Political Code, as amended in 1923. Stats. 1923, p. 1139. Judgment was entered in favor of defendant, and the petitioner has appealed. The facts are undisputed.

Prior to the legislative session of 1921 Sutter county was in the forty-eighth class. Section 4277, subd. 12, as amended in 1919, fixed the compensation of surveyor in counties of the forty-eighth class at $900 per annum. Stats. 1919, p. 114. Acting under the provisions of the County Engineer Act (Stats. 1919, p. 1290), and prior to the legislative session of 1921, the supervisors of Sutter county appointed a county engineer. Section 11 of the act provided that "the office of county surveyor of any county shall be and is hereby abolished" upon the appointment of a county engineer, to take effect not later than the expiration of the then current term. Sections 4005c and 4006 of the Political Code were so amended in 1921 as to place Sutter county in the forty-first class. Stats. 1921, pp. 2 and 3. At the same session section 4270 was amended to read as follows:

> "In counties of the forty-first class the county officers shall receive, as compensation for the services required of them by law or by virtue of their offices, the following compensation and salaries, to wit:" Then follows a list of all county officers, except county surveyor, and their compensation. Stats. 1921, p. 634.

The office of county surveyor was omitted for the probable reason that it was deemed abolished by the appointment of a county engineer. October 7, 1921, the County Engineer Act was held to be unconstitutional. Coulter v. Pool, 187 Cal. 181, 201 Pac. 120. At the general election in 1922, the petitioner was elected to the office of county surveyor for the term commencing in January, 1923. The Legislature of 1923 amended section 4270, by re-enacting and publishing the section at length as amended. Stats. 1923, p. 1139. Subdivision 11 of the amended section fixes the compensation of county surveyor at $2,100 per annum. The amending act contains the following:

> "21. That wherever in this act the salary of a county officer is changed from a fee basis or a fee and salary basis to a flat salary only, it is hereby found that such change does not effect or constitute an increase in the salary of such officer.
> "22. The provisions of this act are intended to apply to, and effect incumbents, except in so far as such provisions constitute, an increase in salary of such incumbent."

For many years section 4044 of the Political Code has contained the following provision:

* Hearing in supreme court denied September 2, 1924.

> "In lieu of fees, as now provided by law, the surveyor shall receive such compensation as the board of supervisors may allow, not to exceed ten dollars per day for all work performed for the county."

Respondent contends that the amendatory act of 1923, in so far as it fixes the salary of county surveyor at $2,100 a year during the current term, is in conflict with article 11, section 9, of the Constitution, which provides:

> "The compensation of any county, city, town, or municipal officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term of office."

It is argued that prior to such amendment the surveyor's salary was $900 a year, as fixed in 1919 by amendment of section 4277, or "not to exceed ten dollars per day for all work performed for the county," as provided by section 4044. Appellant contends that, prior to the amendment of 1923, he was entitled either to no compensation or to the per diem provided by section 4044, and that in either case the salary fixed by the amended section is not an increase of compensation.

[1, 2] Article 4, section 24, of the Constitution provides:

> "No law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title; but in such case the act revised or section amended shall be re-enacted and published at length as revised or amended."

Under the provisions of this section it is clear that the amendment of a statute or section operates as a repeal of those parts of the statute or section which are not reenacted. "The revising or amending act is intended as a substitute for the original statute or section, continuing in force that which re-enacted and repealing what is omitted." Pierce v. Solano County, 62 Cal. App. 465, 469, 217 Pac. 545, 546. Petitioner was at no time entitled to the salary of $900 a year provided by section 4277 as amended in 1919, because that provision was omitted from the amendatory act of 1921 and was thereby repealed.

[3] Appellant suggests that the foregoing provision of section 4044 is invalid as an unlawful delegation of legislative power to boards of supervisors to fix the compensation of a county officer, contrary to the constitutional provision that the Legislature "shall regulate the compensation of all such officers." Const. art. 11, § 5. It is not necessary to decide the question thus presented, because, as further suggested by appellant, assuming section 4044 to be valid and applicable to the facts of this case, it does not show on its face that the surveyor's annual compensation thereunder, in counties of the forty-first class, does not equal or exceed $2,100, the sum fixed by the amendment of 1923. Under such circumstances "the conclusive presumption is that the governor and the Legislature have investigated, ascertained, and determined that the change does not result in an increase of compensation." Galeener v. Honeycutt, 173 Cal. 100, 104, 159 Pac. 595, 597.

[4] If it be assumed that section 4044 is invalid, and that, prior to the amendment of 1923, the petitioner was entitled to no compensation, the same result will follow. "It is a common provision in the Constitutions and statutes of states, that the salary or compensation of a public officer shall not be increased or diminished during his term. * * * Where, however, the salary or compensation has not been fixed at all at the time of the election or appointment, this provision does not prevent its being fixed after the term begins." Mechem on Public Officers, § 858; Gwynn v. McKinley, 30 Cal. App. 381, 158 Pac. 1059; Harper v. Board of Comrs., 54 Okl. 545, 149 Pac. 1102, 154 Pac. 529; Board of Supervisors v. Stephens, 20 Ariz. 115, 177 Pac. 261; State v. Harper, 33 Okl. 572, 123 Pac. 1038; James v. Duffy, 140 Ky. 604, 131 S. W. 489, 140 Am. St. Rep. 404; Stone v. Pryor, 103 Ky. 645, 45 S. W. 1053, 1136; Purcell v. Parks, 82 Ill. 346; State v. McDowell, 19 Neb. 442, 27 N. W. 433; Rucker v. Supervisors, 7 W. Va. 661.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to enter judgment in favor of petitioner as prayed for in the petition.

I concur: PLUMMER, J.

WILEY v. COLE. (Civ. 4017.)

1. Trial ⚷253(8)—In automobile collision case, instruction on question of speed held erroneous as ignoring essential elements.

In automobile collision case, instruction, based on St. 1919, p. 220, § 22, limiting speed at street intersections in business districts, or where driver's view is obstructed, to 15 miles per hour, to effect that if plaintiff exceeded such limit he was guilty of negligence as matter of law, held faulty in not taking into consideration whether or not intersection was within business district, or whether driver's view was obstructed.

2. Municipal corporations ⚷706(8)—In automobile collision case, instruction on speed held erroneous as inapplicable to facts.

In automobile collision case, instruction, based on statute limiting speed at street intersections, to effect that if plaintiff exceeded limit prescribed he was negligent as matter of law, held prejudicially erroneous, where accident occurred outside of intersection.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨705(10)—Negligence of plaintiff contributing to collision of automobiles bars recovery.

Any negligence on part of plaintiff, which contributed directly or proximately to automobile collision, would bar his recovery for injuries inflicted thereby.

4. Trial ⇨253(3) — In automobile collision case, instruction held erroneous as ignoring question whether exceeding speed limit by plaintiff proximately contributed to accident.

In automobile collision case, in which it was admitted that defendant was negligent in driving on wrong side of road, instruction that if plaintiff was exceeding speed limit verdict should be for her, unless jury should find that she could have avoided accident after actual discovery of peril of plaintiff, held erroneous as not being further predicated on assumed excessive rate of speed being a proximate cause of accident.

5. Municipal corporations ⇨706(7)—Whether unlawful speed of plaintiff's automobile proximately contributed to collision for jury.

In automobile collision case, in which it was admitted that defendant was negligent in driving on wrong side of road, question of whether alleged exceeding of speed limit by plaintiff proximately contributed to accident was for jury.

6. Municipal corporations ⇨706(8)—In automobile collision case plaintiff held entitled to instruction as to care required in emergency.

In automobile collision case, refusal to instruct that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, merely because in time of imminent danger he did not take every precaution which, from careful review of circumstances, it afterwards appeared he might have taken to avoid accident, held error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Action by H. C. Wiley against Pauline Cole. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 52 Cal. App. 617, 199 Pac. 550.

David R. Faries, John R. Berryman, Jr., and J. Allen Davis, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Arthur E. Koepsel, of Santa Ana, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. From the record in this case it appears that a collision between two automobiles occurred at about 9 o'clock at night near the intersection of two streets, by reason of which plaintiff sustained damages to his automobile, and thereafter brought an action against defendant therefor, which resulted in a judgment on a verdict being rendered in defendant's favor, and from which judgment plaintiff has appealed to this court. Defendant was traveling in a southerly direction and plaintiff was traveling in a northerly direction. Defendant had been driving her automobile on the westerly or right side of the street, but as she approached a certain intersecting street, into which she intended to turn in an easterly direction, she left the westerly side of the street on which she had been driving and thereafter drove her automobile on the easterly side thereof to a point estimated as being at least 15 feet from the northerly line of the intersecting street, where the collision occurred. Plaintiff was driving his automobile at all times in question on the right or easterly side of the street, and was traveling at a rate of speed, as he crossed the intersection, of from 20 to 25 miles per hour.

[1-3] Many different forms of prejudicial error are urged by appellant, but, for the purpose of deciding this appeal, but one series of such alleged errors, consisting of certain instructions requested by plaintiff and refused by the court, or in the giving of certain other instructions requested by defendant and given by the court, need receive attention herein. One of such instructions given to the jury at the request of defendant was as follows:

"You are instructed that, under the Motor Vehicle Act, plaintiff was not permitted to drive his car at an intersection of a highway at a greater rate of speed than 15 miles per hour, and if you find from the testimony that the plaintiff was driving his car past the intersection of said highway at a greater rate of speed than 15 miles per hour, and you shall find that said intersection was a highway as heretofore defined in these instructions, then I instruct you that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence as a matter of law, and if such negligence directly or proximately contributed to the happening of the accident in any degree, however slight, then I instruct you that your verdict shall be for the defendant, notwithstanding the fact that the defendant may have been guilty of negligence."

The accident occurred on the 10th day of August, 1919, and the statute then in force (section 22[a], Stats. 1919, p. 220) provided in effect that where the intersecting highway was in a business district of an incorporated city, or where the driver's view of the roadway was obstructed, the rate of speed of an automobile in crossing an intersection of streets should not be greater than 15 miles per hour. Even assuming that, instead of the accident having occurred at a point at least 15 feet beyond the street line of the intersection, it had actually occurred within the lines of the street intersection, the instruction, standing by itself, is faulty, in that it fails to take into consideration whether or not the intersection was within a business district, or whether or not the driver's view was obstructed. There was no evidence as to what constituted either a "business district" or an "obstruction," within the meaning of the statute; nor was any instruction given by the court to the jury from which the meaning of either of such terms could be determined. The jury, however, was elsewhere instructed that it was unlawful to operate an automobile across a street intersection at a greater rate of speed than 15 miles per hour, where the "driver's view of the road is obstructed." With the foregoing conditions noted therein, the latter part of the criticized instruction, which tells the jury that plaintiff was guilty of negligence if he was driving his car at a greater rate of speed than 15 miles per hour, would perhaps be good law, if the accident had occurred within the intersection. But, in view of the fact that the accident unquestionably occurred at a point outside the intersection, the instruction was misleading and prejudicially erroneous. Any negligence on the part of plaintiff which contributed directly or proximately to the happening of the accident would bar his recovery, but the instruction, in effect, that if at some time before the accident occurred plaintiff was driving his automobile across a street intersection at a greater rate of speed than 15 miles per hour would constitute negligence (even taking into consideration the necessary qualifying provisions of the statute, together with the definitions thereof to which reference has been made), was a statement of the law which was inapplicable to the question of plaintiff's negligence at the time the collision occurred between the two automobiles, but which undoubtedly had a prejudicial effect upon the jury, as indicated by its verdict in the case.

[4] Appellant further complains of an instruction given to the jury at defendant's request, which, after instructing the jury in substance that in operating her automobile defendant had a right to act upon the belief that all other persons using the highway would exercise ordinary care in the operation of vehicles thereon, and that such persons would not violate any laws with reference to the operation of such vehicles, instructed the jury that:

> "Therefore I instruct you that the defendant in this case had the right to assume that the plaintiff, as well as all other persons using the highway were exercising ordinary care in driving their vehicles in accordance with law, and were not violating any of the speed limits, and if you shall find that the plaintiff was driving at an excessive rate of speed, still the defendant had the right to drive her car until in the exercise of ordinary care she had known that the plaintiff was in a position of danger, and, unless you shall find that the defendant could have avoided the accident after the actual discovery of the peril of the plaintiff, then your verdict will be for the defendant."

Taking into consideration the admitted fact that at the time the accident occurred defendant was violating the terms of the statute, in that she was operating her automobile on the easterly side of the road, by this instruction the jury was erroneously instructed that, although defendant was herself guilty of negligence in driving her automobile on the "wrong side of the road," she was to be wholly excused therefrom and a verdict should be rendered in her favor, unless, in the exercise of ordinary care, she knew that plaintiff was in danger, and after such discovery of plaintiff's danger "defendant could have avoided the accident." In other words, after defendant by her negligent acts had placed plaintiff in a dangerous situation and from which the accident resulted, if, thereafter, with knowledge of plaintiff's peril, defendant could not have avoided the accident, she was to be held blameless, without reference to whether or not the assumed "excessive rate of speed" that plaintiff was driving was a contributing proximate cause of the accident. The instruction appears further to prejudice plaintiff's rights, in that plaintiff's "excessive rate of speed" was thereby determined by the court as being at least a proximate cause of the accident.

[5] That, however, assuming that there was any evidence justifying the inference that at the point of the accident plaintiff was driving at a rate of speed which was in violation of the provisions of the statute, was a question which, under appropriate instructions from the court, was solely for the jury to determine; that is to say, whether or not the speed at which plaintiff's automobile was being driven was the cause which, in natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any efficient intervening cause, produced the accident, and without which excessive and unlawful speed the accident would not have occurred. If the speed of plaintiff's automobile was not a cause which contributed directly or proximately to the happening of the accident—in other words, if the accident would have happened whether plaintiff was driving at the rate of 25 miles per hour, or at 5 miles per hour, or at any other speed, and if plaintiff was guilty of no other direct, contributing cause to the accident, no reason would be apparent why defendant should not be held responsible for the negligent act or acts which were the proximate cause or causes of the collision between the two automobiles.

[6] The court also incorrectly refused to instruct the jury, at plaintiff's request, in effect that a plaintiff in an action of the character before the court could not be lawfully charged with contributory negligence, merely because in time of imminent danger he did not take every precaution which, from a careful review of the circumstances, it afterward appeared that he might have taken to avoid the accident. Karr v. Parks, 40 Cal. 188. The question of what plaintiff should have done in the circumstances here presented was exclusively within the province of the jury, and it should have been permitted to determine whether or not, all the evidence considered, plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. Shupe v. Rodolf, 185 Cal. 371, 197 Pac. 57; Jensen v. Fish, 54 Cal. App. 304, 201 Pac. 954.

Others alleged errors need not be considered. It sufficiently appears, as hereinbefore indicated, that plaintiff's rights were prejudicially affected, by reason of certain instructions which, at defendant's request, were given by the court to the jury, as well as by at least one of plaintiff's requested instructions which the court refused to give to the jury; for which reasons plaintiff is entitled to a new trial.

It is ordered that the judgment be and the same is reversed.

FINCH v. FINCH et al. (Civ. 4357.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 3, 1924. Rehearing Denied July 24, 1924.)

1. Corporations 🔑619—Allegation of nonpayment against trustee of defunct corporation held sufficient.

Complaint in an action against defendant, as trustee of a defunct corporation and individually, to recover payment by plaintiff on a judgment against corporation, alleging "that nothing has been paid on account of liability of said corporation or of its trustees or stockholders," held sufficient.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1152—Error in authorizing judgment against defunct corporation to be paid out of a particular fund, held not to require a reversal.

In an action against defendant, as trustee of a defunct corporation, and individually, to recover amount paid by plaintiff on judgment against corporation, erroneous direction that judgment be paid out of a specific fund, and that lien thereof attach to particular property, did not require a reversal, since it might be corrected by modification.

3. Judgment 🔑754—Kind or extent of lien created by judgment cannot be prescribed by court pronouncing it.

A judgment ordinarily attaches to the real property generally of judgment debtor, and kind or extent of lien created thereby cannot be prescribed or regulated by court pronouncing it.

4. Limitation of actions 🔑58(4)—Limitations do not run against stockholder's liability to surety until payment by it.

Limitations do not run against stockholder's liability to surety on corporation's undertaking on appeal until surety's payment of the judgment recovered against the corporation.

5. Corporations 🔑264—Limitation of actions 🔑34(5)—Action to enforce stockholder's liability must be commenced within three years after liability created.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 1, and section 359, an action to enforce a stockholder's liability on a corporate indebtedness must be commenced within three years after liability is created.

6. Corporations 🔑619—Trustee's attempted cancellation of his own stock in defunct corporation held void.

Where director of corporation became trustee thereof, with power to settle its affairs on forfeiture of its charter, under St. 1915, p. 422, his attempted cancellation of his own stock, after judgment against corporation had become final, was in nature of a fraud, and void; no powers being granted to trustee, which would result in a benefit to him personally and to disadvantage of beneficiaries of the trust.

7. Corporations 🔑617(1)—Corporation's and stockholders' liability to surety for judgment paid by it not affected because corporate charter forfeited prior to payment.

That corporation's charter had been forfeited for failure to pay its state license tax, prior to time that surety on an undertaking for corporation had paid a judgment against it, did not affect liability of corporation or stockholders, under Civ. Code, § 322.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Mary L. Finch, executrix of Allen Finch, deceased, against B. A. Finch, trustee of the property and assets of the United Trade School Contracting Company, a defunct corporation, and individually, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant, as trustee and individually, appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Dockweiler & Dockweiler & Finch, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Wm. Hazlett, Ray Howard, and Chas. M. Easton, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal by the defendant B. A. Finch, as trustee of the United Trade School Contracting Company (hereinafter referred to as the corporation), from a judgment rendered against him as such trustee for the sum of $8,224.94, and it is also an appeal by defendant B. A. Finch, individually, from a judgment rendered in the same action against him for the sum of $2,756.66.

On July 7, 1913, a judgment was rendered in the superior court of Los Angeles county against the corporation, from which judgment the corporation appealed to the Supreme Court. The undertaking on appeal to stay execution on the judgment was executed on September 5, 1913, by plaintiff in her individual capacity, and by Allen Finch—the latter of whom died before the determination of the appeal, and which appeal resulted in an affirmance of the judgment. Prior thereto the plaintiff here qualified as executrix of the will of Allen Finch, deceased. After the judgment had been affirmed, an action was brought against Mary L. Finch, as such executrix, on the said undertaking, and judgment was recovered therein against said Mary L. Finch, in such capacity, which judgment, in pursuance of an order of the court, was compromised and paid on July 12, 1918. On March 4, 1916, for failure to pay its corporation license tax, the corporation forfeited its charter to the state of California. The action here involved was brought by said executrix against B. A. Finch, as the remaining trustee of the defunct corporation, to recover a judgment for the amount paid on the undertaking, and against said B. A. Finch, individually, as a stockholder of the corporation for his proportion as such stockholder, of the amount so paid by the plaintiff on account of such undertaking.

[1] Appellant urges that because the complaint contains no specific allegation that nothing has been paid on account of the liability upon which the action was brought, no cause of action is stated in the complaint, and hence that the judgment should be reversed. The criticism by appellant probably arose from a typographical error in his copy of the complaint containing an allegation "that nothing has been paid on account of the liability of said corporation or by its trustees or stockholders," etc.; whereas, according to the clerk's transcript of the record herein, it appears that the allegation of the complaint was "that nothing has been paid on account of the liability of said corporation or of its trustees or stockholders, either in proportion to their respective holdings or otherwise." We think that, under the authorities cited by counsel, the allegation was sufficient.

The next point presented by appellant, as a reason for a reversal of the judgment, depends upon the particular wording of the judgment itself, which, in part, provides that:

> "This judgment of $8,224.94 is payable only from the assets and property of the United Trade School Contracting Company, a defunct corporation, which forfeited its charter to the state of California on the 4th day of March, 1916, in which it then had any interest, or from the proceeds of such property or assets."

It is contended that the italicized portion of the judgment is erroneous and should be stricken therefrom, for the reason that it is an attempt to make all the property and assets, or the proceeds of said property and assets, which the corporation owned on March 4, 1916, when the forfeiture of its charter occurred subject to the lien of the judgment herein which was rendered on May 1, 1922, and which was more than six years after the charter of the corporation was forfeited.

[2, 3] From the record of the proceedings, which took place among the respective counsel and the court, it appears that, at the request of counsel for defendant, the judgment was made payable only from the assets and property, if any, of the corporation defendant. But nowhere does it appear that defendant was responsible for that part of the judgment which directs that it be paid from such property as on March 4, 1916, the corporation "then had any interest, or from the proceeds of such property or assets." There was nothing in the nature of the action by which the court was authorized to direct that the judgment be paid out of a specified fund, or that the lien thereof attach to particular property. A judgment ordinarily attaches to the real property generally of the judgment debtor, and the kind or the extent of the lien created by the judgment cannot be prescribed or regulated by the court pronouncing the judgment. 23 Cyc. 1350, and cases cited; Freeman on Judgments, § 342. The judgment, however, in that regard, may be corrected under an order of modification, rather than by an order of reversal of the entire judgment.

[4, 5] It is further contended by appellant that the cause of action as against B. A. Finch individually was barred by the provisions of section 359, and by subdivision 1 of section 338, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The undertaking was signed on September 5, 1913, and the judgment for the payment of which the undertaking was given was paid on July 12, 1918, by plaintiff herein as executrix of the will of Allen Finch, deceased. It is settled by a long line of authorities in this state, and particularly by the case of Hunt v. Ward, 99 Cal. 612, 34 Pac. 335, 37 Am. St. Rep. 87, that an action to enforce a stockholder's liability on a corporate indebtedness must be commenced within three years after the liability is created. The principal question involved in the instant case is the date at which the defendant B. A. Finch, as a stockholder of the corporation, became liable on account of the undertaking which was signed on the 5th day of September, 1913, and paid on the 12th day of July, 1918. If the liability was created at the date when the undertaking was signed, defendant B. A. Finch as a stockholder is not liable; but if the liability was incurred as of the date of the payment of the amount of the judgment, it is conceded that the statute has no application. The attention of this court has not been directed to any case which deals with a situation like the one presented by the facts herein. There are several California cases in which the question of the liability of stockholders is treated, but in none of them is there found a statement of the law which refers to such liability, where an undertaking on appeal has been the basis on which the determination of the question depended. In the case of Coulter Dry Goods Co. v. Wentworth, 171 Cal. 500, 153 Pac. 939, certain merchandise was contracted to be purchased by the corporation at a certain time, and which merchandise was not delivered, to the corporation until several months after it had been purchased. On the failure of the corporation to pay the purchase price, an action was brought to enforce the stockholders' liability as to certain stockholders who became such after the merchandise was purchased, but before it was delivered. It was held that such stockholders were not liable. In the course of the opinion, having to do particularly with the question of the date when a stockholder's liability attaches, the court said:

> "* * * It is apparent that, under the provisions of the Constitution and section, a 'liability' is created when a contract binding on it is made by a corporation and independent of any question as to whether that 'liability' is absolute or contingent, or as to when the right to enforce it may accrue, and therefore that those who are stockholders when the 'liability' is created or incurred are alone liable in any actions arising from its breach."

To the same effect, see Hunt v. Ward, 99 Cal. 612, 34 Pac. 335, 37 Am. St. Rep. 87.

While such language is very strong, the force thereof is somewhat lessened, because in neither of the cases to which reference has been made were the facts strikingly analogous to those here presented. No question of suretyship was therein involved. In each of those cases the obligation of the corporation to pay a fixed or determinable amount was agreed upon at the outset. Here, whether or not the surety would ever be called upon to pay on account of the undertaking, depended, first, upon the outcome of the appeal from the judgment; and, secondly, assuming that the judgment against the corporation should be affirmed by the Supreme Court, and the judgment against the corporation should become final, upon the question of whether or not the corporation itself would pay the judgment. The effect of the undertaking was that, in the event a liability on account of the judgment were eventually established against the corporation, the surety promised to pay the same. The surety did not agree to pay the judgment as of the date when the undertaking was signed, but agreed to be bound only upon the happening of a certain event. He incurred no liability on account of the undertaking unless the judgment were affirmed. No cause of action arose in favor of the judgment creditor and against such surety until after the judgment was affirmed, and since the surety incurred no present liability on account of the undertaking no present cause of action existed in his favor on account of such undertaking, either as against the corporation or as against any of its stockholders. He had parted with nothing of value, and his right to maintain an action against either the corporation of its stockholders became fixed only after he had paid the amount which he had agreed to pay on the affirmance of the judgment. Up to the time the payment be actually made by the surety, his position is that of a mere promisor. He promises that he will pay; but a promise on his part cannot be accepted as a consummated fact. If by reason of his insolvency or other inability to pay the amount of the judgment, he fail to pay the same, no liability to him is ever incurred. In the leading case of Yule v. Bishop, 133 Cal. 574, 62 Pac. 68, 65 Pac. 1094, and in which the facts nearest approach the facts here presented, it is held that one, who signed a corporation promissory note as an accommodation indorser thereon, and who, on the default of payment thereof by the corporation, was compelled to pay the same, was entitled to recover from those persons who were stockholders, not when the note was signed, but from those who were stockholders when the note was paid—in other words, that no debt or liability was incurred by the corporation to the surety, or accommodation indorser of the note, until after he had actually paid the same.

From analogy it may therefore be announced as a rule of law that on an undertaking of the character here involved, as between the surety and the stockholders of the corporation, the statute of limitations does not commence to run until the surety has met the obligation imposed upon him by the undertaking.

[6] At the time the charter of the corporation was forfeited, defendant B. A. Finch was the only director thereof; and under the terms of the statute then governing the forfeiture of charters of corporations, because of failure to pay state license taxes (Stats. 1915, p. 422), he became a trustee of the corporation and the stockholders thereof, with power to settle the affairs of the corporation. After the judgment against the corporation had become final, and before plaintiff herein had paid on account of the undertaking the amount of the judgment theretofore rendered against the corporation, defendant B. A. Finch, as an individual stockholder, surrendered his stock in the corporation to himself, acting as trustee of the corporation, for the purpose of having such stock canceled. Acting thereon, B. A. Finch, as trustee for the corporation and its stockholders, accepted the said stock from himself individually and went through the form of its cancellation. The findings of the court show that, at the time the said stock was thus attempted to be canceled, certain other stock in the corporation was owned by certain other stockholders. B. A. Finch was a trustee not only for the corporation as a legal entity, but was also a trustee for all the stockholders. The effect of a valid cancellation of the stock of any one stockholder would necessarily increase the liability of the remaining stockholders for any debts of the corporation. To permit B. A. Finch as a trustee for all the stockholders to cancel his own stock, and thereby to relieve himself from liability for debts of the corporation, would be to recognize the right of a trustee to benefit himself by virtue of such a transaction, to the injury of others to whom he stood in a fiduciary relationship. Notwithstanding the broad powers possessed by trustees of a defunct corporation, rendered such because of the forfeiture of its charter to the state, "to settle the affairs of the corporation," it cannot be presumed that such powers are granted as will result in a benefit to the trustees personally, and at the same time work to the disadvantage of the beneficiaries of the trust. It follows that the attempted cancellation of the stock of B. A. Finch was in the nature of a fraud and as such was a nullity.

[7] It is finally contended by appellant that, because the corporation had failed to pay its state license tax, and as a result thereof that its charter had been forfeited to the state prior to the time that the surety on the undertaking paid the judgment which had been affirmed by the Supreme Court against the corporation, the corporation ceased to exist, and consequently that there were no stockholders thereof against whom any statutory liability could attach. Section 322 of the Civil Code provides in effect that those persons only are liable as stockholders of a corporation, who were stockholders at the time the debt or liability of the corporation was incurred. The case of Van Landingham v. United Tuna Packers, 189 Cal. 353, 208 Pac. 973, is authority for the rule that, where the charter of a corporation has been forfeited to the state because of failure on the part of the corporation to pay its state license tax, such corporation, during the period of its suspended powers, has no authority to continue to function as a de facto corporation, so as to give validity to any contract which might be attempted to be entered into between the corporation and any other person; and there are other California cases which in effect announce a similar principle. Those cases, however, all deal either with a new obligation on the part of the corporation, contracted by it during the period of the suspension of its corporate existence, or with questions related to matters of procedure. Nowhere in any of such cases is there discussed the legal effect of an original obligation existing against the corporation before the forfeiture of its charter, which obligation has been assumed and discharged by a co-obligor under and by virtue of legal procedure, with the resultant right in such obligor to relief, as against the corporation after its corporate franchise had been forfeited, and during a time when such corporate franchise was in a state of suspension, dependent upon action by such corporation, in the way of redeeming its charter by means of payment of the delinquent license tax.

The statute which provides for the forfeiture of the charter of a corporation also provides the procedure by which such a corporation may be restored to its original powers. During "forfeiture," or the time that the corporation is denied the right to exercise corporate functions, its existence is merely in a state of suspension. Immediately upon compliance by its representatives with the simple requirements of the statute, it fully regains its original "corporate status," with the same powers and functions which it possessed prior to the temporary loss of its corporate franchise. The statute contains no express declaration, nor do we perceive any indication of legislative intent, to the effect that any change in the personnel of either the officers or the stockholders arises by virtue of the fact that, for a time, the corporate powers of the corporation are suspended. Upon restoration to corporate existence, each of the officers who were in office and the respective stockholders who owned the stock of the corporation, prior to the forfeiture of the charter of the corporation, resumes each his original status with all the rights appertaining thereto, including, as to the stockholders, the right on dissolution of the corporation to a proportionate division of the assets thereof. It follows that, during the time that "forfeiture" of the corporate franchise obtains, both the corporation and its stockholders are in a state of legal existence, with the corporate power to voluntarily act as a legal entity removed; but the sovereign power which may exercise the right of suspension of such corporate powers with reference to voluntary contractual ability on the part of the corporation, may also retain in behalf of the corporation certain duties and burdens, including the involuntary, yet legal, assumption by the corporation of those liabilities which, by virtue of other regulatory provisions of the law, would ordinarily be cast upon the corporation. In the instant case, a just debt in the form of a judgment subsisted against the the corporation prior to the loss by it of its corporate charter. That debt was paid by the plaintiff herein for the benefit of the corporation and its stockholders, and thereupon an implied obligation, not of the choosing of the corporation, but cast upon it by operation of law, came into existence on the part of the corporation and its stockholders to reimburse the plaintiff.

The purpose of the Legislature, in decreeing a penalty of temporary loss of corporate powers for the failure of the corporation to pay its state license tax, could not reasonably be held to include such an advantage as that of freeing either the corporation or its stockholders from the payment of such just debts as had accrued against the corporation prior to the forfeiture of its charter. Such a construction of the statute, with such a disastrous result, could not have been within the contemplation of either the Legislature as a whole or of any honest legislator. It follows that the judgment herein should be affirmed, other than that said judgment should be modified by striking therefrom the provision hereinbefore italicized and being the words "in which it then had any interest, or from the proceeds of such property or assets." It is so ordered; respondent to recover costs on appeal.

1. Master and servant 🔑375(2)—Injury received while transported to place of work held compensable as "arising out of and in course of employment."

Where an employee, while being transported by automobile from one of his employer's farms to another, to perform certain duties, was struck by locomotive and killed, his injuries arose out of and were in the course of his employment, within Workmen's Compensation Act.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Course of Employment.]

2. Master and servant 🔑388—Dependent of member of family of employee, entitled to compensation regardless of relationship.

Under the Workmen's Compensation Act, § 14c, a dependent of deceased employee, who is a member in good faith of his family or household, is entitled to compensation regardless of relationship by consanguinity or according to the rules of affinity or lack of such relationship.

3. Master and servant 🔑388—On showing dependency, relationship is sufficient to secure compensation.

Under the Workmen's Compensation Act, § 14c, providing for compensation to certain dependents of a deceased employee, good faith as to family or household membership is not necessary to the right of recovery of compensation under the relationship or kindred clause, such right existing by force of relationship alone, if dependency is shown.

4. Master and servant 🔑388—Aunt of deceased employee held dependent member of his family within Compensation Act.

Where deceased had been in effect adopted by his maternal aunt and was domiciled at her residence, and she was in part dependent upon him, the aunt held in good faith a dependent member of his household within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, § 14c.

5. Master and servant 🔑388—Minor held not member of employer's family.

That an employer of a minor, who intended to return to the residence of his aunt with whom he lived, expected to employ him as long as he gave satisfaction, did not make him a member of the employer's household so as to defeat the claim of his aunt for compensation for his death as a dependent member in good faith of his household, under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 14c.

6. Domicile 🔑4(2) — Domicile of minor not changed by absence for temporary employment.

Under Pol. Code, § 52, subds. 1 and 7, where a minor left his residence with his maternal aunt for purpose of accepting employment and intended to return, his residence or domicile was not changed.

7. Master and servant 🔑388—Emancipation held to make compensation claimant member of minor employee's family.

Under Civ. Code, § 211, where mother abandoned her child which was reared by his maternal aunt, mother's disclaimer in proceedings by the aunt for compensation for the death of the minor, held, in effect, an acknowledgment of emancipation, so that his residence established with his aunt made her a member of his household in good faith, as required by Workmen's Compensation Act, § 14c.

8. Domicile 🔑5—Parent not entitled to custody of child has no right to control residence.

Parent not entitled to the custody of a child has no right to the control over his residence given by Civ. Code, § 213.

9. Master and servant 🔑388—Deceased need not be head of household "of" dependent.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 14c, it is not necessary that deceased employee be head or master of the household of which dependent is member, the words "of such employee" being words of identification and relation rather than words of proprietorship or possession, and the preposition "of" meaning associated with or connected with, usually in some causal relation, efficient, material, formal, or final.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Of.]

10. Statutes 🔑184—Language must be construed to effect its evident object and purpose.

The language of an act must be construed to effect its evident object and purpose.

11. Master and servant 🔑348—Compensation Act liberally construed.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 69, it must be liberally construed to effect its purposes, as expressed in section 1.

12. Master and servant 🔑388—Beneficiary within Compensation Act.

All that is necessary to render one a beneficiary of the Workmen's Compensation Act is a bona fide family or household, and the existence of dependency of a member thereof.

13. Master and servant 🔑416—Finding in language of Compensation Act sufficient.

A finding of the Industrial Accident Commission in the literal language of the Workmen's Compensation Act, as to family or household membership, is sufficient to support an award to a dependent.

14. Master and servant 🔑417(1)—Insurer need not apply for a second rehearing before applying for writ of review.

Under the Workmen's Compensation Act, § 67a, giving any party affected 30 days after application for a rehearing is denied or if granted, 30 days after rendition of a decision on rehearing, to apply for a writ of review, liability insurer need not apply for second rehearing before applying for a writ of review.

Frank J. Creede and John J. Taheny, both of San Francisco, for amicus curiæ State Compensation Insurance Fund.

SEAWELL, J. Application for a writ to review and annul an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission.

The employee in this case was an illegitimate male child. The writ raises the question whether the applicant, widow and sister of the full blood of the mother of said illegitimate minor child, and therefore a maternal aunt, and who received him at birth into her family and treated him in all respects as her child and a member of her family, and which child had, from the time he was physically able to do so, contributed to the support of said aunt and her minor children and was so contributing at the time he was accidentally killed in the performance of services which were in the course of and arose out of his employment, is entitled to compensation within the intent and meaning of the dependency provisions of section 14(c) of the "Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act" of this state (St. 1917, p. 831) which read as follows:

> "No person shall be considered a dependent of any deceased employee unless in good faith a member of the family or household of such employee, or unless such person bears to such employee the relation of husband or wife, child, posthumous child, adopted child or stepchild, father or mother, father-in-law or mother-in-law, grandfather or grandmother, brother or sister, uncle or aunt, brother-in-law or sister-in-law, nephew or niece."

The commission, upon a rehearing, specifically found that said illegitimate minor had since infancy lived in the home of the applicant, and his absence therefrom at the time he was killed was temporary merely: further, that applicant was in good faith a member of the family or household of said illegitimate minor at the time of his death; that applicant was his aunt on his maternal side, and is entitled to all the rights and benefits of an aunt under the compensation act that could be conferred upon legitimacy; that section 1388, Civil Code of California, substantially legitimatizes illegitimate children as far as relatives on the maternal side are concerned, and thereby furnishes an exception to the common-law rule that such children are nullius filius; that said illegitimate child left surviving him said applicant, and she was a member of the family or household of said employee, and was partially dependent upon him for support.

Such findings only as are necessary to sustain the commission's award will be noticed.

[1] Said minor was at the time of his death an employee of T. W. Harlan, the owner of two large farms situate near Willows, Colusa county, but separated by some distance. Said minor, in company with four other employees, was being transported by automobile from one of said farms or ranches to the other to perform certain duties. In crossing the railroad track of the Southern Pacific Company, the automobile containing said employees was struck by a locomotive, causing the death of four of said employees, including said minor, and wounding the fifth. That the injuries inflicted upon said employees, and which resulted in death, arose out of and were in the course of their employment within the meaning of the compensation act, we have no doubt. That question was decided by this court's refusal to grant a writ of review, wherein the circumstances of this accident were fully related and finally determined in a proceeding instituted by the widow of one of said employees in the case entitled "T. W. Harlan et al. v. Industrial Accident Commission et al.," S. F. No. 10927. We are not disposed to again review those findings.

It cannot successfully be disputed, and we do not understand that it is disputed, that applicant was partially dependent upon said minor for her support. A determination of that issue in applicant's favor leaves but two questions remaining for solution, to wit, "Has applicant shown herself to be included within the enumeration of persons who are entitled to claim as legal dependents as specified in section 14(c) of the Compensation Act?" second, "Has petitioner insurance company lost its right to apply for a writ of review for the reason that it did not apply to respondent Industrial Accident Commission for a rehearing of the decision rendered after a rehearing once granted?" In other words, was petitioner required to petition for a second rehearing before it was entitled to apply for the writ herein prayed for?

[2, 3] Returning to a consideration of the first proposition, it is quite clear that section 14(c) provides that if either of the two conditions or relationships described therein exist the dependent person is entitled to the benefits conferred by the statute. The first requirement is satisfied by establishing that the dependent was a member in good faith of the family or household of the employee. In such a case no question of relationship by consanguinity or according to the rules of affinity is involved. If it be determined that the applicant was in good faith a member of the family or household of said employee, then it becomes immaterial what the degree of relationship was, if any, that existed between applicant and said employee. On the other hand, good faith as to family or household membership is not a necessary prerequisite to the right of recovery under the relationship or kindred clause. Such right exists by force of relationship alone, if dependency is shown.

[4] A determination of the question whether dependent was "in good faith a member of the family or household of such employee" (said minor), as that clause must be construed, requires a brief review of the uncontradicted evidence given at the hearing.

Said minor was, at the time he met his death, of the age of 18 years and unmarried. He was born out of wedlock, at the home of applicant. His mother was a young woman who had been deluded into the belief that she had been lawfully wedded to the father of said minor under a contract of marriage. Upon discovering the invalidity of common-law marriages in this state, and realizing the ignominy of her condition, she became embittered against the man who had deceived her, refused to consent to a solemnization of marriage with him, repudiated and abandoned the child, and went her way. Applicant took said minor into her family, gave it the family name, and reared it as a twin brother of her eldest son, who was born two months after the birth of said illegitimate child. The family at that time and until augmented by the birth of her son consisted of applicant, her husband, and said illegitimate child. Subsequently two other children, a son and daughter, were born as the issue of applicant and her husband. None of applicant's children to the day of the death of said illegitimate child knew or had ever suspected, nor did said illegitimate child itself know, that he was not in fact a brother. Applicant and her husband were afterwards divorced. The wife retained the custody of said illegitimate child and her two younger children, while her older son went to live for a time with his father, who later married. Applicant, being without sufficient funds or property to support herself and children, was compelled to seek employment, offering herself as nurse, hairdresser and physical culturalist. Said illegitimate minor upon arriving at an earning age was employed by a firm at Vancouver, where the family was then residing, at a wage of $15 per week. He turned the whole of his earnings over to his putative mother for the support of the family. Later he attended an auto school, and in March, 1923, applicant moved with her family to San Francisco. There said minor was employed during the months of April, May, and June, 1923, at a wage of $18.50 per week. Applicant was then in poor health and under the care of a physician. She had recently removed from Vancouver to San Francisco with the expectation of re-establishing herself in the business in which she had formerly engaged. Finding her health broken, and being depleted in finances and said minor being without present employment, she chanced to meet said T. W. Harlan, of Willows, in San Francisco, and made the arrangements whereby said minor was to be employed to operate farm tractors at the place where six days later he lost his life. It was the understanding between applicant and said minor that his employment at Willows was only temporary, and that he was to return to her and the family just as soon as she could rehabilitate and establish herself in business in San Francisco, which was the family home. It was the intention and understanding that he would remain in the employ of Mr. Harlan until the following Christmas holidays.

[5] The fact that Mr. Harlan expected to employ said minor as long as he gave satisfaction is not proof that he was a member of his family or household. Any employer of labor would have said as much. But this does not bind the employee to change his domestic relations or residence. He was at best an employee. When he failed to give satisfaction as such he was no longer entitled to remain in the household. Petitioner quotes a portion of applicant's testimony with reference to the time when said minor was to return to his home, which was dependent upon the time required by her to "get her business going." The answer given by the witness, to the effect that said minor was to come to her if he could, had reference to her ability to complete her plans within a definite period. As soon as and when this was done he was to come to her. This portion of her testimony, read with reference to its context, makes it perfectly clear that it was the intention of both parties that said minor's absence was in the performance of temporary employment. There is absolutely nothing in the evidence which would justify the inference that the household or family ties had become severed. If the separation, under the circumstances of the situation before us, can be regarded as a severance of family or household relations there would be but few families or households that could be said to be intact. Such a relationship resting upon 18 years of reciprocal acknowledgment of parent and child is not to be lightly set aside.

[6] According to the intention of said minor his place of residence or domicile was not changed by his temporary employment at Willows. Applying section 52, Political Code, subdivisions 1 and 7, there can be no doubt as to the residence of said minor. Subdivision 1 provides that, "It is the place where one remains when not called elsewhere for labor or other special or temporary purpose, and to which he returns in seasons of repose;" * * * subdivision 7 provides that, "The residence can be changed only by the union of act and intent." It was clearly not the intention of said minor to change his residence to Willows. In this case there had been a clear abandonment by the mother, and the aunt stood in her place.

[7, 8] Abandonment by the parent is presumptive evidence that the parent relinquishes all right of controlling and receiving the earnings of his or her child. Section 211, Civ. Code. A parent not entitled to the custody of a child has no right to control his residence. Section 213, Civ. Code. The natural mother of said minor, while not expressly acknowledging maternity in herself, caused to be filed with the Commission her affidavit disclaiming any interest in or to any compensation that might be found to be owing on account of the death of said minor. She avers that she "has no interest in or no right to any compensation; that she has never received any money from, and has never been dependent in any manner nor to any extent whatsoever upon, said deceased, and to the best of her knowledge and belief 'applicant' was and is the sole person dependent upon said deceased, and the sole person having any right to or interest in such compensation." The disclaimer in effect amounts to an acknowledgment of emancipation if abandonment was doubtful, and would be sufficient to free the child from her parental control. There were but two persons who could have exercised the right to control the residence of said minor child, to wit, the applicant, with whom he had always resided and to whom he had rendered obedience, and the minor himself. The home of applicant in the city of San Francisco was selected as the residence of both. Domicile could not be more firmly established than it is shown to be by the facts and circumstances of this case. We feel satisfied that the abuses which have been suggested by the amicus curiæ, will find no protection in this opinion by reason of the conclusion compelled by the evidence, and as found by the Commission to the effect that the applicant was in good faith a member of said minor's household as herein construed. Proof of good faith more impressive in its convincing force can scarcely be imagined than that which is found in the tragic story of the birth, life, and death of this unfortunate youth, and the commendable efforts of the putative mother to lift him from without the shadow of illegitimacy by giving him a name and a place in her family. Her example in this respect will furnish no encouragement for those who would improvise family relationships for fraudulent purposes.

[9] We now come to a consideration of the effect to be given to the words "of such employee" as used in section 14(c) of the Compensation Act, which reads: "No person shall be considered a dependent of any deceased employee unless in good faith a member of the family or household of such employee. * * *" It is petitioner's claim that a natural construction of this clause would exclude applicant from the class which the act was designed to benefit. In other words, it is contended that it is not sufficient to show that said deceased employee was in good faith a member of applicant's family or household, or that both were members of or belonged to the same family or household, but it must appear that the applicant was a member of the family or household of which said deceased employee was the head or master. Such a restricted construction would tend to defeat rather than to promote the purpose of the act. We think that petitioner has lost sight of the object and purpose of the law. It is not to be doubted that the words "of such employee," are words of identification and relation rather than words of proprietorship or possession within the contemplation of the act. In this connection the preposition "of" is very commonly used and has a meaning well understood. The Standard Dictionary thus defines it. "(1) Associated or connected with, usually in some causal relation, efficient, material, formal or final." It will be noted that the act does not employ the term "head of the family," for the reason, doubtless, that the head of the family or person who by common consent exercises authoritative domestic control may not, in fact, be a breadwinner at all, but in many cases a dependent. The act cares for the support of dependents, and does not concern itself with the real or nominal heads of families or households, except so far as that station may have a causal relation to the support of dependents of the household.

[10, 11] The cardinal rule of statutory construction is too well settled, to the effect that the language of an act must be construed to effect its evident object and purpose, to require citations of authorities. The object and purpose of the workmen's compensation, insurance, and safety laws is so clearly stated in the following language that there can be no mistake concerning the purpose aimed to be accomplished. To this end it must be liberally construed. Section 69, Workmen's Compensation Act. Section 1, in defining the scope and intent of the act declares that "a complete system of workmen's compensation includes adequate provision for the comfort, health, safety and general welfare of any and all employees and those dependent upon them for support to the extent of relieving from the consequences of any injury incurred by employees in the course of their employment, irrespective of the fault of any party. * * *" (Italics ours.) Considering this language in connection with section 14(c) it is very apparent that applicant comes within the intent of said section, and must be regarded as a dependent member of the family of the deceased employee and entitled to the benefits conferred by the statute.

[12] We do not think that the Legislature intended to prescribe over-nice rules by which the head of a family should be determined. It may often become a very difficult question in cases of broken families, where increasing responsibilities fall upon the individual members of the household in proportion to their ability to sustain them, to determine which one is the technical head of the family. Such responsibilities are often divided and shifted from one to the other and depend upon many varying circumstances peculiar to the particular family. The Workmen's Compensation Act does not, in our opinion, make the question of dependency rest upon such refinements. All that it requires is a bona fide family or household and the existence of dependency of a member thereof as illustrated by the facts of the instant case.

While the precise question now under consideration is a new one in this state, it was decided by the Supreme Court of Michigan in Peay v. Fred Kulow & Co., 226 Mich. 512, 197 N. W. 1020. In that case neither the facts nor the statute were as favorable to the claims of the dependent as the facts and law in the instant case are to this applicant. The statute of that state provided:

> "No person shall be considered a dependent unless he or she is a member of the family of the deceased employee, or unless such person bears to said deceased employee, the relation of husband or widow, or lineal descendant, or ancestor, or brother or sister."

It will be observed that our statute is broader inasmuch as it ex industria includes a member of the household as well as a member of the family, and extends the line of collateral kindred. In that case a youth of the age of 14 years, whose parents had died, went to live and make his home with his aunt. His status with his aunt's family was the same as that of a son. When working he contributed a portion of his wages to said aunt. The lad found employment at Detroit while the aunt lived in Youngstown, Ohio. He had resided apart from her for a period of 3 years but contributed on an average of $10 per month to her support. While at work he fell, and died from the effects of the injuries so received. The point made in that case, as here, was that he was not a member of the aunt's family, and therefore she could not recover under the compensation act of the state of Michigan. The court, in its discussion of this objection, said:

> "Counsel construes this statute to mean that no one outside of the specific blood classes can be a dependent, unless he or she is a member of a family of which the deceased was at the head; in other words, that plaintiff was not a member of deceased's family. I am of the opinion that this construction is too restricted. The idea which underlies and which gave birth to the Compensation Law was to afford timely relief to the injured employee, and in event of his death to afford relief to persons who were receiving care and support from him. In view of this, it would be more nearly in accord with the spirit of the statute to construe it to apply to any person who was a member of the same family of which the deceased was a member. It is not uncommon to hear a wife speak of her family, her church or her lodge, not because she is at the head of the family, church, or lodge, but to indicate her relation to them. It is not one of those cases where the word 'of' is used as a sign of possession, but it is used rather to indicate his relation to the family. It appears to me that the language of the statute was used in this sense. Had the Legislature intended the statute to have the meaning contended for, may we not assume it would have indicated 'the family of which the deceased was at the head?' If the construction contended for is to prevail, foster parents can never, under these circumstances, take an award from one who was a member of the family, and had been cared for and treated as a child. The deceased had been taken when a young boy, and given a home, and treated as a son in plaintiff's family. He was unmarried, and plaintiff's home was the only home he had, and he was contributing to the upkeep and maintenance of that home. We think it is within the spirit of the statute to hold that plaintiff was a member of the same family that deceased was a member of, and hence comes within the class of dependents that are entitled to an award."

[13] The finding of the Commission in the literal language of the act as to family or household membership is sufficient to support the award under the construction we have given the act.

In view of our construction of section 14(c), Workmen's Compensation Act, it becomes unnecessary to consider the rules of succession as affecting illegitimates as they existed at common law, or as since modified by the statute of this state and many of our sister states. We are not here considering a statute of succession, which was the subject of consideration by most, if not all, of the cases cited by petitioner. The real question is pointedly discussed in Portin v. Portin, (Tenn.) 261 S. W. 362, wherein it is said:

> "The Workmen's Compensation Act is not a statute of descent or distribution. It was intended to relieve society of the burden of caring for injured workmen or the dependents of deceased workmen, and to place that burden upon the industry employing the workman. In case of the workman's death, the lawmakers were concerned for the case of his dependents, and not about the devolution of the workman's property. The dependency of the claimant is the true basis of his right to compensation rather than blood or marriage. Relationship is really only evidence of dependency."

In Scott's Case, 117 Me. 436, 104 Atl. 794, it is said:

> "It is a well-recognized rule of construction of acts of this kind, however, and expressly enjoined upon those whose duty it is to administer this statute, that it shall be construed liberally with a view to carrying out its general purpose, and not strictly as other statutes in derogation of common-law rights usually are." * * *

See, also, Piccinim v. Conn. Light & Power Co., 93 Conn. 423, 106 Atl. 330.

A decision on the question of legal succession, so far as the illegitimacy of said minor is concerned, is rendered unnecessary by reason of the conclusion we have reached as to said minor's status in applicant's household, and the findings of the Commission on the issue of succession are not, for the reasons heretofore assigned, material.

[14] Only one other question, which is raised by respondent, remains for consideration, to wit, whether petitioner, Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, Limited, has lost its right to apply to this court for a writ of review for the reason that it did not apply to respondent Industrial Accident Commission for hearing after rehearing once granted.

We think the act furnishes no substantial grounds for the claim that a second petition for a rehearing is required before an application may be made to this court for a writ of review. The act contemplates a speedy determination of questions involving the right to compensation, and the Commission is given broad powers to the end that long delays may be avoided. It is the policy of the law in general practice to consider but one application for a rehearing, and there is less justification for an exception to this rule in proceedings that are somewhat summary in character, as the act under consideration undoubtedly is. The language of section 67(a) is determinative of the question against respondent's claim. It provides:

> "Within thirty days after the application for a rehearing is denied, or, if the application is granted, within thirty days after the rendition of the decision on the rehearing, any party affected thereby may apply to the supreme court of this state, or to the district court of appeal of the appellate district in which such person resides, for a writ of certiorari or review, hereinafter referred to as a writ of review, for the purpose of having the lawfulness of the original order, rule, regulation, decision or award, or the order, rule, regulation, decision or award on rehearing inquired into and determined."

From the above language it will be noted that any party affected by the Commission's decision may apply to this court or to the District Court of Appeal for a writ of review without petitioning for a second rehearing. The case of Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 190 Cal. 97, 210 Pac. 628, is an authority supporting what we have here said. The reasoning in Carroll et al. v. Industrial Commission of Colorado et al., 69 Colo. 473, 195 Pac. 1097, 19 A. L. R. 107, and Schrewe v. New York Cent R. R. Co., 192 Mich. 170, 158 N. W. 337, is also applicable to the question.

The award is affirmed.

SUNTER v. FRASER et al. (S. F. 10465.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1924.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑184(2) — One falsely imprisoned may not recover on policeman's bond.

Under Const. art. 11, §§ 6, 8, as amended in 1914, empowering cities to make and enforce all laws and regulations respecting municipal affairs, subject only to charter restrictions and amendment to Eureka City Charter, art. 3, § 22, taking advantage of such privilege, one falsely arrested and imprisoned by an Eureka policeman may not recover on his official bond, running to the city as obligee.

2. Officers 🔑135—At common law only obligee may sue on bond of public official.

At common law, only the obligee named in the bond of a public official can maintain an action on it.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑79 — Power over municipal affairs restricted by charter only.

Under Const. art. 11, §§ 6, 8, as amended in 1914, and amendment to Eureka City Charter, of art. 3, § 22, the powers of that city over its municipal affairs became all-embracing, restricted by its charter only, and independent of control by general laws.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action for damages for false arrest and imprisonment by Janet Sunter against John M. Fraser and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Pierce H. Ryan and A. G. Bradford, both of Eureka, for appellants.

J. Logan Beamer and Henry L. Ford, both of Eureka, for respondent.

WASTE, J. This case was transferred to the Supreme Court after decision and judgment in the District Court of Appeal, for the reason that the principal question involved is a new one in this state, and it was thought well to give the opposing parties further opportunity to present their respective views. After such presentation and examination of the matter, we are satisfied that the conclusion reached by the District Court of Appeal in and for the First Appellate District, Division 2, on the first point presented by the appeal, is correct, and conclusively settled all of the matters involved in the present litigation. We therefore approve and adopt, as the opinion of this court, the following portion of the decision prepared by Mr. Justice Nourse:

"This is an appeal from a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant Fraser, a police officer of the city of Eureka, and the defendants Hodges and McDonough, as sureties upon his official bond. The complaint was framed in three causes of action, alleging, respectively, that the defendant Fraser had breached the obligations of his official bond in that he had subjected the plaintiff to a false arrest, that he had committed a physical assault upon her in making the arrest, and that he had falsely imprisoned her as a result of the arrest. The verdict of the jury upon which the judgment rests awarded the plaintiff $2,000 against the defendant Fraser and $1,000 against the defendants Hodges and McDonough. In each cause of action the complaint relies upon the alleged breach by the defendant Fraser of the conditions of his official bond; the allegations in each case being that he 'committed a breach of his said official bond as aforesaid in that by reason of the premises as aforesaid he did not faithfully perform his official duties.'

"The facts of the case are, generally, * * * that the defendant Fraser, while acting in the course of his official duties, attempted to restrain the plaintiff under the belief that she was insane or at least irrational at the time, and that she immediately became either hysterical or 'fighting mad,' as a result of which the two became engaged in a tussle. This became so violent on the plaintiff's part that the defendant Fraser was required to call a citizen to assist him in making the arrest. These two thereupon forcibly took the plaintiff to the city prison, where she was booked upon a charge of disturbing the peace and turned over to the police matron, who kept her in her own home for the remainder of the night. The plaintiff was released early on the following morning, and a few days later, upon a hearing before the police court, the charge of disturbing the peace laid against her was dismissed.

"On this appeal the appellants urge that, inasmuch as the bond upon which the suit is based was given to the city of Eureka in accordance with the terms of the municipal charter, it does not inure to the benefit of an individual who has been offended by the acts of the police officer, and that accordingly the respondent in this action could not maintain her suit upon this bond or against these sureties. The position of the appellants is that, the city of Eureka having expressly provided in its charter the form of bond to be given by its public officials, and having therein provided that the city of Eureka should be the obligee of said bonds, and there being no statutory authorization for someone other than the named obligee to sue for a breach of the bond, the common-law rule requiring the obligee to be the actual party plaintiff obtains. Respondent answers that the case is controlled by section 961 of the Political Code, which authorizes any person injured or aggrieved to bring suit on an official bond in his own name. In reply * * * appellants point out that section 961 is a part of article 9, which covers the subject of official bonds to be given by state, county and township officers only (Rowe v. Rose, 26 Cal. App. 744, 745, 148 Pac. 535), and that all such bonds are required by section 958 to be made payable to the state of California 'with such conditions as required by this chapter.' In section 961 it is then provided that such a bond 'is in force and obligatory upon the principal and sureties therein to and for the state of California, and to and for the use and benefit of all persons who may be injured or aggrieved by the wrongful act or default of such officer in his official capacity; and any person so injured or aggrieved may bring suit.' (Italics ours.)

[1, 2] "Conceding, as we must, that the subject of requiring bonds of municipal officers and employees is a municipal affair, and that the provisions of the municipal charter relating to a municipal affair are controlling over the general state laws, the question arises whether, without express statutory authority, an individual aggrieved by an act or default of a municipal officer may sue upon his bond which runs solely to the benefit of the municipality. The question is a new one in this state, and there is therefore no California authority to aid us in a solution of the question. An examination of authorities from other jurisdictions satisfies us that the accepted rule is that under the common law an action upon a bond of a public official could be maintained only by the obligee named in the bond, and that, unless the right has been given to an individual by statute to maintain such an action in his own name, the right does not exist.

"The leading case upon this subject seems to be City of Eaton Rapids v. Stump, 127 Mich. 1, 86 N. W. 438, 89 Am. St. Rep. 451, in which, in a case similar to the case at bar, the Supreme Court of Michigan say: 'The bond was not given for the protection of third parties, but for the protection of the city alone. * * * There is no statute in this state providing that such actions may be brought on such a bond, in the interest of or for the benefit of a third party, for damages arising by the act or omission of such appointive officer. Our statutes do provide for actions on official bonds, but suits by third parties on bonds given by appointive municipal officers are not included, and without the aid of some statute no such suit can be maintained. * * * The bond in this case runs to the city of Eaton Rapids, and not to the people. The rule as stated by Murfree on Official Bonds is as follows: "The primary object of an official bond is, of course, to protect the interest of the beneficiary named in it—the state, county, corporation, etc., as the case may be. By statute, however, it is usually provided that bonds given by officers of states and counties shall be available to protect the interests of private persons who may be aggrieved by the breach of such bonds. They cannot be used, however, for these purposes in cases unprovided for by such statutory enactment."' (Italics ours.) To the same effect are Carr v. Knoxville, 144 Tenn. 483, 234 S. W. 328, 19 A. L. R. 69; Alexander v. Ison, 107 Ga. 745, 33 S. E. 657; State v. Stout, 26 Ind. App. 446, 59 N. E. 1091; U. S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co. v. Jasper, 56 Tex. Civ. App. 236, 120 S. W. 1145; Cushing v. Lickert, 79 Neb. 384, 112 N. W. 616; U. S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co. v. Crittenden, 62 Tex. Civ. App. 283, 131 S. W. 232.

"In Alexander v. Ison, supra, the action was one to recover damages for false arrest and imprisonment. The defendants were the police officer and the sureties on his official bond, which ran to the city in accord with the municipal charter. The Georgia court held that the sureties were not liable to the plaintiff, saying: 'Being an entire stranger to the contract, it would require express legislative authority to give him a right of action thereon. Apparently the bond taken in the present instance was solely for the protection and benefit of the city in its corporate capacity.' Section 12 of the Georgia Political Code contained the same provision for suits by individuals as is found in section 961 of our Code, but the court, in the Alexander Case, said that this applied only to the public officers who owed a duty to the state at large, but not to a municipal officer, who is required by special legislation to give such a bond as the mayor and council 'may deem necessary to the proper protection of the city itself.'"

The District Court of Appeal is correct in its conclusion that no express statutory authority can be found under which the plaintiff may maintain this present action. The charter of the city of Eureka is silent on the subject, and section 961 of the Political Code does not apply. Whatever may have been the situation prior to the adoption of certain amendments to the state Constitution and to the charter of the city, plaintiff's right of action here sought to be maintained is now foreclosed. Cases cited and relied on by the respondent, but which were decided prior to these amendments to the Constitution, no longer have any controlling application. The charter of the city of Eureka was adopted in 1895. In 1896 section 6 of article 11 of the state Constitution was amended to provide, in respect to cities operating under freeholders' charters, that "all charters thereof framed or adopted by authority of this constitution, except in municipal affairs, shall be subject to and controlled by general laws." It was thereafter held by this court that, with respect to matters not municipal, or municipal affairs upon which the charter was silent, the provisions of any general law pertaining thereto would control the subject. Fragley v. Phelan, 126 Cal. 383, 395, 58 Pac. 923; Clouse v. City of San Diego, 159 Cal. 434, 437, 114 Pac. 573. It was also held that when a charter which was previously silent was amended so as to make a provision upon such municipal affair, that provision would would immediately suspend the general law so far as the two were in conflict. Byrne v. Drain, 127 Cal. 663, 667, 60 Pac. 433.

[3] In 1914, however, sections 6 and 8 of article 11 of the Constitution were amended by making important changes in the provisions thereof relating to the adoption of freeholders' charters and the effect thereof. In section 6 the provision relating to municipal affairs was changed to read as follows: "Cities and towns hereafter organized under charters framed and adopted by authority of this constitution are hereby empowered, and cities and towns heretofore organized by authority of this constitution may amend their charters in the manner authorized by this constitution so as to become likewise empowered hereunder, to make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in their several charters, and in respect to other matters they shall be subject to and controlled by general laws." In section 8 this clause was inserted: "It shall be competent in any charter framed under the authority of this section to provide that the municipality governed thereunder may make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in their several charters and in respect to other matters they shall be subject to general laws."

In 1917 the city of Eureka availed itself of the privilege given to it by the amendments of sections 6 and 8 of the Constitution, supra, and amended section 22 of article 3 of its freeholders' charter to provide that thereafter the city should "have the power to make and enforce any and all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in this charter as the same now is or as it may be hereafter amended; * * * and no enumeration or specific statement herein of any particular powers shall be held to be exclusive or a limitation of the foregoing general grant of powers." Stats. 1917, p. 1743. By this amendment to its charter the city brought itself within the conditions of the amendments of 1914 to sections 6 and 8 of article 11 of the Constitution. Thereupon, according to the terms of those sections, its powers over municipal affairs became all-embracing, restricted and limited by the charter only. The result is that the city has become independent of control by general laws upon municipal affairs. Civic Center Association v. R. R. Comm., 175 Cal. 441, 448, 166 Pac. 351.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider the additional grounds urged by the appellants for a reversal.

The judgment is reversed.

GILBERT et al. v. MILLER.

SAME v. BAIRD. (Civ. 4101, 4102.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 30, 1924.)

1. Corporations 🔑404(1)—Secretary has no implied authority to assign or transfer assets of corporation.

The secretary of a corporation has no right to assign or transfer assets of a corporation without authority from the board of directors.

2. Bills and notes 🔑489(6)—One claiming under assignment must allege and prove valid assignment.

In action on notes by one claiming as assignee thereof, plaintiff must both allege and prove valid assignment.

3. Bills and notes 🔑523—Evidence held sufficient to overcome prima facie evidence of ownership of notes by indorsees thereof.

In action on notes by indorsees, prima facie evidence of ownership, made out by plaintiff's production of notes indorsed by secretary of corporation to which they were payable, was overcome by uncontradicted evidence that secretary had no authority to make indorsements, so as to sustain finding that plaintiffs were not owners of notes.

4. Corporations 🔑417, 466—Attempted release of claim against corporation, made to secretary, held a nullity, and not consideration for indorsement of notes to it.

An attempted release by attorneys of claim against corporation for legal services was a nullity, because made to secretary and not accepted by directors, and not a consideration for indorsement by secretary to attorneys of notes payable to corporation.

5. Bills and notes 🔑452(2)—Rule stated as to when defense of want of title not available.

Defense of want of title in plaintiffs to notes sued on cannot be interposed in absence of bad faith, if plaintiffs have possession of notes, and defendants would be protected by payment of any judgment on notes.

6. Bills and notes 🔑452(2)—Defense of want of title held available against indorsees in possession suing on notes.

Where corporation remains owner of notes payable to it, notwithstanding unauthorized indorsement of them by its secretary to plaintiffs, fact of possession of notes by plaintiffs will not prevent corporation from suing thereon, and therefore makers may interpose defense of want of title in action by indorsee, though bad faith is absent.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Actions by W. I. Gilbert and another against R. E. Miller and against Robert J. Baird. From a judgment in each case in favor of defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Alonzo D. Hitchcock, of Van Nuys, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. These actions were instituted to recover upon two promissory notes, each for the sum of $750, one executed by the defendant Miller and the other executed by the defendant Baird, in favor of the Oak Forest Development Association, a corporation. Judgement went for the defendants in each action, and plaintiffs appeal therefrom.

There is practically no dispute as to the facts of the case. They are substantially as follows: The plaintiffs claimed that said association was indebted to them in the sum of $1,500 for legal services performed by them for said association. They demanded a settlement of their claim, and the secretary of said association indorsed and delivered to them the two promissory notes sued on. The notes were indorsed, "Oak Forest Development Association, by A. E. Place, Secretary." The secretary had no authority from the board of directors of said association to indorse said notes, nor to deliver them to the plaintiffs, nor was his act, in indorsing and delivering said notes to the plaintiffs, ever ratified by said board of directors. Neither was there any provision in the by-laws of said association whereby any authority was conferred upon the secretary of said association, either to indorse, transfer, or deliver said notes. The answer to the complaint in each case denied that the note sued on therein was ever assigned or transferred to plaintiffs, or that plaintiffs were the owners thereof. The court found that the Oak Forest Development Association had never assigned or transferred either of said notes to plaintiffs, and that plaintiffs were not the owners of either of said notes. Plaintiffs, in appealing from the judgments herein, attack this finding of the court.

[1, 2] It is well settled in this state that the secretary of a corporation has no right to assign or transfer the assets of the corporation, without authority is given him so to do by the board of directors. Read v. Buffum, 79 Cal. 77, 21 Pac. 555, 12 Am. St. Rep. 131; Buena Vista Oil Co. v. Park Bank of L. A., 39 Cal. App. 710–715, 180 Pac. 12. One claiming under an assignment must both allege and prove a valid assignment. Bovard v. Dickenson, 131 Cal. 162, 63 Pac. 162; Lapique v. Denis, 23 Cal. App. 683, 139 Pac. 237.

[3] A case very similar to the one before us is that of Read v. Buffum, supra, in which the Supreme Court states the law as follows:

> "In order to maintain his action, it was necessary for the plaintiff to allege an assignment to him by the California Powder Works of the claim sued on, and the denial of that allegation by the defendant cast the burden of proving it upon the plaintiff. This he attempted and failed to do. The secretary of the company, who executed the assignment on which plaintiff relies, is not shown to have had any power to make it."

The case before us is even stronger than that of Read v. Buffum, supra, where the evidence failed to show that the secretary of the company had authority to make the assignment. In the present case, the undisputed evidence is that the secretary had no authority, expressed or implied, to assign or transfer the notes to the plaintiffs. The authorities above referred to appear to be decisive of the question involved in this appeal, and to sustain the findings of the trial court, to the effect that the Oak Forest Development Company never assigned or transferred to plaintiffs the promissory notes, and that plaintiffs were not the owners thereof.

Appellants have called our attention to the cases of Dyer v. Sebrell, 135 Cal. 597, 67 Pac. 1036, and Linder Hardware Co. v. Pacific Sugar Corporation, 17 Cal. App. 81, 118 Pac. 785, 789. They insist that, according to the doctrine laid down in these cases, the assignment of the notes to them was legal and binding upon all parties in interest. In the case of Dyer v. Sebrell, supra, the evidence showed that the plaintiff was the cashier of the Riverside Banking Company, and that she assigned to herself a promissory note belonging to the bank and executed by the defendant. She then instituted an action to collect the note, and the Supreme Court held that:

> "The cashier of a bank can indorse negotiable paper and convey the legal title to it to any person but himself. An indorsement to himself would be voidable merely at the instance of the bank, and, until avoided by the bank, would pass legal title to the cashier."

Evidently the authority of a cashier of a bank to indorse and transfer negotiable paper is much broader than that of the secretary of an ordinary commercial corporation. In the case of Linder Hardware Co. v. Pacific Sugar Corporation, supra, the note sued upon was executed by the defendant in favor of the Studebaker Bros. Co., a corporation. It was indorsed and assigned to the plaintiff by the treasurer of the Studebaker Bros. Co. There was no evidence as to the authority of the treasurer to make said indorsement. The court held in that case:

> "We think it was rightly admitted in evidence. Possession of commercial paper, with indorsement, makes a prima facie case of delivery by the indorser to the holder and of ownership of the latter."

A petition to the Supreme Court for a rehearing was filed in this case and denied. Chief Justice Beatty, in dissenting from the order denying a rehearing, said:

> "There was a plain and direct issue as to the assignment of the note given by defendant to Studebaker Bros. Co., and the plaintiff was bound to make proof of that fact. In my opinion the proof was wholly insufficient."

The rule enunciated in this case was also commented upon unfavorably in a note appearing in 11 A. L. R. 957. But, giving to this case full weight as an authority upon the question considered therein, we still question it as controlling upon the point involved in the present case. All that the court held in the case of Linder Hardware Co. v. Pacific Sugar Corporation, relative to the legality of the assignment of the note, was that possession of the note, indorsed by the treasurer of the corporation, the payee therein, was prima facie evidence of ownership thereof. In the case before us the evidence showed conclusively that the secretary had no authority to indorse or assign the note sued on. The prima facie case, made out by the plaintiffs' production of the notes indorsed by the secretary, was entirely overcome by the uncontradicted evidence that the secretary had no authority, expressed or implied, to make said indorsement.

[4] The claim of appellants that they obtained title and possession of these notes for an adequate consideration cannot be maintained. This consideration, plaintiffs assert, was the release of the association and its stockholders by plaintiffs of their claim for attorney's fees. This release, if made at all, was made to the secretary of the association, who had no authority to accept it. There is no evidence that said release was ever made to the board of directors of said association or that said board ever accepted the same. Without the acceptance by the board of directors, the attempted release made by plaintiffs to the secretary amounted to a mere nullity, and, never having been accepted, is not binding upon the plaintiffs nor upon the association. Plaintiffs still have their right of action against the association upon their claim for attorney's fees.

[5] Appellants, however, claim that, notwithstanding the fact that plaintiffs are not the owners of said promissory notes, the defendant cannot escape liability, upon the ground that title thereto is not in the plaintiffs. In support of this claim plaintiffs have cited the following authorities: Gushee v. Leavitt, 5 Cal. 160, 63 Am. Dec. 116; Price v. Dunlap, 5 Cal. 483; Giselman v. Starr, 106 Cal. 651, 40 Pac. 8; Dyer v. Sebrell, 135 Cal. 597, 67 Pac. 1036; Linder Hardware Co. v. Pacific Sugar Corporation, 17 Cal. App. 81, 118 Pac. 785, 789; and Smith v. Woods, 164 Cal. 291, 128 Pac. 748. The rule laid down by these authorities is well stated in the case of Smith v. Woods, supra, as follows:

> "In the absence of bad faith an action upon a note cannot be defended upon the ground that the title is not in the plaintiff, if plaintiff has possession and defendant would be protected by the payment of any judgment on the note."

[6] There is no question of bad faith involved in this action. The plaintiffs were, at the trial of the actions, in possession of the promissory notes, and, if the defendants will be protected by the payment by them of any judgments which might be obtained against them in these actions, then, in accordance with the authorities above referred to, the defense interposed by them, of want of title to the notes by the plaintiffs, cannot be maintained. But would the defendants be protected by the payment of such judgments? The Oak Forest Development Association is still the owner of said notes. The fact that the possession of said notes is in the plaintiffs does not affect the association's title thereto, nor does such possession deprive the association of the right to institute actions upon said notes. The defendants, therefore, will not be protected against such actions by the payment of any judgments which might be obtained in the present action.

Accordingly, the defense interposed by the defendants, that plaintiffs are not the legal owners of the notes in suit, is a legal and valid defense, and the judgments in their favor must stand. The judgment in each of said actions is affirmed.

DOLLEY et al. v. RAGON et al. (Civ. 4367.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 20, 1924. As Modified July 11, 1924.)

1. Attorney and client 🔑52—To disbar attorney for misquoting record separate charges required.

So far as proceeding against attorney for misconduct in misquoting the record in his brief is in disbarment, separate disbarment charges, not bearing the title of original action, should have been filed, and informant's failure to so file required dismissal without prejudice as to disbarment matter.

2. Contempt 🔑44—Contempt charges considered after final judgment, though appeal was beyond court jurisdiction.

Notwithstanding judgment has become final, and appeal beyond appellate court's jurisdiction, the court may receive and consider any charges of contempt by an attorney in his conduct of the action.

3. Amicus curiæ 🔑1—In contempt proceeding for misquoting record on appeal, court will hear any qualified attorney.

In contempt proceedings, by one not party to appeal, against attorney for misquoting record on appeal, appellate court will hear any reputable attorney entitled to practice before it, appearing as friend of the court.

Action by L. F. Dolley and another against Edward D. Ragon and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appealed. On application by Henry G. Dent, as friend of the court, for action by the court upon accusation of misconduct of counsel. Petition entertained in part.

See, also, 228 Pac. 665.

CONREY, P. J. This court's decision on appeal in this action was filed on the 24th day of April, 1924. The case is now before the Supreme Court on petition for rehearing. On the 23d day of May, 1924, Henry G. Dent, appearing as a friend of the court, presented to the court certain charges against certain attorneys for respondents, asserting that said attorneys were guilty of misconduct in making sundry alleged misstatements in their reply brief for respondents. The court by an order entered on that day directed attention to the fact that the document filed by Mr. Dent failed to set forth any specific description or statement of the facts constituting the alleged misconduct. Thereupon the court ordered that the petition for action by the court in said matter be denied without prejudice to the informant's right to file further charges if he so desired.

Accordingly, on June 16, 1924, Mr. Dent, who is not a party to the action, filed another document entitled in said action and being "Ex parte motion and petition in bank of Henry G. Dent, informant," charging misconduct of one of said attorneys.

[1] This document is capable of being considered in part as a disbarment proceeding and in part as a contempt proceeding. In so far as it is a disbarment proceeding, it should have been filed in the form of separate charges not entitled in this action. Then, under the rule of the Supreme Court, which assigns all special proceedings to Division 2 of this district in even numbered years, the proceeding would have been automatically assigned to Division 2, where it properly belongs. In so far as the matters contained in said information or petition state the subject-matter of a disbarment proceeding, the same is hereby dismissed, without prejudice to any right which the informant may have, to institute a disbarment proceeding in proper form if he so desires.

[2] We are of the opinion, however, that, notwithstanding the fact that the judgment has become final in this court, and the appeal is now beyond our jurisdiction, nevertheless, this court has authority to receive and consider any charges of acts constituting contempt of court by an attorney in his conduct of the action. Section 1209 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares that "the following acts or omissions in respect to a court of justice, or proceedings therein, are contempts of the authority of the court: * * * 3. Misbehavior in office, or other willful neglect or violation of duty by an attorney. * * *" The court therefore retains this proceeding for the sole purpose of considering that part of the petition which charges that said attorney in his brief for respondent is guilty of willful misrepresentation of facts arising upon the record on the appeal in this action. The matters so retained are hereby designated as follows: Beginning on page 16 of the petition, the matters stated under the heading "Misconduct Relating to Assignment"; beginning on page 21, the matters stated under the heading "Misconduct Relating to References to Drilling Contract Exhibit 3"; beginning on page 28, statement under the heading "Misconduct Relating to 'the Facts'"; beginning on page 32, statement under the heading "Misconduct Relating to Allegations in the Original Complaint; also following in Amended Complaint."

[3] In his petition the informant, who is not an attorney at law, requests that he be permitted to submit to the justices of this court the names of five reputable attorneys, and that we select or express our approval that either of the five or two of the five may appear here as friends of the court. Without adopting that procedure, the court suggests that it will hear the application of any reputable attorney entitled to practice before this court who may offer to appear as a friend of the court in this proceeding. The document of more than 100 pages, filed by the informant, shows clearly enough that its voluminous contents could be far more briefly and clearly stated, and brought within the range of possibility of proper consideration by the court. The court further suggests that a copy of said petition should be delivered to the president or secretary of the Los Angeles Bar Association, so that some representative of that association duly designated by it may appear to aid in the proper disposition of the proceeding. A minute order will be entered in accordance with this opinion.

I concur: HOUSER, J.

Mr. Justice CURTIS, deeming himself disqualified, takes no part herein.

DOLLEY et ux. v. RAGON et al. (Civ. 4367.)

1. Contempt ⚷55—Court bound to examine charges of counsel's misconduct, though informant did not appear.

Where a nonprofessional friend of the court filed sworn charges of misconduct of counsel in misquoting the record, and informant, being informed of the hearing by mail at only address furnished by him, failed to appear, nevertheless the court is bound to examine for itself and see whether the record bears out the charges.

2. Contempt ⚷61(1)—Honorable and experienced member of bar entitled to careful examination of misconduct charges and vindication if not partially sustained.

Recognized, active, and honorable member of the bar, charged in good faith or otherwise, with misquoting the record in his brief, is entitled to a careful examination of the charges, and, unless partially sustained, to full and distinct vindication.

Action by L. F. Dolley and wife against Edward D. Ragon and others. On petition by Henry G. Dent as amicus curiæ, charging misconduct of an attorney for respondents. Petition dismissed.

Henry G. Dent, in pro. per.

George P. Adams, of Los Angeles, in pro. per.

PER CURIAM. This matter came on for hearing July 21, 1924. At the conclusion of the hearing, wherein an attorney for respondents was accused of acts constituting contempt of court, the decision of the court was announced orally by the presiding justice, as follows:

[1] Mr. George P. Adams was herein charged with misconduct in wrongfully misrepresenting the facts in the record; such alleged misrepresentations being contained in his brief for respondents. The court examined the petition very promptly after its filing, and made a statement, which was made a matter of record, that the whole matter was beyond the jurisdiction of this court, except in so far as there were any charges of misconduct amounting to contempt of this court. There were positive statements made in the petition that the respondents' brief filed by Mr. Adams contained false statements concerning the record, known by Mr. Adams to have been false. Of course, where a statement is made under oath by one purporting to inform the court of acts of that kind, the court is not justified in ignoring them, even though (as in this case happens to be true), the attorney against whom the charges have been made is one in whom the judges of the court, through many years of professional experience, have had complete confidence. For no one is above the law. The informant—who is not a party to the action—suggested to the court that he was not an attorney at law, and that he was willing to furnish the court with the names of five reputable attorneys practicing at the bar of this state, of whom the court might select any two to appear as friends of the court and present the matters complained of. The court, in passing preliminarily upon the application, declined to adopt that exact procedure, but stated that it stood ready to hear an explanation or prosecution of the charges by any reputable attorney who would appear for that purpose. The court has waited for some time; no one has appeared. The informant, Mr. Henry G. Dent, has been informed of this hearing, brought up at the instance of Mr. Adams; has been so informed by notice given in the only way that he has left open to give notice, for, in his communications to the court, he not only gives no residence or office address, but does specifically give his address as at a certain post office box in the city of Los Angeles. He has been notified by mail in that way, but does not appear.

Nevertheless, it is the duty of the court, I presume, in any instance where a suggestion is made of conduct constituting contempt of court, particularly where it is made under oath by one purporting to know the facts, to examine for itself and see whether the record bears out the charges. This petition was carefully examined by Mr. Justice Houser and by the presiding justice. Mr. Justice Curtis had declined to have anything to do with the decision of the appeal, and declined also to have anything to do with this proceeding, because, in a remote and indirect fashion, due to some property interest, he felt that he had a connection with the litigation, or might be thought to have had, such that it was not appropriate for him to take part in the case, although he was not technically disqualified. The examination as made by Mr. Justice Houser and by me led us to the conclusion that, upon its face, in certain paragraphs, the petition made a statement of charges which, if true, might constitute misconduct and might be contempt of court. Although the petition was not drawn in the form that a competent attorney familiar with such practice would have drawn it, nevertheless there were some of the elements there of such charges. In substance, these were charges of knowing and intentional misquotation from the record on appeal, charges capable of being tested throughout, as far as the matters are material, by comparison of the charges themselves with the brief and with matters of record. The court has gone through the record, comparing it from page to page in the course of Mr. Adams' argument, and our previous familiarity with the record enables us to pass upon the matter now without further examination.

[2] We are satisfied that in each and every instance the record contains matters which justified counsel (Mr. Adams), in his brief for respondents, in making the statements contained in his brief; and if, by chance, in any instance (but we are unable to find that such example exists), there has been any deviation from absolute and strict statement in conformity with the record, there is, nevertheless, every reason for the assumption and for the positive belief that it was mere inadvertence. Every one knows that in the course of litigations in which numerous details of extensive transactions have to be referred to, as they were referred to in this case, sometimes counsel, and sometimes the judges of the court, will commit errors, whereby a misstatement of fact may be made, or a fact may be omitted which ought to have been included in the statement. That occurs every day. No one reasonably expects perfection in such matters, and no one reasonably charges corrupt intention in the making of such errors. In this connection it is to be observed that appellants themselves never filed any reply to respondent's brief, or complained that there was any misrepresentation therein. Beyond this, we think that men are entitled to the benefit of earned reputations. Where a man has been a recognized, active, and honorable member of the bar for a long series of years, and some one, whether in good faith or otherwise, puts on record a charge of misconduct, the person so charged is entitled to a careful examination of the charges; and, unless there is something to sustain the charges, he is entitled to a full and distinct vindication. To that vindication, Mr. Adams, on the record here, is now entitled, and the court awards it.

The proceeding is dismissed.

VALENTE v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.

(Civ. 4921.)

1. Master and servant 🔑367—Workman held "independent contractor" not within Compensation Act.

One chopping wood at a certain amount per cord, who fixed his own time and hours of work, employer exercising no direction or control over work, except to designate place for cutting, and not furnishing tools, but giving him those which another had left when quitting, was an "independent contractor," not entitled to benefit of Workmen's Compensation Act.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Independent Contractor.]

2. Master and servant 🔑366—Minor compensation claimant cannot, by disaffirmance of contract, change status from independent contractor to employee.

One cannot change his status, when injured, from independent contractor to employee, so as to be within benefit of Workmen's Compensation Act, by disaffirming contract by reason of his minority.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding by Tony Valente, a minor, claimant, for compensation for injuries, under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279), opposed by A. O. Peterson, employer, and the State Compensation Insurance Fund, insurance carrier. Award of the Industrial Accident Commission denied compensation, and claimant applied for certiorari to annul it. Award affirmed.

Edmond E. Herrscher and Simeon E. Sheffey, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. Petitioner seeks an annulment of an award of the Industrial Accident Commission denying him compensation, which order was based upon a finding that petitioner at the time of the injury was an independent contractor.

[1] Petitioner, a woodchopper at the time of the injury, was chopping wood under respondent Peterson, who had a contract for the delivery of wood with the Albion Lumber Company. Petitioner was paid by the cord for such wood as he should chop, and was free to fix his hours of labor per day and days per week. Peterson did not furnish tools, but, as petitioner had none, Peterson gave him tools, which another man had left in camp upon quitting work. Except to designate the place where the wood was to be cut, Peterson exercised no direction or control over the work.

The decision of the Industrial Accident Commission was made upon the authority of Donlon Bros. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 173 Cal. 250, 159 Pac. 715; Fidelity & Deposit Co. v. Brush, 176 Cal. 448, 168 Pac. 890; and Parsons v. Industrial Accident Commission, 178 Cal. 394, 173 Pac. 585; in which the facts determinative of the status are substantially the same as in the instant case. We believe these cases are indistinguishable in any important aspect from the case at bar and are controlling.

[2] The contention that petitioner can change the status from independent contractor to employee by disaffirming the contract by reason of his minority, we think, is without merit.

Award of the Industrial Accident Commission affirmed.

BURROWES v. BOSWORTH et al.

(Civ. 4827.)

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑169(3)—Complaint by occupant against lessor for personal injuries from failure to light premises held insufficient.

Complaint by occupant, in action against landlord, based on State Housing Act, § 66, requiring artificial lights in tenement houses, alleging that defendant was owner of tenement house at time of accident to plaintiff, and that plaintiff's injuries were caused by negligence of defendant, in that hallway, toilet room, etc., at time of accident, were unlighted and dark, held insufficient to state cause of action.

2. Appeal and error 🔑916(1)—Rule stated as to presumptions on appeal from judgment on pleadings.

On appeal by plaintiff from judgment on pleadings entered on motion of defendant, court cannot indulge in inference regarding evidence which might have been produced, nor strain language of pleading to advantage of appellant; presumptions always being against pleader.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by Rachel M. Burrowes against Josephine Bosworth and another. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Philip M. Carey, of Oakland, and Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, and M. W. Dobrzensky, all of Oakland, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment on the pleadings entered upon motion of the defendant and respondent Eliza Hyde. The only question involved upon the appeal is: Does the complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the respondent?

The complaint alleged that the respondent "is now, and was at all times herein mentioned, the owner of that certain tenement house * * * in the city of Oakland," more particularly described in the complaint; that the defendant, Josephine Bosworth, was at all of the times herein mentioned the lessee, in possession of said tenement house, as such lessee; that, at the time of the accident complained of, plaintiff was an occupant of one room in said tenement house rented of the lessee by H. Polglase; that, in connection with the rooms of said apartment upon the first floor thereof, a toilet room was maintained by defendants, for the use of the occupants of said apartment. That said toilet room was located on the west side of a hallway, which said hallway connected the said toilet room with the said apartment which plaintiff was occupying as aforesaid. That, in order to go to said toilet room, it became and was necessary for her to pass along and through said hallway to the door leading from said hallway into said toilet room. That, on the 24th day of June, 1922, at the hour of about 6:30 p. m., and after sunset, plaintiff, intending to go to said toilet room, and enter the same, walked along and through said hallway to a door, which she believed and supposed to be the door leading into the said toilet room, but which, in fact, led to a public stairway to the basement of said tenement house, and opened said door for the purpose of entering said toilet room, and, in stepping forward for the purpose aforesaid, suddenly fell upon and down the said stairway, whereby she sustained great bodily injuries and shock, and was made sick, sore, and disabled. That said injuries were occasioned by the carelessness and negligence of defendants, and each of them, in this: that the said hallway, toilet room, and stairway, at the time of said accident, were and each of them was, unlighted by any means, and they were, and each of them was, dark, and plaintiff was, by reason of said unlighted and dark condition, unable to see the said stairway, or to locate said toilet room, thereby causing plaintiff to mistake the entrance to said toilet room, and to fall down the said stairway as aforesaid." Plaintiff then set forth her special items of damage, and prayed for general and special damages in the sum of $25,380.

To establish negligence, the plaintiff relies upon the violation of certain provisions of an act known as the "State Housing Act" (Stats. 1921, c. 354, p. 485, § 66), wherein it is provided:

> "In every tenement house or hotel there shall be installed and kept burning from sunrise to sunset throughout the year artificial light sufficient in volume to properly illuminate every public hallway, public stairway, fire escape egress, elevator, public water-closet compartment, or toilet room, whenever there is insufficient natural light to permit a person to read in any part thereof."

There is no question involved upon this appeal as to the sufficiency of the complaint to state a cause of action against the tenant in possession of the premises, Josephine Bosworth.

[1] It is apparent from the foregoing that the only allegations against the respondent are that she was the owner of the tenement house at the time of the accident, and thereafter, to the date of the commencement of the action, and that the plaintiff's injuries were caused by the carelessness and negligence of defendants in this, that "the said hallway, toilet room, and stairway, at the time of said accident, were and each of them was unlighted by any means, and they were, and each of them was, dark."

Appellant relies upon the case of Rider v. Clark, 132 Cal. 382, 64 Pac. 564, and asserts that the landlord is liable (1) when the nuisance occasioning the injury existed at the time the premises were demised, or (2) when the structure was in such a condition that it would be likely to become a nuisance in the ordinary and reasonable use of the same for the purpose for which it was constructed, and the landlord failed to repair it, or (3) when the landlord authorized or permitted the act, which caused it to become a nuisance occasioning the injury. Under these rules, relied upon by the appellant, she has failed to charge the landlord. She has not alleged that the premises were not equipped with lights, but merely that certain portions thereof were "unlighted and dark," which might have been true because existing lights were not lighted. She has not alleged that the respondent was in possession of the premises at the time of the accident, either exclusively or jointly with her tenant, but, on the contrary, has alleged that the tenant was in possession. There is no allegation that the unlighted and dark condition of the premises existed at the date of the lease, or that the respondent was the owner at the date of the lease. There is no allegation that the respondent, by the terms of the lease, was required to equip the premises with lights or to keep them lighted.

[2] We think that under no possible theory has the plaintiff stated a cause of action against the respondent. We are not at liberty to indulge in inferences regarding evidence which might have been produced, nor strain the language of the pleading to the advantage of appellant. In the language of Silvers v. Grossman, 183 Cal. 696, 192 Pac. 534, quoting a well-settled rule:

> "Presumptions are always against the pleader, and all doubts are to be resolved against him, for it is to be presumed that he has stated his case as favorably as possible to himself."

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

CITY OF OAKLAND v. WILLIAMS et al. (Civ. 4785.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 17, 1924.)

1. Eminent domain 🔑241—Damages for extension of street are finally determined in interlocutory decree.

In proceeding to extend street, under St. 1903, p. 379, § 12, as amended by St. 1909, p. 1040, § 7, compensation to which a party is entitled as damages is finally determined in the interlocutory decree; the final decree determining that compensation has been paid.

2. Eminent domain 🔑262(1) — Interlocutory decree awarding damages for street extension, not appealed from, not reviewable on appeal from final judgment.

In proceeding to extend a street, under St. 1903, p. 376, as amended by St. 1909, p. 1040, interlocutory decree awarding damages to property owners becomes final, if no appeal is taken within 30 days, under section 13, and is not subject to review on appeal from final judgment, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 956, made applicable by St. 1903, p. 378, § 6, as amended by St. 1909, p. 1037, § 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Proceedings by City of Oakland against Thomas S. Williams, Isabella Thompson, and others, to condemn certain property for public street. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Thompson appeals. Affirmed.

H. S. Henion, of Oakland, for appellant.

Leon E. Gray, City Atty., and Bestor Robinson, Deputy City Atty., both of Oakland, for respondent.

Jesse Robinson, of Oakland, for defendants.

NOURSE, J. On May 29, 1922, the city of Oakland commenced an action under the street opening act of 1903 (Stats. 1903, p. 376) to condemn certain property for the purpose of extending a public street. Isabella Thompson was joined as a party defendant because of her interest as a lessee of a part of the premises sought to be condemned. At the trial it developed that she had entered into the lease in expectation of the condemnation proceedings, and had, contemporaneously with the execution of the lease, signed a waiver of any claim she might have against her lessor in the event the city should effect a cancellation of the lease by reason of the condemnation of the property. Upon this showing, the trial court held that she had no interest in the property entitling her to any compensation from the city. An interlocutory judgment was then entered fixing the compensation to be paid the other defendants, and awarding to the city the property in suit in accordance with the provisions of section 12 of the act of 1903, as amended. Stats. 1909, p. 1040, § 7.

This judgment was entered on January 20, 1923. Six months later a final judgment was entered in accordance with the provisions of section 31 of the act of 1903, reciting that payment of the amounts awarded to the respective parties by the interlocutory judgment had been made and confirming the award of the property to the city. No appeal was taken from the interlocutory judgment by the defendant Thompson, but on September 7, 1923, more than seven months after its entry, she gave notice of appeal from the final judgment. This is the appeal which is now before us. It is presented on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The statute under which the cause originated provides that an appeal may be taken from the interlocutory judgment within 30 days from the entry thereof. Section 13. It does not expressly provide for an appeal from the final judgment, but section 6 thereof, as amended (Stats. 1909, p. 1037, § 2), provides that an action brought under the act shall be subject to and governed by the Code of Civil Procedure except where otherwise specified. The general Code provision for appeals is found in section 956 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This section reads in part:

> "The provisions of this section do not authorize the court to review any decision or order from which an appeal might have been taken."

By reason of these provisions of the statutory law, respondent contends that the rule must follow that the matters determined in the interlocutory decree cannot be reviewed on an appeal from the final judgment, and cites cases involving appeals from final judgments in divorce and in the partition of real property. The only difference between the cases cited and the case here is that the right of appeal from the interlocutory decrees of divorce and partition is conferred by section

963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, whereas, in this case, it is found in a special act relating to street improvements. Appellant does not contend that the provisions of section 13 of the street opening act are unconstitutional for any reason, but merely argues that section 956 of the Code of Civil Procedure must be read in connection with the other sections of the Code only, and that, so reading it, we must conclude that it does not include a decision or order from which an appeal may be taken under the provisions of an independent statute. But the Code section is general in its terms and plainly covers "any decision or order from which an appeal might have been taken." There is nothing in the context of this section of the Code, or in those following it, which would warrant the conclusion that it was meant to apply only to such a "decision or order" as is specified in section 963.

[1, 2] The compensation to which a party is entitled as damages under the street opening act in an issue which is finally determined in the interlocutory decree. The final decree determines that the compensation has been paid as awarded. If no appeal is taken from the interlocutory decree within the time prescribed in the act, it then becomes final, and is not subject to review on an appeal from the final judgment. No errors are assigned to the final judgment from which the appeal before us was taken, and it must therefore be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GARCIA. (Cr. 791.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 10, 1924.)

Burglary ⚷42(3)—Evidence held to warrant conviction.

Defendant's conviction of burglary held warranted by his possession of two watches stolen, his suspicious story that he bought them on a street corner from one he knew only by name, inconsistencies in his testimony and contradictions of material parts by witnesses for prosecution, and his admission of previous conviction of robbery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Faustino Garcia was convicted of burglary, and appeals. Affirmed.

John R. Connelly, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of burglary of the second degree. This appeal is from the judgment of conviction and the order denying a new trial. The evidence shows clearly that some person committed the burglary charged. The only ground urged for a reversal is that the evidence is insufficient to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime.

Between the hours of 8:30 in the morning and 12:30 in the afternoon of October 9, 1923, during the absence of the occupants, a Japanese residence was broken into and two watches, certain jewelry, two men's suits of clothes, an overcoat, and a valise were stolen therefrom. About the middle of the same month the defendant, by occupation a plumber, entered a restaurant and sold one of the watches to a man sitting at one of the tables therein for $15. In the early part of December, the defendant pawned the other stolen watch for $15 in a pawnshop in Oakland. No trace was discovered of the other stolen property. The defendant admitted that he sold the one watch and pawned the other as stated. Appellant correctly states that mere unexplained possession of the stolen property is not sufficient to connect the defendant with the commission of the burglary. The question is whether such possession and the defendant's explanation thereof and his acts and conduct relative thereto are sufficient proof of guilt.

When arrested, the defendant said that he had purchased the watches from a Mexican named Frank Gonzales for $30; that he had roomed with Gonzales "for some length of time"; that he did not know where Gonzales then was, or his occupation, or how he could be found. The defendant was living at the Eagle Hotel, less than three blocks from the scene of the burglary, during all of October, 1923. At the trial the defendant testified that he purchased the watches from Gonzales in the latter part of October, and that he had known Gonzales but 15 or 20 days prior to the purchase, having seen him but two or three times. In answer to questions put to him by his attorney, he testified as follows:

> "Q. Now tell us, in your own words, your conversation in your meeting with this man. A. I just met him on the corner and he asked me if I want to buy those watches. * * * I asked him how much he wanted for those watches, and he said $30 for both of them. Then I asked him if those were his property—belonged to him. He said 'Yes.' * * *
> "Q. Now, did he tell you how he come to have a small watch? A. All he told me was, this fellow, the two watches belong to him. The little one was his wife's, and the larger one belong to him.
> "Q. Did he tell you why he wanted to sell them? A. All he said was he needed money.
> "Q. Did he say anything about wanting to get the watches back after a while? A. He said if he could get the money, then, you know, if I would give it to him, or, if he couldn't, why then he would return the watches.

"Q. If he could get the money, he would return the watches, and, if not, then what? A. Then if he couldn't get the money, then this man could do whatever he wanted to with them.

"Q. Did you see Gonzales any more after you bought the watches from him? A. I saw him about three times after that.

"Q. Did he give you back the money you had paid to him? A. No, he didn't say anything in regard to that."

The defendant's testimony was given through an interpreter, who at times, instead of repeating the answers of the witness in the first person, stated them in the third person, thereby making it necessary to determine from the context whether certain pronouns relate to Gonzales or to the witness. With this explanation, it is reasonably clear that the watches were to be returned to Gonzales, according to defendant's testimony, if the money which the defendant paid for them was returned to him. A friend of defendant testified that he was present when the defendant paid for the watches.

There is much to discredit defendant's explanation of his possession of the watches. According to his own testimony, Gonzales was entitled to the return of the watches upon repayment of the $30 given him by defendant. Yet, without anything being said thereafter about repayment, the defendant sold one of them. He testified that he purchased the watches in the latter part of October. A witness for the people testified that defendant sold him one of the watches about the middle of October, about a week after the burglary. The defendant told the arresting officer that he had roomed with Gonzales "for some length of time," yet he did not know the latter's occupation, and at the trial he testified that he had known Gonzales but 15 or 20 days prior to the purchase of the watches from him, and had seen him but two or three times, and knew him "just by sight." The story of the street corner purchase of the two watches from a person of whom defendant knew nothing except his name was in itself suspicious, especially so in view of the fact that the purchase was not made in the course of any business in which the defendant was engaged. The inconsistencies in defendant's testimony and the contradictions of material parts thereof by witnesses for the prosecution justify the inference that his explanation of his possession of the stolen property is false. The defendant, on the witness stand, admitted his prior conviction of the crime of robbery. The evidence as a whole is sufficient to warrant the verdict. People v. Le Roy (Cal. Sup.) 221 Pac. 353; People v. Lang, 142 Cal. 482, 76 Pac. 232; People v. Howard, 58 Cal. App. 340, 208 Pac. 1022; People v. Cataline, 54 Cal. App. 36, 200 Pac. 1060; People v. Miller, 45 Cal. App. 494, 188 Pac. 52.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

John Gianello was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

S. S. Hahn, John L. Richardson, and T. E. Parke, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

WORKS, J. One Jesse Taylor "held up" one Clark at about noon of a certain day. Clark was at the time in charge of a "store," which was connected with a certain creamery in Huntington Park, and Taylor took money and other personal property from the place. Defendant in this action was informed against as a principal in the perpetration of the robbery actually committed by Taylor, under the statute which fastens guilt upon one who aids and abets another in the commission of a public offense. Defendant was convicted, and he appeals from the judgment and from the order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Appellant contends that there was no evidence to show that he aided and abetted Taylor in the perpetration of the robbery. Taking the evidence in the order in which it went to the jury, various of the witnesses testified as follows: Mrs. Marie E. Douglass said that she went to the creamery, as a customer, around noon; that she then saw Gianello sitting in an old Ford car near the creamery; that she drove past the car in which he sat, and parked her car in the rear of it; that she alighted from her car, and, on looking toward the Ford, she observed that Gianello had turned, and was looking at her, and that he continued to look at her; that she then walked toward the door of the creamery, and Taylor was standing there with a wire basket of eggs and butter, and appeared to be looking at Gianello: that she went into the creamery, where she saw Clark, and that she remained inside a minute or two; that when she came out the car in which Gianello had been waiting was no longer there, and that she saw neither Gianello nor Taylor. Clark testified that Taylor entered the creamery store, covered him with a "gun," took money from the cash register, which he forced Clark to open, opened a "case," and took out a tray of butter and eggs, and left the place, and that he met Mrs. Douglass at the door as he departed. Charles H. Bevan, who owned a place of business about 1000 feet from the creamery, testified that he saw Gianello in an automobile standing back of Bevan's store at about 11:30 on the morning of the day on which Taylor robbed the creamery, that Taylor was at the time in the yard back of the store among certain barrels, and that Bevan then had a conversation with his son, Charles H. Bevan, Jr., who was in the store at the time. Bevan, Jr., testified that he saw Gianello at the time and place mentioned by his father in an old dilapidated Ford car, which had its top down; that he then had a conversation with his father, and went into the yard and talked with Taylor; that the latter was then about 50 feet from the Ford in which Gianello was seated, and that the latter was near enough to hear the conversation between him and Taylor; that he asked Taylor what he was doing, stealing the barrels; that Taylor said "he had been there before, and the defendant here told him to put them back, but he had already taken barrels before, because he told me he was the garbage collector"; that Taylor then started to throw a barrel at him, but that Gianello made him stop, and Taylor threw the barrel on the ground instead; that Gianello told Bevan that he was the garbage collector, and had been there before and got barrels; and that, after the conversation with the men, Taylor got into the Ford with Gianello, and the two drove away. The wife of Clark testified that she went to the creamery store about 12 o'clock on the day of the robbery; that when she got within about 50 yards of the place she saw a man run out of the store with a tray of eggs and some butter in his arms, and that he was in a terrible hurry; that he jumped on the running board of a car that was not in front of the store, but which stood about two machine lengths from the entrance; that the car was a Ford, which had its top down, and was a rickety old-looking machine, and had no paint on it; that as the man jumped on the running board of the car it started off; and that he hadn't gotten into the machine when she last saw him. Herman Bossard, a constable and the officer who arrested Gianello, testified that he saw the latter two days after the robbery at a ranch owned by Gianello, a mile and a half distant from Huntington Park; that Taylor and a man named Beal were also present at the time; that there was then on the ranch an old Ford touring car in very poor condition, and with paint in poor condition; and that he saw broken eggs and egg shells on the right-hand side of the floor boards of the front of the car, on the right fender, and on the right running board. Gianello took the stand in his own behalf, and testified that he was on his ranch at the time the robbery was committed; that immediately preceding his going to the ranch, where he arrived at about 11:50 in the morning, he had been at Vernon collecting garbage; that he knew Taylor, but that he did not see him on the day of the robbery; that he did not drive a Ford car on that day, and that he did not know how to drive a Ford. With this array of evidence, it is futile to assert that the jury was not justified in finding that Gianello aided and abetted Taylor in committing the robbery, and that he did so with guilty knowledge.

[2] The remaining point made by appellant is that the trial court erred in giving a certain instruction to the jury, which we shorten by ellipsis, as follows:

> "If you believe from the evidence * * * that the defendant feloniously took * * * the property * * * as charged in the information, * * * or aided and abetted and assisted any other person or persons to so feloniously take * * * the property * * * as charged in the information, * * * then you should find the defendant guilty."

It is contended that the giving of this instruction was error for the reason that it omits language telling the jury that, in order to convict, its members must have found that appellant knowingly and with criminal intent aided, abetted, and assisted another person in taking the property, which was the subject of the robbery. The point is without merit, as the court gave another instruction by which the jury was informed that for one person "to abet another person in the commission of a criminal offense, simply means, to knowingly and with criminal intent, aid, promote, encourage, or instigate, by act or counsel, or by both act and counsel, the commission of such criminal offense."

Judgment and order affirmed.

BLAU v. BLOSSER. (Civ. 4742.)

1. Judgment 🔑256(1)—Findings on cross-complaints held outside issues, and judgment not res judicata.

Where court excluded evidence to support cross-complaints, and sustained motion to strike them out, though no order to that effect was entered, finding that allegations of cross-complaints were untrue, and answers thereto true, were outside the issues, and, in any actions brought upon the same allegations, the judgment could not operate as res judicata or estoppel under Code Civ. Proc. § 1911.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Finding based on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Where the evidence is conflicting, trial court's findings based thereon cannot be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

Action by G. J. Blau against Dan Blosser. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

N. Lindsay South and Geo. G. Graham, both of Fresno, for appellant.

Strother P. Walton, of Fresno, for respondent.

ST. SURE, J. This is an appeal by defendant from judgment in an action of unlawful detainer.

The premises directly involved constitute the west half of the ground floor of a building on Mariposa street, Fresno, numbered 2027. The other half of the same floor is numbered 2029. As owner of the three-story brick building, in which the premises involved are located, Lena Brownstone, on April 7, 1919, leased the entire ground floor (2027 and 2029 Mariposa street) to G. F. Blau for a term of five years from May 1, 1919. On May 1, 1919, the time of the commencement of the lease, Blau owned a barber shop at 2027 Mariposa street. He also, with Dan Blosser as a partner, operated the B & B Realty Company, at 2029 Mariposa street. Under the Brownstone lease to Blau the rental of the entire floor was $160 per month for the first three years, and $175 for the last two. The lease also contained a provision against subletting for any purposes other than those mentioned in the lease, being the businesses for which it was then used by Blau either as owner or partner. In November, 1919, Blau subleased 2027 to one Guest, for the remainder of the five-year term, and also sold to the latter the barber shop he had been conducting there. Under this sublease Guest was to pay $125 per month for two and one-half years and $140 for the two years remaining on the original lease. The B & B Realty Company paid $35 for 2029, or the balance necessary to make the full rental of $160 for the first three years. In December of the same year (1919) Blau withdrew from the partnership with Blosser, taking the money due him as a partner, and went to his ranch. Blau testified that he retained both the lease from Mrs. Brownstone and the sublease to Guest. Blosser asserts that the Brownstone lease was left with him in the B & B Company safe and the Guest sublease was turned over to him a few months after Blau had gone to his ranch. He also contends that the lease from Mrs. Brownstone was taken in Blau's name alone, but for the benefit of the realty company, and that the sublease to Guest was likewise made for the benefit of the realty company. He also says that, on the withdrawal of Blau from the real estate firm, it was agreed that the Brownstone lease was Blosser's alone, that Blau had no further interest in it, and that the same was true as to any dealings in connection with the Guest sublease. After Blau's withdrawal from the firm, Blosser, with his son, continued to occupy 2029, operating under the name B & B Realty Company, as had Blau and Blosser. Payments for the Guest sublease were made to Blosser after Blau's departure, and Blosser in turn made payment to Mrs. Brownstone's agent, Gill, for the entire floor, the receipts therefor probably being taken in Blau's name. Shortly after Blau left for the ranch (February, 1920), Blosser bought the barber shop from Guest, and with Blau's assent took an assignment of the Guest sublease. The front part of the premises (2027) was then occupied by a shoe repairing business. In February, 1923, Blosser remodeled the entire first floor, Nos. 2027 and 2029, and exchanged the position of the real estate office with the shoe repair shop (theretofore in front of the barber shop) and a bootblack stand. For these changes he testified he secured permission from Gill, agent of the building, expending in cost of labor and materials about $1,000. Soon after this, the notice upon which this action was brought was served upon him. The amount demanded as rent is the $140 per month specified as the rent for the last two years of the term under the sublease from Blau to Guest.

A special defense was made admitting the execution of the original lease to Blau alone, but asserting that Blau and Blosser were partners and agreed to take a lease on the first floor of the building in Blau's name alone, but for the benefit of the B & B Realty Company. The same contention, that the lease was made for the benefit of the B & B Realty Company, is advanced with relation to the sublease executed by Blau to Guest.

A separate defense is made that, on withdrawal from the realty partnership, Blau surrendered his entire right, title, and interest in the Brownstone lease, and also the occupancy and possession of the property thereunder, to defendant. Thereafter, according to this defense, Blau voluntarily abandoned the premises, and never thereafter, until demand in this action, asserted any interest in, or ownership thereof.

A cross-complaint alleged three causes of action which were found by the court to be unavailable in an action of unlawful detainer. This appellant conceded to be correct. Arnold v. Krigbaum, 169 Cal. 143, 146 Pac. 423, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 370, is direct authority on the point.

The court made findings in favor of plaintiff's allegations setting out the elements of his cause of action in unlawful detainer, except that alleging damage suffered on account of defendant's holding over, and found against the allegations in defendant's answer based on or involved with the claim that the Brownstone lease or the Guest sublease were made for the benefit of the B & B Realty Company; that Blau had abandoned the partnership and delivered his interest in the lease to Blosser; and never thereafter asserted or retained any interest in said partnership or lease.

The trial court also found that all of the allegations of the counterclaim and cross-complaint are untrue; and that the allegations in the answer to the cross-complaint are true.

As conclusions of law the court decided that plaintiff should be restored to possession and recover the four months' rent sued for. The Guest sublease, assigned to Blosser, was declared forfeited, and the plaintiff given costs of suit.

[1] The appellant urges three points for reversal. The first of these is that the court erred in finding the allegations of the cross-complaint to be untrue, after having refused to receive any evidence thereon, and that said finding is not sustained by what evidence incidentally appears in the testimony on the subjects of said cross-complaint. Appellant's chief objection in this regard is that, though he conceded the correctness of the rule that a cross-complaint or counterclaim has no place in an action of unlawful detainer, a finding such as the one complained of, if permitted to become a final judgment, may be pleaded and operate as a defense in any action brought to recover on the items embraced in the cross-complaint. He cites no authorities on the point, merely stating that the damage is so apparent that no citation of authorities is necessary. Respondent's position is that the findings relating to the counterclaim and cross-complaint were outside the issues, and immaterial, and that the judgment does not in any way depend upon them. With the latter we agree. With his statement that the finding is not erroneous because no evidence was introduced in support of the cross-complaint or counterclaim, we do not agree. The motion to strike out the entire cross-complaint and counterclaim with the objection to any evidence being received under them, was made by respondent, and though no order striking them out appears, it was evident, by the court's refusal to allow evidence to be introduced touching them, and his stated agreement that they had no place in the action, that the order was intended, and its formal making inadvertently overlooked. Following such action, a finding that the allegations of the cross-complaint were untrue, was wholly without the issues presented. The same follows as to the finding that the allegations of the answer to the cross-complaint are true. Collins v. Gray, 154 Cal. 131, 97 Pac. 142; Thayer v. Tyler, 169 Cal. 671, 147 Pac. 979. The judgment was in no way dependent on them. The remainder of the findings fully cover all the issues necessary to a judgment in unlawful detainer, and the judgment is fully supported by them. Any action brought by defendant on the same causes of action attempted to be here set up by cross-complaint or counterclaim, and denied proof by the trial court as not proper subjects of litigation (Arnold v. Krigbaum, supra) could not be barred by the plea of res judicata, nor could the judgment of the court below operate as an estoppel on the particular items. They were not questions which might have been litigated in this action. (Chapman v. Hughes, 134 Cal. 643, 58 Pac. 298, 60 Pac. 974, 66 Pac. 982; Estate of Funkenstein, 170 Cal. 594, 150 Pac. 987; Code Civ. Proc., § 1911), hence the judgment is in no way conclusive upon them. In so holding we have not overlooked the discussion and decision of Dobbins v. Economic Gas Co., 182 Cal. 616, 189 Pac. 1073, and cases there cited. The judgments there reviewed on this particular point were grounded on matters voluntarily put in issue, tried, and determined. This is not such a case. No damages accruing, the judgment is not to be reversed on this ground.

[2] The second point advanced by appellant is that the record does not support the finding that defendant is guilty of withholding the premises in default of payment of rent, and the judgment for plaintiff for restoration to possession grounded thereon. Argument on this point is based on a statement that the defendant has paid or tendered the amount of the rent for the entire first floor, of which the premises in controversy are a part, each month, and has been forestalled for the months for which rent is here found to be in default, by the action of plaintiff in collecting the rents and applying them on the Brownstone lease by payment to the agent, Gill. On this entire question there was a conflict of testimony, that is, whether the payments on the lease were made by defendant as agent for plaintiff, or on his own account under the theory of an assignment of the lease. The court having decided in favor of Blau on this score, the argument that a lease for years is a chattel and an assignment thereof need not be in writing, is unavailing.

The same may be said for appellant's third point on the finding that plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the premises. Appellant's argument on this point is based on conclusions drawn from the evidence favorable to his theory of the case. The conflict here, regardless of the trial court's reason for the decision expounded by appellant, which does not appear in the record, was resolved in plaintiff's favor. On the oft-repeated conflict rule, interference with this finding or the judgment based on it, is forbidden this court.

[4] The main point in the case, as appellant and respondent agree, is: "Whether or not the lease was originally taken by Blau for his individual benefit or whether it was taken by Blau and Blosser for the benefit of the partnership."

The court heard conflicting evidence on the taking of the lease, and conducted an examination of the plaintiff on the point. Its findings on the issues in the case resting on the determination of this fact were adverse to defendant.

For the reasons stated, the judgment is affirmed.

HUGHES v. HUGHES. (Civ. 4880.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 21, 1924.)

1. Divorce 🔑245(1)—Jurisdiction of trial court to modify order as to alimony not divested or modified by contract of parties.

Jurisdiction of trial court to modify an interlocutory decree of divorce allowing permanent maintenance was founded on statute, and was not divested or modified by contract of the parties as to the amount, so as to prevent changing the decree.

2. Evidence 🔑215(1)—Contract between parties admissible as an admission on motion to reduce alimony.

On motion to change the amount of alimony as fixed by an interlocutory decree of divorce, a contract between the parties fixing the amount of alimony was admissible in evidence as an admission.

3. Divorce 🔑245(3)—Trial court held to have authority to determine whether contract was invalid on motion to modify alimony.

On motion to modify a decree of divorce as to alimony, trial court had authority to hear and determine whether a contract between the parties as to alimony was invalid, for fraud or any other reason, not having previously done so.

4. Divorce 🔑286—Presumed that trial court properly determined questions as to fraud in contract offered in evidence.

On appeal from an order modifying an interlocutory decree of divorce as to alimony, in absence of showing to the contrary, it is presumed that the trial court properly determined whether a contract between the parties as to alimony was invalid for fraud or any other reason.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Suit by Cornelia H. Hughes against Wilfred K. Hughes. From an order modifying an interlocutory decree of divorce, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

McKee, Tasheira & Wahrhaftig, of Oakland, for appellant.

Arthur J. Dannenbaum, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against her husband to obtain a decree of divorce. The defendant did not appear, and on the 23d day of September, 1921, an interlocutory decree was entered against him. On the 25th day of September, 1922, a final decree was entered. In her complaint the plaintiff pleaded that $150 per month was a reasonable sum to be allowed her for permanent maintenance. In the interlocutory decree the trial court awarded that sum, and it may be said in passing that the same award was repeated in the final judgment. On the 21st day of September, 1922, the defendant executed an affidavit alleging changes in his business affairs and his inability to pay more than $75 per month, and asked that the allowance be reduced to the amount last mentioned. Thereupon an order to show cause was issued, a hearing was had, and the permanent maintenance awarded in the interlocutory decree was modified as requested by the defendant. From the order modifying the interlocutory decree the plaintiff has appealed, under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] The appellant makes one point and that is that the trial court was without jurisdiction to make the order. To support that contention she calls attention to the fact that on the 15th day of August, 1921, the parties made an agreement in writing settling their property rights. In that behalf she calls attention to paragraph IV of the contract, which provides as follows:

"And in further consideration of the premises said second party agrees to pay to said first party until she shall remarry the sum of $150 per month as an allowance, commencing on the 1st day of August, 1921, and payable on the 1st day of each and every succeeding month thereafter."

Thereupon she contends that the trial court had no jurisdiction to make the order appealed from. We think she has misconceived her rights, and that she confuses her contractual rights with the powers of the court. As clearly appears from the facts above stated, the contract made by the parties is not involved in this litigation. To say that the trial court had no jurisdiction to make the order appealed from has no more support than to say that the trial court had no authority to enter an interlocutory decree of divorce. The trial court in making both orders obtained its jurisdiction from the statute. That jurisdiction was neither divested nor modified by the contract made by the parties. As to what right or rights the plaintiff has to-day under her contract, this court is expressing no opinion, but that matter can be determined only in a proper action based on that contract.

[2-4] After the parties had made their contract, if it had been in all respects a valid instrument, either party could have presented the contract to the trial court in the divorce proceeding, and under proper issues made by the pleadings could have asked the trial court to have adopted the provisions made in the contract theretofore made by the parties. The record shows that in her complaint the appellant pleaded the existence of the contract; but the record does not show whether the trial court, in framing its decree in that case, adopted the contract, or rejected it, or ignored it. The fact does appear that the amount of permanent maintenance agreed upon in the contract was the same as the amount fixed in the interlocutory decree. But it does not appear that the decree adopted its figures from, or was based on, the contract. When the motion for the order appealed from was on hearing, the contract was offered in evidence by the appellant and it was admitted. The ruling was as it should be, for every admission for or against either party was admissible; but the record does not show whether either party presented evidence to the effect that the contract was invalid because it was tinctured with fraud, or for any other reason. Conceding that such contentions were made, the trial court had the authority to hear and determine all such questions as it had not previously done so. Hogarty v. Hogarty, 188 Cal. 625, 206 Pac. 79. As the record does not show to the contrary, we must presume on this appeal that the court properly determined those questions.

We find no error in the record. The order is affirmed.

BARRIOS & CO., Inc., v. G. V. PETTIGREW CO., Inc. (Civ. 4793.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 11, 1924.)

1. Gaming 🔑49(3)—Evidence held not to show an illegal wagering sales contract.

In action for difference between purchase price of prunes and price for which they were resold to seller, evidence held insufficient to show intention that delivery would not be asked for or made, so as to show the sale contract an illegal wagering one.

2. Gaming 🔑12—Mutual understanding that there shall be no delivery is necessary to avoid contract.

Sales contract, under which property is sold for future delivery and repurchased by seller, legitimate on its face, could not be avoided because buyer did not intend to demand or receive the goods; but such understanding must be mutual.

3. Appeal and error 🔑909(5)—Contrary presumed legal in support of judgment for plaintiff.

In action for difference in price of prunes purchased by plaintiff from defendant, and resale price from plaintiff to defendant, innocence of intent to gamble and regularity and fairness of transaction must be presumed in favor of judgment for plaintiff, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1963.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1071(5)—Finding for plaintiff on count on contracts rendered additional finding on account stated, harmless.

The court having correctly found for plaintiff, on count on contracts of sale and resale, additional finding on account stated was harmless.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1050(1)—Admission of contract claimed to have been superseded by another held not prejudicial.

In action upon a sales contract, admission of earlier contract, claimed to have been superseded, where both bore all elements of a contract, sole difference being statement in the earlier one identifying the goods, and no objection to that feature having been offered, held not prejudicial.

Action by Barrios & Company, Inc., against G. V. Pettigrew Company, Inc. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Glensor, Clewe & Van Dine, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Goldman & Altman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff sued for and recovered a judgment for $1,483.41 alleged to be owing on a sales contract. The defendant has appealed from the judgment, and has brought up the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

The plaintiff pleaded its cause of action in three counts. In the first count it pleaded that within two years last past, at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, defendant above named became and now is indebted to plaintiff above named in the sum of $1,433.25, being the difference between the purchase price of five cars of Sacramento Valley prunes, purchased by plaintiff from defendant, and the resale price of said prunes from plaintiff to defendant. The second count was based on an open book account, but at the close of the plaintiff's case that count was dismissed. The third count pleaded an account stated. The defendant interposed an answer which contains specific denials, but does not plead any new matter. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff in which it found on the first count and on the third count in favor of the plaintiff.

The bill of exceptions contains three memorandum contracts. By the first one, which is dated February 1, 1922, the plaintiff bought of the defendant five carloads Sacramento Valley prunes, crop of 1922, 60,000 pounds to the car, sizes ranging 40/50 to 70/80 at 6¾ cents, bulk basis, time of shipment, September, October 15, 1922. The second contract was dated August 16, 1922, and is in form slightly less formal than the first instrument. It purports to be a sale by the defendant to the plaintiff of the same quantity of the same article at 7¼ cents per pound. That paper contains this additional matter: "This is a resale of G. V. Pettigrew Co., Inc., regular dried fruit contract dated February 1, 1922." On August 18, 1922, the parties executed another instrument, which both parties conceded to be a more formal statement of the transaction dated August 16, 1922.

[1] On the trial of the case the plaintiff called as a witness, Alberto Barrios, vice president of the plaintiff corporation, and did not call any other witnesses. The defendant did not call any witness. As to what was the intention of the contracting parties at the time that the instrument dated February 1, 1922, was executed, or when either of the subsequent instruments were executed, the record is silent, except that Mr. Barrios testified that he had several conversations with Mr. Pettigrew, subsequent to the second contract of August 18, 1922, and in one of those conversations, after Mr. Pettigrew had bought the prunes from him, all the witness wanted was the difference in the price or the profit he made; in other words, it was a wash sale, and the witness was only interested in the difference between the two contracts because Pettigrew was supposed to deliver to Barrios, and Barrios was supposed to deliver to Pettigrew. The witness further stated that he did not know whether there were any prunes —any actual prunes represented by the contract. He expected prunes if he had sold to a third party. When the witness entered into the contract, August 18, 1922, the whole transaction became a wash sale, and the witness was only interested in the difference between the two contracts. That is done every day. On October 2, 1922, the plaintiff presented the defendant a bill, "To washout on five cars 60,000 pounds net each 40/70 Sacramento Valley prunes, * * * difference due us $1,433.25." The appellant contends that the whole transaction was a "washout" sale within the technical meaning of that expression as used by the trade when the trade is referring to a gambling contract. Stafford, etc., Co. v. Rock, etc., Co., 94 Kan. 360, 146 Pac. 1139.

In support of its contention in this behalf the appellant cites many authorities to the effect that a recovery cannot be had on a washout sale, which is a gambling transaction. The legal proposition, for which the appellant contends, the respondent does not deny; but the respondent contends that the evidence in the record does not show the transaction to have been a gambling transaction. The respondent concedes that some washout sales are gambling transactions, but that every washout sale is not necessarily a gambling transaction. In this behalf the respondent contends that washout sale is a gambling transaction when it is the intention of both parties that no delivery of the subject of the sale is to be made, and the respondent contends that there is no evidence in the record showing that, when the contract of February 1, 1922, was executed, it was the intention of both parties that no delivery would be asked for or made. In this contention the respondent is entirely supported by the record.

[2] The same remark can be made regarding the evidence of the intention of the parties on August 18, 1922. The utmost that can be said in favor of the appellant's position is that there is possibly slight evidence to the effect that the plaintiff Barrios did not have any intention of demanding and receiving the goods. But the intention of one party does not make a contract. In order to make such a contract illegal the intention to gamble must be mutual. In re A. B. Baxter & Co., 152 Fed. 137, 81 C. C. A. 355, 11 Ann. Cas. 437, and extended note on page 440. The burden of pleading and proving the illegality of the transaction rested with the appellant. Whipley v. Flower, 6 Cal. 630; In re A. B. Baxter & Co., supra.

[3] In the instant case every presumption is in favor of the judgment; furthermore, it is presumed that both parties are innocent of crime or wrong, and that all private transactions have been fair and regular. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963. The trial court heard the evidence and saw the witness. It found the transaction to be legal and not illegal. The record certainly is not so clear as to show any abuse of power on the part of the trial court in finding the fact against the appellant.

[4] The appellant contends that the trial court should not have found in favor of the plaintiff on the issue of a stated account. The respondent replies that the finding is not necessarily important because the trial court found against the appellant on the first count. We think the respondent's position is correct. The appellant also contends that the trial court should have estimated the damages by following sections 3308, 3311, 3353, and 3354 of the Civil Code. A most cursory reading of those sections shows that they are not applicable to the facts above stated.

[5] Complaint is also made that the trial court erred in receiving in evidence the contract dated August 16, 1922. The point in that connection seems to be that said paper was superseded by the paper dated August 18th. To this objection there are several answers. The contract dated August 16th, as stated above, is very slightly less formal than the contract dated August 18, 1922. The appellant refers to the first as a sales memo., whereas it could have referred to either of them as a sales memo., with equal propriety. Moreover, each paper seems to contain every element to constitute a contract. The paper dated August 16th, had on its face, "This is a resale of C. V. Pettigrew, Inc., regular dried fruit contract dated February 1, 1922." That statement was not a necessary part of the contract and merely served to identify the goods. No objection to that feature was contained in the objection interposed to the paper when it was offered in evidence. Except as we have recited, the provisions of the paper dated August 18, 1922, do not differ from the provisions of the paper dated August 16, 1922, and therefore the appellant could not in any manner have been prejudiced by the ruling of the trial court admitting in evidence the paper dated August 16, 1922.

The judgment is affirmed.

IMPERIAL WATER CO. NO. 8 v. CAMERON et ux. (Civ. 3946.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 4, 1924.)

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑110(1)—Provision that landlord should take possession on tenants' "abandonment" inapplicable, where lessees repudiated lease before it became operative.

Lease provision that, if lessee abandoned premises while in default, lessor should "take possession," relet, etc., did not apply where lessees repudiated lease before it became operative, since "abandonment" meant of the premises, and not of the lease, and "take possession" meant retake possession.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑49(3)—Lessor's measure of damages for repudiation of executory contract for lease stated.

Lessor's measure of damages for repudiation of executory contract for lease, before lessee takes possession, is difference between agreed rent and sum for which lessor could have relet the premises by exercise of reasonable diligence.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑49(3)—Lessor's damages for repudiation of lease commencing in future, before lessee takes possession, are rents as they accrue.

Under lease in præsenti, though for a term commencing in future, lessor's damages for repudiation before lessee takes possession are the agreed installments of rent, as and when they accrue.

4. Landlord and tenant 🔑71—Lease, leaving spaces for date of commencement of term to be filled in when lessor finished building, held valid lease in præsenti for future term.

Lease containing words of present demise, and nothing to indicate contemplation of other or further instrument, though spaces for date when term should commence were left blank, to be filled in on completion by lessor of a second story on the rented building, constituted a valid lease in præsenti for term commencing in future.

5. Landlord and tenant 🔑49(3)—Lease held to authorize recovery of accrued rent notwithstanding lessees' repudiation and failure to take possession.

Under executed lease to commence in future, lessor could recover accrued rent, notwithstanding lessees' failure to take possession and repudiation of the lease before it became operative.

6. Landlord and tenant 🔑230(3)—Lessee must plead recoupment of value of lessor's occupancy.

In action to recover accrued rent under lease giving lessor right of re-entry and reletting on lessees' abandonment, lessees' right to deduction of value of lessor's occupancy, subsequent to accrual of re-entry right, was rendered unavailing by failure to plead it in answer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; M. W. Conkling, Judge.

Action by Imperial Water Company No. 8 against H. A. Cameron and wife. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

James L. Allen, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

C. L. Brown, of El Centro, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to recover rent alleged to be due under the terms of a written lease. Judgment passed for defendants and plaintiff appeals.

The facts are these: Plaintiff owned a lot in the city of Brawley, upon which stood a one-story building, then occupied by plaintiff, and to which it was about to add a second story. Defendants, husband and wife, desired to rent the ground floor upon the completion of the contemplated improvement. On December 22, 1920, the parties executed a written instrument wherein plaintiff is designated as the party of the first part and "lessor," and defendants are designated as parties of the second part and "lessees." That document, so far as it is material to our inquiry, reads:

"The said lessor * * * have leased, demised and let, and by these presents do lease, demise and let unto the said lessees, and the said lessees do hire and take of and from the said lessor, all of the following described premises, * * * to wit: The entire ground floor of that certain building located on lot fifteen * * * for the term of three (3) years, commencing on the ——— day of ———, 19—, and ending on the ——— day of ———, 19—, at a rental of sixty-three hundred dollars ($6,300.-00) for said term, which said rental shall be paid in monthly installments of one hundred and seventy-five dollars ($175.00) each, the first installment on the ——— day of ———, 19—, and a like installment in advance on the ——— day of each and every month thereafter during the full term hereof, it being understood and agreed herein that the said party of the first part is about to erect a second story upon the building now on said lot and to occupy the same, and that this lease shall commence upon the day of the occupancy by said parties of the second part, after the completion thereof and the vacating of the entire first floor by the said party of the first part; and by reason thereof the dates of the commencement and ending of this lease are at this time left blank, and both parties hereto agree that the same may be filled in at the time the parties of the second part are to occupy said premises. Said real property is so demised and let upon the conditions and restrictions following, to wit: * * *." Then follows a number of paragraphs, of which the seventh is as follows: "7. If the lessees should abandon said premises while in default in the payment of rental, the lessor shall take possession thereof, and relet the same upon such terms and rental as may reasonably be obtained, and any amount so received, less the expense of said reletting, including agent's commission, shall be applied in reduction of the rental to be paid by the lessees hereunder, and the lessor may recover from the lessees any deficiency, or at the option of the lessor this lease may, in such event, be canceled."

On February 14, 1921, plaintiff completed the construction of the second story, vacated the first story formerly occupied by it, notified defendants that the ground floor was ready for their use and occupancy, tendered them the keys thereto and demanded payment of the first monthly installment of rent. Defendants refused to enter into possession or to pay any rent. Indeed, prior to plaintiff's tender of possession, i. e., on January 12, 1921, and again on January 24, 1921, defendants notified plaintiff in writing that, for financial reasons, they would be unable to occupy the premises and that they would not do so. Defendants never have entered into possession. This action was brought to recover the stipulated rent for each of the three months commencing, respectively, February 14, March 14, and April 14, 1921. Defendants answered, denying that any rent was due.

The trial court found that plaintiff made no effort to, and in fact did not, relet the premises. There is no question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support this finding. The court below, so we are informed, gave judgment for the defendants upon the theory that, by reason of the seventh paragraph of the contract, plaintiff's sole remedy, if it did not choose to cancel the lease, was to relet the premises and to sue for the difference between the rent so obtained and the rent agreed to be paid by defendants.

[1] We agree with appellant that the seventh paragraph of the contract means that, if the lessees should actually take possession upon the commencement of the term and should abandon the premises after having thus entered into possession, and while they were in default in the payment of rent, then, and only then, would the lessor be put to an election to cancel the lease or to re-enter and relet the premises and sue for any deficiency which there might be between the agreed rent and the rent obtained by such reletting. We think, therefore, that this paragraph of the lease is not applicable to the facts of this case, since respondents repudiated their lease before the commencement of the term provided for therein, and they never did enter into possession of the premises. As will be recalled, the language of the seventh paragraph is: "If the lessees should abandon said premises while in default in the payment of rental, the lessor shall take possession thereof and relet the same," etc. This language has reference to an abandonment of the premises, not to an abandonment of the contract. As here understood, an abandonment of the premises by the lessees implies a previous possession by them. This is made clear by the provision that, if the lessees shall abandon the premises while in default in the payment of rent, "the lessor shall take possession." This provision that the lessor "shall take possession" can only mean that it shall retake possession, which it could do only after its original possession had been interrupted by the assumption of possession on the part of the lessees. But the lessor's possession was never interrupted; it was continuous. There was no possession for it to retake. Moreover, this paragraph of the lease is to be applicable when and only when the lessees shall abandon the premises "while in default in the payment of rental." But respondents repudiated their contract before any installment of rent could accrue or become payable, and not "while in default in the payment" thereof.

[2, 3] It only remains to consider whether, independently of paragraph seven of the lease, appellant's remedy is limited to a recovery of damages, measured by the difference between the agreed rent and the actual value of the premises, or whether it was entitled to the rent as and when it accrued. That is to say: Does the written instrument evidence an executory contract—an agreement to give a lease—or is it a lease in præsenti? For, if it be the former, appellant's right of recovery will be limited to damages measured by the difference between the rent fixed in the agreement and the sum for which the premises could be rented by the exercise of reasonable diligence (Cooper v. Aiello, 93 N. J. Law, 336, 107 Atl. 473); whereas, if the contract be a present lease, even though it be the lease of a term to commence in futuro, appellant will be entitled to recover the agreed installments of rent as and when they accrue (see authorities cited infra).

[4] The instrument contains words of present demise, and there is nothing to indicate that the parties contemplated the execution of any other or further instrument. It is true there is no fixed day named or expressed when the three-year term shall commence. But the day when it was to commence and the day on which respondents were to have the right to take possession was capable of being made certain. It was the day when the building should be completed and the ground floor should be ready for defendants' occupancy. Id certum est quod certum reddi potest. We think, therefore, that the instrument in question was a valid lease in præsenti, for a term to commence in futuro—that is to say, on the 14th of February, 1921, that being the day when the building was completed and the leased premises were ready for occupancy by respondents. See Hammond v. Barton, 93 Wis. 183, 67 N. W. 412; Colclough v. Carpeles, 89 Wis. 239, 61 N. W. 836; Becar v. Flues, 64 N. Y. 518; and note to Johnston v. Carson, etc., Min. Co., 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1079.

[5] Since the contract was an executed lease, i e., a demise in præsenti of a term to commence in futuro, appellant is entitled to sue for and to recover the accrued rent, notwithstanding respondents' failure to take possession. The rule is correctly stated by Mr. Tiffany, who says:

> "Apart from any question of the exclusion of the lessee from the demised premises, the cases are generally to the effect that the mere failure of the lessee to take possession is no defense to the claim for rent, since his liability is fixed by the reservation of rent or by his covenant to pay rent, and he cannot escape this liability by failing to utilize the premises." Tiffany on Landlord and Tenant, vol. 1, p. 1154.

As was said by the New York court of appeals in Becar v. Flues, supra, "it [a lease in præsenti to commence in futuro] is like a sale of specific personal property to be delivered." In the case of such a sale the title passes to the vendee, and he is liable for the purchase price. Lassing v. James, 107 Cal. 348, 358, 40 Pac. 534. The following cases, among others, support Mr. Tiffany's statement of the rule: Becar v. Flues, supra; Douglass & Easton v. Branch Bank, 19 Ala. 659; Tully v. Dunn, 42 Ala. 262; Bonfils v. Ledoux, 266 Fed. 507, 16 A. L. R. 430. In the case last cited the court says: "It is the general rule that the failure of the lessee to take possession is no defense to a claim for rent, because that liability is fixed, not by the fact of possession, but by the covenant to pay rent." In Tully v. Dunn, supra, the Alabama Supreme Court says:

> "The appellant [lessee] having committed a breach of the contract, by a failure to enter upon its performance, the appellee [lessor] was not bound to suffer the premises to remain vacant during the term. In such case, the landlord may let the premises lie idle and recover rent for the whole term, or he may put an end to the contract of lease by entry." (Italics ours.)

[6] If it be assumed that respondents may be entitled to any deduction from the full amount of the accrued rent, they can avail themselves of such right to recoupment only by setting up in their answer a claim thereto, based upon an allegation of the value to appellant of its occupancy of the premises subsequent to the accrual of respondents' right of entry. Fitzhugh v. Baird, 134 Cal. 570, 66 Pac. 723. Respondents' answer presents no such issue.

The judgment is reversed.

ADAMS & McKEE LAND CO. v. DUGAN et al. (Civ. 4208.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 23, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑110—Order denying new trial nonappealable.

An order denying a new trial is nonappealable.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑101—After waiver of clause making time of the essence, reasonable notice required for vendor to declare forfeiture.

Where course of dealing between vendor and purchaser has amounted to waiver by vendor of clause making time of the essence, the vendor may not declare a forfeiture, unless the purchaser be given reasonable notice and reasonable time and opportunity to comply with the contract.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑299(4)—Question of reasonable time for purchaser to conform to contract of purchase one of fact for court.

Question of what is a reasonable time to be given by a vendor, who has waived a clause making time of the essence, to purchaser, to conform to the contract or have a forfeiture declared, is primarily one of fact for the trial court.

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑101—Thirty-six days' notice to purchaser to pay installments due or have rights forfeited held reasonable.

Where a vendor had waived a provision of a contract of sale making time of the essence, 36 days' notice to the purchaser, who lived in another state, to pay installments due or his rights would be forfeited, was reasonable.

5. Vendor and purchaser 🔑186—Difficulty of borrowing money no excuse for failure of purchaser to comply with notice of vendor requiring payment of overdue installments.

Where a vendor had waived a provision of a contract making time of the essence, and notified the purchaser to pay certain installments within 36 days or the contract would be forfeited, the fact that the purchaser found it difficult to borrow money was no excuse for failure to comply.

6. Vendor and purchaser 🔑101 — Notice to purchaser to pay installments held sufficient, despite inclusion of assessments.

Where vendor waived provision in contract making time of essence, notice to purchaser to pay certain installments or her rights under contract would be forfeited was not rendered ineffective by including therein demand for payment of street assessments, where purchaser never tendered amount of installments due.

7. Vendor and purchaser 🔑101—Purchaser held estopped to claim demand for payment of installments was ineffective, because it included street assessments.

Where vendor notified purchaser to pay installments due by certain day or her rights would be forfeited, and included therein street assessments, to which purchaser offered to pay $60, to be applied on assessments, and did not object because demand included assessments, she was estopped to set up that demand was ineffective, because it included the assessments.

8. Vendor and purchaser 🔑101 — Requirements of notice to forfeit purchaser's rights stated.

The purpose of a notice to forfeit a purchaser's rights, after waiver of a clause making time of the essence, is to warn that the vendor intends to restore the conditions of contract, and any conduct on the part of the vendor and purchaser suffices, if both parties understood the conditions regarding forfeiture were to be treated as restored and in force.

9. Vendor and purchaser 🔑170—Refusal of offer of less than amount due held not to prevent forfeiture of rights under contract to purchase.

Where purchaser under contract of sale owed installments amounting to $70, refusal of offer of $60 unless full amount claimed, including certain assessments, were paid, did not prevent forfeiture of rights under contract, in pursuance of the vendor's notice reviving a provision that time should be of the essence.

10. Tender 🔑12(2)—Party making tender must see that amount tendered is large enough.

As a rule, party making tender acts at his peril, and must see that the amount tendered is large enough, where correct amount is not within exclusive knowledge of the tenderee.

11. Vendor and purchaser 🔑170—Mistaken demand by vendor for payment of street assessments held not to necessarily indicate bad faith.

Mere fact that vendor may have been in error in supposing and declaring that, unless a purchaser paid the amount of street assessments, in addition to past-due installments, it would consider the purchaser's rights foreclosed, does not necessarily show bad faith.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Suit by the Adams & McKee Land Company against Laura Fulton Dugan and husband. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Benno M. Brink, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Walter M. Campbell, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. [1] This action, though in form a suit to quiet title, is in effect one whereby it is sought to forfeit the rights of the defendant Laura Fulton Dugan under a contract for the sale of real property. W. J. Dugan and Laura Fulton Dugan are husband and wife, and it is for that reason that the former was joined as a party defendant.

Plaintiff recovered judgment. Defendants have appealed from the judgment, and likewise from an order denying them a new trial—a nonappealable order.

By the contract of sale, which was executed on September 6, 1909, Mrs. Dugan, as the vendee, agreed to buy, and one Thomas McClelland, plaintiff's assignor, agreed to sell, certain real property in the city of Los Angeles for the sum of $1,350, payable $25 upon the execution of the contract, and the balance in monthly installments of $10 each, on the 6th day of each and every month, the first installment to be paid October 6, 1909. It also was agreed that the vendee should pay all taxes and assessments which might be levied upon or assessed against the property. Time was expressly made of the essence of the contract. There was a provision to the effect that if the vendee should fail to comply with the terms of her contract she should forfeit all rights thereunder, and all right to such moneys as may have been paid by her, and that the vendor should be relieved from all obligation to convey. Mrs Dugan entered into possession under the contract and paid $433.05 on account of the principal and a further sum on account of interest. The vendor and his assignee, the plaintiff in the action, repeatedly and habitually, and without objection, accepted payments from the vendee when they were past due. Wherefore the lower court found that the clause of the contract making time of the essence was waived both by McClelland and by plaintiff. But it was further found, in substance and effect, that the time clause was revived and reinstated before the action was commenced. Whether the provision making time of the essence was so revived is the vital question in the cause. The facts bearing upon this aspect of the case are, in brief, these:

On May 20, 1920, plaintiff's attorney mailed to Mrs. Dugan, at El Paso, Texas, a letter, the substance of which is hereinafter stated. At the date of that letter there was due and unpaid on the contract six monthly installments of $10 each. A further installment of $10 would fall due, under the terms of the contract, on the 6th day of June following. Subsequently to the execution of the contract, the property was assessed for work done on Brooklyn avenue. Instead of paying the assessment, the vendee permitted a street assessment bond to be issued for the amount thereof. The bond was issued December 15, 1916. The vendee paid all installments of principal and interest which accrued on the bond prior to May 13, 1920, on which date plaintiff, in order to relieve the property of the lien, paid the sum of $39.87. At the same time plaintiff paid the further sum of $199.96, the amount of an assessment which had been levied against the property for work done on Lorena street and which would have become delinquent on May 19, 1920. The two sums thus paid by plaintiff aggregate $239.83. On April 13, 1921, which was after the action had been commenced, the proceedings under which the Lorena street assessment had been levied were abandoned, and thereupon the city returned to plaintiff the amount which it had laid out in payment of that assessment.

On May 20, 1920, plaintiff's attorney, as already stated, caused a letter to be deposited in the United States post office at Los Angeles, addressed to Mrs. Dugan at El Paso, Tex., wherein the latter was specifically notified that she was in arrears in the payment of the six past-due monthly installments on the purchase price, that another installment of $10 would become due on June 6th following, and that plaintiff had paid the sums of $39.87 and $199.96, respectively, to relieve the property from the street assessment liens. The letter, after giving this information, then proceeds as follows:

> "You will please take notice that you are required to pay all of said items on or before the 25th day of June, 1920, and that by making said payment your contract will be considered as restored to good standing and you can then continue to make your payments of $10 per month. You will, however, be expected to make them promptly every month, as called for by the contract. Please let me know whether or not it is your intention to comply with this demand. You will, of course, understand that if the same be not complied with your contract will be forfeited and the Adams-McKee Land Company will take possession of the property and will not be under further obligations to convey the property to you."

This letter was received by the vendee in due course. On June 17, 1920, at Los Angeles, Mrs. Dugan, through an attorney acting for her in the matter, offered by letter to pay to plaintiff the sum of $60. In this letter Mrs. Dugan, or her attorney for her, specifically stated that the $60 was to be applied on the assessments. Plaintiff, through its attorney, refused to accept this offer of $60, stating that it was "unwilling to accept a partial payment on account of past-due indebtedness." Mrs. Dugan never made any other tender or offer to pay. Judgment was given for plaintiff upon the theory that, by the letter of May 20, 1920, Mrs. Dugan was given sufficient notice of plaintiff's intention to revive the provision of the contract making time of the essence thereof, and to terminate the contract unless all amounts past due were paid on or before June 25, 1920.

The principal grounds of appeal are: (1) That the notice to Mrs. Dugan, given to her by the letter of May 20, 1920, did not afford her a reasonable time within which to make the payments under the terms of her contract; and (2) that plaintiff had no right to repayment of the amounts which it had laid out in order to relieve the property of the assessment liens.

[2] Undoubtedly it is the rule that, where the entire course of dealing between the parties to a contract of sale of real property has amounted to a waiver on the part of the vendor of the clause making time of the essence, the vendor may not declare a forfeiture, unless the vendee be afforded reasonable notice of the former's determination and election to terminate the contract. The vendee should be given notice, in some form, that, if the overdue payments are not made on or before a date fixed therefor, far enough in the future to give the purchaser reasonable time and opportunity to comply with his contract by making the payments, the contract will be terminated and a forfeiture will take place.

[3-5] The question of what is a reasonable time is primarily one of fact for the determination of the trial court. Hoppin v. Munsey, 185 Cal. 684, 198 Pac. 398. In cases such as this there cannot, in the nature of things, be any fixed rule as to what constitutes a reasonable time. It must depend upon the facts of each particular case. Here respondent did not summarily insist upon immediate performance of the vendee's obligations, but gave her practically a month within which to secure the money wherewith to make the payments. The time fixed by the notice was 36 days from the date of the letter written by respondent's attorney. The simple act required to be done was the payment of a sum of money. True, appellant lived in Texas and respondent had its residence in California. We cannot, however, close our eyes to what is a matter of common knowledge, that the facilities afforded for communication between different states of the union, and for the transmission of money from one portion of the country to another, have practically annihilated distance and time. If we deduct from the time fixed by the notice for performance the few days necessary for respondent's letter to reach appellant and for the latter to mail her reply, a month or thereabout would still be left appellant within which to raise the money, if, in fact, she did not already possess it. If she found it difficult to borrow money, that fact would afford her no excuse. Skookum Oil Co. v. Thomas, 162 Cal. 546, 123 Pac. 363. She knew what contract she had entered into and what obligations she had assumed; and she likewise knew that, though the time clause had been waived and the matter set at large, respondent, nevertheless, could at any time fix another date for performance by giving notice thereof. Under all the circumstances of the case we think the limitation of time fixed in the notice was a reasonable one. For a closely analogous case see Chabot v. Winter Park Co., 34 Fla. 258, 15 South. 756, 43 Am. St. Rep. 192.

[6] Coming now to the claim that respondent was not entitled to demand repayment of the sums which it paid to the city in order to relieve the property of the assessment liens: Appellants contend that, notwithstanding Mrs. Dugan had covenanted to pay all assessments which might be levied against the property, she could rightfully permit street assessment bonds to issue for such assessments, and that her only obligation was to pay the principal and interest on such bonds as and when they accrued. It also is suggested that respondent could not rightfully demand from Mrs. Dugan the sum of $199.96 which it had paid to satisfy the Lorena street assessment, because the subsequent abandonment of the proceedings which culminated in that assessment indicates that there never was a valid assessment lien under those proceedings. We do not find it necessary to decide either of these questions. Assuming, without deciding, that, by its reference to the assessments, the letter which respondent's attorney mailed to Mrs. Dugan included sums which, under the terms of her contract, she could not be required to pay, nevertheless, the letter was notice to the vendee sufficient to lay the foundation for a forfeiture of her rights. Mrs. Dugan's offer to pay $60 on account of the assessments, the only offer of payment ever made by her after she received the notice from respondent's attorney, was made on June 17, 1920. On that date seven installments of the purchase price had become due and payable under the terms of the contract. Mrs. Dugan's offer to pay $60 therefore fell short of an offer to pay the amount then due and payable by her, even if she was not obligated to pay the amounts which respondent had laid out on account of the assessments. Unless, therefore, respondent's notice of May 20, 1920, was abortive simply because it contained a demand for sums to which respondent was not entitled, it must be held to have been sufficient as a basis for the forfeiture of the vendee's rights under the contract.

[7] Each of the items which made up the total amount demanded by respondent was specifically set forth in the notice to Mrs. Dugan, and the latter knew, as well as respondent, that at least $70 was due and payable by her before the expiration of the time limit fixed in respondent's notice. If, therefore, Mrs. Dugan believed that the notice included items which she was not obligated to pay on or before the expiration of the date fixed in the notice, it was her duty to have said so at the time. See Kimball v. Bellows, 13 N. H. 58, where the court, on pages 69, 70, says:

> "The demand made of the defendant for payment of these claims, is excepted to for the reason that it included a claim of William Cooper. * * * A sufficient reply to this objection is that no exception was taken to the demand at the time, and no specification was asked. Where claims are taken up for the benefit of another, and, on demand of payment, a mere general refusal is given, without any cause assigned, or inquiry made, we hold the demand to be good, notwithstanding it included a claim which the party is not bound to pay, and though no precise sum is named as the amount due."

In her offer to pay the $60 Mrs. Dugan specifically stated that it was "to be applied on assessments." It is quite probable that this language led respondent to believe that Mrs. Dugan recognized an obligation to pay the full amount demanded of her, the assessments included. This furnishes additional reason why Mrs. Dugan, having failed to object to respondent's demand when it was made, should not now be heard to claim that it was for an excessive amount. Having led respondent into a sense of security, she should not now be heard to say that the demand made upon her was ineffective because it included the assessments.

[8] The essential purpose of a notice to forfeit a vendee's rights, after a waiver of the clause making time of the essence, is to let the vendee know that, though there has been a waiver of the time clause, the vendor intends that the conditions of the contract from thenceforth shall be treated as restored. For this purpose, any conduct on the part of the vendor and vendee will suffice, if it is such as to justify the inference that both parties understood that the conditions regarding forfeiture were to be treated as restored and in force. Hoppin v. Munsey, supra, page 688 (198 Pac. 398). The inclusion in the notice to Mrs. Dugan of the amounts paid by respondent on the assessments does not detract from the fact that the notice was sufficient to apprise her that unless she paid the seven installments on the purchase price, aggregating $70, her rights under the contract would be forfeited.

[9, 10] Because respondent refused to accept the $60 unless the full amount demanded by it was paid, it is argued that Mrs. Dugan was excused from making a tender of the amount conceded to be due—$70. The general rule is that the party making a tender acts at his peril, and must see to it that the amount tendered is large enough, where, as here, the correct amount is not within the exclusive knowledge of the tenderee. 5 A. L. R. 1232, note to Graves v. Burch. By demanding more than was due from the vendee, if it did demand more than was due, respondent may have waived the formal requisite of a tender, such, for example, as the actual production of the money, but it did not waive an existing capacity and willingness to perform. That is to say, though the refusal of respondent to accept less than the full amount demanded by it may have excused the actual production by Mrs. Dugan of $70 in money, it did not make an offer to pay but $60 the equivalent of a tender of $70, the amount which it is conceded was necessary to be paid by the vendee in order to comply with the terms of her contract. Respondent's refusal to accept less than the full amount demanded by it did not influence Mrs. Dugan to forbear making a tender of what she now claims was the only proper amount payable by her. It cannot be said that respondent waived a tender which it had no reason to expect. Neither party seems to have thought, when the offer to pay $60 was made, that respondent's demand included any improper item; and there is quite as much reason to hold that respondent would have accepted the sum legally demandable, assuming that that amount was $70, as that Mrs. Dugan would have paid it. See Loewenberg v. Arkansas, etc., Ry. Co., 56 Ark. 439, 19 S. W. 1051; Bolton v. Gifford & Co., 45 Tex. Civ. App. 140, 100 S. W. 210, and Lamar v. Sheppard, 84 Ga. 561, 10 S. E. 1084.

[11] There is no evidence of bad faith on respondent's part. The mere fact that it may have been in error, in supposing and declaring that unless it were repaid the amount of the assessments it would consider the rights of the vendee foreclosed, does not necessarily indicate bad faith.

The appeal from the order denying a new trial is dismissed. The judgment is affirmed.

ENGEL v. DAVENPORT et al. (S. F. 10816.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1924.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 22, 1924.)

On Rehearing.

1. Admiralty 🔑20—State courts held to have jurisdiction of actions for personal injuries to seamen.

State courts have jurisdiction of actions for personal injuries to seamen arising under maritime transactions, including those arising out of maritime torts, in view of federal Judiciary Act 1789 (1 Stat. 73; Judicial Code, §§ 24 and 256 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 991 and 1233]), saving to suitors in all cases right of a common-law remedy where common law is competent to give it.

2. Admiralty 🔑20—State court's jurisdiction over seaman's action for injuries not affected by Merchant Marine Act.

State court's jurisdiction over a seaman's action for injuries because of unseaworthiness of his vessel was not affected by Merchant Marine Act, § 33 (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 8337a), such statute not conferring exclusive jurisdiction upon United States District Court of district in which employer resides, but merely defining venue of an action instituted in district court.

3. Limitation of actions 🔑2(4)—Seaman's action for injuries rightfully instituted in state court held barred by state statute of limitation.

Seaman's action for injuries due to unseaworthiness of his vessel, originally and rightfully instituted in a state court, is governed and barred by state statute of limitations, notwithstanding that federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657–8665) providing that actions commenced thereunder must be commenced within two years, may have been incorporated by reference into Merchant Marine Act, and would be applicable when action was brought in a federal court.

4. Limitation of actions 🔑2(1)—Limitation statute of jurisdiction where suit is brought will govern.

Generally, limitation statute of a jurisdiction where suit is brought will govern and control with reference to time within which a suit may be brought in that particular jurisdiction.

5. Limitation of actions 🔑2(1)—Question of limitations referred to law of forum if shorter than period prescribed by statute of other jurisdiction creating liability.

Limitation prescribed by statute of another jurisdiction, which creates a right of action, and constituting a condition of the right so that latter is extinguished when time so prescribed has expired, does not exclude operation of shorter statute of limitation of the forum.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by E. B. Engel against J. O. Davenport and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. W. Hutton, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Farnham P. Griffiths, McCutchen, Olney, Mannon & Greene, and J. B. McKeon, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment rendered and entered by the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco in favor of the defendants, based upon an order sustaining the demurrer of J. O. Davenport, one of the defendants, to the plaintiff's complaint. The action, which was instituted in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, was brought against J. O. Davenport and the other defendants jointly, as the owner and the operators of the steamship Davenport. The complaint alleged in substance that the plaintiff had suffered injuries because of the unseaworthiness of the vessel's appliances, and in this behalf alleged that the vessel was unseaworthy when she left San Francisco, her home port, for Hoquiam, Wash., by reason of a defective pelican hook which broke at Hoquiam, Wash., fracturing plaintiff's skull. For this injury plaintiff claimed damages in the sum of $50,000. Said complaint was filed in said superior court on the 18th day of January, 1923, 21 months after the injury to the plaintiff, which forms the basis of the action.

The defendant J. O. Davenport demurred upon two grounds: (1) That the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and (2) that the alleged cause of action was barred by the provisions of section 340, subdivision 3 of the California Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that actions based upon personal injury must be commenced within one year. It is apparent that if the state statute of limitations is applicable, the demurrer was properly sustained.

It is plaintiff's contention that the plaintiff's cause of action is brought under the provisions of the Merchant Marine Act of June 5, 1920, § 33 (41 Stats. at Large, 1007 [U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 8337a]), which amended section 20 of the Seaman's Act of March 4, 1915 (38 Stats. at Large, 1164); that section 33 of the Merchant Marine Act incorporates therein by reference the federal Railway Employers' Liability Act of 1908 (35 Stats. at Large, 65) as amended in 1910 (36 Stats. at Large, 291 [U. S. Comp. St. § 8662]); that this last-mentioned act provides a two-year limitation for the commencement of actions brought under it; and that, therefore, such limitation applies to actions brought by seamen under the Merchant Marine Act (41 Stat. 988).

Section 33 of the Merchant Marine Act, upon which plaintiff relies, reads as follows:

> "Any seaman who shall suffer personal injury in the course of his employment may, at his election, maintain an action for damages at law, with the right of trial by jury, and in such action all statutes of the United States modifying or extending the common-law right or remedy in cases of personal injury to railway employees shall apply; and in case of the death of any seaman as a result of any such personal injury the personal representative of such seaman may maintain an action for damages at law with the right of trial by jury, and in such action all statutes of the United States conferring or regulating the right of action for death in the case of railway employees shall be applicable. Jurisdiction in such actions shall be under the court of the district in which the defendant employer resides or in which his principal office is located."

Section 6 of the federal Employers' Liability Act, claimed by plaintiff to be incorporated by reference into the Merchant Marine Act, provides that:

> "No action shall be maintained under this act unless commenced within two years from the day the cause of action accrued. Under this act an action may be brought in a Circuit Court of the United States, in the district of the residence of the defendant, or in which the cause of action arose, or in which the defendant shall be doing business at the time of commencing such action. The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States under this act shall be concurrent with that of the courts of the several states, and no case arising under this act and brought in any state court of competent jurisdiction shall be removed to any court of the United States."

It is the defendants' contention that: (1) If brought under section 33 of the Merchant Marine Act, the state court was without jurisdiction to entertain the action; and (2) whether brought under the Merchant Marine Act, as plaintiff contends, or under the general maritime law, as defendants contend, the one-year state statute of limitations is applicable.

In the former opinion rendered by this court it was held that, if the action was brought under section 33 of the Merchant Marine Act, the state court was without jurisdiction, and, if brought under the general maritime law, the state statute of limitation was applicable, so that in either event the demurrer was properly sustained. The holding that the federal court had exclusive jurisdiction of all actions brought under section 33 of the Merchant Marine Act was based upon the theory that Congress plainly indicated an intention to vest exclusive jurisdiction of all cases arising under said section in a court in the district in which the defendant employer resided, by the provision of said section previously quoted, that "jurisdiction in such actions shall be under the court of the district in which the defendant employer resides or in which his principal office is located." This theory was sustained by decisions of the Supreme Court of New York (Nox v. U. S. Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation [Sup.] 193 N. Y. Supp. 340; Prieto v. U. S. Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, 117 Misc. Rep. 703, 193 N. Y. Supp. 342), and of the District Court of Washington (Wenzler v. Robin Line S. S. Co., 277 Fed. 812).

However, the Supreme Court of the United States in a very recent decision (Panama Ry. Co. v. Johnson, 264 U. S. 375, 44 Sup. Ct. 391, 68 L. Ed. ——), held, in effect, that this provision of the Merchant Marine Act did not confer exclusive jurisdiction upon the particular District Court of the district in which the defendant employer resides, and thereby by implication divest all other courts, previously having jurisdiction of such actions, of jurisdiction, but merely defined the venue of an action instituted in a District Court. The court in that case held that a complaint having been filed in a District Court of a district other than the one in which the defendant employer resided or had its principal office, and no objection having been made at the outset on a special appearance, any objection to the venue was waived by the general appearance and the court where the complaint was filed had jurisdiction. The court in this behalf said:

> "A reading of the provision now before us * * * makes it reasonably certain that the provision is not intended to affect the general jurisdiction of the District Courts * * * but only to prescribe the venue for actions brought under the new act of which it is a part."

It follows that if this provision merely defines the "venue" of an action, the theory that such provision conferred "jurisdiction" upon a particular court is no longer tenable; and, in the absence of any other provision purporting to divest of jurisdiction, those courts, both state and federal, which prior to the enactment of the Merchant Marine Act had jurisdiction of such actions, such jurisdiction may be presumed to continue.

[1] We are satisfied that the state courts have always had the right to enforce rights of action for personal injuries to seamen, arising under maritime transactions, including those arising out of maritime torts, since the federal Judiciary Act of 1789, which provided that District Courts should have exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, "saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy where the common law is competent to give it." 1 Stats. at Large 73; Judicial Code, §§ 24 and 256 (Comp. Stats. §§ 991 and 1233); The Hamilton, 207 U. S. 398, 404, 28 Sup. Ct. 133, 52 L. Ed. 264; Steamboat Company v. Chase, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 522, 534, 21 L. Ed. 369; Garcia y Leon v. Galceran, 11 Wall. 185, 20 L. Ed. 74; Knapp, Stout & Co. v. McCaffrey, 177 U. S. 638, 20 Sup. Ct. 824, 44 L. Ed. 921. In enforcing a liability falling within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, the state court was, however, bound to apply the maritime law. Southern Pacific Co. v. Jensen, 244 U. S. 205, 37 Sup. Ct. 524, 61 L. Ed. 1086, L. R. A. 1918C, 451, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 900; Chelentis v. Luckenbach S. S. Co., 247 U. S. 372, 38 Sup. Ct. 501, 62 L. Ed. 1171.

[2] The present action is based, not upon negligence, but upon the alleged unseaworthiness of the vessel Davenport, by reason of a defective pelican hook, and there can be no question but that the state courts, prior to the enactment of the Merchant Marine Act, did have and did exercise jurisdiction in such cases. This was definitely decided in the case of Carlisle Packing Co. v. Sandanger, 259 U. S. 255, 42 Sup. Ct. 475, 66 L. Ed. 927, and is, in fact, conceded by the defendants. This being so, it follows that the state courts still have jurisdiction over such an action and that the plaintiff could at his election institute the action in the state court unless such jurisdiction has been divested by the adoption of the Workmen's Compensation provisions of our Constitution and statutes, a question which we shall not now undertake to decide.

It is the plaintiff's theory, as hereinbefore indicated, that section 33 of the Merchant Marine Act incorporates therein, by reference, the federal Railway Employers' Liability Act, which latter act provides a two-year limitation for the commencement of actions brought thereunder, and that therefore the two-year limitation for the commencement of actions applies to this action irrespective of whether it was commenced in a state or federal court. In other words, it is plaintiff's contention that the statute of limitation embodied in the federal Employers' Liability Act applies to every cause of action stated thereunder, or under the Merchant Marine Act, regardless of the jurisdiction in which such action is brought. Plaintiff's theory that the federal Employers' Liability Act was incorporated by reference in the Merchant Marine Act was upheld in the case of Martin v. United States Emergency Fleet Corporation, a recent decision of the United States District Court of New York, rendered June 6, 1924. However, in the case of Lorang v. Alaska S. S. Co. et al., 298 Fed. 547, a recent decision of the United States District Court of Washington rendered May 14, 1924, this contention was expressly repudiated.

[3, 4] Conceding, however, for the sake of argument, that the provision of the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657–8665) fixing the period of time within which actions brought thereunder must be commenced at two years was incorporated by reference into the Merchant Marine Act, and would be applicable when the action was brought in a federal court, we are of the opinion that the instant action having been originally and rightfully instituted in the state court, is governed and barred by the state statute of limitations. It is the general rule that the lex fori, i. e., the limitation statute of the jurisdiction where suit is brought, will govern and control with reference to the prescribed period of time within which a suit may be brought in that particular jurisdiction. Plaintiff, however, contends that when a time limit appears in a statute creating a right, that time limit is exclusive of all others. Plaintiff also insists that it is not essential that the limitation be incorporated in the same section or even in the same statute, providing the limitation embodied in another statute is so specifically directed to the newly created liability as to warrant the conclusion that it qualifies the right.

It is true that there is an exception to the general rule that the law of the forum controls to the effect that, when a statute which creates a new liability limits the time within which the right may be enforced, an action seeking to enforce such right can be maintained only within the time limited by the statute creating the right, regardless of the jurisdiction in which the action was instituted. Davis v. Mills, 194 U. S. 451, 454, 24 Sup. Ct. 692, 48 L. Ed. 1067. The Harrisburg, 119 U. S. 199, 214, 7 Sup. Ct. 140, 30 L. Ed. 358; Vaught v. Virginia & Southwestern Railroad, 132 Tenn. 679, 179 S. W. 314. Such exception to the general rule is not, in our opinion, applicable to the instant case.

[5] The exception to the general rule that the law of the forum governs is based upon the reasoning that, when the liability and the remedy are created by the same statute, time is made of the essence of the right, and when the time prescribed by the statute has expired, the cause of action itself is extinguished. The lapse of time prescribed by the statute creating the new right, having operated to extinguish the right, no right remains thereafter to support the action and consequently no action can be thereafter maintained in any jurisdiction. Obviously this reasoning applies only when the period prescribed by the statute creating the liability is shorter than the period provided by the law of the forum. There is no logical reason why the doctrine that the limitation prescribed by the statute of another jurisdiction, which creates a right of action, is a condition of the right of action so that the latter is extinguished when the time so prescribed has expired, and will not thereafter sustain an action anywhere, should exclude the operation of the general rule which refers the question of limitation to the law of the forum, if the period prescribed by the statute of the other jurisdiction creating the liability has not expired. 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687. The exception to the general rule being based upon the theory of the extinguishment of a right by the lapse of time, if the time prescribed by the statute creating the right is longer than the time provided by the law of the forum, such actions will not fall within the exception but will be governed by the general rule that the law of the forum—in the instant case, the state statute of limitations—will prevail. Weaver v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 21 D. C. (10 Mackey) 499; Hutchings v. Lamson, 96 Fed. 720, 37 C. C. A. 564; Wharton on Conflict of Laws (3d Ed.) § 540B, vol. 2, p. 1261. The reason for the exception ceasing to exist, the exception itself ceases to exist.

The judgment is affirmed.

HENNESSY v. TITLE INS. & TRUST CO. et al. (Civ. 4358.)

1. Limitation of actions 🔑82—Administratrix held precluded from quieting title as against grantees of deceased's husband, holding property for 12 years prior to wife's death.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 318, limiting time for actions to recover realty, where property purchased with wife's money was taken in name of husband, who recorded declaration of homestead and held it for 12 years prior to his wife's death, wife's administratrix was barred from quieting title as against subsequent grantees of the husband.

2. Limitation of actions 🔑80—Statute does not toll as against successors of person dying while having cause of action to recover realty.

Where a person having cause of action for recovery of realty dies, the statute of limitations does not cease running as against those to whom property descends.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Suit by Ellen Hennessy, administratrix of Bridget Cassidy, deceased, against the Title Insurance & Trust Company, executor (substituted in place of Mary M. W. Devan, deceased), and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Loewenthal, Collins & Loewenthal and Erwin P. Werner, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

S. F. Macfarlane, Clair S. Tappaan, Earle M. Daniels, Stephens & Stephens, and Albert M. Stephens, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. The suit here involved was brought for the purpose of quieting title to certain real property situated in the county of Los Angeles. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment entered in favor of the defendants.

On the trial it was stipulated that on May 8, 1873, the common source of title was in a certain named person, at which time the property was conveyed to one Patrick Cassidy, who was a married man, and who, on October 8, 1878, made and recorded a declaration of homestead covering the property, and in which declaration his wife, Bridget Cassidy, did not join. Seven years later the wife died. Within three years after the wife's death Patrick Cassidy conveyed all of said property in different parcels to defendants' predecessors, and of such property, ever since such respective conveyances, they, with the defendants herein, have been in continuous possession, and have paid all taxes levied or assessed thereon. No administration was ever had on the estate of Bridget Cassidy, deceased, until more than 35 years had elapsed after her death, at which time plaintiff herein was appointed, qualified, and at all times here involved was the administratrix of the estate of Bridget Cassidy, deceased.

As a part of plaintiff's case a tender and offer of proof were made of the following facts: That Bridget Cassidy inherited money from her parents; that with said money she purchased the property which is the subject of this action; that at the time of the signing and recording of the declaration of homestead hereinbefore referred to, Patrick Cassidy and Bridget Cassidy were husband and wife, and that they, together with their family of four children, actually resided on said property; and that the actual value of said property did not exceed the sum of $5,000. Plaintiff further offered to prove each and all of the several facts set forth in said declaration of homestead.

Defendants objected to the evidence so offered and to each and every part thereof on the grounds that the same was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial; that plaintiff was not a proper party plaintiff; and that it affirmatively appeared that plaintiff's rights, if any, had been barred by laches, as well as by the provisions of each of sections 318, 319, 320, and 322 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court sustained said objections, and each of them, whereupon plaintiff rested her case.

The only error claimed by appellant is that the trial court erred in sustaining defendants' said objections. Appellant contends that, because she could have established the ultimate fact that the money with which the property was purchased was the separate property of Bridget Cassidy, and because she did not join in the declaration of homestead thereon, notwithstanding the fact that for more than 12 years Patrick Cassidy held title to the property in his own name, and during that time made and recorded a declaration of homestead thereon, the actual title to the property was in Bridget Cassidy at the time of her death.

[1, 2] The principal question in the case relates to the statute of limitations. Section 318 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

> "No action for the recovery of real property, or for the recovery of the possession thereof, can be maintained, unless it appear that the plaintiff, his ancestor, predecessor, or grantor, was seized or possessed of the property in question, within five years before the commencement of the action."

The property was purchased in 1873, and, whether purchased with Patrick Cassidy's money or with Bridget Cassidy's money, the title was taken in the name of Patrick Cassidy, and it was he who had the declaration of homestead recorded. If the money with which the property was purchased belonged to Bridget Cassidy, even assuming that the statutes then in force otherwise permitted the maintenance by her of an action to quiet title to the property (which proposition is denied by respondents), she had 5 years within which to commence such an action, if she desired so to do. The admitted facts show that for 12 years before her death no action was commenced. From a reading of the statute, to which reference has been had, as well as to other related sections set forth in the objections to which we have referred and upon which respondents rely, it would seem clear that the action was barred at the time of Mrs. Cassidy's death. The fact that there was no administration upon her estate does not affect the matter. Even had she died before the lapse of 5 years after the property was purchased, the statute would not have been tolled, either pending the appointment of an administrator of her estate or after an administrator had been appointed. The principle is clearly announced in the leading case of McLeran v. Benton, 73 Cal. 329, 14 Pac. 879, 2 Am. St. Rep. 814; where it is held that, where a person in whose favor a cause of action for the recovery of real property exists, and which person dies, the statute of limitations does not cease running as against those to whom the property would descend; and the same rule is laid down in the following cases: Alvarado v. Nordholt, 95 Cal. 116, 30 Pac. 211; Castro v. Geil, 110 Cal. 292, 42 Pac. 804, 52 Am. St. Rep. 84; Anderson v. Superior Court, 187 Cal. 95, 200 Pac. 963; Westphal v. Arnoux, 51 Cal. App. 532, 197 Pac. 395.

Without reference to other questions raised on the appeal, it follows that the trial court properly sustained the objections to which we have referred, and that the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; CURTIS, J.

ANDERSON v. ANDERSON. (Civ. 4718.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 22, 1924. Petition for Rehearing and Modification of Decision Denied Aug. 21, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 16, 1924.)

1. Divorce 🔑150(2), 186—Findings held hopelessly inconsistent; decree reversed where findings hopelessly inconsistent.

Findings in divorce suit held in clear conflict, and incapable of being harmoniously construed, requiring reversal.

2. Trial 🔑398—Hopeless inconsistency of findings requires reversal.

Clear and hopeless inconsistency of findings requires reversal.

3. Appeal and error 🔑931(1)—Findings to be reconciled if possible.

In support of the judgment, findings are to be construed liberally, and reconciled if possible.

4. Divorce 🔑27(2)—Single act of cruelty may justify divorce.

A single act of cruelty, though consisting of unfounded charges, may be of such a nature as not only to inflict grievous mental suffering, but to render impossible the subsequent living together of husband and wife, justifying divorce.

5. Divorce 🔑27(8)—False charges, while parties are living apart by consent, may constitute extreme cruelty.

Action for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty will lie for false charges made by one spouse against the other, while living apart by mutual consent.

6. Divorce 🔑49(6)—Husband could stand on completed cause of action for extreme cruelty and refuse subsequent offer of reconciliation.

Where, before wife sought reconciliation, husband had a completed cause of action for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, because of her false charges while they were living apart by mutual consent, her offer came too late, and he could refuse it and stand on his cause of action.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1122(2)—Appellate court cannot change conflicting findings.

Though conflict in findings of the trial court is no doubt due to inadvertence or oversight, the appellate court cannot change them.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action for divorce by Emil Anderson against Mary Anderson. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Dozier & Dozier, of San Francisco, C. F. Kimball, of Redding, and Dozier, Kimball & Dozier, of San Francisco, for appellant.
Reisner & Honey, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ST. SURE, J. Plaintiff and defendant were married on April 10, 1920, separated four days thereafter, and never again lived together. Plaintiff brought an action for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. Defendant specifically denied the averments of cruelty on her part, alleged willful desertion, willful neglect, and extreme cruelty as recriminatory defenses, and willful neglect and willful desertion by way of cross-complaint for separate maintenance, without asking for a divorce. In both her answer and cross-complaint the defendant alleged that plaintiff deserted her on April 10, 1920. There is no issue of the marriage and there are no property rights involved.

The trial court found specifically that all of the allegations of the complaint charging extreme cruelty against the defendant are true, and that all of the defenses and allegations of the answer and cross-complaint are false. The trial court also found that the parties lived separate and apart by mutual consent from April 14, 1920, until July 7, 1921, when "a reconciliation and restoration were, in good faith, sought by defendant and refused by plaintiff," and that "on or about the 7th day of July, 1921, the said plaintiff disregarded the solemnity of his marriage vow, and willfully and without cause, and with intent to desert and abandon defendant, separated himself from defendant and ever since said date has, and still continues so to willfully desert and abandon defendant and to live separate and apart from her, without any cause or reason, and against her will and without her consent." The trial court decided that plaintiff should not be granted a divorce from said defendant upon the ground of extreme cruelty, because of the showing of recrimination consisting of his willful desertion of said defendant, and also that defendant should not be awarded separate maintenance.

[1] Plaintiff appeals from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone. Plaintiff urges several grounds why the judgment should be reversed, but we think the one of vital importance is that there is in the findings a clear conflict, incapable of being harmoniously construed. The trial court found:

> "(VI) That since the said marriage the said defendant, in utter disregard of her marriage vows, and without any just cause or provocation, has treated plaintiff in a cruel and inhuman manner, and has wrongfully inflicted upon plaintiff great and grievous mental pain, humiliation, and suffering, and more particularly as follows: (1) That ever since the 13th day of May, 1921, the said defendant has, on divers and numerous occasions, and wrongfully and without any cause or reason therefor, falsely accused said plaintiff of marital infidelity and adultery. * * *
> "(VII) That by reason of her acts, language, and conduct, the said defendant has been guilty of extreme cruelty to said plaintiff and plaintiff has thereby suffered and still suffers great and grievous mental pain, humiliation, and anguish, wrongfully inflicted upon plaintiff by defendant as aforesaid."

The findings of the trial court which plaintiff claims present an irreconcilable conflict with those above quoted are as follows:

> "(XIV) It is true that from the 14th day of April, 1920, until the 7th day of July, 1921, plaintiff and defendant lived separate and apart from each other by mutual consent, and that on said 7th day of July, 1921, a reconciliation and restoration were, in good faith, sought by defendant and refused by plaintiff.
> "(XVIII) It is true that on or about the 7th day of July, 1921, the said plaintiff, disregarding the solemnity of his marriage vows, and willfully and without cause, and with intent to desert and abandon defendant, separated himself from defendant, and ever since the said plaintiff has and still continues so to willfully desert and abandon defendant and to live separate and apart from her, without any cause or reason, and against her will and without her consent."

[2-4] We are in accord with the contention of plaintiff that these findings are hopelessly inconsistent. In considering them we have in mind the rule that the findings are to be liberally construed in support of a judgment; that all the findings are to be read and considered together, and, if possible, are to be reconciled so as to prevent any conflict on material points; and that, unless the conflict is clear and the findings incapable of being harmoniously construed, the judgment will not be reversed on the ground of a conflict in the findings. The findings show that (ever since the 13th day of May, 1921) the defendant had, for two months prior to the date when the desertion commenced (July 7, 1921), constantly and falsely accused plaintiff of marital infidelity and adultery. It is manifest that a single act of cruelty may be of such a nature, even where the act consists solely of the making of unfounded charges and cruel imputations, as not only to inflict the most grievous mental suffering, but also to render impossible the subsequent living together of husband and wife upon any such terms as are essential to the accomplishment of the legitimate ends and objects of matrimony, if marriage is to be viewed from a different standpoint than as a mere physical relation. MacDonald v. MacDonald, 155 Cal. 665, 669, 102 Pac. 927, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 45.

[5, 6] While it is true that the parties separated by mutual consent, it has been held that an action for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty will lie for false charges made by one party to the marriage against the other, after they are living apart. MacDonald v. MacDonald, supra. And while it is also true that the defendant wife in good faith attempted a reconciliation and restoration, neither a husband nor wife can claim a right to continue the marriage relation while falsely charging the other with unchastity. Smith v. Smith, 8 Or. 100, cited with approval in MacDonald v. MacDonald, supra. The law does not enforce condonation. The findings show that plaintiff had a completed cause of action for divorce against defendant upon the ground of extreme cruelty before she sought reconciliation. Thus it appears that the offer came too late, and under such circumstances plaintiff had the right to refuse to accept it, and to stand upon his cause of action for divorce. Kenniston v. Kenniston, 6 Cal. App. 657, 92 Pac. 1037; Benkert v. Benkert, 32 Cal. 467, 471; Vosburg v. Vosburg, 136 Cal. 195, 204, 68 Pac. 694.

[7] Of course, the trial court did not intend to make conflicting findings. The embarrassment is no doubt due to inadvertence or oversight, but we manifestly are powerless to change the findings of the lower court.

That may be done only by the trial tribunal. Johnstone v. Gloster, 49 Cal. App. 750, 755, 194 Pac. 504.

Believing, as we do, that, because of the conflicting findings, this cause must be remanded for a new trial, we refrain from reviewing other points for reversal made by the plaintiff.

The judgment is reversed.

(68 Cal. App. 83)

HUCKABY v. NORTHAM et al. (Civ. 2662.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 3, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑2—On appeal from order granting new trial in 1918 no presumption that the order was not based on insufficiency of evidence.

Code Civ. Proc. § 657, as amended by St. 1919, p. 141, providing that, unless an order granting a new trial specifies that it is for insufficiency of evidence, it will be presumed not based on that ground, does not apply to order made July 3, 1918.

2. Appeal and error 🔑933(4)—If sufficient evidence to support judgment for defendants, order granting new trial based on insufficiency of evidence affirmed on appeal.

In ejectment in which defendants' motion for new trial on the ground among others of insufficiency of evidence to justify the verdict was sustained, generally in July, 1918, if there was sufficient evidence to support a judgment in favor of defendants, the order must be affirmed.

3. New trial 🔑70—In presence of sufficient evidence to sustain contrary finding, court not bound by finding of jury.

A trial court, in passing on a motion for new trial on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to justify the verdict, is not bound by findings of the jury, if there is sufficient evidence to sustain a contrary finding.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1015(2)—On substantial conflicting evidence, grant of new trial not disturbed.

Where evidence is substantially conflicting, grant of a new trial will not be disturbed on appeal.

5. Mines and minerals 🔑20(1)—Marking mining claim held sufficient.

Marking a mining claim by driving stakes extending 18 inches above the surface at both ends and middle of the center line, and at the four corners of the claim, and piling rocks around them, and posting notices on the center-line stakes, held a sufficient compliance with Rev. St. U. S. § 2324 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4620).

6. Mines and minerals 🔑20(1)—Marking on ground and notice held sufficient to put subsequent locator on inquiry.

Marking a mining claim by driving stakes extending 18 inches above the surface at both ends and the middle of the center line, and at the four corners, and piling rocks around them, and posting notices on the stakes, and causing a copy of notice to be recorded, held sufficient to put a subsequent locator upon inquiry as to the nature and extent of the claim.

7. Mines and minerals 🔑34—Failure to make payments held to forfeit rights under option making time of essence.

Where an option to purchase a mining claim made time of the essence, failure by the assignee thereof to make the required payments forfeited all its rights under the option.

8. Sales 🔑24—Vendor and purchaser 🔑18(3)—Time of essence of option to purchase.

Time is generally of the essence of an option to purchase, whether so expressed or not.

9. Bankruptcy 🔑268—Deed of trustee in bankruptcy purporting to convey mining claim in which bankrupt had no interest held to pass no title.

Where a bankrupt corporation, in possession of a mining claim under an option to purchase, had forfeited its rights under the option before the bankruptcy proceedings, if the claim was valid, deed of the trustee in bankruptcy, purporting to convey an overlapping claim, passed no title to the overlap.

10. Mines and minerals 🔑38(22)—Question whether mining location was sufficiently marked held one of fact.

In ejectment for a portion of a mining claim, the question of whether the location was sufficiently marked on the ground was one of fact.

11. Appeal and error 🔑931(4)—Finding that mining claim was sufficiently marked must be presumed in support of order granting new trial.

In ejectment for portion of a mining claim, in which an issue was whether the location of defendants' claim was sufficiently marked, it must be presumed, in support of an order granting defendants' motion for a new trial, that the court found that the location of the claim was sufficiently marked.

12. Appeal and error 🔑1024(5)—Finding of trial court on conflicting evidence conclusive on appeal.

Finding of specific fact by trial court on motion for new trial on conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

13. New trial 🔑7—Granting new trial as to defendants having no interest in property held error.

In ejectment for part of a mining claim, where some defendants had no interest in the property, granting a new trial as to them after judgment for plaintiff was error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by Vernon Huckaby against Elizabeth Northam and others. From an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed as to the named defendant, and reversed as to other defendants.

Theodore A. Bell, Sidney Rhein, and Frank J. Golden, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

C. K. Bonestell, of San Francisco, and W. D. Crichton, of Fresno, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. [1, 2] Plaintiff sued in ejectment to recover possession of certain mining ground alleged to be included in an unpatented claim known as the Durable. The answer denied the allegations of the complaint. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the restitution of the premises. Judgment was entered accordingly, and the defendants moved for a new trial on the ground, among others, of "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict." On the 3d of July, 1918, the court made an order granting the motion without specifying the ground upon which the same was granted. This appeal is from the order so made. The amendment of section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure in 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 141), providing that, unless the order granting a new trial shall specify that it is made upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, it will be presumed on appeal that the order was not based upon that ground, can have no application to this appeal. If there is sufficient evidence, therefore, to support a judgment in favor of defendants, the order must be affirmed.

Appellant's opening brief was filed March 17, 1923. The attorneys for respondents have filed no brief, although they have been given every opportunity to do so. "In the absence of any brief on the part of the respondent, the appeal may be determined upon those portions of the record printed in appellant's brief." Lutz v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 179 Cal. 401, 404, 177 Pac. 158, 159. The appellant's opening brief contains 241 printed pages, made up principally of the testimony taken at the trial.

Defendant Elizabeth Northam introduced evidence tending to show that she was the owner of a mining claim known as the Powder House; that it overlaps the Durable claim some 500 feet, and was located prior to the location of the Durable. This controversy is as to the overlapped territory. The jury answered in the negative the following special interrogatory:

> "Did A. R. Wortham mark the boundaries of the Powder House claim sufficiently clear to enable them to be readily traced at the time such marking was made, considering the surface of the land on which the location was made, and the country surrounding it at the time?"

Appellant says in his brief:

> "This finding of the jury entirely eliminated any question as to whether or not the Durable overlaps the Powder House, for, according to the verdict of the jury, no such claim as the Powder House has ever existed."

[3, 4] This argument would be logical if the appeal were from the judgment, but the trial court, in passing on a motion for a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, is not bound by the findings of the jury, where there is sufficient evidence to sustain a contrary finding. Where the evidence is substantially conflicting, the action of the trial court in granting a new trial will not be disturbed on appeal.

[5, 6] A. R. Wortham testified that he located the Powder House claim in the year 1907; that the center line of the claim followed the course of the mineral ledge, the point of discovery being at the middle of the center line; that he marked the claim on the ground by driving square stakes, 4 inches in diameter and extending 18 inches above the surface, at both ends, and the middle of the center line, and at the four corners of the claim, and piling rocks around them, and that he posted notices on the center line stakes, and subsequently on the corner stakes, and caused a copy thereof to be recorded, reading as follows:

> "Notice of Location. Quartz Claim.
> "Notice is hereby given that the undersigned citizen of the United States over the age of 21 years has, in compliance with the requirements of the Revised Statutes of the United States, this day located a claim 1,500 linear feet along the course of this lead, lode, or vein of mineral-bearing quartz, and 300 feet in width on each side of the middle of said lead, lode, or vein, together with all mineral deposits contained therein, and all timber growing within the limits of said claim, and all water and water privileges, thereon or appurtenant thereto, situate in the Fresno mining district, and more particularly described as follows, to wit: Commencing at a stake in canon due south 1,500 feet to stake marked P. C.
> "This claim shall be known as the Powder House quartz claim.
> "Located this 30th day of August, 1907.
> "A. R. Wortham.
> "Witness: J. Norrish.
> "S. B. Brogan."

No reason is shown why the foregoing is not a sufficient compliance with the statute requiring that "the location must be distinctly marked on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced." U. S. Rev. Stats., § 2324 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4620); McKinley Creek Mining Co. v. Alaska United Mining Co., 183 U. S. 563, 22 Sup. Ct. 84, 46 L. Ed. 331. In any event, such marking on the ground and notice were sufficient to put a subsequent locator upon inquiry as to the nature and extent of Wortham's claim. Stock v. Plunkett, 181 Cal. 193, 194, 183 Pac. 657.

September 23, 1911, a corporation known as the Mercy Mining & Development Company, of which Wortham was a director, for a valuable consideration, gave one S. D. Chittenden an option to purchase the Powder

House claim and other property for $50,000—$300 cash, $9,700 at the end of 7 months, $10,000 in 13 months, $10,000 in 19 months, and $20,000 in 25 months. The option agreement required Chittenden to erect a "furnace of at least 20-ton daily capacity" at a convenient place on the property. The agreement expressly made time of its essence, and provided that, upon the failure of Chittenden to make the payments therein provided, or to perform any "other terms and conditions" thereof, "then this contract shall terminate and be at an end." The final clause reads as follows:

> "This contract runs in favor of, and is binding upon the heirs, executors, administrators, successors, and assigns of the parties hereto; it being understood, however, that no personal obligation is imposed upon the party of the second part to buy; it being understood that, if the payments are not made, all rights are forfeited, including all payments and improvements up to the forfeiture."

On the 26th of October, 1911, Chittenden transferred all of his rights under the option agreement to the Pacific Quicksilver Company, a corporation. The Mercy Mining & Development Company delivered possession of the property to the Pacific Quicksilver Company, and pointed out to the superintendent of the latter company one of the stakes of the Powder House claim. There was at that time on the ground in dispute an experimental rotary furnace, two concrete condensers, and "cars and tools necessary for work," all of which were delivered with the mining claim. The Pacific Quicksilver Company made the first deferred payment of $9,700, but no further payments were made on the option. The company expended about $30,000 in making improvements on that part of the Powder House claim, which is overlapped by the Durable. May 26, 1914, E. A. Waldron located the Durable claim. October 7, 1914, a petition in involuntary bankruptcy was filed against the Pacific Quicksilver Company, and on the 1st day of March, 1915, it was duly adjudged a bankrupt. After the filing of the petition, and prior to such adjudication, on the 24th of December, 1914, Waldron conveyed the Durable claim to the corporation. May 14, 1915, pursuant to a sale theretofore made in the bankruptcy proceedings, the trustee in bankruptcy executed a deed purporting to convey the Durable claim, described by courses and distances, which include the overlapping strip, and certain other property to the plaintiff for the sum of $1,500. The deed was recorded May 17, 1915.

April 23, 1912, the Mercy Mining & Development Company joined with A. R. Wortham in a conveyance of the Powder House claim and the other property described in the Chittenden option to E. F. Northam. Thereafter E. F. Northam died, and on the 22d day of May, 1914, all the property of his estate was distributed to defendant Elizabeth Northam. July 7, 1914, Mrs. Northam commenced an action against the Pacific Quicksilver Company to quiet her title to the Powder House claim and other property covered by the Chittenden option. No lis pendens was filed. May 26, 1915, judgment was entered quieting Mrs. Northam's title to the property described in her complaint. August 6, 1915, by virtue of a writ of possession issued by the superior court, the sheriff placed Mrs. Northam in possession of the property in dispute.

[7-9] It is clear from what has been stated that the Pacific Quicksilver Company had forfeited all its rights under the Chittenden option long prior to the insolvency proceeding. That option, by the express provisions thereof, had come to an end. Time was expressly made of the essence thereof. Time is generally of the essence of an option to purchase whether so expressed or not. Rice Lands, etc., Co. v. Blevins, 61 Cal. App. 536, 541, 215 Pac. 402. Since the bankrupt had no interest in the property in dispute, if the Powder House claim is valid, the trustee's deed purporting to convey such property passed no title to plaintiff. Cramer v. Wilson, 195 U. S. 409, 25 Sup. Ct. 94, 49 L. Ed. 256, 258.

It may be conceded that plaintiff made out a prima facie case by proving his peaceable possession of the premises, and his ouster therefrom under the writ of possession.

[10-12] The question then of Mrs. Northam's right to a new trial is dependent upon the validity of the Powder House location. Appellant correctly states that whether the location was sufficiently marked on the ground is a question of fact. It must be presumed in support of the order granting a new trial that the court found, upon the conflicting evidence, that the location of the Powder House was sufficiently marked. That finding is conclusive on appeal.

[13] The evidence shows clearly that the other defendants have no interest in the property. The order granting a new trial was therefore erroneous as to such defendants.

The order is affirmed in so far as it grants a new trial to defendant Elizabeth Northam, and reversed as to the other defendants; appellant to recover costs of appeal from respondents other than Elizabeth Northam.

AYRES et al. v. LIPSCHUTZ. (Civ. 4816; S. F. 10451.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 11, 1924. Rehearing Denied Aug. 8, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 8, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑854(2)—Ground assigned by trial court for decision not material, if judgment otherwise correct.

Ground assigned by trial court for its judgment is not material, if judgment is correct for other reasons.

2. Attorney and client 🔑134(1)—Client liable for reasonable value of services of attorney discharged in violation of contract.

Under Civ. Code, § 2356, client may discharge attorney at any time, but, if by doing so he breaks contract, he is liable in quantum meruit for value of services rendered.

3. Attorney and client 🔑166(3)—Agreed fee held some evidence of reasonable value of services of attorneys on plaintiff's dismissal of action without their consent.

Where husband, under contract to pay attorneys certain fee for securing divorce by default and contingent fee dependent on success in case of contest, dismissed action without attorneys' consent, held, that agreed fee for default was some evidence of reasonable value of services of attorneys down to discharge, sustaining judgment for that sum, less payments against husband.

On Petition for Rehearing in Supreme Court.

4. Contracts 🔑111—Contract to pay contingent fee dependent on success of divorce action held void as against public policy.

Contract to pay attorneys $2,500 if they obtained divorce in contested action, and $2,000 if they were unsuccessful, held void as against public policy, in that under it attorneys were financially interested in preventing reconciliation; contingent provision, being portion of inducement, was not severable.

5. Work and labor 🔑10—Where contract for attorneys' fees void, as against public policy, recovery for services must be on quantum meruit.

Contract to obtain divorce for contingent fee dependent on success, void as against public policy, afforded no basis for recovery against client which could be had only on quantum meruit.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Albert D. Ayres and another, copartners, doing business under the name of Albert D. Ayres and W. M. Gardiner, also commonly and generally known as Ayres & Gardiner, against Benjamin Lipschutz. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Gillogley, Crofton & Payne and Irvin W. Ayres, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Lucius L. Solomons and Fred C. Peterson, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs, who were attorneys at law, with offices in the city of Reno, Nev., entered into an oral contract with the defendant, wherein the defendant agreed to pay the plaintiffs $300 and costs for legal services to be performed by them, provided they were able to secure for him a divorce from his wife by default. Two hundred dollars of this agreed price was paid, and plaintiffs commenced the divorce action. While still acting as attorneys for the defendant, the plaintiffs prepared and entered into a written contract with the defendant, fixing their fees in the event of a contest. This contract called for the payment of $2,500 for their services if they succeeded in procuring a divorce, and for $2,000 if unsuccessful. The wife filed a demurrer to the divorce complaint, which was promptly overruled, and immediately thereafter filed her answer, and then the defendant herein dismissed his action. Plaintiffs thereupon sued to recover the sum of $2,500 upon the written contract, $100 upon the oral contract, and for costs expended by them.

The complaint was in the usual form upon an express contract—merely alleging the execution of the contracts, plaintiffs' part performance and willingness to perform, and defendant's prevention of complete performance by dismissing the action. The answer alleged that the written contract was composed and drafted by plaintiffs while they were acting as attorneys for the defendant, and that he relied upon the confidential relation existing between them, and did not have any independent, legal, or other advice.

The trial court found that the defendant agreed to pay the plaintiffs under the oral contract $300 for their legal services, and to reimburse them for the costs which they expended. It also found that the written contract calling for a larger fee was against public policy and void. Upon these findings, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiffs for $101.65, representing the balance of the fee due under the oral contract and the amount of costs outlayed by plaintiffs. The appeal is from the judgment upon the judgment roll and upon a bill of exceptions.

In support of the judgment, respondent relies wholly upon the finding of the trial court that the written contract was against public policy and void. No authorities are cited in support of this position; the respondent being content to rest upon the simple statement that—

"It is hardly necessary to say that considerations of public policy, founded upon the sanctity of the home and the marital state, differentiate a divorce case from the rule and reasoning relied upon by appellants."

They do refer to 3 Cal. Jur. pp. 691–693, and quote the following:

> "Contracts for contingent fees for attorneys were not tolerated at all at common law, but are unquestionably valid in California. This is on the ground that otherwise a party without the means to employ an attorney to pay his fee certain, and having a meritorious cause of action or defense, would find himself powerless to protect his rights."

They also cite, in support of the quoted text, Newman v. Freitas, 129 Cal. 283, 61 Pac. 907, 50 L. R. A. 548, Parsons v. Segno, 187 Cal. 260, 201 Pac. 580, and several other cases which are so plainly inapplicable to the point under discussion that further consideration of them is unnecessary.

Both the Newman and Parsons Cases involved contracts executed between an attorney, who appeared in a divorce action in behalf of the wife. In both cases the contract between the attorney and his client called for a payment to the attorney out of the alimony or property which the wife might secure from her husband by order of court or a judgment in the divorce action. In the Newman Case the Supreme Court held (page 292 [61 Pac. 910]) that the contract was void as against public policy because the attorney "was directly and greatly interested, not only in preventing any reconciliation, but in bringing about a divorce." In the Parsons Case it was conceded that a similar contract between an attorney and his client was void upon the authority of the Newman Case.

The contract in the instant case was between the attorneys and the husband. It called for the payment of $2,500 in the event that the attorneys should be successful in procuring a divorce for their client, and for the payment of $2,000 if they should be unsuccessful. It was not, like those in the cited cases, a champertous contract, in which the attorneys would participate directly in the funds of the litigation. We have not been cited to any authority which denounces a contract for legal fees of this character, and, without having the point more fully briefed or argued, we are not prepared to agree with the conclusion of the trial court that the contract under consideration is against public policy and void.

[1-3] However, the ground assigned by the trial court is not material, if the judgment is correct for any other reason. We are satisfied that such is the situation here, and that the judgment must be affirmed. The appellants alleged that they were employed as the attorneys of the respondent to maintain an action for divorce; that their fee was agreed upon if they obtained a judgment by default; that thereafter the defendant in the divorce case appeared and interposed a demurrer; that about that time appellants and their client agreed upon a contingent fee dependent upon success in the contested litigation; that, after the demurrer had been presented, the respondent employed other attorneys to dismiss the divorce case, and thereby prevented appellants from performing further services; and appellants thereupon asked judgment for the contract price. The appellants did not plead the value of the services rendered by them, nor ask judgment for the reasonable value of the services rendered before their discharge. The respondent had the power to discharge appellants at any time. Civ. Code, § 2356. However, if, in doing so, he breached his contract, he would have been liable on a count in quantum meruit for the reasonable value of the services rendered by his attorneys down to the date of their discharge. McConnell v. Corona, 149 Cal. 64, 65, 85 Pac. 929, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1171. That was not an action between attorney and client; nevertheless the rule is the same. 6 C. J. 745, § 321; Louque v. Dejan, 129 La. 519, 56 South. 427, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 389.

It is true that some testimony was offered that $2,000 was the reasonable value of the legal services performed by appellants prior to their discharge. But this was not in response to any issue before the court, and the court did not find thereon. The oral contract was some evidence that $300 was the reasonable value of such services without a contest, and the trial court could accept this evidence. The judgment based upon the oral contract is thus free from legal objection.

Judgment affirmed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; STURTEVANT, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [4, 5] We are of the opinion that the contract herein comes within the rule announced and applied in Newman v. Freitas, 129 Cal. 283, 61 Pac. 907, 50 L. R. A. 548, and referred to in Parsons v. Segno, 187 Cal. 260, 201 Pac. 580, for the reason that under it the attorneys were directly and financially interested in preventing a reconciliation, and in bringing about a divorce. The contingent provisions of the contract appear to have been a portion of the inducement which led to its execution, and therefore cannot be deemed a severable portion thereof. The contract, being void as against public policy afforded no basis for a recovery which could have been had only upon a quantum meruit, and we agree with the conclusion of the District Court of Appeal that, in the absence of any allegation or finding as to the reasonable value of the services rendered, the judgment of the trial court was correct.

The petition for a transfer, and hearing by this court, is denied.

PIKE v. PSIHOGIOS. (Civ. 4013.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 11, 1924. Rehearing Denied Aug. 8, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 8, 1924.)

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑79(2)—Purchaser of interest of lessor in sublease held not entitled to deposit made with lessor by subtenant.

Where defendant purchased business and lease of building in which it was carried on from plaintiff for agreed price, sale including interest of plaintiff in sublease of part of building, held, that defendant was not entitled to have agreed price reduced by amount of deposit made with plaintiff at execution of sublease, pursuant to its terms, to secure performance of its conditions, though defendant did not know of such provision in sublease until after consummation of sale; it being his duty to examine sublease before agreeing to accept it.

2. Sales 🔑283—Purchaser enjoying peaceful possession held not entitled to recover on account of defect of title.

In action for price of fixtures, defendant could not recover on account of fact that title of plaintiff was only that of conditional purchaser, where at time of trial conditional vendor had asserted no rights, and defendant enjoyed peaceful possession.

3. Brokers 🔑42—License as real estate broker not required to entitle to recovery for selling personal property or lease of real estate.

Under St. 1919, p. 1252, § 2, enumerating acts which can be done by duly licensed real estate broker only, held, that license was not required to enable broker to recover commissions for selling personal property or lease of real property.

Houser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; M. W. Conkling, Judge.

Action by Peter Pike against James Psihogios. Judgment for plaintiff, causes of action set out in complaint, and from the judgment in defendant's favor on three counterclaims, plaintiff appeals. Reversed in part, affirmed in part, and remanded, with directions.

A. L. Hubbell, of Calexico, for appellant.
F. H. Smith, of Calexico, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This action was instituted to recover the purchase price of certain personal property sold by plaintiff to defendant, also to foreclose a chattel mortgage given to plaintiff by defendant. The defendant set up as a defense to said action certain so-called affirmative defenses and counterclaims. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff upon the two causes of action set out in his complaint, and the court also rendered judgment in favor of the defendant upon four of the counterclaims set out in his answer, and deducted the amount found due on these four counterclaims from the amount found due plaintiff upon his two causes of action, and rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff for the difference. Plaintiff concedes that the action of the trial court in its finding upon one of said counterclaims was proper, but has appealed from that portion of said judgment in defendant's favor, upon the other three counterclaims, and contends that the evidence was not sufficient to justify the court in finding in defendant's favor upon these three counterclaims.

The three counterclaims, the allowance of which is objected to by plaintiff on this appeal, are designated as follows in defendant's answer: Third affirmative defense and counterclaim, defendant's fifth defense, and sixth affirmative defense and counterclaim. We will discuss them in the order named.

[1] Third Affirmative Defense and Counterclaim. Plaintiff sold to defendant a certain pool hall in the city of Calexico, together with the fixtures and furniture contained therein, and the lease of the building in which the business was carried on. The consideration thereof was $15,000. Prior to said sale, plaintiff had leased to a subtenant, to be used as a barber shop, a portion of the building covered by his lease. This fact was well known to defendant at the time of the purchase, and a copy of the lease from the plaintiff to the subtenant, assigned by plaintiff to defendant, in accordance with the agreement between the parties, was, at the time the sale was agreed upon, placed in escrow with a bill of sale of the property sold, and other papers necessary to consummate the sale. This lease in favor of the subtenant contained the following provision:

> "It is agreed at the time of the execution of this lease that the sum of $300 shall be deposited with said first party as a guaranty of faithful performance of the terms and conditions of this lease by said second party. In the event the said second party complies with the terms and conditions of this lease, then said deposit of $300 shall apply as payments of the last three months of said term, otherwise it shall be forfeited to said first party as liquidated damages for a breach of this agreement."

Under this provision of the lease there had been paid by the subtenant to the plaintiff, at the time of the execution of the lease to the subtenant, the sum of $300. Defendant by this counterclaim now seeks to compel plaintiff to pay this sum to him. The claim of defendant is resisted on the part of the plaintiff, upon the ground that the property sold, including the interest of plaintiff in the lease to the subtenant, was sold to the defendant for an agreed price, and, as nothing was said or done regarding this sum of $300, it must be assumed that it was taken into consideration by the parties at the time they agreed upon the price, and was included in and covered by the purchase price. As we have already seen, defendant knew of the lease to the subtenant, and either knew the terms thereof, or at least had ample opportunity to acquire this information. In his agreement to purchase the property, he had agreed to accept it subject to the terms of the lease to the subtenant. He agreed to pay for this property a certain fixed sum. If he expected this purchase price to be reduced to the extent of $300 on account of the above provision in the lease and the deposit of money thereunder with the plaintiff, then, in all fairness, he should have made known his claim at the time he agreed to the terms of the sale. Failing to do so, he must be held to have agreed to accept the property in the condition in which it was at the time of its delivery to him by the plaintiff, and for the price agreed upon at the time of delivery. His claim that he did not know of this provision in the lease until some eight days after the sale was consummated, and the property delivered to him does not help his situation. He not only had every opportunity to examine the lease and know of its terms, but it was his duty to do so before he agreed to accept it as a part of the property he was purchasing from the plaintiff. His failure to do so was gross negligence on his part, and if any one is to suffer on account of this negligence it should be defendant rather than the plaintiff. This is especially true, when we take into consideration the fact that the evidence shows that the plaintiff was perfectly frank and honest in the whole transaction, and did nothing to conceal from the defendant any information to which he was entitled, or to prevent him from learning all the facts regarding the property he was purchasing. In our opinion, the evidence fails to sustain the finding of the court in defendant's favor upon this counterclaim.

[2] Defendant's Fifth Defense was based upon the following facts: The furniture and the fixtures, sold by plaintiff to defendant, included a soft drink bar. The evidence, however, shows that plaintiff was not the absolute owner of this bar, but held it under a conditional sale from the Maier Brewing Company. The conditions set forth in this contract of sale had never been performed by the plaintiff. The brewing company, up to the time of the trial, however, had not taken possession of said bar, nor had the defendant ever paid to the company anything on account of the purchase price of said bar. The defendant went into possession of said bar immediately upon the consummation of said sale, and has had the quiet and peaceable possession thereof ever since its purchase. Defendant therefore had not, at the time of said trial, sustained any damage, and was not entitled to any recovery against plaintiff on account of his defect of title to said bar.

"To recover damages for defect of title to personal property it must be alleged and shown that plaintiff has suffered damages thereby. The rule is the same where the claim for damages is based on breach of agreement to furnish good title as it is where the action is for breach of warranty of title. Indeed, an agreement to furnish a good title followed by a bill of sale of the property is in effect a warranty of title. This rule that the vendee cannot recover on such warranty while still retaining undisputed possession of the property has been frequently recognized in this state." Barnum v. Cochrane, 143 Cal. 642, 645, 77 Pac. 656, 657.

[3] Sixth Affirmative Defense and Counterclaim. This cause of action was based upon a claim assigned to defendant by one A. Katugios. The court found that Katugios acted as agent for the plaintiff in the sale of said poolroom, furniture, and lease to defendant for the sum of $15,000, and that plaintiff agreed to pay him a commission of five per cent. or $750, for said services. While the evidence is conflicting, we think it is sufficient to sustain such finding. It is admitted that Katugios had no license to act as a real estate broker, as required by section 2 of chapter 605, Statutes of California 1919, page 1252. Plaintiff therefore claims that no recovery can be had for his services in effecting such sale. In support of this claim plaintiff relies upon said section 2 and section 20 of said act. Section 2 enumerates the acts which may be performed only by a duly authorized and licensed real estate broker or salesman, and section 20 provides that no action shall be brought or maintained by any such person for the collection of compensation for the performance of any of the acts enumerated in said section 2, without alleging and proving that such person was a duly licensed real estate broker or salesman. The services, on account of which it was sought by said counterclaim to recover, were performed by Katugios in acting as agent of the plaintiff in the sale of personal property, and of a lease to real property. It will be observed that section 2 of said act, in its enumeration of the acts which only a duly licensed real estate broker may perform, does not specify either the sale of personal property, or the sale of a lease to real property. It was therefore not necessary for Katugios to obtain a license under said section 2 to perform the services rendered by him to the plaintiff, and which form the basis of this counterclaim. Katugios therefore had a good cause of action and the right to maintain the same against the plaintiff for his said services, and could, of course, assign it to the defendant. The action of the court, therefore, in awarding the defendant judgment on this counterclaim, was proper and legal, and the judgment herein, in so far as it relates to defendant's sixth affirmative defense and counterclaim, is affirmed.

On account of the error of the court in awarding judgment in favor of the defendant on his third affirmative defense and counterclaim, and on defendant's fifth defense, as set out in his answer, that portion of said judgment in defendant's favor upon said two last-named counterclaims is reversed, and the case is remanded to the trial court, with directions that a new trial be had, but only as to the issues involved in defendant's third affirmative defense and counterclaim, and on defendant's fifth defense.

McCARTHY & MEYER v. BANK OF ITALY et al. (Civ. 4240.)

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑32—Facts held not to show ratification of lease, tendered as fulfilling condition of escrow agreement.

Where lessor sold lessee certain equipment, subject to escrow agreement by which purchase money was to be delivered by escrow holder to lessor when latter tendered new lease, containing certain renewal clause, held that defendant's continued possession of premises and equipment after expiration of old lease did not, under facts, show ratification of new lease tendered by lessor not containing stipulated clause.

2. Escrows 🔑9—Holder of escrow agreement held to have right to insist on fulfillment of condition not illegal, though not enforceable.

Where, under escrow agreement for purchase of fixtures by defendant from plaintiff, his lessor, escrow holder was to deliver purchase money when plaintiff tendered lease carrying "renewal option for two or three years," at rent to be mutually agreed upon, held that, even if such condition was not enforceable, not being illegal, plaintiff could not, without defendant's consent, compel escrow holder to deliver purchase money without fulfilling condition.

3. Escrows 🔑9—Rule stated as to necessity of showing strict performance of conditions of escrow agreement in action against escrow holder.

Where property is sold subject to terms of escrow agreement, in action by seller to compel escrow holder to deliver purchase money, plaintiff can recover only upon showing of full and strict performance by him of terms and conditions of escrow agreement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Action to compel specific performance by McCarthy & Meyer against the Bank of Italy and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

John W. Carrigan, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Andreani & Haines and John L. Bisher, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for respondent Bank of Italy.

Smith & Breslin, of Los Angeles, for respondent Mina.

CONREY, P. J. On or about the 21st day of February, 1921, the defendant Mina, as tenant of the plaintiffs, went into possession of a certain meat market, with its fixtures and equipment, at 1102 West Seventh street, in the city of Los Angeles, and continued in possession thereof during a period extending some months beyond the 31st day of August, 1921. Said entry was made under a written lease for a term commencing on said date of entry and ending on the 31st day of August, 1921, at a monthly rental of $70. On or about the 10th day of May, 1921, the plaintiffs sold said meat market, fixtures, and equipment to the defendant Mina for the agreed price of $2,600, of which sum said Mina then paid $150; it being further agreed that leases should be executed as hereinafter stated.

Said sale was made subject to the terms of their agreement as contained in escrow instructions on said 10th day of May delivered by the plaintiffs and Mina to the defendant Bank of Italy. Said escrow instructions were signed by Mina and at the same time were accepted and approved over the signature of the plaintiffs. The agreement as contained in said escrow instructions provided for the payment of the unpaid balance of the purchase price, amounting to $2,450, as follows: Mina delivered to the bank the sum of $1,850 and a promissory note payable to the plaintiffs in the sum of $600. The bank was instructed that it was to hold said money and said note until August 31, 1921, or before said date, provided the following conditions were complied with. The bank was instructed to hand said money and note to the plaintiffs when the plaintiffs delivered to the bank for Mina a bill of sale to said fixtures and equipment of the meat market stall, and also a lease to said stall and market premises for the term commencing February 21, 1921, and ending August 31, 1921, at the stated rental, and when they further delivered to the bank for Mina a lease to said meat market stall and premises, commencing August 31, 1921, for the period of two years, at a monthly rental not exceeding $70 per month—

> "which said new lease shall also carry a renewal option for two or three years from and after August 31, 1923, at a rental to be mutually agreed upon; the understanding of the undersigned being that said purchase price of $2,600 be paid to said McCarthy & Meyer, if on or before August 31, 1921, they obtain for and deliver to the undersigned lease to said market stall and premises for at least two years, and possibly five years, to said premises, commencing on August 31, 1921. Should said lease, commencing August 31, 1921, for the term of two years or longer, at a rental of $70, be not so delivered for the undersigned, the above-said money is to be returned to the undersigned."

On some day during the month of August, 1921, the plaintiffs tendered to the bank, for delivery under said escrow, a bill of sale and a lease, which they claimed were in full accordance with the requirements of said escrow agreement. The defendant Mina, claiming that said lease commencing August 31, 1921, tendered by the plaintiffs, did not comply with the requirements and conditions of the escrow, refused to accept said documents, and instructed the bank to withhold from plaintiffs the said money and note deposited by him with the bank. The bank thereupon refused delivery of the money and the note to the plaintiffs, who thereupon commenced this action. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendants. The plaintiffs appeal therefrom.

The controversy turns upon the contention of the defendants that the lease tendered by the plaintiffs did not comply with that part of the escrow instructions or agreement which provided that "said new lease shall also carry a renewal option for two or three years from and after August 31, 1923, at a rental to be mutually agreed upon." It does not appear that at the time of making the sale and escrow agreement, or subsequently thereto, the parties ever entered into any agreement or attempted to make any agreement settling the amount of rental to be paid during the period covered by said proposed option. The lease tendered by the plaintiffs in purported compliance with said sale agreement contained no reference to said proposed option other than the following:

> "Provided, however, there is hereby given said second party an option of renewal of this lease at a monthly rental to be mutually agreed upon at its termination, subject, however, to all the rights and interests said lessor herein may then have or have acquired in said demised premises."

If the lease thus offered, containing said quoted clause (which does not state any period of time of such renewal), and not otherwise providing for the renewal option, is not a sufficient compliance with the agreement as made, it must follow that the judgment in favor of the defendants should be affirmed.

[1] Appellants contend, first, that defendant Mina, by continuing in possession of the premises and personal property, ratified and confirmed the terms of the lease which was tendered to him by the plaintiffs. Certainly this result did not follow at the time, early in August, when the two-year lease was tendered. For the defendant Mina was in possession under a prior lease, which by its terms would not expire until the end of that month; and if, after that month (as appellants assert that the fact is), Mina remained in possession and continued to pay rent of $70 per month to plaintiffs, then he became a tenant for one month at the time of each one of such renewals. Civ. Code, § 1945. Plaintiffs knew, before the end of August, that Mina had refused to accept the proffered lease. This must be so, since this action was commenced on August 17, 1921, to enforce the alleged contract of sale by compelling the bank to deliver to plaintiffs the note and money which had been placed in escrow.

[2, 3] Appellants further contend that defendant Mina's claim of right to have the lease carry a renewal option, as specified in the escrow instructions, is not enforceable, because the clause in question, according to "the construction placed upon the agreement by the defendant," is inoperative, indefinite, unreasonable, and not capable of being carried into effect. Let it be conceded that, for said stated reasons, defendant Mina could not have compelled the plaintiffs to execute a lease carrying a renewal option at any stated rate of rent to be paid. It does not follow that the plaintiffs, without offering to execute a lease conforming to the terms of their agreement, can specifically enforce the contract. On the contrary, it would seem that both parties, equally, are unable to obtain specific performance of their agreement. The condition specified in the escrow instructions, in relation to the option, even if not enforceable, was not illegal. Since the defendant Mina, at the time of giving his escrow instructions, thought that the provision in question was of sufficient importance to be included in the proposed lease, the other party was not entitled to change the terms in that respect any more than in any other detail of the lease, without Mina's consent. Yore v. Bankers' Association, 88 Cal. 609, 615, 26 Pac. 514. And in an action to compel the escrow holder to deliver the consideration for the lease, "the bank would be compelled to deliver the papers in controversy to the plaintiffs, only upon the showing of a full and strict performance by them of the terms and conditions of the escrow agreement." Bartley v. Fraser, 16 Cal. App. 560, 565, 117 Pac. 683, 685.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. et al.
(Civ. 4107.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 14, 1924.)

1. Dedication 🔑44—That public map shows land laid out as street not evidence of dedication.

That a public map shows land laid out as a street is not in itself evidence of dedication.

2. Dedication 🔑44—Mention in deed of center of street as boundary line not alone sufficient to prove dedication.

Fact that in deeds center line of street was mentioned as boundary line of conveyed land was not alone sufficient to prove dedication of anything to public, or that offer of dedication had been accepted.

3. Dedication 🔑19(5)—Making sales with reference to supposed street lines held not to constitute dedication.

As between a landowner and public, making sales with reference to supposed street lines does not constitute a dedication.

4. Dedication 🔑44—Reference to map and to blocks delineated thereon held insufficient to prove acceptance.

Evidence showing references as contained in deeds and quitclaims, to map, and items of evidence showing similar references to blocks delineated thereon, held insufficient to prove acceptance of any offer of dedication for street purposes.

5. Dedication 🔑29—Filing map showing street held not effective as against owners acquiring title, under conveyance ignoring existence of street.

Where map showing location of street was filed as public record 11 years after it was made, such filing was too late to be effective as dedication against owners who had acquired title under conveyances which ignored existence of any street or supposed street and disposed of entire area as private property.

6. Dedication 🔑29 — Conveyances ignoring street designated on map held withdrawal of any offer of dedication.

Where map of land showed street, subsequent conveyances prior to recording map, ignoring existence of street or supposed street and disposing of entire area as private property, held withdrawal of offer of dedication, if any, made by map.

7. Dedication 🔑19(1)—Map failing to show boundary of street held not to give notice thereof.

Where map as recorded did not show westerly boundary of street south of certain point, its recording did not give notice to any one of existence of such a street south of designated point, so as to amount to dedication thereof.

8. Evidence 🔑230(3)—Testimony of former owner, after selling land, as to dedication held not admissible as against successor in title.

In action by city to compel removal of obstruction from land contended to have been dedicated to street purposes, testimony of predecessor in title of defendant in another action, after former had sold land, that he did not claim it, was not admissible against defendant.

9. Trial 🔑60(1)—Attempt to accept land for street inadmissible, in absence of evidence of offer of dedication.

In action to compel removal of obstruction from land claimed to be street, in absence of evidence tending to show offer of dedication of land from owners, proceedings of city council attempting to accept land as public street were inadmissible as evidence of acceptance.

10. Municipal corporations 🔑654 — Evidence held sufficient to show existence of street by adverse use.

In action to compel removal of obstruction from land claimed to be street, evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that land had been used openly, continuously, adversely, and exclusively for many years as street, with claim of right and with knowledge of owners, so as to make land street by adverse use.

11. Municipal corporations 🔑657(3)—Placing fence in street held not to prove abandonment.

That fence was placed at or near middle of street, on order of member of board of city trustees, held not proof of abandonment by city, acting through its board of trustees or any competent authority.

12. Estoppel 🔑62(5)—City held not estopped to sue to remove obstruction from street.

Relocation of fences, placing them in center of street, on order of member of city board of trustees, without proof that city itself acted by board or any competent authority, held not to estop city to maintain action to remove obstruction therefrom.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rodgers, Judge.

Action by the People of the State of California against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank Thunen, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Bowker & Sheridan and H. F. Orr, all of Ventura, for the People.

CONREY, P. J. In the name of the people of the state, the city of San Buenaventura brought this action to compel defendants to remove certain obstructions from an alleged public street named Kalorama street. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal.

The complaint is in two counts. The first count claims under a dedication of land for the street, and acceptance thereof by the public. The second count claims through adverse use of the described land, with claim of right so to do; such claim being known to the owners of the land and to the public generally. The answers of the defendants deny the dedication, deny the acceptance, and deny the adverse use. Appellants contend that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings of the court upon these issues.

The disputed strip of land is included in what is alleged to be that part of Kalorama street which extends south from the intersection of that street with an east and west street called Front street. That Front street and Kalorama street north from Front street exist as public streets is not denied. Beach street, as shown on the map, Exhibit 1, parallels Front street, one block south from Front street. The block of land bounded on the north by Front street, on the south by Beach street, on the east by Laurel street, and on the west by the alleged Kalorama street, is known as block 21. The Southern Pacific railroad station is located in block 21, where the right of way runs in a direction extending northwesterly toward and across and beyond the alleged Kalorama street. As conveyed by Robert Sudden to Pacific Improvement Company (predecessor of the defendants) in April, 1887, for railroad and warehouse purposes, the premises described in that deed included the land which is the subject of the present controversy. The right of way parallels the shore of the Pacific Ocean, which at that point is only a short distance (apparently 400 feet, more or less) from the right of way.

In July, 1893, the Pacific Improvement Company conveyed to Southern Pacific Railroad Company the premises acquired by said deed from Robert Sudden. The Southern Pacific Company is lessee of property rights of the Southern Pacific Railroad in and to the same property. The Associated Oil Company is the lessee in possession (under said Southern Pacific Railroad Company and said Southern Pacific Company) of a part of said land, which is also a part of the land in dispute. In the findings, the land occupied by the Associated Oil Company is described as "a parcel of land approximately 30 feet wide and 100 feet long, lying on the easterly side of Kalorama street in the city of San Buenaventura, and on the south side of the right of way of said Southern Pacific Company." It is on this parcel of land that the warehouse and other structures exist, placed and maintained thereon in the year 1918 by the Associated Oil Company, and of which the plaintiff claims that they are an obstruction to the street, and that they constitute a public nuisance.

The findings declare that the city now is, and for more than 20 years prior to the commencement of this action has been, the owner, for street purposes, of the parcel of land described in the complaint; "that the said parcel of land was dedicated and abandoned by the owners thereof to the public prior to the acquisition of any interest therein, or in or to contiguous lands, by any of said defendants, and was accepted by the public as and for a public street."

At the trial the court first received in evidence, as plaintiff's Exhibit 1, a map entitled "Map of the Addition to Town of San Buena Ventura, Surveyed by John T. Stow, Town Surveyor, under Instructions from the Board of Town Trustees, May, 1876." On this map there appears a statement, over the purported signatures of the town trustees and clerk, as follows: "Approved and declared to be the official map of the Addition, Town of San Buena Ventura, by resolution of the board of trustees passed June 5, 1876." There is also thereon the recorder's certificate: "Recorded at request of board of trustees, May 2, 1887, at 9 a. m. L. F. Eastin, Recorder."

This map shows Kalorama street, with its sidelines, north of Front street. According to the copy of this map as contained in the transcript of the bill of exceptions (duly certified to be a copy of the map introduced in evidence), the map shows the west line of block 21 and of block 27 (south of 21) in direct line with the east line of Kalorama street, but does not show any west line of Kalorama street between Front street and the bluff overlooking the ocean beach. In this particular, the map as shown by the transcript differs from its delineation of the neighboring north and south streets, in all of which both of the side lines are extended all the way to the beach or bluff. It appearing likely that there was some error in the copy of the map as contained in the transcript, we have proceeded under section 953, Code of Civil Procedure, and have examined the original map. Counsel have also filed a certified copy of a part of the map as recorded in the recorder's office. We find that the original map shows the west line of Kalorama street south of Front street all of the way to the ocean bluff in direct line with the west line of Kalorama street north of Front street. The condition of the map indicates that this line was always there. But it appears that, when the map was recorded in 1887, the copyist in the recorder's office erroneously omitted said west line of Kalorama street south of Front street. The map also shows certain barrancas running back from the ocean across the strip that would be Kalorama street on the extension south from Front street. No barrancas or other obstructions appear across said other streets. On said map there also appears a note which, among other things, states that the streets are 60 feet wide, with exceptions not applicable to Kalorama street or to any street parallel therewith.

The court next received in evidence certain minute entries of the board of trustees of the town of San Buenaventura, of its meeting held on the 5th day of June, 1876. Plaintiff's Exhibit 2. These entries first recite the submitting to the board, by the town surveyor, John T. Stow, of a map which, by its description in the minutes, appears to be the said map, Plaintiff's Exhibit 1. "It was then ordered by the board that the town clerk, after the absent members shall have approved and signed their approval of said map, that he have the said map recorded in the office of the county recorder of Ventura county."

The court next received in evidence minutes of said board of trustees, dated May 13, 1895 (Plaintiff's Exhibit 3), containing a committee report relating to the matter of extending Laurel and Kalorama streets as open streets to the south line of the railroad right of way. The board ordered the town attorney to draft an ordinance concerning said matter.

The court next received in evidence (Plaintiff's Exhibit 4) an ordinance of said town, dated May 20, 1895, marked "Ordinance No. 78," which on that day was approved and adopted and ordered filed of record. This ordinance is entitled "Ordinance Accepting That Portion of Kalorama Street from Front Street to the Southern Boundary Line of the Right of Way of the Southern Pacific Railroad." Section 1 of the ordinance reads as follows:

> "Kalorama street from the south line of Front street to the south line of the 300 feet right of way of the Southern Pacific Railroad having heretofore been dedicated and having heretofore been traveled and for more than five years used by the public as a highway and public street, it is hereby accepted as a street and by this board of trustees declared to be a public street and opened to the public as such."

To the offer in evidence, of plaintiff's Exhibits 1 and 2, defendants objected on the grounds: (a) That the plat was neither made nor filed by or with the consent of the owner of the land platted; (b) that no evidence was offered to prove that any offer had been made, or ever was made, to dedicate the streets thereon, and particularly the portion of Kalorama street involved in this action. Appellants now contend, on the same grounds, that said exhibits, and the evidence relating thereto, are insufficient to prove that there ever was any dedication, or offer and acceptance of dedication, of said land for street purposes.

[1] It is an established rule that the fact that a public map shows land laid out as a street is not, in itself, evidence of dedication. Cook v. Sudden, 94 Cal. 443, 29 Pac. 949. Not denying this rule, respondent asserts that in this case additional evidence of dedication is found in the record, consisting of: (a) The filing of the map; (b) evidence of continuous user; (c) reference to the map in deeds and other instruments; (d) conveyances by reference to the blocks laid out and delineated on the map; (e) an explicit statement under oath, made by the owner of the premises, that he did not claim Kalorama street.

[2] It is true that in certain deeds executed prior to the deed of Robert Sudden to the Pacific Improvement Company, descriptions had been written which referred to Kalorama street. In June, 1884, Carpentier and Steinbach (the original owners of all of the land shown on said map) conveyed to Snodgrass a parcel, by metes and bounds, wherein the description commenced "at the point where the south line of Front street intersects the center line of Kalorama street," and closed with courses running northwesterly along the beach "to said center line of Kalorama street, thence northerly along said center line of Kalorama street to point of commencement." In June, 1885, Snodgrass conveyed to Robert Sudden by the same description. The title of the defendants deraigns under these deeds. The deed of Sudden to the Pacific Improvement Company and the subsequent deed and leases deal with lands, including Kalorama street, all as private property, and do not mention Kalorama street, although they designate the described land as "being a portion of the Eastern addition to said town." The inscriptions on the map, Exhibit 1, do not describe it as an "Eastern Addition."

[3] The fact that in the deed to Snodgrass, and in the deed to Sudden, "the center line of Kalorama street" is mentioned as a boundary line of the conveyed land is not alone sufficient to prove that the grantor had dedicated anything to the public, or that any offer of dedication of land for such street had been accepted. As between an owner of land and the public, the mere making of sales with reference to supposed street lines does not constitute a dedication to the public. "An acceptance must be had either by user or by some formal act." County of Inyo v. Given, 183 Cal. 415, 420, 191 Pac. 688, 690.

[4-7] The evidence showing references (as contained in deeds or quitclaims) to the map, and the items of evidence showing similar references to the blocks delineated on the map, are alike insufficient to prove acceptance, by the public, of any offer of dedication of this land for street purposes. And when at last, after eleven years from the time when the map was made, it was filed as a public record of the county, that act was too late to be effective as against owners who had acquired title under conveyances which ignored the existence of any street or supposed street, and disposed of the entire area as private property. Such conveyances were a withdrawal of the offer of dedication, if any such offer had been made. "A deed in solido, without reservation of easements or streets, * * * itself operates as a revocation." City of Oakland v. Oakland Water Front Co. 162 Cal. 675, 684, 124 Pac. 251, 255. Moreover, as we have pointed out, the map as recorded does not show the westerly line of Kalorama street south of Front street, and therefore we think that such recording did not give notice to any one of the existence of such street south of Front street.

[8] Concerning respondent's claim that the evidence shows an explicit statement made by the owner of the premises that he did not claim Kalorama street, this refers to testimony given by Robert Sudden at the trial of the action of Cook v. Sudden, supra. From the record in that case, said testimony was read in evidence at the trial of this action. It is apparent that at that time Sudden had ceased to own the land, for his testimony referred to the fact that the railroad had "got the land down there." Therefore his testimony in that action was not admissible as evidence, nor as an admission against interest, against the defendants in this action. Also, his statement was not to the effect that he had offered to dedicate this land for street purposes. The objections of appellants to the testimony of Sudden should have been sustained.

[9] From the foregoing, we conclude that the court erred in overruling the objections of appellant to the admission in evidence of said Exhibits 1 and 2. Also, we think that Exhibits 3 and 4, showing action of the city council in the year 1895, attempting to accept as a public street land including the land in controversy in this action, should have been excluded from the evidence. In the absence of any evidence tending to prove that at that time there was any existing offer of dedication by the owners of the property, such proceedings of the city council could not be effective as an acceptance. From the views hereinabove expressed, it follows as a necessary conclusion that there is no sufficient competent evidence to sustain the cause of action stated in the first count of the complaint, which rests wholly upon a claim of dedication and acceptance.

[10-12] The court further made findings favorable to the plaintiff on the second count of the complaint, which seeks to establish the creation of a public street, including the land here in controversy, by adverse use thereof by the public under claim of right for a period of time sufficient to maintain this cause of action. It is necessary to review some of this evidence. The testimony of James McGlinchey relates to conditions along the line of the alleged street at and after the year 1878. He testified in substance that at that time he traveled over the land where the south extension of Kalorama street from Front street crosses the Southern Pacific right of way; that to get down to the beach they went down and crossed where the railroad tracks are now, "and went on down to the foot of the bank, and then we came along by the south side of the station and went down on the east side down on the trail there." In this testimony, the phrase "the foot of the bank" is indefinite, but apparently it means the bluff next to the beach. This is so, because later on the witness stated that "the tide always drifted up to the bank." The witness, with his father, made trips across this land to the beach for the purpose of gathering driftwood on the beach and hauling it back up to a place where they would dump the wood "at the station at the end of Kalorama street." He gives no explanation of the phrase "the station," but it must have been south of the present railroad right of way, because he says that from that point, "the station at the end of Kalorama street," they traveled north across what is at the present time the Southern Pacific right of way, to Front street. This witness further stated that there was other travel upon the street at that time. This witness stated that at one time there was a fence along there and a gate, but he does not say that the fence or gate ran across the street. On the contrary, from this testimony, the fence and the gate appear to have run north and south, and probably were maintained by Captain Sudden, owner of block 21. The witness said that after the railroad was constructed he helped to farm the land to the east of Kalorama street for Captain Sudden. "We went right across the railroad track and turned to the left and opened the gate to get inside." Referring to the suggestion that the travel might have been through a barranca, the witness said that some people went down through the barranca, but that he and his father went down to the beach on high ground, and not through the barranca. "We went down on this road. From the bluff we went down to the next barranca to the east, * * *" etc.

Robert K. Morgan testified to the fact of travel down Kalorama street prior to the time the railroad came through. "I used to go down on Front street and then south on Kalorama, I should judge about halfway, possibly paralleling the railroad tracks by the beach; and there was a road across the Sudden field where they traveled to haul up produce and stuff." While this testimony does not carry the used road along Kalorama street all the way to the beach, it does carry it south of the railroad right of way. This witness further testified: "The fences have always been along Kalorama street on both sides as far back as I can remember." Referring to another instance of use of the street, he said: "We went down Kalorama street to the south line of the Southern Pacific right of way and then went east. * * * The fence stood on the east line of Kalorama street, and in hauling the refined products from the refinery they came over this road in Kalorama street and came north on Front street, crossing the railroad right of way. There was no gate there; nor was there any sign reading 'Private Way, or Right to Pass through Revocable,' or any signs of such nature."

Without reciting the testimony of other witnesses, we deem it sufficient to say that, notwithstanding some conflict in the evidence, there is evidence sufficient to sustain the finding of the court that the land in question was for many years prior to the commencement of this action (the findings say for more than 40 years) continuously and adversely used by the public in general for the purposes of travel thereon as a part of Kalorama street, with claim of right so to do, with knowledge of the owners of the land, and with general knowledge of such claimed use, and has been generally recognized as and acknowledged to be a public street. This is our conclusion, notwithstanding the fact that there are two fences running down near the center of the street parallel to each other. Morgan said that one of these fences was put there by the Standard Oil Company when it put up its tank "10 years ago." These fences are about two or two and one-half feet apart. At about the same time the other fence, the western of these two fences, was erected by employees of the city under the orders of a city officer. The witness Hamilton testified that he was a city trustee about 1910 or 1911; that at that time the city acquired the Beach Park property, "which is the property lying south of the Southern Pacific Company's right of way to the west of the extension of Kalorama street." He further testified:

> "The road to the park at that time was down through Kalorama street across the Southern Pacific Company's tracks. * * * At that time there was what was called a panel fence on the east boundary of the city park. It was on the west line of Kalorama street. That fence was removed along in 1910. I ordered the work done. I ordered the fence on the Sudden side of the street and on the city side of the street put together south of the Southern Pacific right of way."

But while it is thus proved that a fence was placed at or near the middle of the street, on the order of a member of the board of trustees of the city, in the year 1910, this does not prove that the city itself, acting by its board of trustees or any competent authority, abandoned the street. If the evidence is sufficient to prove that the street had become established by adverse use prior to 1910, it did not cease to become a street merely because obstructions were then placed therein by city employees or officers not legally authorized so to do.

The witness Robert C. Sudden, son of the Capt. Sudden who formerly owned block 21, gave testimony which locates the fence on the east line of the alleged Kalorama street. "We had a right of way fence on the west line of our land, that would be the east line of Kalorama street. That fence was there at the time the railroad came through." This indicates that Capt. Sudden maintained a fence line along this east front line, notwithstanding that the description of the land in his deed included the east half of the street. On cross-examination, this testimony was somewhat weakened by the admission by the witness that he could not swear to the fact whether the fence was on the line or not, and by his statement that "our westerly line fence was supposed to be on the westerly line of the tract of land described in the deed to my father." But he also said that the city's fence on the other side "was supposed to be 60 feet from the west line running north and south." He also said that "our fence went down to the bluff, and the point where we left Kalorama street to go to the beach was, I suppose, not over 200 feet from the edge of the present bluff."

Counsel for appellant have referred to numerous decisions holding that, in order to establish a public road by adverse use, the use must have been adverse to the rights of the owner, open, notorious, and hostile, continuous and exclusive, and must have continued for the statutory period, which in this state is five years. Among these cited cases are Schwerdtle v. County of Placer, 108 Cal. 589, 41 Pac. 448; Coburn v. San Mateo County (C. C.) 75 Fed. 520; Hihn Co. v. City of Santa Cruz, 170 Cal. 436, 150 Pac. 62; San Diego v. Hall, 180 Cal. 165, 168, 179 Pac. 889. Also see Elliott on Roads and Streets (3d Ed.) § 194.

Accepting these authorities as correct statements of the law, we are of the opinion that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the court's findings, under which the adverse use of the land in question for street purposes was sufficient to comply with the law as thus established.

Counsel for appellants further contend that the people are estopped to maintain this action for the reason that, if the public ever did claim the right now asserted, that claim never was so open and unequivocal as to charge the owner of the property with notice; that the city of Ventura itself was unaware of that claim, but, on the contrary, it has always exercised proprietary rights in the fee on its half of the street, so called, and as the agent of the public is estopped now from denying its proprietorship and a like proprietorship in these appellants in the adjacent half of the street, so called. We do not think that the relocation of the fences, placing them down the center of the street in the manner to which we have referred, or any other facts in the record are sufficient to establish this claim of estoppel.

The judgment is affirmed.

MULLER v. UNION TRACTION CO.
(Civ. 4714.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 26, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1191—Plaintiff held to have waived irregularities in issuance of remittitur.

Plaintiff, who caused remittitur to be entered by the clerk of the trial court under Code Civ. Proc. § 958, and who made written request for entry of judgment in second action, in which judgment had been stayed pending determination of appeal in first action, waived irregularities in issuance of remittitur.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1222—Respondent held precluded from recalling and vacating remittitur, when irregularities waived.

Where appellant filed dismissal of appeal, and requested that remittitur issue forthwith, and respondent waived irregularities by causing remittitur to be entered, and by request for entry of judgment in second action, in which entry of judgment had been stayed, respondent could not recall and vacate remittitur because of such irregularities, in view of Civ. Code, § 3513.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1222—Failure to insert in remittitur judgment for costs on appeal held not fatal omission.

Failure to insert in remittitur judgment for recovery of respondent's costs on appeal is not such a fatal omission as to demand a recall of remittitur, where appellant stands ready to pay maximum amount allowed respondent as prevailing party, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1027.

4. Appeal and error 🔑776—Appellant has absolute control over appeal, in absence of cross-appeals or counter demands.

In absence of cross-appeals or counter demands, appellant has absolute control over its appeal, and can terminate proceedings by dismissing appeal and offering to immediately pay full amount of judgment, with maximum amount of interest and costs allowed by law.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Mildred Muller against the Union Traction Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. On motion to recall and vacate remittitur. Denied.

Leo H. Susman, Thos. J. Straub, John W. Preston, and Heller, Ehrman, White & McAuliffe, all of San Francisco, and James L. Atteridge, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Respondent's motion to recall and vacate remittitur. On April 6, 1922, plaintiff, Mildred Muller, obtained a judgment, after verdict by jury, against defendant, Union Traction Company, a corporation, for $38,000 as damages for personal injuries. Defendant appealed. Subsequently, plaintiff, in another action, recovered a verdict for $118,000 against the Coast Counties Gas & Electric Company, the principal stockholder of said Union Traction Company, upon the same cause of action previously declared upon against said Union Traction Company. A stay of entry of judgment and of further proceedings was granted in the second action until the appeal in the first action was heard and determined. On June 26, 1924, after the transcript and briefs on appeal in said first action were filed, but before said cause was placed on the calendar for argument, appellant Union Traction Company filed herein a dismissal of said appeal and a request that the remittitur issue forthwith, and the presiding justice of this court signed and caused to be filed an order to that effect. The remittitur was issued forthwith accordingly and was immediately transmitted to the clerk of the court from which the appeal was taken. On the morning of the following day, June 27, 1924, the attorneys for the respective parties appeared before Hon. D. C. Deasy, judge of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, department No. 13, before whom the second cause of action was tried, and thereupon, the attorneys for the defendant and appellant requested further stay of proceedings in that case, which request was opposed by the attorney for the plaintiff and respondent. The court indicated that upon proper entry of the remittitur in the records of the action in which the remittitur was issued, further stay of entry of judgment in the second action would be denied. Thereupon the attorney for the plaintiff and respondent personally wrote in a book denominated "order book" kept by the county clerk, the following:

> "June 27. Please enter remittitur on minutes of court—Dept. 15. Geo. K. Ford, Atty. for Plaintiff."

The county clerk then, pursuant to section 958 of the Code of Civil Procedure, attached said remittitur to the judgment roll and made proper entry thereon in the docket. Later, on the same day, said attorneys again appeared before Judge Deasy and the attorney for plaintiff and respondent, in opposition to the request made by defendant and appellant for further stay, offered in evidence said remittitur, and, according to the affidavit filed on behalf of defendant and appellant, insisted that judgment be entered in said second action. Thereafter, on the same day, said attorney for plaintiff and respondent made further entry in said "order book" requesting entry of judgment in said second action. Whether or not judgment was so entered is not made certain by the record before us. It further appears that on said June 27, 1924, and again on June 28, 1924, said defendant and appellant, Union Traction Company, duly tendered plaintiff the full amount due on said first judgment, together with interest, costs, and all other moneys due, expressly including the sum of $100, the total amount allowed by law as costs on appeal, which tenders were by plaintiff and respondent refused. Said tender was renewed, in writing, at the time of the hearing of this motion.

Respondent's motion herein, to recall and vacate the remittitur is made upon eleven separate grounds, which briefly stated and in substance are that said remittitur was issued prematurely, inadvertently and irregularly and did not provide for judgment for costs on appeal. In this respect respondent contends, first, that an appeal may be dismissed only "by the court" and then only upon motion, after notice, except on stipulation; secondly, that the dismissal of an appeal is in effect a judgment of affirmance and as such does not become final until the expiration of thirty days, and that only after it becomes final may the remittitur issue, unless otherwise ordered or stipulated.

[1] Irrespective of the merits of the legal points urged by respondent bearing upon the irregularities which she claims underlie the issuance of said remittitur, we are of the opinion that any such irregularities were waived by her when she caused said remittitur to be entered by the clerk of the trial court in accordance with section 958 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and particularly in view of the fact that afterwards she took advantage of such entry by making written request for entry of judgment in the second action, which request was doubtless made, as respondent contends, upon the ground that the appeal in the first action had been determined and the judgment therein had become final. Whether, as appellant claims, such first entry was made in said "order book" at the suggestion of the trial court, or was made upon respondent's own initiative, makes little difference, since, in either event, said remittitur was actually entered by the clerk pursuant to the written request.

[2] The constitutional and statutory provisions, and also the rules of court providing for a lapse of time and stay after rendition of opinion by the appellate jurisdiction, were doubtless designed for the benefit of the losing party. "Anyone may waive the advantage of a law intended solely for his benefit. * * *" Section 3513, Civ. Code. And since the appellant waived the right to any such time, and respondent afterwards treated and acted upon the remittitur, which was issued forthwith as a result of appellant's waiver, as valid, by causing it to be entered in the records of the action, it constituted, we believe, an acceptance by appellant of such waiver, and a ratification of any irregularity in the proceedings under which such remittitur may have been issued.

[3] The failure to insert in the remittitur a judgment for the recovery of respondent's costs on appeal is not such a fatal omission as to demand a recall of the remittitur, for the reason that section 1027 of the Code of Civil Procedure allows respondent, as the prevailing party, her costs on this appeal, and appellant stands ready to pay the maximum amount thereof. The cases relied upon by respondent in support of this point arose prior to the amendment of 1913 to that Code section, except the case of Morgrage v. National Bank of Cal., 25 Cal. App. 133, 142 Pac. 1124, and in the latter case it does not appear, as here, that the losing party stood ready to pay the costs in full, consequently we do not consider the cases cited by respondent in point. Moreover, we are entirely unable to perceive wherein respondent has been harmed by the irregularities complained of, or in what manner her interest will be prejudiced if said remittitur is not recalled. If, as she claims, she has the right to elect which of the two judgments she will execute, the present status of the instant proceeding cannot interfere with the exercise of that right.

[4] There are involved no cross-appeals or counter demands, and certainly under those circumstances appellant has absolute control over its own appeal. Obviously respondent has been waiting over two years to obtain an affirmance of her judgment so that she might collect the money due thereon. Appellant now comes forward and obviates further delay by consenting, in effect, to an affirmance of said judgment, and offers to immediately pay the full amount thereof, together with the maximum amount of interest and costs allowed by law. If the appeal were heard and determined in respondent's favor, she could not in this action recover any greater amount, except, perhaps, in the matter of interest, than appellant is now ready to pay, and when, as here, the appellant, in apparent good faith, desires to abandon its appeal, end the litigation, and pay the full amount of the judgment, we see no reason why the respondent should be allowed to prolong the litigation because of irregularities which, if in fact they do exist, do not in the slightest manner prejudice the right of the respondent, but which, on the contrary, would seem to operate to her advantage.

The motion is denied.

PEOPLE v. COOK. (Cr. 1104.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 18, 1924.)

1. Criminal law 🔑661, 666(1)—State not required to call all possible witnesses or introduce all possible exhibits.

In a prosecution for larceny, the prosecution was not required to call all persons present or appearing to have some knowledge of the matters on trial, or to produce as exhibits all objects or documents referred to, or the existence of which may have been suggested by the testimony.

2. Criminal law 🔑824(9)—In absence of request, failure of court to give further instruction on circumstantial evidence not error.

In prosecution for larceny, failure to instruct that, if prosecution relied on circumstantial evidence alone, it must show beyond reasonable doubt that the alleged facts and circumstances were true, and that they must be absolutely incompatible on any reasonable hypothesis other than guilt, was not error, in absence of request for such instruction or modification of those given.

3. Criminal law 🔑938(1), 1156(3)—Refusal of new trial for newly discovered evidence not disturbed, in absence of showing of abuse of discretion.

Motion for new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence was addressed to the sound discretion of the trial judge, and his decision thereon will not be disturbed, in absence of showing of abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Arthur Cook was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

E. R. Simon and C. B. Conlin, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CURTIS, J. The defendant was found guilty of the crime of grand larceny. He bases his appeal, from the judgment and order of court denying his motion for a new trial, upon the action of the court in giving certain instructions offered by the people, and in denying his motion for a new trial made on the ground of newly discovered evidence.

[1] The first instruction objected to by defendant was as follows:

> "The court instructs the jury that the prosecution is not required to call as its own witnesses all persons who are shown to be present, or who may appear to have some knowledge of the matters here on trial, nor is the prosecution required to produce as exhibits all objects or documents which have been referred to in, or the existence of which may have been suggested by, the testimony in the case."

The law is correctly stated in this instruction. People v. Robertson, 67 Cal. 646, 8 Pac. 600; People v. Johnson, 13 Cal. App. 776, 110 Pac. 965; 16 Cor. Jur. 845, § 2132. While it may be that the facts in the record did not make it necessary to give such instruction, the giving of it is not shown to have been a prejudicial error.

[2] The court gave two instructions upon the subject of circumstantial evidence. No objection is made to either of these instructions or to any statement of the law contained therein, but defendant contends that the court should have gone further, and should have either stated in those instructions or given a separate instruction to the effect—

> "that, where the prosecution relies for conviction upon circumstantial evidence alone, the prosecution must show by the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the alleged facts and circumstances are true, and that they must be such facts and circumstances as are absolutely incompatible upon any reasonable hypothesis other than that of the guilt of the accused."

Defendant does not claim that he proposed any modification of the instructions as given by the court, nor that he proposed any instruction embodying the statement of law which he now complains the court omitted from the instructions given, but contends that the court, inasmuch as it attempted to instruct the jury upon the subject of circumstantial evidence, should have fully covered the subject and, of its own motion, should have instructed the jury fully upon the weight and effect to be given to circumstantial evidence. This contention of the defendant cannot be maintained. If he desired the jury further instructed upon the weight and effect to be given circumstantial evidence, it was his duty to request the court to so instruct the jury. In the absence of a request on his part, for such an instruction, he cannot complain of the failure of the court to so charge the jury. 8 Cal. Jur. p. 310; People v. Balkwell, 143 Cal. 259–264, 76 Pac. 1017; People v. Williams, 184 Cal. 590–594, 194 Pac. 1019. The precise question was before the court in the case of People v. Balkwell, supra, and was disposed of in the following language:

> "Complaint is made that the court did not instruct upon the nature and value of circumstantial evidence; but as defendant asked for no instruction upon this point, she cannot be heard to complain."

[3] Defendant's motion for a new trial, upon the ground of newly discovered evidence, was addressed to the sound discretion of the trial judge, and his action thereon will not be disturbed unless the record shows an abuse of discretion on his part. We have examined the record in this case, and we discover nothing therein which would lead us to hold that the trial judge abused the discretion with which the law invests him.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

WESTERVELT v. McCULLOUGH
(Civ. 4403.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 21, 1924.)

1. Damages 🔑23 — Generally damages for breach of contract are only those reasonably contemplated by parties.

In general, under Civ. Code. § 3300, damages for breach of contract are only such as may reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties at time of making the contract as the probable result of the breach; other damages being too remote.

2. Damages 🔑32—Impairment of health held element of damages for ouster of mortgagor from her home contrary to agreement.

Where aged mortgagor contracted to provide a home for defendant and relatives, and, after living together some time, defendant bought in the home at foreclosure sale, and promised to continue the original contract, if mortgagor would refrain from redeeming, injury to her health, resulting from subsequent ouster, held damage proximately caused by the breach, within Civ. Code, § 3300.

3. Damages 🔑32—Recovery for physical suffering or illness as damages for breach allowable when.

Whenever the terms of a contract relate to matters directly concerning the comfort, happiness, or personal welfare of one of the parties, or the subject-matter is such as directly affects or moves the affections, self-esteem or tender feelings of that party, he may recover for physical suffering or illness proximately caused by breach.

4. Appeal and error 🔑768—Statement in brief that action was not tortious held to prevail.

In action for breach of contract to furnish a home for plaintiff with defendant, where court found that defendant "ousted" plaintiff, statement in briefs that ouster was not tortious precluded a holding that it was tortious so as to allow plaintiff to maintain an independent tort action thereon.

5. Damages 🔑153—Recovery of amount prayed permissible, notwithstanding inclusion of improper item.

The prayer of a complaint for damages is equivalent to statement that the amount stated is the damages suffered, and, though the complaint in itemizing damages includes improper item, recovery is not limited to amount of other items.

6. Judgment 🔑393 — On motion to vacate court considers no facts except those embraced in findings.

On motion, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 663, 663a, to set aside judgment based on findings of facts, court can consider no facts except those embraced in the findings.

7. Appeal and error 🔑931(1)—Uncertainty in findings resolved against appellant on appeal from denial of motion to set aside judgment.

On appeal from denial of motion under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 663, 663a, to set aside judgment based on findings of facts, uncertainty in the findings must be resolved against appellant and most strongly construed for respondent.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1004(1)—Damages for refusal to permit mortgagor to continue living in her house as agreed not disturbed.

In action for breach of contract to permit mortgagor to continue living in her home after foreclosure sale, where court found right to reside there had peculiar value, judgment including less than $100 a month for plaintiff's life expectancy for loss of such right will not be disturbed on appeal from order denying motion to vacate.

9. Judgment 🔑393—Motion to set aside judgment based on findings of fact must be considered in light of pleaded issues.

Motion, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 663, 663a, to set aside judgment based on findings of facts must be considered in light of issues made by the pleading.

10. Action 🔑22—Judgment 🔑249—Action held one for damages, barring recovery on trustee theory.

Though complaint pleading fraud and deceit by purchaser at foreclosure sale in contracting to permit mortgagor to continue living in her mortgaged home authorized recovery under Civ. Code, § 2224, against purchaser as involuntary trustee, prayer for damages, court's conclusions, and judgment held to stamp it as one for damages, barring recovery on trustee theory.

11. Judgment 🔑776—Court may not decree judgment for damages to be equitable lien upon property.

Neither at common law, nor under Civ. Code, § 2224, may the court decree judgment for damages to be an equitable lien upon specific property and direct its sale under execution to enforce such lien, especially in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 671.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thos. O. Toland, Judge.

Action by Emma J. Westervelt against Nora McCullough. Judgment for plaintiff, and from denial of motion for another and different judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed as modified.

Walter M. Campbell and Peyton H. Moore, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

William Hazlett and Merton A. Albee, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. Plaintiff and her husband were the owners of a residence in Los Angeles county which they had possessed for nearly ten years. In it they contracted with defendant to provide a home for the latter and her three female relatives. Under the contract defendant agreed to pay to plaintiff $100 the month for the board and lodging agreed in the contract to be furnished thereunder. At the time of the making of the contract plaintiff was past 60 years of age, and her husband was past 70. At that time the place of residence of plaintiff and her husband was incumbered by a mortgage. The arrangement contemplated by the contract was consummated, and the parties for some time dwelt together in peace and amity, and with mutual trust and confidence. The mortgage on the property fell due, and was foreclosed. Defendant purchased it at the foreclosure sale, and at the time, as found by the trial court, she "stated, promised, and represented to plaintiff that plaintiff could and should continue to have her home in said premises as before, so long as she should desire." Before the expiration of the time for the redemption of the property from the foreclosure sale plaintiff had an opportunity to sell it for a sum largely in excess of the amount necessary to redeem, and made defendant acquainted with the fact. The trial court found that defendant then "stated, offered, represented, and promised plaintiff that, if plaintiff should not sell said property, and should not redeem the same from said foreclosure sale, but should permit defendant to obtain a sheriff's deed therefor under said sale, the agreement and arrangement" theretofore entered into by the parties "should continue so long as plaintiff should live or should desire, and that the plaintiff and her husband could and should have their said home just as they were then having it so long as they lived or should desire, and defendant urged plaintiff to continue to make her home with defendant as before." Plaintiff assented to this proposal, relinquished all attempt to sell the property or to redeem it from the foreclosure sale, and permitted defendant to take her sheriff's deed. Defendant complied with her agreement until about six months after procuring the deed, when she ousted plaintiff and her husband from the common place of residence, and they were compelled to seek shelter elsewhere. This action was then commenced for the purpose of recovering the damages occasioned by defendant's breach of her agreement. Plaintiff was awarded judgment for $6,300, and the judgment also charged the property in question with an equitable lien as security for the payment of the amount. Defendant moved for another and different judgment upon the findings of the court, under the terms of sections 663 and 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The motion was denied, and the present appeal is prosecuted from the order denying it. We have already determined that the order is appealable. See Westervelt v. McCullough (Cal. App.) 221 Pac. 661.

The prayer of the complaint contains a general demand for damages in the sum of $6,300. The body of the pleading exhibits allegations of damages in the amount of $5,300, because appellant refused to permit respondent and her husband to remain in "said home on said property," and because she "ousted them from said property," whereby it was lost to respondent, and she and her husband were deprived of their home, and compelled to seek and did seek other lodgings, and were compelled to depend upon the charity of friends and relatives for support; in the sum of $500 upon allegations that respondent's husband died two months after the ouster, and that his life was shortened thereby; and in the sum of $500 because of the impairment of the health of respondent which resulted from the ouster.

We now state the findings of the trial court which are material to a consideration of the points presented on the appeal. It was found that appellant paid $3,700 for the property involved in the litigation at the sheriff's sale; that the amount for which respondent could have sold the property shortly before the expiration of the redemption period was $9,000, which amount was then the fair market value thereof; that respondent could have saved $15 each month out of the $100 per month agreed to be paid for board and lodging by appellant prior to the death of her husband, and $20 per month thereafter during her own life; that at the time of the ouster the life expectancy of respondent was eleven and one-half years, and that of her husband seven and one-half years; that during the year allowed by law for the redemption of the property from the foreclosure sale appellant paid on the property the total sum of $268.31 for taxes, principal and interest on street assessment bonds, and repairs, which amount "plaintiff would have been required to pay to defendant, in addition to said sum of $3,700, * * * and in addition to interest at 1 per cent. per month on said sum of $3,700, in order to redeem said property from said foreclosure sale"; that the fair rental value of the property at the expiration of the redemption period was $125 the month; and that respondent, at all times after the original arrangement between the parties for board and lodging, was and is unable to earn a living except in the manner contemplated by that arrangement. The court also found that it was unable to determine that the life of respondent's husband was shortened as a result of the acts of appellant, but it was found "that said acts of defendant caused great shock to plaintiff's nerves, and caused plaintiff to become sick and ill, and impaired her health for a period of six months thereafter." Certain other findings of the court are of especial interest in the consideration of the points presented by the appeal. It was found that appellant made the "statements, representations, promises, and agreements" whereby she induced respondent to refrain from redeeming from the foreclosure sale "without intending to keep, fulfill, or perform the same, or any of them, and for the purpose and with the intent on her part of thereby inducing plaintiff to refrain from selling said property during said year of redemption and from redeeming the same from under said foreclosure sale, and for the purpose of thereby securing said real property and the title thereto for herself without consideration to plaintiff, and of cheating and defrauding plaintiff out of the same." It was further found that "the right to live in said premises, and to continue to make her home therein as theretofore," that is, before the ouster, "was of a special and peculiar value to plaintiff, as defendant at all of said times well knew, over and above the actual moneys received from defendant and in addition to the cost of maintenance of said property."

If we take these findings specifically and without thought of establishing more than a foundation upon which to discuss the points presented by the appeal, measuring them with great strictness by the prayer of the complaint, we adopt the tentative idea that they call for a judgment of at least $5,124.69. The amount stated is arrived at thus: Add to $3,700, the amount paid by appellant at the foreclosure sale, the sum of $268.31, paid out by her as found by the court, or in all $3,968.31, and the further sum of $407, interest at 1 per cent. per month on the sum of $3,968.31 to the date upon which respondent could have sold her property, and the result is $4,375.31. Deduct this sum from $9,000, the amount for which respondent could have sold, and the remainder is $4,624.69. Add to this latter figure the sum of $500, the amount of the damages asked for the impairment of respondent's health, and the result is $5,124.69, the amount above stated. Is there anything in the findings, upon a proper application of the law to them, which requires this sum to be lessened or to be increased to $6,300, the amount for which the trial court rendered judgment?

[1] It is contended by appellant that the award of any damages for the impairment of the health of respondent was improper. It is provided by section 3300 of the Civil Code that—

> "For the breach of an obligation arising from contract, the measure of damages * * * is the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom."

The rule upon the subject is stated in somewhat different language in Hunt Bros. Co. v. San Lorenzo Water Co., 150 Cal. 51, 87 Pac. 1093, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 913:

> "It is the well-settled general rule of damages for any breach of contract that the damages that can be recovered for a breach are only such as may reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time of the making of the contract, as the probable result of a breach. Other damages are too remote."

[2] Was it proper to allow damages for the impairment of the health of respondent under these rules? A mention of a few of the circumstances of the case will serve to clarify the point thus presented. Respondent and her husband, well advanced in life, had lived together in the residence for eight or ten years before appellant and her relatives appeared on the scene, and respondent's right there to reside was of a peculiar value to her, a circumstance well known to appellant. After the original arrangement between respondent and appellant on behalf of the latter and her relatives all the parties resided together for some months practically as one family, thus naturally creating the feeling of trust and confidence which the trial court found that they reposed in each other. Notwithstanding this feeling, and in utter disregard of the warm-heartedness which should characterize the relations between those in a family circle, appellant entered into the arrangement which secured the home of respondent to her without intending to perform her own obligations under the arrangement. This was a detestable exhibition of wickedness and bad faith. Finally, it is to be observed that the arrangement was one the practical effect of which was to provide a home for respondent and her husband and to secure their maintenance through the remainder of their age and until death, whereas its breach thrust them into the street as outcasts, and compelled them to resort to the charity of friends and relatives for subsistence and shelter. Under such a chain of circumstances was not an impairment of the health of respondent a "detriment proximately caused" by the breach, "or which in the ordinary course of things," under such a state of facts, "would be likely to result therefrom?" Was not damage to the health of respondent such an outcome "as may reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time of the making of the contract, as the probable result of a breach?" If respondent could have foreseen these untoward events at the time of the making of the contract, would she not have feared an impairment of her health as a result of the last event, the breach? Appellant did foresee the events which followed after the making of the arrangement, for, as in effect found by the trial court, she contemplated in the beginning the specific evil which she wrought in the end. Did she not necessarily contemplate an injury to the health of respondent as a possible result of her calculated breach of the contract between them? It seems that upon reason and principle alone all these interrogations must be answered adversely to the claim of appellant. There is to be found, however, authority which bears upon the question.

> "The element of bad faith would clothe a court, upon plain principles, with the power to fix damages according to the detriment shown by the existing special circumstances of the case. * * * The damages, therefore, would be those which would ordinarily and proximately follow from the breach of such a contract under the peculiar circumstances which were known to both parties." Kline v. Guaranty Oil Co., 167 Cal. 476, 140 Pac. 1.
> "One who in bad faith violates his contract is liable for all damages traceable to the breach, including even those which could not be foreseen at the time of making the contract." Overstreet v. Merritt, 186 Cal. 494, 200 Pac. 11.

These California opinions establish general principles within which the present case would seem to find an abiding place, but we must look to other jurisdiction for authority more specifically applicable to it. Let us say first, however, that there are many cases which announce the general rule that in actions for the breach of contracts of employment or of contracts relating to property there can be no recovery of damages for mental suffering or for physical disability or ill health resulting from "nerves." A fair sample of these authorities is Smith v. Sanborn State Bank, 147 Iowa, 640, 126 N. W. 779, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 517, 140 Am. St. Rep. 336. It was there said:

> "But no case has been called to our attention, nor do we think one can be found, which holds that damages are recoverable for mental anguish growing out of the violation of a contract for the payment of money. To so hold would be to open the door to a ruinous flood of litigation. Occasions will arise when it would seem that such a recovery is demanded in the interests of justice, but it is better that the exceptional wrong should sometimes go unrequited than to abrogate a rule which in the vast majority of cases has a salutary effect. Generally speaking, failure to pay or deliver money according to agreement gives rise to no recoverable damages beyond the sum wrongfully withheld with interest during the time payment is delayed. Special circumstances may sometimes justify the recovery of special damages, but these do not include compensation for mental suffering."

We are satisfied that the rule of cases of this class has no application to controversies like the one now before us, and that other adjudications are readily to be found which do govern it. In a case in which undertakers had breached an agreement safely to keep the body of a deceased person until the time when a belated interment was to occur it was said:

> "The cases rest upon the reasonable doctrine that where a person contracts, upon a sufficient consideration, to do a particular thing, the failure to do which may result in anguish and distress of mind on the part of the other contracting party, he is presumed to have contracted with reference to the payment of damages of that character in the event such damages accrue by reason of a breach of the contract on his part." Renihan v. Wright, 125 Ind. 536, 25 N. E. 822, 9 L. R. A. 514, 21 Am. St. Rep. 249.

Authority of a similar character on the facts is to be found in Loy v. Reid, 11 Ala. App. 231, 65 South. 855. An interesting case arose upon the breach of a dressmaker of an agreement to furnish dresses to a prospective bride. It was said in the opinion:

> "Although the general rule is that damages are the amount of the loss the creditor has sustained, or of the gain of which he has been deprived, yet there are cases in which damages may be assessed without calculating altogether on the pecuniary loss, or the privation of pecuniary gain, to the party. When the contract has for its object the gratification of some intellectual enjoyment, whether in religion, morality, or taste, or some convenience or other legal gratification, although these are not appreciated in money by the parties, yet damages are due for their breach. A contract for a religious or charitable foundation, a promise of marriage, or an engagement for a work of some of the fine arts, are objects and examples of this rule. * * * In computing the damages the allowance must be restricted to what may reasonably be held to have been within the contemplation of the parties in entering into the contract. The contract was to furnish the dresses in time for the wedding on the 19th. D. H. Holmes must be held to have known that, if the dresses were not finished by that day, the bride would be keenly disappointed. Also that the bride would need the dresses for the festivities incident to her wedding and immediately following, for which it is customary for brides to provide themselves with a trousseau. In gauging this disappointment of the bride the surrounding circumstances must, as a matter of course, be considered. And one of these is the fact that entertainments were planned, and that for want of the dresses these entertainments would have to be given up; and another is her humiliation in going to her husband unprovided with a suitable trosseau. We do not think that the amount of $575 fixed by the district judge is excessive." Lewis v. Holmes, 109 La. 1030, 34 South. 66, 61 L. R. A. 274.

Another decision of a similar character to the one last noted was based upon the breach of a contract to furnish a conveyance for the purpose of transporting a bridegroom to the scene of his approaching wedding. Because of the breach the bride was kept "waiting at the church," this and other circumstances moving the groom to sue for damages for mental suffering, physical pain, humiliation, and mortification. The view of the case which the appellate court took is sufficiently shown by the syllabus which precedes the opinion in an unofficial report in which it is printed:

> "Where a contract is entered into under special circumstances known to both parties at the time, the damages recoverable for a breach are measured not only by the actual loss sustained naturally resulting as the ordinary consequence of the breach, but includes consequences which may under the special circumstances be presumed to have been in the contemplation of the parties as the probable result of a breach. * * * Mental anguish is an element of actual damages for breach of contract." Browning v. Fies, 4 Ala. App. 580, 58 South. 931.

[3, 4] It will be observed that in all these cases it was determined that recovery could be had for mental anguish, humiliation, and the like. In the present action, however, the disability suffered by respondent was physical, for she was caused by the acts of appellant to become ill, and her health was impaired for the period stated in the findings. In considering the cases to which we have just pointed, the nature of the injury to respondent is distinctly worthy of note, as the courts have often been disinclined to allow damages for mental anguish in cases in which physical pain or impairment of health were an undoubted basis for relief. Forgetting therefore the matter of mental anguish, and reducing the doctrine of the cases which we have cited, and of others which we have examined, to the terms of the present controversy, we have no doubt that a correct rule of law may be stated thus: Whenever the terms of a contract relate to matters which concern directly the comfort, happiness, or personal welfare of one of the parties, or the subject-matter of which is such as directly to affect or move the affection, self-esteem, or tender feelings of that party, he may recover damages for physical suffering or illness proximately caused by its breach. In the statement of this rule, expressly limited to physical suffering or illness as it is, we rely upon authority as to mental anguish for the reason that cases showing physical disability as the result of the breach of contracts are unusual, to say the least. We do not rely upon Sloane v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., 111 Cal. 668, 44 Pac. 320, 32 L. R. A. 193, because that case sounded in tort, although the Supreme Court says in its opinion that the plaintiff, with propriety, might have founded it upon contract. This statement leaves it open to conjecture whether the court would have applied the same measure of damages if the action had been based upon the defendant's contract of carriage, and whether, even so, the case would then have been in point, relating, as it does, to the obligation of a common carrier. Finally, in applying the rule which we have formulated above, it is to be observed that respondent is without remedy for the impairment of her health if she cannot recover in this action. We can conceive of no theory upon which she could sue as upon a tort. The trial court found that she was "ousted" from her old home it is true, and, under ordinary circumstances, having in mind the sanctity with which findings are invested upon a motion under sections 663 and 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure, we might possibly deem the ouster to have been forcible and therefore tortious. This we cannot do in the present instance, however, as it is stated in the briefs that the ouster was not of that character, a statement to which we are bound to pay regard. On the whole, the damage to respondent's health, under the authorities, was in contemplation of the parties when they made their contract, and it resulted proximately from the breach. We are clearly of the opinion that she was entitled to recover. There is nothing to interfere with this conclusion in the cases cited by appellant: Newman v. Smith, 77 Cal. 22, 18 Pac. 791; Fox v. Oakland Con. St. Ry., 118 Cal. 55, 50 Pac. 25, 62 Am. St. Rep. 216; Westwater v. Grace Church, 140 Cal. 339, 73 Pac. 1055; and Bond v. United Railroads, 24 Cal. App. 157, 140 Pac. 982.

[5] Appellant contends that the findings do not support the judgment for $6,300 by reason of the fact that the body of the complaint specifically alleges damages, in money, only to the extent of $5,300 for the loss of respondent's property, and $500 for the impairment of her health, if we lay aside, as we must, the allegation of $500 damage for the shortening of the life of respondent's husband. It is said that the prayer for damages in the sum of $6,300 is controlled by the allegations mentioned. The point is without merit, as it is well settled that the amount stated in the prayer of a complaint for damages is equivalent to an allegation that the amount thus stated is the damage suffered by the plaintiff. See Tucker v. Cooper, 172 Cal. 663, 158 Pac. 181.

[6-8] In addition to the amount which we have tentatively stated above as the least sum for which judgment should have been rendered in favor of respondent, that is, the sum of $5,124.69, she insists that the findings support various other items of damage which, when added to the amount named, will produce a result showing a much greater total than the sum for which judgment was given. We are satisfied that most of these claims are not well founded, for the reason that they cover matters for which respondent is compensated by the damages allowed her for the loss of her property. There are, however, some general findings of the court which to our minds support that part of the judgment which is in excess of $5,124.69. The difference between that sum and the total amount of the judgment is but $1,175.31. The court found that, as well known to appellant, the right of respondent to reside in her home was of a special and peculiar value to her, and that her life expectancy was eleven and one-half years. We cannot know what was the evidence upon which the finding that respondent's right was of unusual value was based, for on a motion under sections 663 and 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure no facts can be considered except those which are embraced in the findings of the court. Dahlberg v. Girsch, 157 Cal. 324, 107 Pac. 616; Hole v. Takekawa, 165 Cal. 372, 132 Pac. 445; Akley v. Bassett, 189 Cal. 625, 209 Pac. 576. Moreover, upon an appeal from an order denying such a motion "any uncertainty in the findings must be resolved against the appellant, and they are to be most strongly construed in favor of the respondent." Spotton v. Dyer, 42 Cal. App. 585, 184 Pac. 23. Under these rules of law we are bound to assume that the trial court allowed judgment for as much as $1,175.31 upon the findings last above stated. Granting, for the purpose of argument, what we need not now decide, that in a proper case under such a motion as is now before us a court of review may reduce a judgment as excessive under the findings, no such case appears here. The judgment awarded to respondent for her loss of the right to continue to reside in her home amounts to but about $100 the year for the period of her life expectancy. It is quite possible that the evidence heard by the trial court was of such a character as to have justified a larger allowance as to this item, and that the total amount of the judgment was limited to $6,300, for the reason that the prayer of the complaint demanded that sum. It is clear to us that the judgment for $6,300 must stand.

[9-11] The sole remaining point presented in the briefs makes necessary a statement showing the unusual character of the complaint, and in making the statement we have in mind the well-settled rule that a motion under sections 663 and 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure is to be considered in the light of the issues made by the pleadings in the action. See Dahlberg v. Girsch, 157 Cal. 324, 107 Pac. 616; Akley v. Bassett, 189 Cal. 625, 209 Pac. 576. The complaint in the present action pleads with particularity the facts showing the fraud and deceit practiced by appellant upon respondent, in connection with the allegations of damage to which we have already referred. If, then, the averments as to damages be regarded as surplusage, the pleading appears to state a complete cause of action for relief under section 2224 of the Civil Code, which reads:

> "One who gains a thing by fraud, accident, mistake, undue influence, the violation of a trust, or other wrongful act, is, unless he has some other and better right thereto, an involuntary trustee of the thing gained, for the benefit of the person who would otherwise have had it."

The prayer, however, in addition to and immediately following the demand for damages in the sum of $6,300, asks that "it be decreed that defendant holds said real property as trustee for plaintiff to the extent of plaintiff's said claim," and the conclusions of law and judgment follow this dual demand for relief. The former recite that defendant is and by the judgment shall be "declared to be an involuntary trustee of said real property for plaintiff to the extent and in the sum" of the money judgment, "which interest of plaintiff in said real property is and shall be by way of security to plaintiff for the payment of said judgment, and shall cease and terminate upon and by full payment and satisfaction of said judgment." It is then recited that "plaintiff is entitled to further judgment that said real property be sold by the sheriff * * * on execution" for the purpose of satisfying the judgment for damages. As already remarked, judgment passed accordingly.

Appellant's last point is that the findings afford no support for the portion of the conclusions of law and judgment which attempts, in effect, to fasten upon the real property a lien for the payment of the judgment for damages. Respondent contends that she is entitled to that relief under the terms of section 2224 of the Civil Code, but the contention surely is without merit. The section merely provides that one gaining a thing in the manner denounced by its provisions holds that thing in trust for the person wronged, with the result that the latter may recover it, or force a reconveyance of it, or quiet his title to it. This view of the effect of the section has prevailed, ever since its enactment, in the twoscore opinions of the Supreme Court and of the District Courts of Appeal in which it is cited, all of which we have examined. By this we do not mean to say that the courts have in express terms declared the effect of the section so to be, for they have not, but that they have invariably been called upon in such manner to enforce its salutary mandate. The enactment has never before been resorted to in an attempt to fasten upon a "thing," to employ the word used in it, an involuntary trust to secure the payment of damages or to secure the satisfaction of any other money obligation or claim. The very language of the section would seem to preclude its use for the attainment of such an end.

Is there any other basis upon which a court may decree a judgment for damages to be a lien upon specific property and direct its sale under execution for the purpose of foreclosing the lien? We know of none. In an endeavor to uphold the portion of the judgment now in question, and in addition to her contention as to the bearing of section 2224 of the Civil Code upon the point before us, respondent cites 21 C. J. pp. 118, 119, tit. "Equity," § 96; Bradley v. Bosley, 1 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 125; and Greil v. City of Montgomery, 182 Ala. 291, 62 South. 692, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 738. We can see in these authorities nothing to aid respondent. We cannot regard the attempt of the trial court to fasten a lien upon the real property as a successful exercise of equitable jurisdiction. While the body of the complaint exhibits the dual character to which we have referred, the prayer with which it concludes, and, especially, the view which the trial court took of it as evidenced by the conclusions of law and judgment, stamp it for our consideration as a complaint for damages. The judgment in its essence is one for damages, and to that judgment the attempt to charge the property with a lien is a mere incident. In our opinion the incident cannot stand, and the judgment must be reduced to its essence.

We have made disposition of appellant's last point because it is presented by the motion, and because it is argued in the briefs, not because we regard it as important. The judgment of the trial court, in essaying to give to respondent a lien for the enforcement of her judgment for damages, could, if valid, secure to her no greater right than the law has expressly provided for her protection. The purpose of the court's attempt was in effect to impound the real property until it could be sold on execution. This same right exists for her under section 671 of the Code of Civil Procedure, not only as to the property described in the judgment, but as to all real property of respondent within the jurisdiction of the trial court, if other real property she has, or may later acquire. The section provides in part:

> "Immediately after filing the judgment-roll, the clerk must make the proper entries of the judgment under appropriate heads, in the docket kept by him, * * * and from the time the judgment is docketed it becomes a lien upon all the real property of the judgment debtor not exempt from execution in the county, owned by him at the time, or which he may afterwards acquire, until the lien ceases."

The existence of this section furnishes an added argument against the portion of the judgment attempting to create a lien on specific real property of appellant. In making the attempt the trial court performed a futile act.

The conclusions of law are amended by striking therefrom all that part thereof which follows the paragraph numbered "I," and which precedes the paragraph commencing "Let judgment be entered," and the judgment is modified by striking therefrom all that part thereof which follows the paragraph commencing "First" and which precedes the paragraph commencing "Fourth," and by changing the said word "Fourth" to the word "Second." As so modified the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; CRAIG, J.

68 Cal. App. 121

BRAUN v. DALLIN et al. (Civ. 4261.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 9, 1924.)

1. Frauds, statute of 🔑128—Parol agreement made subsequent to written agreement for purchase of land held not to bring transaction within statute.

Where defendant went into possession under written contract to purchase from plaintiff, building house and residing on premises, and subsequently on foreclosure of deed of trust given to plaintiff by third person plaintiff bid in premises pursuant to oral agreement to sell to defendant if latter would not bid, held, that defendant's asserted right to purchase could not be defeated on theory that oral agreement brought transaction within statute; position of parties not having changed, except as to amount of debt due from defendant, and real contract, being written one, which remained alive, measuring rights of parties.

2. Frauds, statute of 🔑161—Findings held to sufficiently state that claimed right to purchase based upon written as well as verbal agreement.

In suit to quiet title, findings as whole held to sufficiently state that defendants possessed right to purchase, based upon written contract between parties as well as upon subsequent verbal agreement.

3. Frauds, statute of 🔑161—Rule stated for determining from facts presented whether asserted right to purchase land based upon written or oral agreement.

In determining whether an asserted right of litigant to purchase land was based on written or oral agreement, court must construe whole transaction from facts presented, irrespective of name by which designated or any particular isolated feature of it.

4. Appeal and error 🔑931(1)—On facts authorizing different inferences, presumed inference by trial court was one upholding rather than defeating judgment.

Whenever facts found might authorize different inferences, it will be presumed that inference made by trial court was one upholding rather than defeating its judgment, and an inference will not be drawn contrary to that which might have been drawn by trial court for purpose of rendering its judgment.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)—Proper judgment not reversed because of erroneous finding or failure to make finding upon issue.

Where judgment is justified by facts shown from entire record, reversal will not be granted because of erroneous finding or failure of trial court to make finding upon any issue.

6. Quieting title 🔑47(2)—Finding that defendant entitled to possession held decision that plaintiff not so entitled.

In a suit to quiet title, finding that defendant was entitled to possession was decision on issue whether plaintiff was entitled to possession.

7. Quieting title 🔑52—Judgment held not erroneous because not following decision, "including interest."

In suit to quiet title, where findings, conclusions of law, and judgment required defendants to pay plaintiff $1,150 in amounts of $50 per month, "and interest," on deferred payments, judgment was not erroneous because specifying "$1,150, including interest," while the decision specified "$1,150 and interest"; meaning not being doubtful.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; T. N. Harvey, Judge.

Suit by F. W. Braun against Stanley Dallin, Telitha L. Dallin, and others, in which the named defendants filed a cross-complaint. From judgment for plaintiff as to ownership of property, subject to right of the named defendants to purchase it, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John E. Biby and Harry C. Biby, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clark, Law & Clay, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. Suit was instituted January 12, 1922, by plaintiff and appellant, to quiet title to lot 89 of tract 3987, in Los Angeles county, alleging that the defendants asserted some interest in said property adverse to plaintiff without right, that neither of them had any estate, right, title, nor interest therein, and praying that each of said defendants be required to set forth the nature of his claim, that the same might be determined, and that it be adjudged and decreed that plaintiff was the owner and entitled to a writ of possession thereof.

Defendants Dallin answered, denying that the plaintiff was the owner or entitled to possession of said lot, and affirmatively alleging that on November 25, 1921, the plaintiff threatened to sell the property under an alleged deed of trust which they believed to be void, and that to avoid litigation they agreed to refrain from bidding at such sale, and to buy the lot from the plaintiff for $1,150, and to pay $50 cash and $50 per month thereafter until the full sum had been paid, together with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, and that the plaintiff agreed to sell them the property upon such terms if they would not bid at the sale; that they thereafter notified the plaintiff that they were willing to proceed with the terms of their agreement, but that plaintiff refused to permit them to purchase the property upon said terms. They further alleged that they were the owners in fee of the property described, and prayed judgment that they be declared the lawful owners, and that the plaintiff "have no interest therein, and that the plaintiff be debarred and enjoined from asserting any claim thereto."

Defendant C. Robert Minton answered, denying for want of information or belief that the plaintiff was the owner or entitled to possession of the property, and alleging that he held a valid mechanic's lien against the premises for $471.38; and by cross-complaint against the plaintiff and defendants Dallin he alleged that the Dallins were at all the times mentioned the owners and in possession of said property, and that in pursuance of an agreement with them he furnished labor and materials between June 15 and August 15, 1921, in the construction of a dwelling house thereon, and thereafter filed his duly verified mechanic's lien above mentioned.

The defendants Dallin denied that Minton had performed the conditions of his contract, or that he was entitled to any amount. Defendant Ada Minton disclaimed.

The plaintiff, answering said cross-complaint, denied that the Dallins were the owners, but admitted that they were in possession of the premises at the times mentioned in the cross-complaint, and denied defendant Minton's right to a lien for labor and materials. He then alleges that prior to June 30, 1921, he was the owner in fee simple of said property, subject to a contract of purchase between himself and said Dallins; that on said last-mentioned date the latter assigned all their interest therein to cross-complainant Minton, and that the plaintiff and his wife on the same date also conveyed their interest to the same party, and received from Minton and his wife a promissory note for $843.50, secured by trust deed; that Minton defaulted in the payment of stipulated installments due upon his said note, and that the property was, on November 25, 1921, sold to the plaintiff by trustee's deed, duly executed and recorded.

The trial court found from the evidence adduced that "the title to the property * * * is in the plaintiff subject to the right of the defendants Dallin to purchase same for the sum of $1,150"; that the Dallins are in possession; that they went into possession on or about January 5, 1921, under an agreement to purchase from the plaintiff, subsequent to which time they made valuable improvements upon the premises. It is also found that on or about June 20, 1921, the Dallins transferred their interest to Minton, that Minton transferred to plaintiff, who in turn conveyed to Minton and took back a trust deed.

The findings further recite that thereafter, and on November 21, 1921, it was adjudged by the superior court that the agreement between the Dallins and Minton was void ab initio, and that Minton acquired no interest in the property from them; that thereafter and on or about the 25th day of November, 1921, "a verbal agreement was entered into between the defendants Dallin and the plaintiff that the plaintiff would foreclose his trust deed on said property and purchase same in at the sale thereof, and, if the defendants Dallin would not bid on said property, but permit the plaintiff to purchase same at said foreclosure sale, the plaintiff would sell said property to the defendants Dallin for the sum of $1,150, $50 cash, and $50 per month thereafter with deferred payments bearing interest at 7 per cent. per annum; that thereafter on said 25th day of November, 1921, said plaintiff foreclosed said trust deed, and bid said property in at the sale thereof; that said defendants Dallin were present at said sale, were ready and able to buy said property, but refrained from so doing because of said verbal agreement with the plaintiff; immediately after said sale said defendants Dallin offered to pay to the plaintiff the sum of $50 and enter into a written agreement to purchase said property according to the verbal agreement, but the plaintiff refused to enter into said agreement and refused to sell said property to the defendants Dallin according to the verbal agreement herein mentioned; that since said time the defendants Dallin have at all times been ready, willing, and able to perform the conditions of the verbal agreement to purchase said property."

Judgment was given the plaintiff as to ownership of the property, subject to the right of defendants Dallin to purchase the same for $1,150 upon the terms and conditions specified in the findings. Defendant Minton does not appeal.

[1] The principal ground of this appeal is the verbal agreement referred to herein and set forth in the finding above quoted. It is contended that an oral agreement to convey real property is void, and that no action can be based thereon; and that the trial court erred in permitting respondent to testify regarding the same. It appears from the record that appellant entered into a written contract of sale with respondents on January 5, 1921, of the property in question for a consideration of $1,132, payable $180 in cash and $15 per month; that thereafter and on June 20, 1921, respondents assigned their interest to Minton upon certain conditions which Minton did not fulfill, and that in an action subsequently decided between Minton and Dallin, wherein Braun was not a party, it was held that Minton had acquired no interest by the attempted assignment. Dallin had at the same time also caused Braun to convey his interest to Minton, which was subsequently recovered by Braun upon foreclosure of the trust deed. Respondents have at all times remained in possession, and Dallin testified that "as quick as the court destroyed this instrument that I gave to Minton I considered that it naturally reverted back and fell back in its old place"; "he said that if I did not bid that they would bid it in, and that they would let me pay them what they had in it for the indebtedness that was against the place, they would draw up the papers and let me pay them off, $50 down and $50 a month"; "I told him I knew at the time that I hadn't ought to pay all these expenses, but still rather than have trouble I thought to myself I had better do it"; "after the sale was over he came out and he says, 'All right, Mr. Dallin, we bid it in for the costs—for the costs and what there is in it.' And he says, 'You have your wife up in the morning, and we will have the papers all ready for you to sign, and you can go ahead and pay this indebtedness off and go right along.'"

The defense in this case, and the appeal, were obviously founded upon the acknowledged and well-known rule that a parol agreement for the sale of land, made after the termination of a prior written agreement, must be viewed as a new contract, and, standing by itself, is void under the statute of frauds. Smith v. Taylor, 82 Cal. 533, 23 Pac. 217. But the facts remove this case from the application of that rule. Dallin's right to purchase was created by the written contract of sale of January 5, 1921; he built a house on the premises, and has since continued to reside thereon. No steps were taken by the vendor to terminate the contract of Dallin's interest. All that can be said of the intervening negotiations and litigation is that the vendor and the vendee prior to this suit found themselves in the same position which they had formerly occupied toward each other, except with an additional indebtedness resulting from building operations and the expense of the foreclosure. The "memorandum in writing" consisted of the contract of January 5, 1921, and it is impossible to discover any respect in which the position of either party thereto was changed, except that by subsequent arrangement between them Braun assumed an added indebtedness, and the amount due him from Dallin was increased to include it. Appellant seeks to take advantage of the word "sale" because he had previously told Dallin that, if he would not bid at the foreclosure sale, he would "sell" him the property for $1,150, but it is evident that Dallin never considered his original contract at an end; when he tendered the $50 and demanded a writing evidencing their verbal agreement appellant demanded a larger payment, and finally wrote to Dallin that, if he did not wish to buy on those terms, he might pay $50 per month as rent. To this Dallin promptly replied by letter, "I had thought as soon as the sale of November 25 came off things would be clear, and so they should have been. Through Minton's doings I have been damaged, and still the damage goes on. My property here is in a stage that the storms and weather is very damaging to it, saying nothing about the rest. As to paying you rent, that is absurd."

Sandfoss v. Jones, 35 Cal. 481, is not essentially unlike the case at bar in so far as the holding applies to the situation created by the facts recited. The Supreme Court there said, at page 486:

> "So far as the contract relates to the sale of real estate, it amounts to an agreement on the part of Jones and Blanchard to buy the property at sheriff's sale for the benefit of Bartram, who was the execution debtor, and to advance their own money, if necessary, for that purpose. Whether they paid for the real estate wholly or in part with Bartram's money, or their own exclusively, is immaterial. In either event their agreement was not within the statute of frauds, and was not, therefore, void because it was not in writing. If the real estate was paid for by Jones and Blanchard with the money of Bartram, there was a resulting trust in favor of the latter which a court of equity will declare and enforce, for such a trust is expressly excepted from the operation of the statute of frauds. * * *
> "If, however, we consider the averments of the complaint in the light which is most favorable to the defendants, we have a verbal agreement on their part with an execution debtor, whose land is about to be sold by the sheriff, to purchase it with their own funds, and hold it for his benefit. Such an agreement is equivalent to a loan of the money and a taking of the title as security for its repayment; or an agreement by one person to purchase land for the benefit of another, under circumstances which would amount to a fraud upon the latter, if the former was allowed to repudiate his promise, and, therefore, not within the statute of frauds."

In that case even the possession was surrendered by the debtor, whereas in the instant case there was no suggestion that the debtor in possession should sacrifice any right or interest, nor is there any evidence that he conceded anything; and, if such were claimed by appellant, there is no evidence of any consideration having passed to the respondents therefor.

Moore v. De Barnardi (Nev.) 213 Pac. 1041, citing Sandfoss v. Jones, held that, where defendant occupant of land had an existing interest therein with the mortgagor, but, in reliance upon a parol agreement with the mortgagee that the latter would foreclose for defendant's use and benefit, and convey land to him upon acquiring title, if he would not become a bidder to protect his interest in the property, defendant refrained from protecting his interest so that he could not acquire title to the land in its perfected state through the foreclosure proceeding, the refusal of the mortgagor to afterwards convey was such a fraud as operated to convert the mortgagee into a trustee ex maleficio.

Broadwell v. Maxwell, 30 Ga. App. 738, 119 S. E. 344, 346, is in point. Maxwell instituted proceedings seeking to dispossess Broadwell for failure to pay rent. Broadwell alleged that the evidence showed that he did not originally hold the property as a tenant, but that he had owned it; that he had borrowed $3,500 from one Smith and given a deed to the property as security; that the debt was subsequently reduced to judgment by Smith, and the property offered for sale. Smith and Broadwell agreed that, if the latter would not bid at such sale, Smith would buy in the property and allow the defendant to redeem it by payment of the amount of the indebtedness. Smith bought in the property, Broadwell refraining from making a bid, and the defendant, after extensions of time had been given him therefor, tendered to Smith's administrator the amount paid by Smith, which was refused. Judgment was given for the plaintiff, and in reversing the lower court it was said on appeal:

> "It follows, therefore, that when the defendant, Broadwell, made the alleged agreement with Smith's attorney, by the terms of which bids were choked off, and Smith bid in the property at reduced figures, and took a deed from the sheriff, and allowed Broadwell to remain in possession and pay a certain amount as 'rent,' with the right to redeem the property upon the payment of the indebtedness, the relationship between the parties was that of trustee and cestui que trust.
> "In the case now before us, where the evidence is supplemented by the written contract of 'tenancy,' so called, this contract must be construed in the light of this relationship, and equitable principles must be applied thereto, and this contract given an effect accordingly. This being a resulting trust, the statute of frauds does not apply (Chastain v. Smith, 30 Ga. 96), and the parol agreement will be considered."

Upon the facts presented, and the authorities herein referred to, appellant is the owner of the property described, subject to the right of respondents Dallin to purchase the same, as recited by the judgment; and the respondents were entitled to remain in possession, as found by the trial court.

[2-4] The findings state that the defendants Dallin have at all times been ready, willing, and able to perform the conditions of the "verbal agreement to purchase said property"; appellant contends that this language indicates that it was the theory of the trial court that the rights of the Dallins are predicated upon the verbal agreement, and that the contract to purchase the property is to be found in the verbal agreement only. But we must construe the whole transaction from the facts presented, irrespective of the name by which it may have been designated (Harron, Rickard & McCone v. Wilson, Lyon & Co., 4 Cal. App. 488, 88 Pac. 512; Hogan v. Anthony, 40 Cal. App. 679, 182 Pac. 52), or of any particular isolated feature of it. (Palmer v. Howard, 72 Cal. 293, 13 Pac. 858, 1 Am. St. Rep. 60). The findings considered as a whole sufficiently state that the Dallins possessed a right to purchase the premises in question, based upon the entire transaction, beginning with the written contract, and including the verbal agreement, which was partially executed. Whenever the facts found are such as might authorize different inferences therefrom, it will be presumed that the inference made by the trial court was one that will uphold rather than defeat the judgment, and in such case an appellate court will not draw from those facts any inference contrary to that which might have been drawn by the trial court for the purpose of rendering its judgment. Taylor v. Avila, 175 Cal. 203, 165 Pac. 533; Haight v. Haight, 151 Cal. 90, 90 Pac. 197; Paine v. San Bernardino Valley Trac. Co., 143 Cal. 654, 77 Pac. 659.

[5] The real contract between the parties was the written agreement of January, 1921. This is still alive. The entire record justifies, and indeed requires, a finding to this effect, and that the rights of the parties are still measured by it. The rule is well established that where a judgment is justified by the facts shown upon an examination of the entire record a reversal will not be granted merely because of an erroneous finding or the failure of the trial court to make a finding upon any issue. Anderson v. Blean, 19 Cal. App. 581, 126 Pac. 859; American Nat. Bank v. Donnellan, 170 Cal. 9, 148 Pac. 188, Ann. Cas. 1917c, 744; Krasky v. Wollpert, 134 Cal. 338, 66 Pac. 309.

[6] We do not agree with appellant's contention that there was no finding that he was not entitled to possession, since the finding that respondents were entitled to possession was a decision upon the issue presented. Koeberle v. Friganza (Cal. App.) 226 Pac. 35.

[7] It is next contended that the judgment does not follow the decision, in that the judgment requires that respondents pay "$1,150, including interest," while the trial court's decision specifies $1,150 "and interest." The findings, conclusions of law, and judgment require that respondents pay the appellant the principal sum of $1,150, in fractional amounts of $50 per month, and interest on deferred payments at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum; and, although worded slightly differently, there is no room for doubt that such rate of interest will accrue and be payable upon any remaining balance until fully paid, as the record stands.

The judgment is affirmed.

WESTERN PIPE & STEEL CO. OF CALIFORNIA v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 11044.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 4, 1924.)

1. Master and servant 🔑403—Dependency of nonresident parents of employee not presumed.

There is no presumption of dependency in case of nonresident parents of deceased employee.

2. Master and servant 🔑405(5)—Finding of partial dependency sustained.

That deceased employee had, for several years prior to his death, been sending $20 to $25 a month to his parents who resided in Italy, giving as reason that they were in need along with some other evidence, held sufficient to sustain finding as to parents' partial dependency.

3. Master and servant 🔑417(5)—Mere errors of procedure by Industrial Accident Commission not ground for review.

Denial of continuance by Industrial Accident Commission on ground that application came too late is mere error of procedure not affecting its jurisdiction to make award, and, on certiorari to review its award, does not constitute ground for review.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceedings under Workmen's Compensation Act by Angelo Zani and another, by A. E. Privato, their next frend, against Western Pipe & Steel Co. of California, employer. Compensation was awarded by the Industrial Accident Commission, and the Company brings certiorari. Award affirmed.

Eugene D. Bennett and Edgar C. Chapman, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, J. This is a petition for writ of review, after an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission to the father and mother of one Joe Zani, deceased, who lost his life through injuries received while in the employ of the petitioner. The award was based upon the finding of the commission that the father and mother of the decedent, residents in Italy, were partial dependents upon their son at the time of his death, and that the deceased was contributing to the support of his parents at the rate of $240 a year. The petitioner contends that the evidence before the commission was not sufficient to support its finding of partial dependency.

[1, 2] There is no presumption of dependency in the case of nonresident parents of deceased employee. That question must be determined in accordance with the fact as the fact may be at the time the decedent received the injury. Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 844), § 14(b). The decedent in this case worked in the oil fields and received good wages. His personal expenses appear not to have been very large. There is evidence that once a month, for a period of two years prior to his death, and at about the time he received his pay checks from his employers, he called at the office of a notary and general adviser to the Italian colony in Los Angeles, to whom he gave money to send to his father and mother in Italy. Sometimes the money was sent through various forwarding agencies; at other times, through money orders, and sometimes in currency. These remittances averaged from $20 to $25 a month. A number of them are substantiated by receipts issued by the forwarding agencies. There was other evidence to the effect that the decedent devoted a considerable portion of his wages to the support of his parents. The decedent gave as the reason for sending these amounts to his parents that they were in need and did not have enough to eat, and it was necessary for him to send them money. There was further evidence from which an inference might be drawn that the parents of the deceased were partially dependent upon him for their support.

In view of the record in this case, the objection that the finding of the commission as to partial dependency is not supported is in the nature of a demurrer to the sufficiency of the evidence. Other and better evidence might possibly have been produced tending to shed light upon the question of the dependency of the parents in Italy, but no order or rule of the Industrial Accident Commission may be invalidated because of the admission into the record, and use as proof of any fact in dispute before it, of any evidence not admissible under the common-law or statutory rules of evidence. Workmen's Compensation Act, § 60(a). We are of opinion, therefore, that the finding of the commission, as to the partial dependency of the parents of the decedent, is supported by the evidence.

In cases of partial dependency the dependents, in addition to the reasonable expenses of burial of the decedent, not exceeding $100, shall be allowed a benefit fixed by the statute at three times the annual amount devoted by the deceased to the support of his dependents. Workmen's Compensation Act, § 9(c) (2). Such was the award in this case.

[3] At the conclusion of the hearing before the commission the petitioner requested a continuance to enable it to take the deposition of the parents of the decedent who were in Italy. The request was denied, and petitioner now argues strenuously that this action amounted in effect to a denial of a hearing before the commission, and renders its award void as in excess of jurisdiction and as depriving petitioner of its property without due process. The evidence sought, it contends, would have had a material bearing on the question of the dependency of the claimants. The commission based its denial of the application for a continuance on the ground that it came too late, that it should have been made prior to the hearing. The Industrial Accident Commission is vested with very broad powers. All hearings and investigations before it are governed by the Workmen's Compensation Act, and by the rules of practice and procedure adopted by the commission. In the conduct of causes before it the commission is not bound by the common-law or statutory rules of procedure. Section 60. Adjournments from time to time are in the discretion of the commission or referee holding the hearing. Section 19a. The action now complained of in this case, at the very most that can be charged against it, was nothing more than an error in the proceedings of the commission which did not go to its jurisdiction to make the award. Consequently, it does not constitute a ground of review in this court. Maryland Casualty Co. v. In. Acc. Comm., 178 Cal. 491, 493, 173 Pac. 993.

The award is affirmed.

REILLY v. POLICE COURT, CITY OF OAKLAND, ALAMEDA COUNTY, DEPT. 1, et al. (S. F. 11292.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 3, 1924.)

1. Judgment ⚷552—Denial on merits, by District Court of Appeal, of writ of prohibition held res judicata on subsequent application to Supreme Court.

Denial by District Court of Appeal, on the merits, of writ of prohibition against trial of criminal complaint for libel, held bar to subsequent application to Supreme Court to prohibit trial of same prosecution based on same complaint, same questions being involved as on first application.

2. Courts ⚷475(1)—Prohibition may not be sought in Supreme Court while appeal from judgment refusing it is pending in District Court of Appeal.

Where an appeal from a judgment of the superior court refusing prohibition was still pending and undetermined in the District Court of Appeal, the petitioner may not seek prohibition on the same facts in the Supreme Court.

3. Appeal and error ⚷790(2)—Questions involved in appeal from refusal of prohibition to prevent trial not rendered moot by trials resulting in hung jury.

Where an accused appealed from denial by superior court of his application for writ of prohibition against trial in police court, fact that pending appeal trial took place in police court resulting in hung jury, as did also another trial in that court, did not render the questions on his appeal moot nor his appeal nugatory.

4. Courts ⚷476—Litigant may not seek same remedy on same facts in two different courts at same time.

A litigant will not be permitted to seek the same remedy on the same state of facts in two different courts at the same time, and pursue them both concurrently to a conclusion.

In Bank.

Application by Philip Reilly for writ of prohibition to be directed to the Police Court, City of Oakland, Alameda County, California, Department 1, and another. Writ denied.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. [1] This is an application for a writ of prohibition to prevent the respondent court from proceeding with the trial of the petitioner upon a charge of criminal libel now pending before it, upon the ground that the complaint therein does not state facts sufficient to charge a criminal offense, and upon the further ground that the respondent court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter thereof, in that the Whitney Act (Stats. 1885, p. 213) and the act of 1901 (Stats. 1901, p. 576) are unconstitutional and void. The facts of this case are stated by petitioner as follows:

> "This is an application for an alternative writ of prohibition in the Supreme Court to prohibit a third successive trial on a void complaint in a police court of Alameda county, for the crime of libel. On the first trial on the same set of facts, the superior court issued an alternative writ of prohibition, staying all proceedings until final determination of said special proceeding. A demurrer to petition was interposed by respondents that the police court complaint was sufficient to sustain a conviction, which demurrer was sustained without leave to amend, judgment entered on demurrer and appeal duly taken and perfected, transcript filed in District Court of Appeal, a stay on said appeal was refused by the superior court, after appeal perfected and a writ of supersedeas refused by the District Court of Appeal and a writ of prohibition refused by the District Court of Appeal, each and all based on the ground that petitioner would have to submit to be tried upon said void complaint, and that if he was convicted he would have a remedy by an appeal from the judgment to the superior court."

[2] Upon the facts thus stated we must conclude that the questions which petitioner is here asking us to consider and determine are res adjudicata as against him. He shows that he has heretofore applied to the District Court of Appeal for a writ of prohibition, for the purpose of preventing these respondents from proceeding with the trial of the same prosecution based upon the same complaint which is involved herein. That application of necessity involved the same legal and constitutional questions which would be involved herein. The refusal of that court to grant the writ prayed for was an adjudication that, upon such a state of facts (identical with the facts herein), petitioner was not entitled to the relief prayed for. It would be useless for us now to inquire whether that judgment was correct or erroneous. Having become final, it is now conclusive upon the parties thereto, and upon all other courts in a proceeding between the same parties involving the same questions. In Dawson v. Superior Court, 158 Cal. 73, 110 Pac. 479, this court decided that the judgment of the District Court of Appeal denying on its merits an application for a writ of prohibition is a bar to a subsequent application in the Supreme Court. In that case, the question was reserved as to whether such an adjudication would be a bar if made otherwise than upon the merits. Petitioner expressly alleges herein in effect that the adjudication of the District Court was on the merits. He alleges that the denial of the writ by that court was "on the ground that the remedy of the petitioner was to submit to be tried in said police court on said complaint, and that, if convicted, then petitioner would have his remedy after conviction and during his imprisonment at the discretion of the police court if the bail were increased to an amount above that which petitioner could procure, by an appeal from the judgment of conviction, notwithstanding that the complaint failed to state a public offense." It has since been decided that the denial ex parte and without the filing of an opinion by an appellate court of an original application for a writ (other than the writ of habeas corpus) is a final adjudication that, upon the facts stated in the application, assuming them to be true, the petitioner is not entitled to the writ prayed for. Napa Valley Electric Co. v. Railroad Commission of California, 251 U. S. 366, 40 Sup. Ct. 147, 64 L. Ed. 310; People v. Hadley (Cal. App.) 226 Pac. 836, 838. If it could be assumed contrary to the express allegations of the petitioner herein that the denial of the application by the District Court of Appeal in this case was predicated upon the circumstances that the same question was involved in the appeal from the judgment of the superior court then pending in such district court (see Lickley v. County Board of Education, 62 Cal. App. 527, 217 Pac. 133), the same circumstance would move this court to deny the present application.

[3, 4] The appeal from the judgment of the superior court denying the writ of prohibition is still pending and undetermined in the District Court of Appeal, and of necessity involves the same questions which would be involved herein if we were to grant an alternative writ. A litigant will not be permitted to seek the same remedy upon the same state of facts in two different courts at the same time, and pursue them both concurrently to a conclusion. Petitioner argues that the questions presented by his appeal from the judgment of the superior court have become moot and his appeal rendered nugatory by reason of the fact that the trial which he was then attempting to prevent by the writ of prohibition has already taken place. That trial did not reach a conclusion. That trial as well as the one which followed it resulted in a "hung jury," the jurors upon each trial being unable to agree upon a verdict. Therefore the case still remains pending and undetermined in the respondent court. Otherwise, there would be no occasion for the present application for a writ of prohibition to prevent that court from proceeding with the trial thereof. So long as this state of facts obtains the questions involved upon the appeal to the District Court of Appeal cannot be regarded as moot or that appeal deemed nugatory.

The application is denied.

BIASCA v. SUPERIOR COURT OF HUMBOLDT COUNTY et al. (S. F. 11285.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 30, 1924.)

Injunction 🔑148(1)—Interim restraining order not void for failure to require undertaking.

An interim restraining order issued by superior court at time of application for temporary injunction pendente lite, restraining defendants from doing things specified in injunction pending hearing on order to show cause why injunction should not be granted, is not void for failure of court to require undertaking mentioned in Code Civ. Proc. § 529.

In Bank.

Application by Henry Biasca for a writ of prohibition to be directed to Superior Court of Humboldt County, and George D. Murray, judge thereof, to restrain hearing of contempt proceedings. Writ denied.

W. F. Clyborne and A. J. Thatcher, both of Eureka, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. This application for a writ of prohibition presents for decision the single question of the jurisdiction of the superior court to issue an interim restraining order, without requiring the undertaking mentioned in section 529 of the Code of Civil Procedure. A complaint was filed in the respondent court which stated a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff therein for an injunction against the defendant therein. Upon application for a temporary injunction pendente lite, the respondent court issued an order to show cause why an injunction should not issue as prayed for, which was made returnable seven days after the date of its issuance, and which provided further that, "pending the hearing of said motion for a preliminary injunction and until the determination of said motion," the defendants were restrained from doing the things therein specified. No undertaking was required or given in connection with the issuance of said interim restraining order. Contempt proceedings having been initiated in the respondent court, based upon an alleged violation of the interim restraining order, a writ of prohibition is sought to restrain the respondent court from proceeding with the same, upon the ground that, in the absence of such an undertaking, the restraining order was void. In San Diego W. Co. v. Steamship Co., 101 Cal. 216, 35 Pac. 651, this court pointed out the distinction between a preliminary injunction on the one hand, and an interim restraining order in connection with an order to show cause and expiring with it on the other hand, and held definitely that an undertaking is required in connection with the former, but not with the latter. That decision has never been overruled or departed from by this court so far as we are advised. It was cited and distinguished in Neumann v. Moretti, 146 Cal. 31, 79 Pac. 512, and it was there pointed out that "the temporary restraining order referred to in the statute is an order which applies to the time intervening between an application for an injunction and the day fixed in the order to show cause. Under section 528, after the defendant has answered, an injunction cannot be allowed except upon an order to show cause. Under section 530, if the court or judge deems it proper that the defendant should be heard, an order may be made requiring cause to be shown at a specified time and place.

> "Under either section, pending the application and before hearing the parties on the order to show cause, the defendant may be restrained. It would be the better practice, and certainly is the general practice, to require an undertaking during such temporary restraining order."

In Maier v. Luce, 61 Cal. App. 552, 215 Pac. 399, the District Court of Appeal held that any injunctional order issued in the absence of such undertaking is inoperative. We do not feel warranted in adopting this conclusion as applied to interim restraining orders such as the one here under consideration. Thirty years have elapsed since the decision in the San Diego Water Case, supra, during which time several amendments to section 529, Code of Civil Procedure, have been adopted, the last of which was subsequent to the decision in the Neumann Case, supra. None of these amendments evidences an intent on the part of the Legislature to depart from the rule of law embodied in this section as expounded in those two decisions. The provisions of the former section 530, Code of Civil Procedure, for an interim restraining order, which were referred to in the Neumann Case, were omitted therefrom in the amendment thereof in 1911 (St. 1911, p. 1421). But they were at the same time inserted, in substance, in section 527 (St. 1911, p. 59). We must therefore regard the amendments as legislative affirmances of that rule of law. This court has several times expressed its opinion that the better practice would be to require an undertaking upon the granting of such an interim restraining order, but we cannot conclude that the omission to do so renders such order void.

The petition is denied.

HENNESSY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.

(No. 11074.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 2, 1924.)

1. Costs 🔑209—Must not be entered in judgment before judicially determined if disputed.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1033–1035, no authority whatever is given the clerk or any other officer to enter costs until same have been judicially ascertained if they are disputed.

2. Appeal and error 🔑442—Trial court retains jurisdiction to tax costs after judgment and appeal therefrom.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 946, the trial court retains jurisdiction to tax costs, after rendition and entry of final judgment, and appeal duly perfected therefrom, as a "matter embraced in the action and not affected by the order appealed from."

3. Mandamus 🔑31—Will not issue to interfere with superior court decision as to sufficiency of particular facts to confer jurisdiction.

Mandamus will not issue to interfere with decision of superior court as to sufficiency of certain facts established by the record or determined by court upon proper evidence to give it jurisdiction to proceed with particular case.

4. Mandamus 🔑59—Will lie on refusal to entertain jurisdiction on erroneous decision that as matter of law court has none.

Where superior court erroneously decides as matter of law that it has been divested of jurisdiction to entertain motion to tax costs by pending appeal, and therefore refuses to entertain such motion, mandamus will lie to compel it to perform duty specially enjoined upon it of hearing motion.

5. Mandamus 🔑4(3)—Remedy by appeal held not alone reason for denying writ to compel hearing of motion to tax costs.

Conceding that order refusing to perform duty specially enjoined upon court by law, of hearing motion to tax costs, is appealable, that alternative alone is not sufficient reason for denying mandamus to compel hearing of motion, question of expedition in determination of matters, depending upon evidence as to items of cost being factor.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandate by Annie L. Hennessy, directed to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco and another, to require retaxation of costs. Writ granted.

R. H. Cross, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Albert I. Loeb, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. Annie L. Hennessy brought an action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against T. E. Haley for the rescission of a certain contract and agreement entered into by said parties, and for the cancellation of certain promissory notes executed by Hennessy to Haley, which constituted a part of the transaction for the purchase by Hennessy from Haley, of the Spaulding Hotel, situate in the city of San Francisco. The details of the transaction are not important. Judgment went in favor of defendant Haley, and against plaintiff Hennessy for costs of suit, which was entered June 6, and recorded June 7, 1923. On the same day defendant Haley filed and served upon plaintiff Hennessy his memorandum of costs, amounting to $299.46, together with a notice of the entry of said judgment. Said plaintiff, petitioner here, filed and served her notice of appeal on June 7, stating that said appeal was taken from the whole and each and every part of said judgment. Within the period of five days allowed by statute to move for taxation of costs, to wit, June 11, 1923, said Hennessy served upon Haley and filed in the court below her motion to tax said costs. The clerk immediately upon receipt of the bill of costs, entered the amount in the judgment according to the demand of the defendant. This was premature and unauthorized by any statute. Said motion to tax costs came before the court for hearing on February 24, 1924, was taken under advisement, and, on the 27th day of February, 1924, was disposed of by the court in the following minute order:

"In this action, the motion to re-tax costs having been heretofore submitted to the court, and the court having duly considered the same, and now being fully advised in the premises, it is ordered that said action be and the same is hereby denied for want of jurisdiction."

Other proceedings, which do not affect the question before us, followed the appeal.

The refusal of the court to entertain or decide the matter of costs upon the ground that it was divested of jurisdiction by reason of a pending appeal under the circumstances here shown, is before us for decision. This question must be decided with reference to the provisions of our statute which provide, in case of appeal, for a stay of proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from, or upon the matters embraced therein, but which are not affected by the order appealed from, under the provisions of section 946, Code of Civil Procedure, and other sections pertinent to the subject.

[1] Section 1033, Code of Civil Procedure, gives to the party against whom costs are claimed the right to file within five days after notice of filing of the bill of costs a motion to have the same taxed by the court in which the judgment was entered. The clerk of the court must include in the judgment the costs "if the same have been taxed or ascertained." Section 1035, Code Civ. Proc. No authority whatever is given the clerk or any other officer to enter costs until the same have been judicially determined if they be disputed. In Kaiser v. Barron, 153 Cal. 474, 95 Pac. 879, it is said:

> "The entry of costs in the judgment, while a motion to tax them was pending, was without authority, and the issuance of an execution for the collection of such costs and the levy upon plaintiff's property was improvident and untimely."

[2] Section 946, Code of Civil Procedure, provides:

> "Whenever an appeal is perfected, as provided in the preceding sections of this chapter, it stays all further proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from, or upon the matters embraced therein. * * * But the court below may proceed upon any other matter embraced in the action and not affected by the order appealed from." (Italics ours.)

Hayne on "New Trial and Appeal," in referring on the clause "any other matter embraced in the action and not affected by the order appealed from," says:

> "But even in the absence of such a provision, it is believed that the trial court may take any action that may be proper in connection with the cause, provided conditions are allowed to remain substantially unchanged as when the appeal was perfected. Matters ancillary or collateral in connection with the appeal itself or the proceedings in the lower court, as a settlement of a bill of exceptions, etc., are not affected by the appeal." Vol. 2 (Rev. Ed.), p.

1223, § 224; Estate of Waters, 181 Cal. 584, 185 Pac. 951; 2 Cal. Jur. 418.

A motion to tax the cost bill made after the rendition and entry of final judgment is a "matter embraced in the action and not affected by the order appealed from." It is true, as a general rule, that a duly perfected appeal divests the trial court of further jurisdiction in the cause. This rule has its qualifications, however. In re Morehouse, 176 Cal. 634, 169 Pac. 365. Such qualification exists by reason of the fact that ancillary or collateral matters in connection with the appeal are unaffected, and, notwithstanding the appeal the trial court may determine such matters as the settlement of bills of exception, hearing and disposing of motions for new trials, the payment of alimony, and other matters incidental to the action. In Whitaker v. Title Ins., etc., Co., 179 Cal. 111, 175 Pac. 460, we held that, upon an appeal from a judgment or order directing the payment of money, it was not necessary under the provisions of section 942, Code of Civil Procedure, that the bond should cover the amount awarded as costs in order to effectuate a stay of proceedings pending the appeal since the words "in double the amount named in the judgment must be taken as referring to the amount adjudged to be due the prevailing party upon the claim involved in the action and for which recovery is awarded, and as not including the incidental recovery on account of the costs of the action awarded only upon claim made and ascertainment of amount had subsequent to the giving of the judgment." In 7 Cal. Jur. 298, the rule is thus stated: "It is now settled that an order on a motion to re-tax a cost bill made after the rendition and entry of final judgment is appealable as a special order after final judgment." See, also, Dooly v. Norton, 41 Cal. 439; Empire Gold Min. Co. v. Bonanza, etc., Min. Co., 67 Cal. 406, 7 Pac. 810; Yorba v. Dobner, 90 Cal. 337, 27 Pac. 185; Linforth v. San Francisco Gas, etc., Co., 9 Cal. App. 434, 99 Pac. 716; Quitzow v. Perrin, 120 Cal. 255, 52 Pac. 632; Elledge v. Superior Court, 131 Cal. 279, 63 Pac. 360.

[3, 4] Sufficient has been said, supported by authority, to show that petitioner was entitled to have the matter of costs judicially determined in the usual and orderly way agreeable to the statutory provisions regulating the subject. The question next to be answered is whether the writ of mandamus should issue as prayed for, or whether petitioner should be relegated to some other remedy. The underlying principle which supports the right for relief by the aid of the writ of mandamus has been many times defined by the decisions of this court. It is well-settled law that this court will not interfere with the decision of a superior court in that class of cases in which a superior court is called upon to consider the sufficiency of certain facts established by the record, or certain facts determined by it upon evidence properly addressed to it, to give it jurisdiction to proceed with the particular case before the court. But the case at bar presents a proposition not dependent upon a consideration of the powers of the court as defined by the Constitution and the statutes. See Temple v. Superior Court, 70 Cal. 211, 11 Pac. 699; Grimwood v. Barry, 118 Cal. 274, 50 Pac. 430; San Francisco Gas & Electric Co. v. Superior Court, 155 Cal. 30, 99 Pac. 359, 17 Ann. Cas. 933; Inglin v. Hoppin, 156 Cal. 483, 105 Pac. 582; Sullivan v. Superior Court, 185 Cal. 133, 195 Pac. 1061; Hill v. Superior Court, 15 Cal. App. 307, 114 Pac. 805; Moch v. Superior Court, 39 Cal. App. 471, 179 Pac. 440. What has been said above with respect to the question of jurisdiction is practically in the words of Cahill v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 42, 78 Pac. 467. The language there used is so applicable to the question of law presented in the instant case as to justify a reproduction of the following paragraph:

> "The Code provides that the writ of mandate may be issued to 'compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins, as a duty resulting from an office.' Code Civ. Proc. § 1085. The law specially enjoins upon the superior court, and upon the judge thereof, the duty of hearing and determining all matters which are within its jurisdiction, and which come properly before it. The motion under consideration did come properly before that court, but the judge decided, as matter of law, and upon the statute and Constitution only, that the court had no power in any case to make orders of the kind there applied for, and upon that ground only refused to proceed to the merits of the application. If the person holding the office could thus decide what were the duties pertaining thereto which the law specially enjoins him to perform, the writ of mandate would be practically useless. The decision refusing to act which gives occasion for the writ would also furnish sufficient cause for denying it. As was well said in Temple v. Superior Court, 70 Cal. 211, 'The court cannot, by holding without reason that it has no jurisdiction of the proceedings, divest itself of jurisdiction and evade the duty of hearing and determining it.' To the same effect are Merced M. Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 130; Ortman v. Dixon, 9 Cal. 23; Heinlen v. Cross, 63 Cal. 44; People v. Barnes, 66 Cal. 594; Crocker v. Conrey, 140 Cal. 213."

[5] Conceding the order refusing to tax costs to be an appealable order that alternative would not of itself be a sufficient reason for holding that remedy exclusive. The bare refusal to perform an act which the law specially enjoins, and which act embraces the determination of matters incidental to a judgment appealed from are not the only reasons that may be urged for the issuance of the writ, but also the question of expedition in the determination of matters depending upon evidence as to questions of witnesses' fees and items of costs which would be more conveniently and readily disposed of at a time when said matters are fresh in the memory of all concerned rather than postponed to an uncertain day.

We may add to what has already been said that an order of reversal upon appeal would have amounted to a peremptory mandate. San Francisco Gas & Electric Co. v. Superior Court, supra.

Let the writ issue.

LEW U. FON et al. v. CHAMBERS et al.
(Civ. 4092.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 26, 1924.)

1. Searches and seizures 🔑5—Evidence held sufficient to support finding that tickets were designed and intended to be used in Chinese lottery.

In claim and delivery to recover tickets seized under search warrant, issued in pursuance of Pen. Code, § 1524, evidence held sufficient to support a finding that the tickets were designed and intended to be used in connection with a Chinese lottery.

2. Replevin 🔑72—Action in claim and delivery, a civil case in which issues are determined according to preponderance of evidence.

An action of claim and delivery for leaflets seized by police officers as intended to be used in a Chinese lottery, is a civil case in which the issues are determined according to the preponderance of evidence, and does not require proof beyond a reasonable doubt that the papers were in fact blank lottery tickets.

3. Evidence 🔑588—Trial judge may believe testimony of one witness or reject testimony of any other witness.

It is within the province of a trial judge to believe testimony of any one witness, or to disbelieve or reject the whole or any part of any testimony of any other witness.

4. Appeal and error 🔑994(3) — Finding of trial court, based on evidence, not disturbed on appeal, in absence of abuse of discretion.

If in exercise of prerogative of trial court to believe testimony of one witness or disbelieve or reject testimony of others, there is substantial evidence on which to base his finding, it cannot be disturbed in absence of abuse of discretion.

5. Evidence 🔑129(1) — Admitting testimony that tickets seized were similar to other lottery tickets used not error.

In claim and delivery for tickets defended on the ground that they were to be used in a Chinese lottery, where a witness was shown to have long experience in dealing officially with matters of such a nature, and the similarity of tickets in question with completed lottery tickets, was fully explained, admitting his testimony that the tickets were similar to lottery tickets used in other stores, was not error.

6. Searches and seizures 🔑5—Claim and delivery will not lie to regain tickets to be used in lottery, although no criminal action was taken against owners.

Where blank tickets intended and designed to be used in a lottery, and possessed in violation of an ordinance, were seized under a search warrant issued in pursuance of Pen. Code, § 1524, claim and delivery will not lie to recover them, regardless of the fact that no criminal complaint had been filed against the owners.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Lew U. Fon and others against Joseph F. Chambers and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Warren L. Williams and Seymour S. Silverton, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., Chas. B. MacCoy, Deputy City Atty., and J. M. Friedlander, City Prosecutor, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. Plaintiffs brought an action in claim and delivery against the defendants, who were, respectively, the police judge, the city prosecutor, the clerk of the police court, the chief of police, and a patrolman, to recover from them certain so-called merchandise consisting of pamphlets or paper leaflets on which it was alleged were portrayed Chinese poems and literature. The answer, besides containing a specific denial of nearly all the material allegations of the complaint, other than that the demand by plaintiffs for the merchandise and the refusal thereof by the defendants was admitted, set up the affirmative defense that the patrolman, having been informed that plaintiffs had in their possession tickets to be used in a lottery, "seized and took from said plaintiffs 29 boxes or cases containing slips of paper on which was and is written various Chinese characters; that said tickets or slips of paper were printed and designed to be used as and in connection with a lottery scheme and in furtherance of said lottery scheme, and were intended to be used and issued as lottery tickets in the operation of a lottery."

[1] The findings of the court with reference to the nature of the slips of paper were that at the time referred to in the complaint they were taken by the patrolman, and at such time were the property of the plaintiffs; that they were not in pamphlet form, but that such slips of paper constituting the contents of said 29 boxes "bear the same Chinese characters and are identical in form; that said tickets or slips were not designed or intended to be sold as literature or used as such"; that said patrolman (referring to one of the defendants) "on or about the 9th day of August, 1921, having reasonable cause to believe that the contents of said boxes were designed to be used as and in connection with a lottery scheme and in furtherance of said lottery scheme, and were intended to be used and issued as lottery tickets in the operation of a lottery, and acting under and by virtue of a search warrant issued on the 9th day of August, 1921, * * * seized and took from said plaintiffs 29 boxes containing tickets or slips of paper on which were or are written Chinese poems and literature in various Chinese characters; that said tickets or slips of paper were printed and designed to be used as and in connection with a Chinese lottery scheme and in furtherance of said lottery scheme and were intended to be used and issued as lottery tickets in the operation of a Chinese lottery."

Appellants first contend that the finding by the court to the effect that the slips taken from the plaintiffs were lottery tickets, or lottery tickets in an unfinished state, intended for no other use than as lottery tickets or lottery material, is not sustained by the evidence. At the outset, it is admitted by appellants that, if the possession of the slips by the plaintiffs came under the prohibition of ordinance number 37737, new series, of the city of Los Angeles, the taking of such slips by the officers was lawful and is determinative of the appeal.

Section 1 of the ordinance in question provides that it shall be unlawful for any person to have in his possession "any ticket * * * paper * * * or any other object used or intended to be used in a lottery"; and section 4 thereof makes it unlawful for any person to have in his possession "any ticket * * * paper * * * or any other object used or intended to be used for contriving, preparing, setting up, or drawing any lottery, or used or intended to be used for contriving, setting up, preparing, marking, printing, stamping, writing, or getting ready for sale, or distribution, any lottery ticket, or lottery tickets." Section 6 of the ordinance provides that "in all cases, proof of the fact that such * * * paper * * * ticket * * * device, or other object, is used or intended to be used * * * or is understood to belong to, or to be a part of, or relates to, any lottery, lottery company, lottery tickets, or lottery drawing, is sufficient."

While but one box of the "merchandise" was opened by the officers, the action was for the recovery of the possession of the full number of 29 boxes under the allegation that they contained "Chinese poems and literature in pamphlet form"; and the admission of one of the defendants was in substance that "the boxes all contained the same as the one we had opened." The testimony given by one of the officers who served the search warrant was that he had been stationed as a police officer in Chinatown for six and one-half years; that he had seen slips similar to those in question in nearly every place in Chinatown, and that they were used as lottery tickets; that he was familiar with Chinese lottery tickets by reason of many raids in which he had participated, and in which raids lottery tickets were seized and thereafter used as evidence against the persons arrested in such raids; that the only difference between the tickets here in question and the lottery tickets seized in such raids was that "the other tickets, of course, were marked in here (indicating) over the Chinese characters and the name of the lottery company and the amount for which the company was capitalized, and also there would be the name in Chinese characters on it, and the amount which the ticket was played for."

The only evidence which might be considered as in any way contradicting the testimony to which reference has just been had was that of one of the plaintiffs, who testified that he did not know the use for which the slips were intended; that on each of the slips were 80 characters representing different poems, and which slips were sold at wholesale to "other stores and to school children." In this connection, it is significant that the slips were loose-leaf and were "tied in a bunch"; that they were sold only a "whole case at a time," and at a rate of 42 cents a pound. While it is possible that these slips may have been useful for some purpose other than as lottery tickets, the evidence does not show that they were ever put to any other use, or that any one other than one of the plaintiffs ever considered them as literature. The fact that they were tied up in bunches and were sold by the pound negatives any such idea, although such a method of sale of "poems and literature" perhaps in some cases might well be emulated by enterprising merchants of other nationalities. On the other hand, that they were identical with lottery tickets used in other stores in Chinatown, excepting that they were not marked, nor had thereon the name of the lottery company issuing the tickets, nor its capitalization, nor the amount for which the ticket was played, would indicate that they were stock lottery tickets, ready to be sold to different lottery companies, requiring only the filling in of the details just noted.

The fact that the slips had printed thereon Chinese characters representing 80 different poems, or "one poem with 80 different meanings," is of no great consequence. So far as their use as lottery tickets is concerned, apparently in the place of the Chinese characters, there might as well have been used 80 different numerals.

[2] The case is not one requiring evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that these slips of Chinese poems and literature were in fact blank lottery tickets; but it is a civil case in which the rule is that the issue may be determined according to the probabilities arising from the preponderance of the evidence.

[3, 4] It was clearly within the province of the trial judge to give credence to the testimony of any one witness, or to disbelieve or to reject the whole or any part of the testimony of any other witness; and if, in exercising his prerogative in that regard, there was any substantial evidence on which to base his finding, it cannot, in the absence of an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial judge, be disturbed on appeal. That the evidence, together with the inferences which may reasonably be drawn therefrom, is sufficient to support the conclusion reached by the trial judge we entertain no doubt. It therefore follows that appellants' contention with reference to the finding of the court cannot be sustained.

[5] It is also urged that the trial court erred in receiving evidence over plaintiffs' objection thereto that the slips taken from the plaintiffs by the officers were "similar" to lottery tickets used in other stores in Chinatown. The foundation for such evidence was properly laid by showing the long experience of the witness in dealing in an official capacity with matters of the nature involved herein, and the similarity of the slips in question with completed lottery tickets was fully explained. In such circumstances, we are unable to perceive that the court erred in admitting the testimony.

[6] Plaintiffs finally urge that, because under the powers created by the search warrant the officers took merchandise which was in plaintiffs' possession for lawful purposes, and because no criminal complaint had ever been filed against plaintiffs up to the time the action herein was tried, the plaintiffs were entitled to a return of the seized property. What has heretofore been said with reference to the nature of the slips and their intended use will suffice as an answer to the first part of plaintiffs' contention. Regarding the latter part, the only authority cited by appellants is the case of Modern Loan Co. v. Police Court, 12 Cal. App. 582, 108 Pac. 56, which had to do with the jurisdiction of the police court to try ex parte the question of title to some personal property which had been taken on a search warrant from the possession of the pledgee thereof; and the court held that "one who is in possession of property under a claim of right cannot be deprived of its possession without due process of law; and, in order to constitute due process of law, there must be notice of the time and place of hearing and an opportunity to be heard."

On the other hand, many cases are cited by respondents which in principle sustain the judgment of the trial court. In the case of Collins v. Lean, 68 Cal. 284, 9 Pac. 173, a search warrant authorized an officer to search the person of an individual for lottery tickets. Such search failed to reveal any lottery tickets, but the room of the individual contained a package of 100 lottery tickets, which was found and seized under the search warrant. It was held that an action to recover the lottery tickets would not lie. Among other things, the court said:

> "Conceding all that the plaintiff claims as to the tickets being his property, and that he cannot be deprived of them as such without due process of law under most circumstances, yet nevertheless, it is firmly settled by the law that all rights of property are held subject to such reasonable and proper control of the mode of its keeping and use as may be deemed necessary for and in consonance with the welfare of the general public. And in the exercise of the police power vested in the Legislature under our state Constitution, certain kinds of property, when held or used so as to be injurious to the general public, may be seized and destroyed."

In the case of J. B. Mullen & Co. v. Moseley, 13 Idaho, 457, 90 Pac. 986, an action in replevin was brought to recover certain slot machines from the possession of the sheriff, and it was held on the authority of many cited cases that such an action would not lie where the subject-matter was designed and intended only for use in the commission of a criminal offense.

In the case of Stanley-Thompson Liquor Co. v. People, (1917) 63 Colo. 456, 168 Pac. 750, it was likewise held as to certain gambling devices which, prior to their seizure, had been in storage for three years, and which had never been used for the purpose for which they were manufactured or intended.

In Board of Police Commissioners v. Wagner (1901) 93 Md. 182, 48 Atl. 455, 52 L. R. A. 775, 86 Am. St. Rep. 423, it was held that replevin would not lie to recover a slot machine, even though no criminal proceedings had been instituted as against the owner thereof either before or after its seizure.

In Robertson v. Porter (1907) 1 Ga. App. 223, 57 S. E. 993, trover was instituted against the sheriff to recover the possession of "1 large oak table, with carved legs, worth $145; 1 roulette wheel, with complete appliances, worth $400; 1 bookmaker's wheel, worth $150; 1 large walnut table, worth $60; 1 long oak table, with rounded corners, worth $90; 1 round oak table, worth $25; 5,000 composition discs or chips, worth $175; 1 cribbage or faro layout, worth $25; 1 glass layout for bookmaker's wheel, worth $40; 1 long pine table, worth $12; 1 lot playing cards, worth $10; and 1 lot dice, worth $5." Although it is apparent that many of such articles might have been useful for other than gambling purposes, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover. In the course of the opinion it is said:

"Courts are created for the upholding of the law and of morals, and will therefore decline to allow their processes used to further the maintenance of crimes and public evils. The law has the right of self-defense. It will not, by its own strong arm, assist in placing into the possession of any one instrumentalities designed for no other purpose than the breaking of the law. It will not protect the owner of a house devoted to lewd purposes, as to his rents (Ralston v. Boady, 20 Ga. 449); the mistress of a lewd house, as to her contracts with the inmates (Postelle v. Rivers, 112 Ga. 850, 38 S. E. 109); unlawful assemblages, as to their common fund (Regina v. Hunt, 8 Car. & P. 642); the milk dealer, as to his milk watered in violation of law (Deems v. Baltimore, 80 Md. 164, 30 Atl. 648, 26 L. R. A. 541, 45 Am. St. Rep. 339); the 'blind tiger' keeper, as to his liquors (State v. O'Neal, 58 Vt. 162, 2 Atl. 586, 56 Am. Rep. 557); the indecent individual, as to his obscene prints and lascivious pictures; the gambler, as to his slot machine (Board of Police Com'rs v. Wagner, 52 L. R. A. 775, 93 Md. 182, 48 Atl. 455, 86 Am. St. Rep. 423), or as to his poker chips (Bales v. State, 3 W. Va. 687); the burglar, as to his kit, or the counterfeiter, as to his molds and coins (Spalding v. Preston, 21 Vt. 9, 50 Am. Dec. 68); the highwayman, as to his spoils (opinion of Lord Ellenborough, referred to on page 16 of case last cited); nor will it protect the keeper of a gaming house, as to his paraphernalia and implements of crime (Kneeland v. Connally, 70 Ga. 424)."

From a reading of those portions of the ordinance quoted herein, there can be no doubt of its applicability to the facts involved in this controversy. The finding of the court, which is sustained by the evidence, is to the effect that the slips on which were printed the so-called poems and literature were in fact but blank lottery tickets, which were seized under a search warrant and taken from the possession of the plaintiffs under the provisions of the statute section 1524, Pen. Code. Considering the purposes for which the slips were intended, the authorities are practically unanimous in announcing the doctrine that replevin (or claim and delivery) will not lie. It therefore follows that the judgment was right and should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; CURTIS, J.

68 Cal. App. 259

PEOPLE v. YBARRA. (Cr. 1073.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 29, 1924.)

1. Homicide 🔑204—Statements made in expectation of death admissible as dying declaration.

Repeated statements by deceased, who was mortally wounded, that he did not expect to recover, followed by death 11 days later from such injuries after being committed to a hospital by physician who swears he believed the patient would die, held admissible as dying declaration.

2. Homicide 🔑228(1) — Corpus delicti held sufficiently established.

In prosecution for murder, where defendant's contradictory statements were disproved by direct testimony of several eyewitnesses, evidence held sufficient to establish corpus delicti.

3. Criminal law 🔑747—Conflicting evidence as to alibi for jury.

In prosecution for murder on the defense of alibi, it was for jury to determine whether defendant had made conflicting statements, and, if so, which, together with other evidence, was true.

4. Criminal law 🔑1169(2)—Admission of evidence held harmless error, in view of other similar testimony.

In prosecution for murder, admission of testimony of deceased's family as to statements made to them by deceased, that he had identified his assailant, if error, was harmless in view of testimony by defendant and several other witnesses to same effect.

5. Criminal law 🔑1170½(1)—State's contradiction of own witness not prejudicial error, where answers favorable to defendant.

Where testimony of witness for prosecution differed at trial from that on preliminary examination, questions by state, seeking to refresh her memory, resulting in answers favorable to defendant, held not prejudicial error as an attempt to impeach her.

6. Homicide 🔑340(2)—Giving instruction inapplicable to evidence harmless.

In prosecution for murder, though there was no evidence of the use of a dangerous weapon by defendant, instruction as to the presumption arising from the use of a dangerous weapon, while inapplicable, was harmless.

7. Homicide 🔑305—Instruction as to defendant's participation in robbery resulting in death of victim justified by evidence.

In prosecution for murder committed while robbing deceased, where there was evidence that two men acting together had committed robbery, one of whom was defendant, an instruction as to responsibility of individual participants in an unlawful act which is subject of a conspiracy was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Jose Ybarra was convicted of murder in the first degree and appeals. Affirmed.

William T. Aggeler, Public Defender, Frederick H. Vercoe, and Franklin Padan, Deputy Public Defenders, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. Appellant was convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree and the penalty fixed at life imprisonment. This appeal is based principally upon alleged insufficiency of the evidence to establish the corpus delicti; also upon an alibi, and asserted errors in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence, and in the instructions to the jury.

In attempting to establish the corpus delicti, it was sought to introduce statements of the deceased, and much evidence was offered for the purpose of showing that he was impressed with the consciousness of impending death at the time they were made. The first point of appellant is that this foundation was not sufficient to permit of the introduction of the decedent's declarations as to his injuries and concerning the person or persons who had inflicted them upon him.

On Sunday, August 26, 1923, at about 9:30 in the evening, a police officer first saw Gordon McCutcheon, the decedent, in an alleyway in the city of Los Angeles, in a stooping position, as if arising to his feet; when the policeman approached he observed that McCutcheon had apparently been beaten about the face, and that there was blood on his face and on the front of his clothing. Eleven days later McCutcheon died from the injuries received at that time. The facts upon which the people relied for a foundation upon which to introduce his declarations were substantially as follows:

McCutcheon arrived at his home at about 10:30 at night. Members of his family testified that his face was badly swollen, one eye was entirely closed, and his clothing was soiled with blood. He had previously been in good health, but on this occasion he complained of his body paining him, and went to bed, where he remained until the following Wednesday; physicians were called in and visited him each day, and on Thursday, August 30, he was up and dressed and attended court; on Sunday evening, September 2, he returned to his bed, and was ordered to the hospital by his physician, who concluded it was a surgery case, though McCutcheon's temperature had been normal, pulse slightly elevated, his abdomen showed tenderness and his bowels were inactive. A surgeon who examined him at the hospital described his condition as "very bad," stating that he found evidences of strangulated bowel, and decided to operate, but that he and his consultants did not believe the man could live. On Thursday, September 6, an operation was performed, which revealed a ruptured intestine, general peritonitis—an inflamed condition of the intestines and surrounding structures and pronounced inflation. Immediately following the operation McCutcheon died. The surgeon who performed the autopsy found a gangrenous condition at the junction of the large and small bowels, and a rupture of the left side of the diaphragm, through which a large portion of the great omentum was protruding, and which had not been disclosed by the operation because it was above and not within the region then explored. It was testified that these conditions would result only from the force of great pressure, or a blow, from without.

When McCutcheon first arrived home on the night of August 26 he told his wife that he felt very badly, and then and on subsequent occasions he said: "I don't think I will be here with you long;" "I believe I am done for." He told his brother on the 27th that he did not think he would live; about three days before his death he said to his daughter: "Mary, don't go to work, I won't ever pull through with this;" for her to be a good girl, and to pray for him, that he was "going to die." She testified that, on two occasions thereafter, her father told her that he was not going to live, though she admitted that on one occasion he asked her to pray for him to get well.

[1] It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the interval between the time of the injury and the death of McCutcheon, his apparent improvement after the third day, his attendance at court, and request that his daughter pray that he might get well, all support the conclusion that, at the time of any declarations he may have made, he was not in a dying condition, and entertained such a degree of hope for recovery that he could not have believed that he was not going to recover. Statements made by a mortally wounded person, who repeatedly says that he does not expect to recover, followed by death from the identical injuries which he had in mind, after being committed to a hospital by a physician who swears that he believed the patient would die, furnish sufficient ground for the conclusion that such statements emanated from a mind impressed with the solemnity of the occasion as though under the binding force of a legal oath. This is essentially so when such facts are supported by the conditions revealed by the operation and the autopsy. According to the authorities it is the condition of the mind that governs, rather than the construction to be placed upon peculiar circumstances such as the degree of possibility that the person might, with the symptoms described, have recovered. That McCutcheon was beaten and ruptured internally, and that experienced physicians and surgeons recognized his condition as being fatal, that he repeatedly stated that he believed he must die, and that he did die from such rupture, though some days later, are facts which present as strong a case for the application of the rule admitting the statements in question as dying declarations as we have been able to find since People v. Ybarra, 17 Cal. 166, and People v. Lee, 17 Cal. 76, which are somewhat analogous to the case at bar, and are in harmony with the more recent case of People v. Cord, 157 Cal. 562, 108 Pac. 511. In the latter case it was said:

"We have no decisions in this state declaring the meaning of the phrase 'a dying person,' in section 1870 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It does not mean that in order to make such declaration admissible the person making it must be at the time in the act of expiring or in the final death struggle. It is seldom that a human being in that stage of dissolution is capable of making any statement whatsoever in the nature of a connected or reliable narrative or account of a past transaction. To admit such declarations only when made by a person in that condition would practically exclude them altogether, or render them useless for any purpose. We think the intention of the codifiers was to express, as clearly and comprehensively as was compatible with the necessary brevity, the rule on the subject of the admissibility of dying declarations as it had previously existed. By this rule it was not necessary that the person should be at the time in the throes of death, or that he should die immediately, or within any specified time thereafter, in order to give the declaration probative force. * * * It was considered that the belief that a fatal wound had been received and that death was about to ensue therefrom would deter such person from uttering a willful untruth about its cause, if not as effectively as would the sanction of an oath reinforced by the earthly penalty for its violation, at least sufficiently to justify its admission as evidence of the facts recounted. Where a person has been fatally wounded, is in sore distress therefrom, and believes that he will not recover and is soon about to die, his statement made in this belief relating to the cause of his injury is admissible, if it appears that he subsequently died from the direct effects of the wound, although he may have revived after making the statement or may have lived a considerable time thereafter, and may have again begun to hope for recovery. Such person is to be deemed 'a dying person' within the meaning of the statute from the time the wound is received until death results from the injury, and his statement during that period made in view of death and with the belief that it is near at hand, may be proven to establish the cause of death."

Objection to the introduction of the decedent's statement was therefore properly overruled. It was then related by the police officer that Mr. McCutcheon conducted him to a restaurant 175 feet from where he was found, where the latter identified the defendant, who, after being arrested, escaped and ran. The officer testified that the deceased, pointing to Ybarra, said, "that is one of the men that held me up." Members of his family stated that upon returning home he told them that a Mexican had held his hands behind him while another took about $50 from his pockets, and that they had then beaten him severely. The policeman also testified that the defendant was the man identified at the restaurant by McCutcheon, and that the defendant's hands were bloody, that there was blood on his shirt and on his sleeve; that the officer took the decedent to the receiving hospital, then returned to a house near the restaurant, where he found the defendant and placed him under arrest; he further testified that Ybarra offered to give him what money he had if he would let him go.

A lieutenant police detective by the name of Lopez testified that he questioned appellant on the day following his arrest, and that appellant told him in Spanish that he had nothing to do with the holdup, but that he ran when the officer came to arrest him because he was frightened; that the witness acted as interpreter for the district attorney at the latter's office at a later date when the appellant stated in response to questions that he met the deceased in the alley and that he took hold of him; that he got the blood on his hands in that manner and went to the restaurant to eat and to wash his hands. Upon the trial of this case the appellant testified that he first went to a picture show, on the evening of August 26th, then to a restaurant where he had a drink that crazed him; that while in the restaurant the officers came in and that one of them struck him on the nose, and that this was the cause of blood appearing on his hands and on his clothing. On the stand he denied any knowledge of being in the alley, or of having seen Mr. McCutcheon, and denied that he made the statements to which Lopez testified; on cross-examination he testified that he could not remember the theater that he had attended, or what he saw there; that when he entered the restaurant he asked the proprietress for something to eat, and that she said they did not have anything to eat, but that she placed some wine before him that was poisonous, and although he went in also to wash his hands he did not ask for water. The officer testified that he made no attempt to strike the appellant, and the woman who conducted the restaurant where he was found testified that when appellant entered and sat down she asked him what he wanted and that he said "nothing."

[2] The argument that the evidence furnishes grounds for an inference that death could have resulted from accident or natural causes, and that the corpus delicti was therefore not established in this case, is untenable for the reason that there is much evidence strongly tending to prove criminal agency, and this testimony, the statements of the decedent and of appellant, were predicated upon sufficient foundation and were properly admitted. The contradictory nature of appellant's various narrations, conflicting with the direct recitals of several eyewitnesses, fully justified, if they did not compel, the conclusion that he was not worthy of belief. His brief is prolific with quotations of authorities holding that, where it is just as reasonable to suppose that the deceased came to his death from other causes as from the hand of the accused, the corpus delicti is not established; but none of them go so far as to hold that, where all the evidence offered by the prosecution tends to prove the offense charged, the mere suggestion by the defendant of other possible theories will nullify it. Were such a rule to be recognized few criminal cases would get to the jury.

[3] What has been said also applies to the question of appellant's asserted alibi. It was within the exclusive province of the jury to determine whether he had made conflicting statements upon that point, and, if so, which, together with all the other evidence in the case, was true.

[4] Another point raised by appellant is that, regardless of the question of admissibility of other statements claimed to have been made by McCutcheon regarding the cause of his injuries, it was error on the part of the trial court to permit his family to testify that he told them he had identified one of the Mexicans who held him up, and that he was in jail. It is argued that this was not part of the res gestæ, and he quotes from People v. Cyty, 11 Cal. App. 702, 106 Pac. 257, and others cases, wherein it was held that such evidence must "be restricted to the act of the killing, and to the circumstances immediately attending it and forming a part of the res gestæ." It is said in the case at bar that the statement of decedent was a narration of a subsequent transaction, or a mere opinion of the decedent. Appellant contends that this testimony was highly prejudicial, and that the judgment should be reversed upon the authority of People v. Carkhuff, 24 Cal. 640, which held that evidence there admitted "tended to prove the presence of the defendant at the house of the deceased on the night of the murder, and that may have been the evidence that mainly satisfied the jury that he was present at that time." However, in the instant case, the correctness of the ruling of the court as to the admissibility of evidence under consideration was entirely immaterial, and had it been omitted there were four witnesses for the people who testified to the occurrences at the restaurant; the defendant himself stated that McCutcheon pointed him out at that place, and the police officer related all of the circumstances of the identification, arrest, and imprisonment of appellant. Hence, whether or not McCutcheon told his family that he had identified the defendant in the restaurant, it was not an issue, and any error in admitting testimony as to what he said in that behalf was harmless. People v. Wolff, 182 Cal. 728, 190 Pac. 22; People v. Ong Mon Foo, 182 Cal. 697, 189 Pac. 690; People v. Goodwin, 132 Cal. 368, 64 Pac. 561; People v. Sanchez, 23 Cal. App. 743, 139 Pac. 820.

[5] Again it is objected that respondent was permitted to impeach certain of its own witnesses, and that this was prejudicial error. The only instance we find that is worthy of notice, and to which objection was interposed, was the submission to the witness Godoe when she testified at the trial of a portion of her testimony given at the preliminary examination. The report of her former testimony contained the statement that she saw blood on the appellant's face when he entered her restaurant; but she testified at the trial that she saw only dirt upon his face. The prosecution being surprised sought to refresh her memory, and she testified that they must have misunderstood her at the preliminary, because she did not know about any blood being on his face, that it was dirt. This was not an attempt to impeach her, but it brought forth testimony favorable to the appellant, and in any event would not constitute prejudicial error. People v. Glover, 141 Cal. 233, 243, 74 Pac. 745; People v. Casselman, 10 Cal. App. 234, 101 Pac. 693.

[6] The court below instructed the jury that—

> "A person must be presumed to intend to do that which he voluntarily and willfully does in fact do, and must also be presumed to intend all the natural, probable, and usual consequences of his own acts. Therefore, when one person assails another violently with a dangerous weapon, likely to kill, and which in fact does destroy the life of the party assailed, the natural presumption is that such assailant intended death, or other great bodily harm, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary this presumption must prevail."

Appellant contends that there was no evidence of his having used a dangerous weapon, and that this instruction led the jury to believe that he did, in fact, assail the deceased with a dangerous weapon. It is conceded by respondent that there was no evidence as to any weapon, but as was said in People v. March, 6 Cal. 543, 547:

> "There is no evidence in the record upon which to base the instruction, or to show its relevancy, and we have before decided that we would not disturb a judgment of the court below on account of an erroneous instruction, which was not applicable to the facts of the case. [See People v. Roberts, ante, 214.]"

The same ruling was made in People v. Dole, 5 Cal. Unrep. 934, 51 Pac. 945. In People v. Methever, 132 Cal. 326, 64 Pac. 481, it was held that where there was no evidence that the defendant charged with murder was drunk at the time the crime was committed, an instruction as to the effect of drunkenness, while unnecessary, was not prejudicial.

[7] The jury were also instructed as to the responsibility of individual participants in an unlawful act which is the subject of a conspiracy, and appellant asserts that he was prejudiced thereby, since there was no evidence of this offense having been committed as a result of a conspiracy. The evidence discloses that decedent had said that two Mexicans held him up; he pointed out the defendant to the officers, saying to them, "That is one of the Mexicans that held me up," but there is no evidence as to which of the men struck him. This was some evidence that two men acting together had committed the robbery of McCutcheon, when he was injured.

It was purely a question for the jury to determine whether he was held up, whether two persons committed the offense, and, if so, whether or not the defendant took such active part as to be guilty of the battery which caused McCutcheon's death, even though he did not actually commit the assault.

> "The general rule is well settled that where several parties conspire or combine together to commit any unlawful act, each is criminally responsible for the acts of his associates or confederates committed in furtherance of any prosecution of the common design for which they combine. * * * But whether or not the act committed was the ordinary and probable effect of the common design or whether it was a fresh and independent product of the mind of one of the conspirators, outside of, or foreign to, the common design, is a question of fact for the jury." People v. Kauffman, 152 Cal. 331, 92 Pac. 861.

The jury in the instant case were instructed in the exact language of the opinion above quoted, and an instruction requested by the defendant was also given, that "it must appear from the evidence and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant and not some one else committed the offense charged," and that "to warrant a conviction of the defendant he must be proven to be guilty clearly and conclusively beyond all reasonable doubt, so that there is no reasonable theory upon which he can be innocent when all of the case is taken together." Upon the record before us, we think that the instructions fully and fairly presented the law of the case and were proper.

The only remaining points raised relate to instructions given which under various rulings have been approved, or to the refusal to give requested instructions which were covered by others already given. It is not necessary to review them here. After careful consideration of the entire record, we are satisfied that no prejudicial error is contained therein, and the judgment and order denying the motion for new trial are affirmed.

MASON v. STRAUBE et al. (Civ. 4759.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Aug. 1, 1924.)

Appeal and error ⚿628(2)—Reporter's failure to file transcript on time held not jurisdictional.

Appellant having done all that was required to perfect his appeal, mere failure of the reporter to file the transcript within statutory 20-day limit did not require dismissal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by Leslie R. Mason against William C. Straube and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Motion to dismiss appeal denied.

Walter Gould Lincoln, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fred Aberle, Jr., of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. Respondent herein obtained judgment against appellant and his codefendant upon a promissory note January 7, 1924, which judgment was entered January 25, 1924, and on the 2d day of February, 1924, notice of appeal, with bond and notice for reporter's transcript under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, were filed. The stenographic reporter did not furnish the transcript until on or about the 15th day of May, 1924, and thereafter and on May 29th it was delivered to appellant's counsel. On May 31st appellant served upon counsel for respondent notice of intention to settle said transcript in the superior court; but previously thereto and on May 24th notice of motion to dismiss the appeal was filed in this court by respondent, upon the ground that said appeal being taken under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, but 20 days were allowed the reporter for filing the transcript, and that 58 days having elapsed from the date of the notice of appeal, the time limited by said section had expired.

It is shown by the records of the trial court that appellant duly served notice of appeal and filed his order for the reporter's transcript, and that as soon as said transcript became available he notified respondent of his intention to settle the same within the time required by the statute; and the transcript was settled by the court below on June 5, 1924.

It is obvious that appellant was not at fault, and the question presented having heretofore been decided, it is not necessary for us to discuss it at length. Smith v. Jaccard, 20 Cal. App. 280, 128 Pac. 1023, 1026, held that none of the requirements of said section as applied to officials was jurisdictional to the appeal, saying:

⚿For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

> "Neither in the statute nor in the rules of the court is any penalty prescribed for the failure of the reporter to file such transcript within 20 days. We think it perfectly clear that the provision as to the time for filing such transcript is merely directory, and the failure of the reporter to file such transcript within the time allowed is not jurisdictional. It is doubtless the duty of the appellant, as the moving party, to take the necessary steps to secure the filing of such transcript, and for want of diligence in such matter on his part it is within the power of the trial court to terminate his proceedings for procuring such transcript. The determination of the question as to whether or not there has been due diligence in such matter is one largely lying in the discretion of the trial court, with which the appellate court will not interfere unless it appears that the court in its action has abused its discretion."

In the case last mentioned 48 days had elapsed when notice of motion to terminate the proceedings was given. In Fisher v. Oliver, 174 Cal. 781, 164 Pac. 800, about 60 days elapsed on account of delays caused by the reporter and the clerk, but the Supreme Court in denying a motion to dismiss said:

> "Respondent's contention in this regard is fully answered by Smith v. Jaccard, 20 Cal. App. 280, 128 Pac. 1023, 1026."

The motion to dismiss this appeal is denied.

LONG v. CHRONICLE PUB. CO. (Civ. 4192.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 18, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 15, 1924.)

1. Specific performance 🔑114(1)—Complaint for recovery of prize offered in newspaper subscription contest held sufficient as against general demurrer.

In action by contestant, in newspaper subscription contest, to compel judges to award her second instead of third prize, complaint held sufficient as against general demurrer.

2. Pleading 🔑343—Pleadings held to raise issues making proper refusal of judgment on pleadings.

In action for recovery of prize offered in newspaper subscription contest, pleadings held to raise issues requiring introduction of evidence in substantiation thereof, so that defendant's motion for judgment on pleadings was properly denied.

3. Trial 🔑165—Rule stated for construing evidence on motion for nonsuit.

On motion for nonsuit, evidence must be construed most favorably to plaintiff, and whatever, so construed, it tends to prove, together with such presumptions and inferences as may be reasonably drawn therefrom, must be regarded as proven.

4. Contracts 🔑248—Question of notice of change in terms of newspaper subscription contest held for jury.

In action to recover prize offered in newspaper subscription contest, question as to whether plaintiff in last week of contest had been notified of change in method of paying subscriptions held for jury.

5. Contracts 🔑238(1)—Contestant in newspaper subscription contest held entitled to personal notice of change in rules of contest.

Where printed rules of newspaper subscription contest, promoted by defendant's newspaper published in small city, provided that they might be amended, held that notice of change in rules published in newspaper was not binding on contestant not reading it, personal notice being required, notwithstanding Civ. Code, §§ 18, 19.

6. Notice 🔑10—Statute or contract requiring notice, without specifying manner of giving it, contemplates personal service.

Statute or contract which requires that notice be given, but which is silent as to manner of giving it, contemplates personal service thereof.

7. Contracts 🔑284(4)—Judges of newspaper subscription contest held not empowered to conclusively determine effect of published notice of change in rules.

That rules of newspaper subscription contest provided that, on any disputed question decision of management would be final, did not enable either management or judges of contest to declare that contestant, who was entitled to personal notice of change in rules, was bound by notice published in newspaper.

8. Contracts 🔑127(1)—Stipulation making judgment of one party on questions of law growing out of contract, conclusive invalid.

Party cannot even by express terms provide in advance of any controversy that his judgment of the law, regarding any question which may arise, shall preclude the other party from contesting same in court.

9. Contracts 🔑284(4)—Judges of newspaper subscription contest held not empowered to finally determine questions of law.

Where rules of newspaper subscription contest provided that management would have final decision of disputed questions, and also that contest should be under supervision of "judges from advisory board," held that judges selected by newspaper and, so far as shown, not in accordance with rules nor constituting management, could not bind contestant on questions of law.

10. Contracts 🔑238(1)—Waiver of compliance with terms of newspaper subscription contest held shown.

Where checks turned in by contestant in newspaper subscription contest were cashed by defendant newspaper and proceeds retained, held that defendant could not complain of noncompliance with rule of which contestant had no notice published in last stages of contest, requiring payment of subscriptions in cash or certified checks.

11. Appeal and error 🔑1046(5)—Overruling motion for directed verdict in presence of jury held not prejudicial to movant.

Court's answer in presence of jury to counsel's announcement that he desired to ask for directed verdict, and requesting discharge of jury for that purpose, "I will overrule it," held not prejudicial, since jury, when called back, would know that motion had been denied.

12. Appeal and error 🔑1069(3)—Oral instruction after retirement of jury as to amount of recovery held not prejudicial.

In action to recover value of automobile offered as prize in newspaper subscription contest, oral instruction after retirement of jury that, if they found for plaintiff, they must find for her in value of automobile as admitted in answer or nothing, held not prejudicial to defendant.

13. Appeal and error 🔑1058(2)—Exclusion of testimony on cross-examination held not prejudicial error in view of other testimony of witness.

In action to enforce terms of newspaper subscription contest, refusal to permit plaintiff on cross-examination to testify to matters material on question of notice of change in rules of contest held not prejudicial, defendant from subsequent answers of witness obtaining substantially what he sought.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Action for specific performance by Marjory Long against the Chronicle Publishing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Myers, C. J., dissenting.

Patrick J. Cooney, of Los Angeles (Alfred Blaisdell, of Calexico, of counsel), for appellant.

Charles L. Childers, of El Centro, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. [1, 2] This action was brought by plaintiff against the defendant for the value of an automobile alleged to be the sum of $1,995, which was offered by the defendant as a second prize in a newspaper subscription contest.

The facts may be briefly stated as follows: The defendant published in its newspaper a general offer by which it agreed to give certain designated prizes to the winners of a subscription contest, and provided rules governing same, among which were provisions to the effect that "cash must accompany all orders"; that the contest would be under the personal supervision of two or more judges "from the advisory board"; that the right to amend the rules was reserved to the defendant; that, should any question with reference to the contest arise, the decision of the management would be absolute and final; and that each of the contestants agreed to abide by all of the foregoing conditions.

From the start, the rule requiring that cash should accompany all orders was waived by the defendant, and, until the last week of the contest, personal checks were received in payment of subscriptions. The contest lasted for a period of about eight weeks, and on the beginning of the last week thereof the defendant published in its newspaper a notice as follows:

> "Important Notice.
> "All subscriptions deposited in the sealed ballot box must be accompanied by cash, money order, or certified check for the full amount to cover. Personal checks up to $10.00 are acceptable, providing no two checks are signed by the same party. This rule is made in fairness to all candidates and will be strictly adhered to."

At some time during the evening of the last day of the contest, plaintiff deposited with the defendant an uncertified check for $30, and another uncertified check for $18, to cover certain subscriptions obtained by plaintiff, which checks were cashed and the money received therefor was retained by the defendant. When the judges of the contest made an accounting for the several contestants it was found that, by giving plaintiff credit for the subscriptions covered by the two uncertified checks, aggregating $48, she would be entitled to the second prize, which was an automobile of the stipulated value of $1,995; otherwise she would be entitled only to the third prize, which was of the value of $500. The conclusion by the judges of the contest was that plaintiff was entitled only to the latter prize. Plaintiff was dissatisfied with such determination, and brought this action. The case was tried before the court sitting with a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $1,995, on which judgment was entered; and the defendant appeals therefrom.

The defendant demurred generally to the amended complaint, which set up in substance at least all the foregoing facts, with the exception of the "Important Notice," which was published at the beginning of the last week of the contest. The demurrer was overruled. The defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings was likewise denied; and it is to such rulings that the defendant first directs attention of this court as a reason for a reversal of the judgment.

As the amended complaint was drawn, no mention was made of the requirement contained in the "Important Notice" that either cash, money order, or a certified check must accompany the subscriptions. The allegations of the amended complaint showed that the duty only of counting the votes correctly was assumed by the judges of the contest; and it was alleged that, had the judges properly given plaintiff credit, she would have received a sufficient number of votes to entitle her to the second prize, of the value of $1,995. The answer to the amended complaint, in addition to certain admissions of facts set up in the amended complaint and the denial of certain other allegations therein, contained an affirmative defense based upon the "Important Notice," together with the alleged finality of the decision by the judges of the contest—all of which being deemed denied by plaintiff, raised issues thereon requiring the introduction of evidence in substantiation thereof. In such circumstances no error was committed by the trial court in denying the defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings; and we think that the court did not err in overruling the demurrer to the amended complaint.

[3] Appellant next complains that the trial court erred in denying the defendant's motion for a nonsuit, as well as in denying the defendant's motion for a directed verdict.

On a motion for nonsuit it is a cardinal rule that the evidence must receive a construction most favorable to the plaintiff, and whatever the evidence so construed tends to prove, together with such presumptions and inferences as may be reasonably drawn therefrom, must be regarded by the court as in fact proven. Ferris v. Baker, 127 Cal. 520, 59 Pac. 937, and cases cited; Union Construction Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co., 163 Cal. 298, 125 Pac. 242.

A review of the record on appeal discloses the fact that the evidence introduced in behalf of plaintiff supported the allegations of the amended complaint. In addition thereto, however, plaintiff caused to be introduced in evidence the "Important Notice" pleaded by the defendant. But in view of the fact that plaintiff did not show either actual or constructive service thereof on herself, the injection of the "Important Notice" into plaintiff's case was of no great consequence. The motion for nonsuit was therefore properly denied.

[4] Regarding the motion for a directed verdict, it need only be said that the evidence with reference to the service of the "Important Notice" on plaintiff, or the knowledge of plaintiff acquired either by actual or by constructive notice of the contents of the "Important Notice," was conflicting. The defense depended primarily upon a decision of the fact as to whether or not plaintiff had been notified by the defendant that, during the last week of the contest, only such subscriptions as were covered by either cash or by money orders or by certified checks would be credited to the several contestants. The question of fact was one for determination by the jury, and the judge of the trial court would not have been authorized to withdraw such question from the consideration of the jury.

The contract between the parties provided in substance, among other things, that the rules governing the contest might be changed, and that, in the event of any question arising, the decision of "the management" would be absolute and final. Although the wording of the contract is not clear, throughout the trial it was assumed by both parties to the action that "the management" referred to the judges of the contest. For present purposes, it may therefore be here assumed that, if plaintiff had had notice of the change in the rules to which reference has just been had, the ruling by the judges of the contest against plaintiff's contention, in the absence of fraud (assuming further that the judges had power and jurisdiction in the premises), would have precluded plaintiff from successfully contesting such conclusion. Such is the effect of one of the instructions given by the court to the jury.

[5] By another instruction, which constitutes one of appellant's principal reasons for urging a reversal herein, the jury was told that actual notice to plaintiff was required as to any change in the rules, from which it would follow that defendant's attempted notice to plaintiff by the publication of the "Important Notice" in its newspaper would have no binding effect upon plaintiff. It is claimed that, because plaintiff first acquired knowledge of the proposed subscription contest from the defendant's newspaper, and because the printed rules of the contest provided that such rules might be amended, plaintiff was bound to take notice of any amendment to the rules which thereafter might be published in the newspaper in which the original offer appeared. Section 18 of the Civil Code provides that actual notice consists in express information of a fact, and that constructive notice is that which is imputed by law. By section 19 of the Civil Code it is provided that:

> "Every person who has had actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to a particular fact, has constructive notice of the fact itself in all cases in which, by prosecuting such inquiry, he might have learned such fact."

It is therefore urged that, if plaintiff had actual notice of the fact that the rules were likely to be amended, she was placed in possession of such facts and circumstances as would put her upon inquiry as to when, if at all, and if altered, in what respect, they were amended. The original rules contained neither an express declaration, nor anything from which it might reasonably be inferred, that any contestant for a prize under the subscription contest was either obliged or was expected to read possibly the whole of each and every edition of the newspaper thereafter published for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not any of the rules of the contest had been either modified or abandoned. Necessarily, from the nature of the enterprize, the several contestants would be required to be in constant touch with the management of the newspaper, during the time that the contest was in progress. The relationship between the parties, considering the population of the city (a city of the sixth class) wherein the newspaper was published, and the surrounding circumstances, would be of a very close personal nature. The contestants were not so numerous but that if any changes in the rules of the contest were either contemplated, or had been made by the management, the most natural thing to have been anticipated by each of the parties to the contract would have been an actual notification thereof, rather than the impersonal method of publication in a newspaper.

[6] A statute requiring that a notice shall be given, but which is silent as to the manner of giving such notice, contemplates personal service thereof. 29 Cyc. 1119. It is said in the case of Stockton Automobile Co. v. Confer, 154 Cal. 408, 97 Pac. 884:

> "It may be broadly stated that where a statute or contract requires the giving of notice, and there is nothing in the context, or in the circumstances of the case, to show that any other form of notice was intended, personal notice will be required. 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 53, and cases. This is true, because the law always favors a personal notice, and countenances substituted and constructive notices as matters of necessity or extreme expediency. But the principle is not that personal notice must always be given, but that it must be given where, from the nature of the statute or contract—from the nature of the case in short—it appears that no other notice is contemplated."

With reference to newspaper notices, the following statement of the law occurs in 21 American & English Encyclopedia of Law, page 586:

> "A notice, advertisement, or other statement published in a newspaper, if not made pursuant to some statute or judicial order so as to have the legal operation of notice regardless of want of actual knowledge by the person to be charged, does not of itself afford implied or constructive notice to a person who is a subscriber to or habitual reader of that newspaper. In order to charge such person with notice of the fact or statement published it must be proved that he actually read it; in other words, actual notice must be shown."

In the instant case, plaintiff testified that she was not personally notified of the change in the rule to which reference has been had, nor did she see or read the "Important Notice" published by the defendant in its newspaper; and, although there was a conflict in the evidence with reference to personal notification of plaintiff by defendant's manager to the effect that the rule had been modified so as to require cash or a money order or a certified check to accompany each subscription to the newspaper, the verdict by the jury in favor of plaintiff constitutes a finding in plaintiff's favor as to such disputed fact.

The bald effect of the legal proposition as advanced by the appellant is that defendant laid down certain conditions, which plaintiff was at liberty to either accept or to reject, as she saw fit; and thereafter, assuming plaintiff's acceptance, the defendant had the right to modify the terms of the contract in any way it chose, whether lawful or unlawful, and which modification might either seriously impair or entirely destroy plaintiff's rights theretofore acquired by her under the terms of the contract; and, notwithstanding which, the decision by the defendant or its chosen representatives regarding plaintiff's rights in the premises would be "absolute and final."

[7] While the rules provide that, "The Chronicle guarantees fair and impartial treatment to all candidates, but should any question arise the decision of the management will be absolute and final;" and, while no question is apparently raised regarding the power of the judges of the contest, as distinguished from the "management" to supervise the contest and to determine to whom the several prizes should be awarded, nevertheless, the authority of the "management" or of the judges of the contest could not be so used as to deprive plaintiff of her legal rights. Assuming that the judges of the contest acted in the highest good faith with reference to their determination of the facts relative to plaintiff's rights in the premises, they possessed no authority to decree that plaintiff should not have that to which she was legally entitled. For the judges to be enabled to declare that by reason of the "Important Notice" having been published in the newspaper, plaintiff was obliged to comply with the terms thereof, whether she ever saw the notice or not, would be to empower the judges to determine the case against plaintiff contrary to the law. If she received no personal notice of the change in the rules (and the jury so found on the evidence), neither the defendant nor its "management" could rightfully take away from her that which she had earned under the terms of the contract, even though the defendant had contemplated by another provision of the contract to make the decision of the "management * * * absolute and final."

[8] It certainly cannot be lawful for one party to a contract, even by express terms thereof, to provide, in advance of any controversy growing out of the contract, that his judgment of the law regarding any question which may arise shall preclude the other party to the contract from contesting the same in a court of law or equity.

[9] In this case, the newspaper was owned by a corporation; and Mr. Perrin, who was the president and manager of the corporation, had absolute control thereof. It was he who selected the judges of the contest. Plaintiff was not consulted with reference thereto, nor did she have any voice in their selection. The substance of the contract is that the newspaper said to plaintiff and to the other contestants that it would treat them all fairly, but that, if any contestant thought he had a grievance of any sort, whether of fact or law, or both fact and law, "the decision of the management will be absolute and final." By "the management" plaintiff may have understood that the manager of the newspaper, or the campaign manager of the contest (Mr. Stott), was intended. However, it is stated in another part of the rules of the contest that "to insure absolute fairness in the awarding of prizes, the race will be brought to a close under 'sealed ballot box' system, and will be under the personal supervision of two or more judges from the Advisory Board." What the "advisory board" was, or of whom it consisted, or whether it had any existence in fact, is not shown either in the rules of the contest or in the evidence taken at the trial. Neither does it appear that the judges were selected from any board, whether advisory or otherwise. At any rate, the judges of the contest who were to settle any controversy, whether of fact or of law, or both of them combined, which might arise as between any of the contestants and the defendant, were to be "hand picked" solely by the defendant. The tribunal, if it may be so called, was entirely one-sided. It was as though the defendant's manager had constituted himself the sole judge of all questions which might arise in the matter, whether of law or of fact, with the provision that from his decision upon all such questions there should be no appeal. But the rules do not contain such a statement either in substance or in effect. The provision with reference to the judges is that "the race * * * will be made under the supervision of two or more judges from the advisory board"; that is, that the judges should have a general oversight of, or superintendency over, or right of inspection of, the contest. There is nothing to show that the judges were selected according to the terms of the contract, nor that they constituted the "management" as provided by the rules; and, consequently, even conceding the right of some judges, under proper circumstances, to decide the controversy, no authority or jurisdiction is shown in the judges who did decide it. It may be admitted that an arbitration board, legally selected, would have possessed power and jurisdiction, but here was a board selected by one of the parties to the controversy from an unknown source, and, so far as disclosed, not in accordance with the rules of the contract, deciding not merely questions of fact, but questions of law as well. The judges may have done their best, but their decision should not be binding upon plaintiff.

[10] The evidence does not show that the two checks aggregating the sum of $48 were returned or offered to be returned to plaintiff to be dealt with by her as she might desire. But, to the contrary, the defendant at all times retained those checks in its possession during the pendency of the controversy between plaintiff and the defendant, cashed the two checks, and appropriated the money so received to its own use; thus establishing the fact that the two checks, from a money standpoint, were not only satisfactory to the defendant, but that they were in all respects the equivalent of "cash, money order, or certified check," required by the "Important Notice." The defendant received exactly the same benefit from the two checks as it would have received had cash been deposited in lieu of the checks. In the circumstances, no money or property loss of any sort could have ensued to the defendant or to any of the other persons interested in the contest by reason of the two checks being considered as identical with so much cash.

On the other hand, the defendant having accepted the two checks, and having received the cash represented thereby, and being financially benefited to that extent, was in no position to urge compliance with the belated rule of which plaintiff had neither actual nor constructive notice.

From what has been said herein, it follows that no error was committed by the trial court in instructing the jury concerning the subject of notice, to the effect that plaintiff was entitled to actual notice regarding any change in the rules governing the contest.

[11] Appellant complains of error on the part of the court arising out of the fact that, after all the evidence in the case had been introduced and counsel for the defendant had declared in open court that after the jury should be excused he desired to make a motion for a directed verdict, the judge, in the presence of the jury, stated "I will overrule it" (referring to counsel's proposed motion). But it is apparent that, considering the fact that the jury was present when counsel for defendant made the motion, whether present or not when the motion was ruled upon by the court would make no difference, for the reason that, if the jury had been excused from the courtroom at the time the ruling was actually announced by the court, upon the return of the jury to the courtroom, and the jury being thereafter permitted to continue with its consideration of the case, would have indicated to the mind of any member of the jury, who thought about the matter at all, that the motion had been denied; and, accordingly, the same result would have been reached.

[12] Appellant makes further complaint of the action of the court in orally advising the jury, after its retirement from the courtroom at the close of the trial and upon its subsequent return thereto for the purpose of procuring further instructions from the court, that the jury must find for plaintiff either in the sum of $1,995, or nothing. At the time referred to, the reporter's transcript shows that the following occurred:

> "The court: Gentlemen of the jury, the bailiff of the court said you wanted to see the court for some purpose.
> "Juror: Your honor, we wish to ask you whether it is under the jurisdiction of the jury to set any other amount besides the supposed value of the car at that time, which as we understand was $1,995.
> "The court: That is the amount that is admitted in the answer as the approximate value of the car.
> "Mr. Cooney (attorney for the defendant): Yes, sir.
> "The court: You can't take into consideration what some one thinks about the value of the cars.
> "Juror: It would have to be that or nothing.
> "The court: Either that for the plaintiff or nothing.
> "Juror: We wanted to be sure it read that way.
> "Mr. Childers (attorney for plaintiff): She is entitled to $500 in any event. The pleadings show she was entitled to and was tendered $500, and they still tender it to her. The pleadings say that. She isn't entitled to $500 and the automobile both.
> "Juror: Have we got any right, your honor, to make a fifty-fifty proposition of those damages?
> "The court: No.
> "Juror: Then she has got to have an automobile, and that is the way of it."

By the answer of the defendant, it was specifically admitted that the value of the automobile in question was the sum of $1,995. Such being the case, the question of value of the automobile was not one for the jury to determine. From a consideration of the conversation which took place among the members of the jury, the court and counsel representing the respective parties to the action, it is apparent that the jury wished to compromise the matter by returning a verdict that the automobile was worth less than the value thereof as admitted by the defendant; or, in the words of one of the jurors, "to make a fifty-fifty proposition of those damages." Under the pleadings in the case and as a matter of law, plaintiff was entitled either to a verdict for $1,995 or nothing, with the exception that she might in any event be entitled to a verdict for $500, representing the third prize in the contest. But it is clear that no question existed in the minds of the members of the jury respecting the third prize. The questions by the jury indicated that the jury was considering solely its right to find for plaintiff and then "to set any other amount besides the supposed value of the car at that time, which as we understand was $1,995." Considering the circumstances, we think no prejudicial error was committed by the court in connection therewith.

[13] It is finally urged by appellant that the trial court erred in refusing to permit plaintiff to testify on cross-examination by counsel for the defendant as to how much money and how many checks for subscriptions were "turned in" by her on the last week of the contest. It is not difficult to understand that such evidence was material, in that it might have been used as a basis for determining whether or not plaintiff had followed the rule requiring either "cash, money order, or certified check" on all other occasions during the period that the rule was enforced, and ultimately going to the point of plaintiff's knowledge of the rule. But it appears from the record that, immediately preceding the question with reference to how much of the subscriptions was paid in cash, plaintiff had testified that she had handed in a great number of subscriptions during the last week of the contest. Immediately following the question to which such objection was made plaintiff was asked:

> "Q. Was the balance of the money representing the subscriptions over and above these two checks in cash? A. Yes, sir; I think they were."

It therefore is apparent that, with the exception of the two checks in question, cash was paid for all such subscriptions, and, consequently, that defendant obtained everything which it sought, other than an answer to the question of the amount of cash which was "handed in" by the plaintiff; and as to the refusal of the court to permit the witness to testify thereto, we are unable to perceive any prejudicial error.

The judgment is affirmed.

I concur: CONREY, P. J.

CURTIS, J. I concur. Plaintiff had actual notice of the right reserved by defendant to amend the rules of the contest. She also, in my opinion, had actual notice that all rules of the contest, including any amendment thereof, would be published in the newspaper conducted by defendant. As a prudent person, I think she was put upon inquiry as to what amendments, if any, might be made and published. She therefore had constructive notices of all amendments made by the defendant and published in its paper, including the "Important Notice." Having constructive notice of the amendment she was bound thereby. The defendant, however, in cashing her checks, uncertified, and appropriating the money received thereon to its own use, waived the rule requiring that all checks accompanying subscriptions be certified. The plaintiff was therefore entitled to credit for the subscriptions covered by the two uncertified checks.

SCELLARS et ux. v. UNIVERSAL SERVICE EVERYWHERE et al. (Civ. 3956.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 26, 1924. Rehearing Denied Aug. 27, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 25, 1924.)

1. Negligence 🔑121(2) — Res ipsa loquitur only applicable to person having control and management.

In order for maxim "res ipsa loquitur," to apply, person sought to be held liable must have had control and management of thing causing injury.

2. Negligence 🔑121(2)—"Res ipsa loquitur" defined.

"Res ipsa loquitur" means thing or affair speaks for itself, and so speaking authorizes inference of negligence in absence of showing to contrary.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Res Ipsa Loquitur.]

3. Bailment 🔑31(1)—Where automobile found damaged after washing, held under circumstances that doctrine of res ipsa loquitur not applicable.

Where automobile intrusted to defendant for washing was, for that purpose, driven up an incline 20 feet long to level surface 40 inches above ground, and afterwards was found to be damaged, and there was no showing of negligence aside from accident except testimony that high motor speed could cause the damage, doctrine of res ipsa loquitur was not applicable.

4. Negligence 🔑121(2)—"Res ipsa loquitur" inapplicable when cause of damage is mere surmise.

Where it is a matter of surmise only that damage was due to a cause for which defendant is liable, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is inapplicable.

5. Negligence 🔑121(2) — Res ipsa loquitur avoidable by proof.

Even if case is proper for application of doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, defendant is not prevented from avoiding its effect by affirmative proof that it had been in nowise negligent in managing object of which it had control.

6. Negligence 🔑121(2) — Burden of proof where res ipsa loquitur applies.

Where maxim, "res ipsa loquitur," applies, plaintiff is not relieved from burden of proof generally required in damage suits, and defendant need only meet plaintiff's proof by evidence of equal weight.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Louis W. Scellars and wife against the Universal Service Everywhere, a corporation, and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Lawlor and Richards, JJ., dissenting.

Ray L. Chesebro, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

George S. Hupp, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. The defendant corporation appeals from a judgment for damages and from the order denying its motion for a new trial, upon the ground of insufficiency of evidence to sustain the findings and judgment of the trial court.

Appellant conducted an automobile washing and cleaning business in the city of Los Angeles, and on May 27, 1920, respondent drove his Cadillac automobile from his residence to appellant's stand, a distance of about 10 blocks, where he delivered it to one Carr, an employee of appellant, and ordered it washed. Respondent returned in about 2 hours for the car, when he was told by said employee that it was broken. Carr handed respondent a small "wrist pin," which he stated that he had found in the pan underneath the machine, and upon investigation by an expert it was found that the crank case was broken in 3 places; that the connecting rod had broken and gone down inside, tearing out the rocker plate around the cam shaft, necessitating repairs which cost $738.78. It was alleged in the complaint that, prior to said washing, the machine was of the reasonable market value of $4,300, and that, while in possession of defendants, the latter so carelessly, negligently, and unskillfully handled and managed the same that it was damaged to the extent of $2,800. The answer specifically denied each material allegation of the complaint.

The appellant maintained an elevated rack upon which automobiles were driven up an incline about 20 feet long, to the level surface, which was 40 inches above the ground. Carr testified that respondent's machine stood about 25 feet from the incline, and that he placed the machine in low gear and drove it to the top, whereupon he heard a click, then a dull thud or "bang," when he immediately shut it off at the switch and threw it out of gear; that the car was then pushed along on the rack by hand and washed. He further testified that he did not at any time have the car in high gear, and did not race the motor, and that the clutch did not slip; that he had operated nearly all makes of automobiles, and was familiar with and had operated Cadillacs; that he did not do anything unusual in the handling or management of this particular machine, and "did not know what was the matter with the motor" when it stopped.

Respondent testified that the car was purchased by him in the fall of 1917, and that he had driven it about 20,000 miles, but had had it inspected and gone over monthly, and that, when he left it at the rack, it was apparently in good condition. Experts called as witnesses for respondent testified that, when the car was taken down, broken parts were found in the bottom of the crank case; that high motor speed could cause the damage which occurred in this instance, one witness saying, "Different things that I know could cause it;" that defective parts or crystallization of metal would cause it to break, and, in fact, that a defective part might have started the breaking, but that he did not know what did it; neither the respondent nor any witness in the case knew the condition before the accident of the parts involved.

Upon the evidence above outlined the court found that "the defendant so carelessly, negligently, and unskillfully handled and managed the same, and particularly by racing and running the engine thereof at excessive speed that the engine thereof was damaged and broken," as alleged in the complaint.

The respondents relied upon the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. Appellant's contention is that there was not such a preponderance of the evidence in favor of plaintiffs' claim that Carr caused the damage by racing the motor as would justify the rendition of a judgment upon that theory.

[1, 2] The cause of the injury in this case is undetermined. It may have been one over which the defendant had control, and it might have been one with which he had nothing to do. In order that the maxim, "res ipsa loquitur," may apply, it must first be shown that the person held liable had control and management of the thing in question. O'Connor v. Mennie, 169 Cal. 217, 146 Pac. 674. This maxim means:

> "'The thing, or affair, speaks for itself,' and, so speaking, authorizes the inference of negligence in the absence of a showing to the contrary." O'Connor v. Mennie, supra.

In the same opinion it is said:

> "Of course, to justify its application in any case, the circumstances of the accident must be such as, unexplained, afford reasonable evidence of want of care in a respect for which the defendant is liable in the particular action."

[3, 4] In the instant case, aside from the occurrence of the accident, there is no further showing of negligence on the part of the defendant except the testimony above referred to that high motor speed could cause the damage which resulted. To hold the defendant liable under these circumstances would be to merely conjecture that he had conducted himself negligently, and thus caused the injury. Where it is a matter of surmise only that the damage was due to a cause for which the defendant is liable, the doctrine is inapplicable. O'Connor v. Mennie, supra. For this reason we are of the opinion that the evidence in the case before us was insufficient to establish negligence of the appellant, or to render applicable the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. Besides, by respondents' own showing, the injury might have occurred as the result of other causes than racing or running the engine at an excessive speed, as defective parts or metallic crystallization, and such other causes must have been those over which the defendant had no control. It has been held in a case arising in this jurisdiction that:

> "The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur involves an exception to the general rule that negligence must be affirmatively shown, and is not to be inferred, and the doctrine is to be applied only when the nature of the accident itself, not only supports the inference of the defendant's negligence, but excludes all others." Lucid v. E. I. Du Pont, De Nemours Powder Co., 199 Fed. 377, 118 C. C. A. 61, L. R. A. 1917E, 182.

[5] And also we may say as the court did in Maryland Casualty Co. v. Matson Nav. Co., 177 Cal. 610, 613, 171 Pac. 427:

> "But conceding, without determining, that this is a proper case for the application of this principle, and that the plaintiff would have had a right to rely upon it, as affording a prima facie showing of negligence, still the defendants would not be prevented from avoiding its application and effect by affirmative proof that it had been in no wise negligent" in managing the object of which it had control.

The evidence not only wholly failed to show a want of due care on the part of appellant's agent, but it affirmatively establishes without attempted contradiction that the condition and the maintenance of the part or parts of respondents' car which broke were matters with which appellant could have had no possible concern. And the appellant produced direct, positive and undisputed testimony that the engine was not raced, as the court found.

[6] In cases where the maxim "res ipsa loquitur," is applicable, the plaintiff is not relieved from the burden of proof generally required in suits for damages; the defendant need only meet plaintiff's proof by evidence of equal weight. Rathbun v. White, 157 Cal. 248, 107 Pac. 309; Cody v. Market St. Ry. Co., 148 Cal. 90, 82 Pac. 666. As conceded by respondents, "Carr was the only person who could tell what did happen," and we have his positive testimony that he did not operate the motor at a high rate of speed; but we also have the testimony of respondents' own witnesses to the effect that there are other causes which will produce the same result, and no one testified that he saw any of the parts before the accident, or that they were not defective.

The judgment and order denying motion for new trial are reversed.

DUNN v. DUFFICY. (S. F. 10462.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 10, 1924.)

1. Physicians and surgeons 🔑18(4) — Complaint for malpractice held to sufficiently allege negligence as against general demurrer.

Complaint that defendant neglected to ascertain by use of ordinary care and skill that a tendon was severed, and that he carelessly and unskillfully failed to sew up tendon under plaintiff's finger, held sufficient allegation of negligence as against general demurrer.

2. Negligence 🔑111(1) — May be pleaded in general terms.

Subject to qualification and condition that it must appear from facts averred that negligence caused injury, it is sufficient to say that act complained of was negligently done, without stating particular omission which rendered act negligent.

3. Physicians and surgeons 🔑18(4) — Complaint held to show cause of injuries.

In action for malpractice, complaint held sufficient to show causal connection between the alleged negligent omissions and injuries complained of.

4. Physicians and surgeons 🔑18(4) — Complaint held to show good practice required certain treatment which, if pursued, would have prevented injury.

Complaint that defendant negligently failed to sew up severed tendon under plaintiff's finger, and that as result her finger became useless and her right hand permanently crippled, was equivalent to allegation that good practice required it to be sewed up and that, if it had been, no injury would have resulted.

5. Pleading 🔑18—Requirements of complaint as against special demurrer for uncertainty, stated.

Complaint setting forth essential facts of case with reasonable precision and with sufficient particularity to acquaint defendant with nature, source, and extent of cause of action, is good as against special demurrer for uncertainty.

Myers, C. J., and Shenk, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by Margaret Dunn against Rafael Dufficy. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hamilton A. Bauer, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Martinelli & Martinelli, of San Rafael (Hartley F. Peart and Charles V. Barfield, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

LENNON, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment following an order sustaining defendant's demurrer to the second amended complaint. The action is one for damages for alleged malpractice. The complaint alleges that the defendant is, and at the times referred to was, a duly licensed and practicing physician and surgeon, and proceeds as follows:

> "That on or about the 1st day of May, 1920, plaintiff herein suffered a severe cut by glass to the second finger of her right hand, and then and there, at San Rafael, Cal., placed herself under the care of, and employed defendant to sew up, care for and cure same for a reasonable reward to be paid by plaintiff to said defendant for his said services to plaintiff. That said defendant then and there accepted said employment and received from plaintiff a fee for his said services.
> "That upon accepting the employment hereinbefore set forth, defendant administered the following treatment and services to plaintiff, to wit, defendant thereupon sewed up the cut surface of plaintiff's injured finger and then bandaged the same up. That at said time and place, the tendon under the cut surface of plaintiff's said injured finger was severed, all of which could have been ascertained by defendant, by the use of ordinary care and skill, but was unknown to plaintiff. That defendant failed and neglected to ascertain, by the use of ordinary care and skill, that said tendon was severed, and carelessly, negligently, and unskillfully, failed and neglected to sew up the said severed tendon under plaintiff's said injured finger. In a few days' time plaintiff returned to the office of said defendant, and said defendant thereupon removed said bandage, and again dressed and rebandaged said finger. That in a few days' time plaintiff again visited defendant at his office, and said defendant thereupon removed the bandage and discharged plaintiff as cured. That after a period of about two weeks plaintiff noticed that her said finger did not straighten, but remained bent. That plaintiff thereupon returned to the office of defendant and reported to him the condition of her said finger and exhibited it to said defendant. That thereupon said defendant advised plaintiff to return home and that the said finger would straighten out in a few weeks. That at the end of said period plaintiff's said finger still remained bent and was beginning to lose life. That plaintiff did not visit defendant any further."

The demurrer was both general and special, the grounds of special demurrer being uncertainty, ambiguity, and unintelligibility, with 22 specifications under each of these grounds. The order sustaining the demurrer granted leave to the plaintiff to amend within 10 days, and plaintiff having declined to avail herself of this permission, the judgment followed from which this appeal is prosecuted.

[1, 2] In support of his general demurrer, respondent presents three principal contentions: (1) That the complaint does not contain a sufficient allegation of negligence; (2) that no facts are alleged showing a causal connection between the claimed negligent acts and the injuries complained of, and (3) that the cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations. It may be said in passing that there is no merit in the third contention, inasmuch as it appears from the record that the action was commenced within one year following the acts complained of. As to the first contention we are of the opinion that the allegation "that defendant failed and neglected to ascertain by the use of ordinary care and skill that said tendon was severed, and carelessly, negligently, and unskillfully failed and neglected to sew up the said severed tendon under plaintiff's said injured finger," is a sufficient allegation of negligence as against a general demurrer. It is settled by a long line of decisions in this state, beginning with the leading case of Smith v. Buttner, 90 Cal. 95, 27 Pac. 29, that—

> "Negligence may be charged in general terms; that is, what was done being stated, it is sufficient to say it was negligently done, without stating the particular omission which rendered the act negligent."

It seems to us that the allegations of the complaint last quoted meet and comply with these requirements.

It is, of course, conceded that this rule is always subject to the qualification and condition that "it must appear from the facts averred that the negligence caused or contributed to the injury." Champagne v. A. Hamburger & Sons, 169 Cal. 683, 147 Pac. 954; Bergen v. Tulare County Power Co., 173 Cal. 709, 161 Pac. 269; Ingalls v. Monte Cristo Oil & Development Co., 176 Cal. 128, 167 Pac. 857; Hughes v. Warman Steel Casting Co., 174 Cal. 556, 163 Pac. 885; Manwell v. Durst Bros., 178 Cal. 752, 174 Pac. 881, 1 A. L. R. 669; Goldstein v. Healy, 187 Cal. 206, 201 Pac. 462; Fay v. Cox, 45 Cal. App. 696, 188 Pac. 623.

[3] We are of the opinion that the complaint herein does contain a sufficient averment of facts necessary to meet this requirement. Among other allegations contained in the complaint are the following allegations which, in our opinion, show a causal connection between the alleged negligent omissions and the injuries complained of:

> "That as a result of the carelessness, negligence, and unskillfulness of the defendant as hereinbefore stated, plaintiff's said finger has become useless and her right hand permanently crippled by the loss of the use of the second finger thereof; that by reason of her inability to further use her said finger and as a result thereof her said right hand, all of which was occasioned by the negligence, carelessness, and unskillfulness of defendant as herein set forth, plaintiff has been unable to pursue her occupation as stenographer for a period of nine months; that by reason of the carelessness, negligence, and unskillfulness of defendant as hereinbefore alleged, plaintiff was compelled to, and did, engage the services of three other physicians; * * * that by reason of the negligence, carelessness, and unskillfulness of defendant as hereinbefore alleged, and the loss of the use of the said right hand as hereinbefore alleged, * * * plaintiff has suffered general damage in the sum of $10,000."

True, these allegations in themselves contain no averment of facts bearing upon the issue of proximate cause, but they do refer back and by reference incorporate within themselves the allegations previously quoted herein which set forth the facts upon which this action is based. These allegations, stripped of legal verbiage, state in effect that (1) the tendon of plaintiff's finger had been severed by a piece of glass, (2) defendant, employed as a physician to treat said injury, failed to discover that the tendon had been severed, (3) the defendant failed to sew up the severed tendon, and (4) as a result of such failure to discover the severance of the tendon and the consequent failure to sew it up, plaintiff's right hand became permanently crippled. It seems to us, therefore, that the requirements of the rule have been met in the instant case.

[4] It is contended that in order to state a cause of action the complaint should have contained the allegation that good practice required that a severed tendon be sewed up, and that if the tendon had been sewed up no injury would have resulted. The allegation that "defendant carelessly, negligently, and unskillfully, failed and neglected to sew up the said severed tendon under plaintiff's said injured finger," and that "as a result of the carelessness, negligence, and unskillfulness of the defendant as hereinbefore stated, plaintiff's said finger has become useless and her right hand permanently crippled, * * *" is in effect an allegation that the resultant injury was due to a failure by the defendant to sew up the severed tendon in the plaintiff's finger. That allegation is equivalent to an allegation that good practice required a severed tendon to be sewed up and that if the tendon had been sewed up no injury would have resulted. By definitely placing the responsibility for the resultant injury upon the defendant's failure to sew up the tendon, the allegation thereby obviously negatives the idea that the injury might have been permanent even if the tendon had been sewed up.

A review of the cases cited in support of the rule that, from the facts averred, it must appear that the negligence caused or contributed to the injury, discloses the fact that those cases wherein it was held that the pleadings did not satisfactorily fulfill this requirement, are readily distinguishable from the case at bar. In Smith v. Buttner, 90 Cal. 95, 27 Pac. 29, it was alleged that plaintiffs were in possession as tenants of a dwelling house owned by the defendant who caused the same to be raised some six or seven feet while the plaintiffs were occupying it, and that after so raising it defendant wholly failed and neglected to provide any safe and proper means of entrance to or egress from the house and "by reason of the negligence and failure of defendant to provide safe, suitable, or proper means of exit from said house, said plaintiff, Dora Smith on said 30th day of June, 1887, in endeavoring to descend from said house to the ground, for a proper and lawful purpose, while in the exercise of due care and diligence, and without any fault or negligence on her part, fell to the ground, and dislocated her left wrist, and broke the bone of her left arm, near the wrist and sustained other severe and painful injuries." In that case the court said that—

> "The negligence consisted simply in failing to provide a safe, proper, and suitable means of entrance to or egress from the house, and it is alleged that this negligence caused plaintiff to fall. But no fact is averred which shows that such negligence had anything to do with the accident. * * * Such complaint does not state the facts constituting plaintiffs' cause of action."

From a perusal of the complaint in the case last cited, it is evident that there is a hiatus in the link of alleged causal connection, and this deficiency should have been supplied by appropriate allegations describing in what manner defendant failed to provide a safe, suitable, and proper means of exit from the house; whether the structure was insufficiently secured or whether the negligence consisted of an entire failure to supply any steps. In describing the negligence in such general terms—a failure to provide a safe, suitable, and proper means of entrance and egress—such a broad field is described that there are included therein possibilities which would not give plaintiffs a cause of action. On the other hand, in the case of Goldstein v. Healy, 187 Cal. 206, 201 Pac. 462, based upon somewhat similar facts, the complaint was held to be sufficient. The complaint therein alleged that a certain railing was placed on the outer edge of a platform upon which was erected a tent, owned by the defendant, and rented by him as living quarters to guests at a summer resort; that said railing "consisted of decomposed and rotten wood * * * negligently and carelessly maintained in said condition by the said defendant; * * *" and that while a guest at said summer resort was leaning against said railing, "by reason of said rottenness and decomposition of the said wood of which said railing consisted as aforesaid, and by reason of the carelessness and negligence of the defendants in so maintaining said railing, * * * the said railing gave way and broke, thereby precipitating and causing the plaintiff to fall off the said platform and to the ground below, a distance of about 20 feet, and causing the plaintiff to strike upon his head and body." It will be noted that the negligence was specifically defined and the facts upon which plaintiff relied to show a causal connection between the injury and the negligence definitely detailed. In the instant case the negligence is precisely described as a failure to sew up a severed tendon. It would be practically impossible to describe the negligence in more exact and explicit terms, and if the pleadings in this case will not suffice to bring the defendant into court, it is difficult to conceive of pleadings that would.

The case of Manwell v. Durst, 178 Cal. 752, 174 Pac. 881, 1 A. L. R. 669, is not in point for the reason that the complaint in that case not only failed to state facts showing a causal connection between the alleged negligence of the defendant and the injury to the deceased, but the facts, as pleaded, failed to show any negligence at all. In that case the deceased was employed by the defendants to assist the sheriff and his deputies in clearing defendants' premises of a dangerous mob. As was pointed out in the opinion in that case, it is the employment without informing the employee of the danger that constitutes negligence, and the court held that the complaint, failing to contain any allegation that the defendants failed to inform the deceased of the danger of the employment, failed to state any negligence in the matter.

The case of Merriam v. Hamilton, 64 Or. 476, 130 Pac. 406, in which the Supreme Court of Oregon approved and followed the rule of Smith v. Buttner, supra, was a malpractice case. Therein it was alleged that the defendant negligently and carelessly failed to discover and diagnose the true condition of the plaintiff and properly treat her therefor, and that by reason thereof the plaintiff was rendered sick and injured in her health and constitution. The manner and method of treatment was not specified. And in that case the complaint did not, except by inference, allege that plaintiff was suffering from any disease at the time of the employment of the defendant. In the case at bar the nature of the original injury is stated and the permanency of the injury directly attributed to a failure to treat the injured finger in a definite manner, i. e., to sew up the severed tendon.

The same criticism is applicable to the case of Sweat v. Foster, 28 Ga. App. 360, 111 S. E. 66, which was also a malpractice case wherein it was alleged:

> "That the death of his wife was due to the unskillful diagnosis and treatment by defendant as a medical practitioner, and to the gross carelessness and neglect in his treatment and handling of said wife's illness."

Inasmuch as the complaint in the case last cited, as in the case of Merriam v. Hamilton, supra, just commented upon, failed to specify the nature of the treatment accorded the patient, the situation presented in both cited cases is not analogous to the situation presented in the case at bar.

In the case of Davis v. Rodman, 147 Ark. 385, 227 S. W. 612, 13 A. L. R. 1459, also a malpractice case, the negligence consisted of a failure on the part of the physician, called in to attend a patient stricken with typhoid fever, to notify the patient's family that typhoid fever was an infectious disease. Manifestly, with negligence of this character specific facts were necessary to connect the injury with the negligence complained of. In the instant case the injury is directly connected with the negligence, and consequently there are no intermediate facts required to be set forth in order to show the connection of the injury with the negligence set forth.

[5] Respondent insists that the special demurrer on the ground of uncertainty is well founded. With this contention we cannot agree. All that is required of a plaintiff, as a matter of pleading, even as against a special demurrer, is that his complaint set forth the essential facts of the case with reasonable precision and with sufficient particularity to acquaint the defendant with the nature, source, and extent of his cause of action. Goldstein v. Healy, supra.

The judgment is reversed.

MYERS, C. J. I dissent. I am unable to distinguish this case from Smith v. Buttner and think, therefore, that the judgment herein should be affirmed unless we are willing to overrule that case, which has stood unchallenged for more than 30 years and has been cited with approval more than 30 times. The cases cited in the majority opinion are in full accord with that case and no decision to the contrary has been cited. A comparison of the allegations of the complaint herein with those under consideration in Smith v. Buttner, on the one hand, and with those under consideration in Goldstein v. Healy, on the other hand, compels the conclusion in my mind that this case is ruled by Smith v. Buttner. That conclusion is confirmed by Merriam v. Hamilton, which expressly follows Smith v. Buttner.

I am also of the opinion that the special demurrer herein for uncertainty was well founded as to some of the particulars therein specified.

McFARLAND et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF MERCED COUNTY et al.
(S. F. 11041.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 11, 1924. Rehearing Denied Oct. 9, 1924.)

1. Injunction 🔑231—Judgment of contempt affirmed if affidavit and evidence sufficient.

On certiorari to review adjudication of contempt for violation of injunction, regardless of affirmative defenses and questions of fact raised by petitioners, if affidavit of contempt was sufficient and there was sufficient evidence to support its allegations, judgment must be affirmed and petition denied.

2. Injunction 🔑230(3) — Evidence held to show violation of injunctional order as to taking of water.

Evidence held to show violation of injunction restraining taking of water from stream by irrigation district, until plaintiffs had received specified quantity.

3. Injunction 🔑225—Diligence immaterial as regards disobedience of injunction.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1209, subd. 5, making disobedience of judgment order or process of court contempt, diligence in stopping pumping preventing plaintiff from receiving quantity of water specified in injunction is not material as to fact of disobedience.

4. Injunction 🔑230(3)—Evidence held sufficient to support judgment of contempt against attorney of irrigation district.

Testimony as to conduct of attorney of irrigation district in advising officers that injunction decree was "no good," and that district continued pumping on advice of such attorney, was sufficient to support judgment of contempt as to attorney.

5. Injunction 🔑228—Order binding upon all persons acting for corporation enjoined.

Injunction restraining corporation, its officers, agents, and employés, is binding upon all persons acting for corporation with full notice and knowledge of injunction.

6. Injunction 🔑230(1)—Parties to original action need not be ones instituting proceedings in contempt.

It is not necessary that parties instituting proceedings in contempt for violation of injunction be parties to original action; contempt proceeding being separate and distinct.

7. Injunction 🔑223(1) — Injury unnecessary to contempt in disobeying.

It is not necessary, in order to constitute contempt by violating injunction, to show injury.

8. Injunction 🔑225 — Change of conditions does not warrant disobedience.

That conditions have changed and additional supply of water has developed is no defense to proceedings in contempt for violation of injunction restraining irrigation district from taking water.

9. Injunction 🔑225—No defense to contempt proceedings that others took water unlawfully.

In contempt proceedings against irrigation district violating injunction restraining taking of water, it was no defense that others were unlawfully taking water.

LAWLOR, J. This is an application for a writ of review of an order adjudging petitioners, who are, respectively, the officers and attorney of the Tranquility Irrigation District, guilty of contempt of court for the violation of a judgment of injunction issued by respondent court in a proceeding instituted therein and entitled "Miller & Lux, Incorporated, a corporation, and the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company, Incorporated, a corporation, v. J. G. James Company, a corporation, and the San Joaquin Valley Farm Lands Company, a corporation, No. 2006 of the files of said court."

On August 14, 1923, the affidavit of W. H. Trump, the secretary of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company, a corporation, was filed in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Merced. This affidavit alleged that on the 8th day of January, 1917, the above-entitled court made and entered its final judgment in an action in which Miller & Lux, Incorporated, a corporation, and the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company, Incorporated, a corporation, were plaintiffs, and J. G. James Company and the San Joaquin Valley Farm Lands Company, a corporation, were defendants; that said judgment has ever since said day been, and now is, in full force and effect; that by said judgment the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company, Incorporated, a corporation, was entitled to take and divert from the San Joaquin river 1,360 cubic feet of water flowing therein per second at the head of its main, and outside canals situated in the county of Fresno, near the confluence of the San Joaquin river and Fresno slough, and that by said judgment the defendants and all of the agents and attorneys thereof, and all successors and assigns of the said defendants, were forever enjoined, restrained, and strictly prohibited from pumping, taking or diverting any of the waters of the San Joaquin river or any of the water of the San Joaquin river being or flowing in Fresno slough from the channels of said river or slough until the said plaintiff, the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company, shall have received into the head of its canals 1,360 cubic feet of water; that the defendants, the J. G. James Company and San Joaquin Valley Farm Lands Company, a corporation, formed an irrigation district known as the Tranquility Irrigation District, and conveyed to it all the canals, pumps, and works owned by them in the San Joaquin river or in Fresno slough, and that the Tranquility Irrigation District is the successor and assignee of the defendants; that the officers of the Tranquility Irrigation District had notice of the entry and existence of this decree and the terms thereof; that on the 9th, 10th, and 11th days of August, 1923, "there was less than 1,360 cubic feet of water flowing per second in the San Joaquin river and Fresno slough to the heads of said plaintiff's canals," and that the Tranquility Irrigation District on those days knowingly and intentionally took and pumped a large quantity of water of the San Joaquin river then flowing in Fresno slough, well knowing that the plaintiff was not receiving, and could not receive into its canals, the quantity of water so adjudged to it, and well knowing that the taking of the said water prevented the said plaintiff from taking, diverting, and using the quantity of water adjudged to it as aforesaid.

Upon this affidavit the trial court issued an order to show cause ordering the Tranquility Irrigation District and its officers and attorney to appear before the court on September 4, 1923, to show cause why they should not be adjudged guilty of contempt and punished accordingly.

On September 4, 1923, the said R. C. McFarland, the engineer and superintendent of the Tranquility Irrigation District, filed his affidavit stating that the Tranquility Irrigation District takes its water from the Kings river and from the Fresno slough; that the water diverted from the Kings river during a portion of the season is diverted by gravity, and during another portion of the season the water used by the district is pumped from the Fresno slough; that during the last two or three years the district has modified the diverting system from the Kings river so that the amount of water coming into Fresno slough has been materially increased; that at all times and at the present time there is coming into the Fresno slough above the point where the district pumps large amounts of water from sources other than the San Joaquin river; that the level of underground water, or the water table, has been raised so that at the present time the surface of the water in Fresno slough is only 0.80 hundredths of a foot above the water level; that the pumping of the Tranquility Irrigation District does not affect the flow of the water at the head of the canal of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company's canal; that every indication is that the water which would be pumped by the Tranquility Irrigation District is water coming from sources other than the San Joaquin river, and that the supply of water has been increased and developed by the action of the Tranquility Irrigation District; that the said district, in response to the demands of the plaintiff, ceased to pump on the 14th day of August, 1923, and is not now pumping; that large amounts of water are being diverted into canals higher up the river than the intake of the canal of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal Company, and higher up than the pumping plant of the Tranquility Irrigation District, which said canals are owned and controlled by the plaintiff; that the intake of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company has been examined and that said canal is not taking all of the water flowing in the river, but a very considerable amount of water is flowing past said intake and on down the San Joaquin river and that a large portion of the water diverted by that company into said canal is being apparently wasted and turned out to flood grass land.

A joint affidavit of the said R. C. McFarland, W. A. Draper, the general manager and a member of the board of directors, respectively, of the district, and L. L. Dennett, the attorney thereof, denies that the district or the officers or attorney thereof violated the decree of the court, that the pumping by the district has in any way affected the flow of water to the canal of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company, Incorporated, and alleges that, as soon as they were notified that the water in the river had fallen below 1,360 cubic feet per second, the Tranquility Irrigation District ceased to pump; that the demand made by the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company was malicious and without any foundation, and that the Tranquility Irrigation District, in ceasing to pump in accordance with such demand, has suffered damage in an amount in excess of $100,000. The affidavit further alleges that the Tranquility Irrigation District perfected the diverting works from the Kings river, and is entitled to use and divert all of the waters of that river coming into Fresno slough; that during the month of August, 1923, the district pumped the following amounts of water from Fresno slough: August 1, 42 second feet; August 2, 45 second feet; August 3, 42 second feet; August 4, 36 second feet; August 5, 30 second feet; August 6, 35 second feet; August 7, 41 second feet; August 8, 42 second feet; August 9, 47 second feet; August 10, 49 second feet; August 11, 53 second feet; August 12, 48 second feet, and August 13, 44 second feet; that during all this time there was flowing by the diverting weir of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company an amount in excess of 53 second feet; that is, that at no time has the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company diverted into its canal all of the water in the San Joaquin river; that the major portion of the water diverted in the canals of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company is not used to supply the water users from said canal, but is diverted by Miller & Lux, a corporation, upon riparian land covered with wild grasses and of little value, and that, under and by virtue of the judgment and decree it is the right of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company, and not of said Miller & Lux, to a priority over the land of the J. G. James Company; that due to the diversion of water from the Kings river and other sources the water level in the Tranquility Irrigation District has been raised until it is within four or five feet of the surface of the land, and the water in Fresno slough is only about eight-tenths of a foot above the ground level, and that, if the Tranquility Irrigation District ceases to pump, the water level will continue to rise and alkali will be brought up from underground surfaces and the land in that district will be damaged and destroyed; that, subsequent to the judgment, the plaintiff entered into agreements with certain power companies, and had consented to the construction of reservoirs at Bass lake, Kertchoff, and at Huntington lake, where water had been stored, and that the storing of this water has materially affected the condition of the San Joaquin river, and rendered it impossible for the purpose and intent of the judgment to be carried out and complied with; that on the San Joaquin river above Fresno slough and the intake of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company are various diverting ditches —Gravely Ford, Aliso canal, and Lone Willow slough—and it is alleged that the amount of water diverted through these diversions is greater than that to which the plaintiff is entitled, and that, if they were diverting the amount of water only to which it is entitled, then the amount of water flowing in the river at the intake of the canal would be greater than that specified in the judgment, and, finally, that the plaintiff has maliciously and intentionally diverted the water, as alleged above, so as to reduce the flow of the San Joaquin river to a point where they could claim that the Tranquility Irrigation District was interfering with the flow of said river.

In the order for judgment the court found that:

> "The evidence shows that the parties and persons cited to show cause in the above-entitled action are in contempt of the order and judgment of the court, by reason of the fact that they knowingly took in excess of 30 cubic feet of water per second more than the judgment herein permitted them. According to their own evidence they could not take as much as 10 cubic feet of seepage water per second from Fresno slough when there was less than 1,360 cubic feet flowing at the head of plaintiff's canal. They could take seepage water only at that stage of river flow."

On February 8, 1924, the defendants, R. C. McFarland, W. A. Draper, and L. L. Dennett, were each adjudged guilty of contempt of court and fined in the sum of $50 each.

The judgment which the court found to be in full force and effect, the violation of which constituted the contempt, is as follows:

> "That the plaintiff, the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company, Incorporated, is entitled to take and divert from the San Joaquin river 1,360 cubic feet of water flowing therein per second at the head of its main and outside canals, situated in the county of Fresno near the confluence of the San Joaquin river and Fresno slough, * * * and the right * * * is prior and superior to any right of the defendants to take or divert any of the water of the San Joaquin river or any water of the San Joaquin river being or flowing in the Fresno slough and the said defendants * * * are forever enjoined, restrained, and strictly prohibited from pumping, taking, or diverting, or otherwise removing any of the waters of the San Joaquin river, or any of the waters of the San Joaquin river being or flowing in Fresno slough from the channels of the said river or slough until the said plaintiff, the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company, Incorporated, shall have received into the head of its said canals 1,360 cubic feet of the water of the San Joaquin river flowing therein per second, or so as to in any manner interfere with the flow of the water of the said San Joaquin river to the heads of said canals of the said plaintiff, or so as to in any way interfere with the diversion of said quantity of water by the said plaintiff."

The petition for a writ of review is based upon the contention that the judgment of the court was in excess of the jurisdiction thereof. In paragraph VII of the petition 15 particulars are specified in which the excess of jurisdiction is claimed to appear. The argument is "that there was a complete lack of evidence that the Tranquility Irrigation District was taking any water from the San Joaquin river," and "that the Canal Company is entitled not to 1,360 cubic feet of water to do with as it wishes, but to 1,360 cubic feet of water for the purposes which give rise to the injunction, and that it cannot complain if the Tranquility Irrigation District was pumping water when less than 1,360 cubic feet of water came to the canals of the Canal Company, unless the Canal Company wished to put that water to the beneficial use authorized by the judgment."

An order to show cause was ordered to issue by this court on February 21, 1924.

Respondents' brief points out (1) that the affidavits charging a violation of the decree constitute the complaint and the counter affidavits of defendants the answer; that the only denial of any of the allegations of the affidavit was "one to the effect that the pumping of the said Irrigation District had not in any way interfered with or affected the flow of water into the canals of the Canal Company"; that the answer "expressly admitted the pumping of large quantities of water by the said district, from 47 to 53 second feet continuously on the days in question, for which a violation of the injunction was claimed"; that the affirmative allegation in the answer that "by its pumping the Tranquility Irrigation District did not take out of Fresno slough any more water than was coming into it from the Kings river and sources other than the San Joaquin river" was not supported by any evidence introduced by the defendants, and that the only issue was "whether under the circumstances the taking from Fresno slough of the quantity of water (47 to 53 cubic feet per second), admittedly taken with the aid of the defendants with knowledge of the decree, was a violation of the injunction." The brief further points out: (II) "That the water in Fresno slough comes from the San Joaquin river has been determined by this court in litigation between the Canal Company and the predecessors in interest of the Tranquility Irrigation District," citing the two decisions in Miller & Lux v. Enterprise Co., 169 Cal. 415, 147 Pac. 567, and Miller & Lux v. James, 180 Cal. 41, 179 Pac. 174; (III) "the evidence independent of the decisions in the previous cases showed a willful and deliberate taking of water in violation of the decree;" (IV) "as there was no act in excess of jurisdiction on the part of the lower court its judgment is final;" and (V) "but one issue could be tried in the contempt case and the jurisdiction of the court concerning the same was beyond question," there being no evidence to support the affirmative defenses set up by defendants in their counter affidavits.

Petitioners' reply is based on the ground of lack of jurisdiction as shown in the affidavit of contempt: First, that no demand was made upon the Tranquility Irrigation District by or on behalf of the Canal Company to stop pumping, the notice having been given by the Miller & Lux Company; second, that the Canal Company was entitled to priority only for the public use determined in the original judgment; third, that the Tranquility Irrigation District was using the water pumped by it with the consent of the Canal Company, and that there was nothing to show that the Canal Company had not abandoned its right to the water; fourth, that there is no evidence that the district did not use diligence in stopping its operations; fifth, that, as to its attorney, L. L. Dennett, there is absolutely no evidence connecting him with the alleged contempt; sixth, that the Tranquility Irrigation District, as successors of the defendants in the original suit, are not guilty of contempt even if it diverted water from Fresno slough belonging to the Canal Company; seventh, that proceedings in contempt can only be initiated by one beneficially interested, and Miller & Lux initiated the proceedings; eighth, that one not injuriously affected cannot complain, and the Canal Company has not shown that it was injured; and ninth, that the fact that the contemners were officers and agents of the district does not of itself make them liable for a contempt of the district.

[1, 2] The only question here is whether the evidence before the court is sufficient to sustain the adjudication of contempt. Regardless of the affirmative defenses and questions of fact raised by petitioners, if the affidavit of contempt was sufficient, and there was sufficient evidence to support its allegations, the judgment of the lower court must be affirmed, and the petition herein denied. In re Brambini (Cal. Sup.) 218 Pac. 569.

The testimony taken upon the order to show cause is substantially as follows:

J. J. Hogue, a witness called on behalf of plaintiff, testified that he had been in the employ of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company between three and four years, and was in charge of the water coming into the heads of plaintiff's canals at a place called Mendota, where a dam is maintained across the river. He stated that the Fresno slough and Lone Willow slough empty into the San Joaquin river near this dam, and that the canals of the company take out above the dam, the effect of which is to back up the water of the San Joaquin river into Fresno slough. The White House gauge or measuring station is above the place where the Lone Willow slough takes out of the river, and is equipped with an automatic gauge recorder and a staff gauge recorder. A gauge station is also maintained at the Lone Willow slough. He testified further:

"Q. Now, the measurements that you took, how did you go about it? A. Well, at each measuring point, we had a station and the station is divided off into sections, according to the width of the stream. Q. Now, a station, what do you mean by a station? A. At the point where I took the measurements and the station is divided off into different sections, and the first cross-section is taken of the channel and then the meter is lowered to the standard method and measurements are taken, readings are taken. Q. Did you lower the meter? A. Yes, sir. Q. How many measurements did you take across the stream, how many times did you lower your meter in the stream? A. At every section. Q. How far apart were those sections? A. Some of them were 4 and some 10, depending on the width of the stream. Q. You mean feet? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did you do then? A. Then, I took cross-sections; then I lowered the meter down. Q. What happended when you lowered the meter? A. See the revolutions. Q. What did those revolutions indicate? * * * A. Well, it indicates the velocity. Q. Now, after having gotten the velocity, what did you do next? A. Well, compute out the discharge. Q. What is that? A. Compute out the discharge over the area. Q. How did you do that? A. The area of the different sections times the velocity; it is done according to the standard method. Q. What had you done about the standard method? A. I am going according to one now."

He did not measure Fresno slough, but the measurements on the San Joaquin river, just above Lone Willow slough, are as follows:

> "August 7th, 1,420.91; August 8th, 1,110; August 9th, 1,000; August 10th, 1,210; August 11th, 1,300; August 12th, 1,350; August 13th, 1,090; August 14th, 986.04."

The measurements on Lone Willow slough, which takes out immediately below the above point, are as follows:

> "August 7th, 160 feet; August 8th, 127; August 9th, 125; August 10th, 137; August 11th, 147; August 12th, 158; August 13th, 127; August 14th, 118."

No other water can come into the San Joaquin river between the point of measurement above Lone Willow slough and the place that the canals of the company take out at Mendota dam, and the amount of water flowing at the dam is the difference between these two streams. It appears, then, that on August 7, at the head of the canal, there were 1,260.91 second feet; on August 8, 983; on August 9, 875; on August 10, 1,073; on August 11, 1,153, and on August 12, 1,192; on August 13, 963; and on August 14, 868.04. These figures represent the maximum amount of water that could possibly flow in the San Joaquin river at the head of the Canal Company's diverting works. However, no allowance is made for evaporation and seepage between the point of measurement and the intake of the canal. The witness further testified that during the days between August 7th to the 14th, inclusive, the Tranquility Irrigation District was pumping water out of Fresno slough, and R. C. McFarland was notified to close down the pumps as soon as possible; that he said the court decision did not amount to very much, and he did not think they would stop pumping. In a letter he said the matter would be taken up with the attorney of the Tranquility Irrigation District before the pumps would be closed. On August 11th further notice was given by Miller & Lux, Incorporated, to the Tranquility Irrigation District to shut down its pumps as the water at the White House measured only 1,000 second feet. On August 12th, in a conversation with R. C. McFarland, the district was requested to shut down the pumps immediately. On August 14th the Tranquility Irrigation District notified Miller & Lux that the pumps had been closed down. On cross-examination J. J. Hogue testified that he made measurements at the main, outside, and Helm canals every week. For the week of August 7th they were as follows: At the outside canal, 270 feet; at the Helm, 330 feet, and at the main, 750 feet. On August 13th the measurements were as follows: In the outside canal, 162 feet; in the main canal, 708 feet, and in the Helm, 207 feet. No measurements of the water coming from Fresno slough into the San Joaquin river were made, nor were any taken of the amount of water going over the Mendota weir. The witness stated that he did not know whether any water was coming from the Fresno slough into the San Joaquin river or from the San Joaquin river into Fresno slough or whether the water in Fresno slough came from Kings river. However, there were about three feet of water in Fresno slough for several weeks from indications on the channel. The water that went over the Mendota weir was seepage through the boards. To explain the difference of 70.91 feet between the two figures given on August 7th, the witness said: "No doubt it was backed up at the weir; it was left above the weir as back water."

C. L. Kaupke, a witness called on behalf of plaintiff, testified that he had been an engineer since June, 1909, and connected with the state division of water rights since 1921; that on July 6, 1923, there was no water at Burrel, about 20 miles above the dam, in the Kings river, that could flow into Fresno slough to the head of the canals of the Tranquility Irrigation District; that the water ceased flowing at the head of the James canal on June 11, 1923, and at the Beta main canal on June 16, 1923; that there is no source or supply of water for Fresno slough other than San Joaquin river unless there is plenty of water in Kings river; that the only possibility is under surface streams and seepage water and that at McMullen, just above the diversion weir of the James canal, there were not in excess 5 or 6 second feet of water on August 25, 1923.

E. T. A. Bartlett, a witness called on behalf of plaintiff, testified that he is a surveyor, and since 1906 has been a civil engineer and in the employ of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company for six and a half years; that the effect of the dam is to back up the water in Fresno slough about 12 or 14 miles, and that if the Tranquility Irrigation District operates its two pumps on Fresno slough, of approximately 50 second feet capacity each, the water is withdrawn from the head of the canals of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company.

R. C. McFarland, one of the petitioners, sought to show by illustrating a chart that the water pumped out of Fresno slough by petitioners came from the Kings river. The chart indicated the constant increase of seepage from the Kings river, that is, that the water level had increased until it appeared that, at the time of the hearing, there is more water flowing in the Fresno slough from seepage than is being pumped out. The witness declared that the chart showed that the surface water in Fresno slough was between 1 and 2 feet higher in 1923 than in 1922. The seepage water is claimed to come from the area of 27,000 acres in the Tranquility Irrigation District, the water level having raised "practically 4 feet and a half since last year." The following measurements, taken between August 15 and September 15, 1923, after the affidavit in contempt was filed, were given: One and 4/10 second feet of water flowing in from the James Irrigation District to Fresno slough as drainage water, an average of 2 second feet flowing into Fresno slough from the Kings river by-pass and the final average about 10 second feet of actual flow to the Fresno slough. It was shown that measurements for 30 days do not vary 3 per cent. As tending to show that the Canal Company did not use all the water flowing in the San Joaquin river, the witness testified that on August 16th there was considerable water flowing over the Mendota weir, "practically about 25 feet flowing over the weir." On cross-examination he admitted that all he could show by the illustrated chart was the elevation of the water plane, and that it was merely his conclusion or guess as to what caused the water to rise in Fresno slough—whether it was seepage or whether it came down the river.

Petitioners claim that the evidence establishes the following facts: That the Canal Company was not using even the water flowing in the river; that Miller & Lux was permitted to divert water through the Helm canal, the Helm ditch, Lone Willow slough, and Aliso ditch; that the Canal Company did not object to the diversion of the water; that on August 12th the record at Lone Willow weir shows there were 1,350 second feet of water, and that "unquestionably there was a considerable additional source of supply from Fresno slough"; that reservoirs on the San Joaquin river controlled by the Canal Company are storing water to which petitioners are entitled; that since the pumps of the Tranquility Irrigation District are practically at the head of the Fresno slough, and since the drainage of the reclamation district and the James Irrigation District discharges water below the pumps, evidence as to the amount of water coming in above the pumps is relatively unimportant; that there was coming into the Fresno slough from sources other than the San Joaquin river, water greater in quantity than that being pumped by the Tranquility Irrigation District; that on August 12th, with the water coming into Fresno slough, there were more than 1,360 second feet of water flowing in the San Joaquin river; that on August 14th, after investigation, the Tranquility Irrigation District shut down its pumps; and that these facts do not sustain the adjudication of contempt.

But even if this appraisal of the evidence be correct it does not sustain the contention of petitioners that the court was without jurisdiction to pronounce a judgment of contempt. They tried to show by their testimony that the Fresno slough had an independent source of supply as great, or greater, than was pumped out. This was a question of fact to be determined by the court, and, in the face of the evidence the determination became final.

It is clear from the import of the judgment of injunction that the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company is entitled to take 1,360 cubic feet of water per second out of the San Joaquin river, "near the confluence of the San Joaquin river and Fresno slough," and that the Tranquility Irrigation district is enjoined from taking any water of the San Joaquin river being or flowing in Fresno slough until the canal company shall have received 1,360 cubic feet of water per second of the San Joaquin river into the head of its canals. No attack is made on the jurisdiction of the court to make the injunction. It is shown that the decree is in full force and effect; that petitioners are the successors of the defendants, the J. G. James Company, Incorporated, and the San Joaquin Valley Farm Lands Company, Incorporated; that they had knowledge of the full force and effect of the judgment and decree of injunction; that the pumping operations of the Tranquility Irrigation District on Fresno slough withdraw water from the head of the canals of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company; and finally, by their own testimony, that they pumped 47, 49, and 53 second feet of water from Fresno slough on the 9th, 10th, and 11th days of August when the water in the San Joaquin river measured, respectively, 1,000, 1,210, and 1,300 cubic feet per second, and, when on the said respective days only 875, 1,073, and 1,153 cubic feet per second of water were received into the canals of the company. The trial court declared that "according to their own evidence, they could not take as much as 10 cubic feet of seepage water per second from Fresno slough when there was less than 1,360 cubic feet flowing at the head of plaintiff's canal." It is true the witnesses for the Canal Company testified they did not know whether water was coming into Fresno slough from other sources than the San Joaquin river, and that no measurements had been taken of water flowing from the San Joaquin river into Fresno slough. On the other hand, C. L. Kaupke testified that there is no source of supply of water in Fresno slough other than the San Joaquin river, unless there is plenty of water in Kings river, and that the only possibility of other sources of supply for Fresno slough is undersurface streams and seepage water. He further testified that on July 6, 1923, at Burrel, about 20 miles above the dam, there was no water in the Kings river that could flow into Fresno slough to the head of the canals of the Tranquility Irrigation District, and that the water ceased flowing at the head of the James canal on June 11, 1923, and at the Beta main canal on July 16, 1923. Furthermore, petitioner R. C. McFarland, although he testified that there were on the average of 10 cubic feet per second of seepage water in Fresno slough, he admitted on cross-examination that all he could show by the chart was the water plane, and that it was merely his conclusion and guess as to what caused the water to rise in Fresno slough. In view of the testimony that water backs up into Fresno slough from the San Joaquin river unless there is water coming into Fresno slough from Kings river by reason of the Mendota dam, that in the earlier part of the season, that is, in July, there was no water that could flow into Fresno slough from the Kings river, and that seepage water was not and could not be measured, the trial court could have found the source of the water in Fresno slough contrary to the contention of petitioners. In other words, there is sufficient evidence to justify the court's finding that the greater portion of the three feet of water in Fresno slough was water backed up into that stream by the Mendota dam.

[3-7] The other points raised by petitioners may be briefly discussed. Petitioners claim that due diligence in stopping pumping operations on August 14, 1923, was shown to have been exercised. Section 1209, subdivision 5, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that disobedience of any lawful judgment, order, or process of a court is a contempt, and therefore diligence is not material as to the fact of disobedience. As to one of petitioners, L. L. Dennett, the attorney of the Tranquility Irrigation District, it is contended there is no evidence connecting him with the alleged contempt. The testimony as to the conduct of the attorney in advising R. C. McFarland that the decree was "no good" and that he, McFarland, could have it set aside, and that the district continued pumping on the advice of the attorney, is sufficient to support the judgment of contempt as to him. Ex parte Vance, 88 Cal. 281, 26 Pac. 118. An injunction restraining a corporation, its officers, agents, and employees is binding upon all persons acting for the corporation with full notice and knowledge of the injunction. 5 Cal. Jur. 894. The claim is made that the Miller & Lux Company instituted the proceeding in contempt "to take an unconscionable advantage of the Tranquility Irrigation District, and to avoid, so far as Miller & Lux was concerned, the limitations imposed by the judgment in which the injunction was issued." As a matter of fact, the affidavit instituting the proceedings in contempt was subscribed and sworn to by the secretary of the Canal Company. It is immaterial which company gave notice to cease pumping. Moreover, there is no provision requiring the parties to the original action for which the judgment has been rendered to institute proceedings in contempt. A contempt is a separate and distinct proceeding, and is no part of the original case out of which it arises. As a matter of practice, the party most likely to institute proceedings would be the one beneficially interested in the judgment. The final point that the canal company did not show any injury resulting from the alleged contempt may be disposed of by the remark that it is not necessary in order to constitute a contempt to show injury. The sole test is whether the judgment has been violated.

[8, 9] The allegations of petitioners that conditions have changed and an additional supply of water developed, and that water to which they are entitled is being impounded in reservoirs by the Canal Company are unsupported by evidence, and, furthermore, if any testimony had been offered in support of the allegations, it would clearly be immaterial and irrelevant to the issue of contempt before the court. Moreover, petitioners would have recourse to an action at law to determine any relative rights that may have intervened subsequent to the granting of injunctive relief. It may be mentioned, however, that respondents, in answer to petitioners' claim that the Miller & Lux Company is using the water to which they are entitled, stated that Miller & Lux purchased the water from them, and that even if taken wrongfully this would be no answer to a violation of the injunction by petitioners.

No attempt has been made herein to review the evidence so far as it affects or applies to the merits of the case; it has been considered solely for the purpose of ascertaining whether the court could have found the necessary jurisdictional facts therefrom. The order to show cause is discharged, and the petition for a writ of review denied.

SPRECKELS et al. v. GRAHAM, County Clerk. (S. F. 11298.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 24, 1924. Rehearing Denied Sept. 26, 1924.)

1. Elections 🔑142—Candidates for office of presidential elector cannot be nominated by petition; "public officer."

Candidates for offices of presidential electors cannot be nominated by petition under Pol. Code, § 1188, providing for such nomination of candidates for "public office," since presidential electors, even if public officers, within the common acceptation of the term, are not within the statute, in view of legislative history of such statute, and section 1197, and Direct Primary Law 1917, § 1, subd. 9 (b), and sections 2, 5—(citing Words and Phrases, First Series, "Officer"; "State Officer").

2. Statutes 🔑206—Rule as to construction of co-ordinate provisions of statute stated.

Co-ordinate provisions of statute will be construed so as to give effect to each, and so that they shall harmonize rather than conflict with one another, if it is reasonably possible to do so, but, if there is an irreconcilable conflict, the provision last in point of time or place shall prevail.

3. Elections 🔑21—Statute prescribing method of nominating candidates for presidential elector other than as candidates of existing party held constitutional.

Direct Primary Law 1917, § 1, subd. 9(b), prescribing mode of nominating group of candidates for presidential electors other than as candidates of existing party, held not unconstitutional as limiting unjustifiably the right of suffrage.

Lennon, Lawlor, and Seawell, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Mandamus by Rudolph Spreckels and others against Robert E. Graham, as County Clerk of the County of Marin, State of California. Writ denied.

Nathan Moran, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Henry Greer, of San Rafael, for respondent.

MYERS, C. J. Application for writ of mandate directing respondent, as county clerk of Marin county, to receive, examine, certify, and forward to the secretary of state a certain document or set of documents purporting to nominate the petitioners as group candidates for the office of electors of President and Vice President of the United States, to be placed upon the ballot and voted for at the approaching November election; the respondent having refused so to do. It must be conceded that the county clerk is a ministerial officer; that his duties are those prescribed by statute; and that a writ of mandate can only issue to compel him to perform an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from his office. It must also be conceded that the document or documents offered to the county clerk for his reception, etc., must have had their inception in lawfulness; or in other words must, in their preparation, certification, and presentation to the county clerk for his action thereon, have been based upon some statutory authorization of the persons so preparing and presenting the same so to do. The petitioners herein allege that five persons, qualified electors of the county of Marin, joined in proposing these petitioners as candidates for nomination to the office of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, to be voted for at the November election; and also joined in appointing verification deputies to serve in procuring, and who did procure, the signatures of voters to the nominating papers of these petitioners for such office, and did present the aforesaid nominating paper bearing the signatures of certain voters registered and residing in the county of Marin to the respondent, as county clerk of Marin county, for his examination, certification, and transmission to the secretary of state.

Petitioners base their claims of right to be nominated as such candidates by direct petition of electors, and to have their names as such nominees printed upon the ballots at the November election upon section 1188 of the Political Code and the provisions of the Direct Primary Law therein referred to. The respondent contends that neither in the statutes referred to nor in any other law of this state has the Legislature provided for the direct nomination by petition of candidates for presidential electors. He further contends that there is no provision in our laws for the nomination of several such candidates in a group by means of a single set of nomination papers.

Section 1188 reads as follows:

"A candidate for any public office for which no nonpartisan candidate has been nominated at any primary election may be nominated subsequent to said primary election, or in lieu of any primary election, in the manner following: A nomination paper containing the name of the candidate to be nominated, with other information required to be given in the nomination papers provided for in the Direct Primary Law then governing primary elections, shall be signed by electors residing within the district or political subdivision for which the candidate is to be presented, equal in number to at least one per cent. of the entire vote cast at the last preceding general election in the state, district or political subdivision for which the nomination is to be made subject to the restrictions contained in said Direct Primary Law. The provisions of said Direct Primary Law as therein applied to nonpartisan offices, when the nomination to be made under this section is for an office for which nominations are made at the August primary election, and the provisions of that law as therein applied to primaries other than the August primary election and the May presidential primary election, when the nomination to be made under this section is for a municipal office or for any office to which that law does not apply, shall substantially govern as to the manner of the appointment of verification deputies, the form of nomination papers and the securing of signatures thereto, and fastening together of sections of the nomination paper containing such signatures, and the filing thereof with the county clerk, or the certification thereto by the county clerk and transmission thereof to the secretary of state or to the city clerk or secretary of the legislative body of any municipality, as the case may be, the filing of the candidate's affidavit, the payment of a filing fee, and all other things necessary to get the name of a candidate under this section upon the ballot, except that such provisions shall be directed toward getting the candidate's name on the ballot for a general or municipal election or a special election and not on the ballot for nomination at a primary election. In addition to the other matter required to be set forth on the candidate's nomination paper, it must also be set forth that each signer thereof did not vote at the primary election immediately preceding at which a candidate was nominated for the public office mentioned in said nomination paper; provided, that this statement shall be omitted in case no candidate was nominated at said primary election for the public office mentioned in said nomination paper.

"Upon the filing of a sufficient nomination paper and affidavit by any candidate nominated under the provisions of this section and the payment of the filing fees as hereinbefore provided, the name of such candidates shall go upon the ballot at the ensuing general or municipal election according to the provisions of section one thousand one hundred ninety-seven of this Code."

It will be noted that the section is composed of four sentences, only the first two having an important bearing upon the questions here involved. The first sentence purports to grant the substantive right, and specifies its limitations and restrictions. It provides, in substance, as follows:

> "A candidate for any public office for which no nonpartisan candidate has been nominated at any primary election may be nominated * * * in the manner following: * * * [by means of nomination papers signed by the requisite number of electors], subject to the restrictions contained in said direct primary law."

The second sentence specifies the procedural requirements necessary to be complied with by a candidate who would avail himself of the substantive right accorded by the provisions of the first sentence. For this purpose it divides all of such candidates into two classes, and prescribes (by reference) one code of procedure to be followed by all of such candidates within one of the designated classes and another and different code of procedure to be followed by all candidates of the other class. Under this section, if the candidate aspires to an office for which nominations are made at the August primary, he must follow and conform to the procedural provisions of the Direct Primary Law as applied to nonpartisan offices. If he is seeking a nomination to a municipal office or to any other office to which the Direct Primary Law does not apply, he must follow and conform to the requirements of that law as applied to primaries other than the August or May presidential primary. Counsel for petitioners has so analyzed the provisions of this sentence, and has graphically presented the result of the analysis in his brief in the manner following:

Class.	Procedure.
1. Office for which nominations are made at August primary.	Nonpartisan provisions of direct primary law.
2. (a) Municipal office. (b) One to which direct primary law does not apply.	Provisions of direct primary law as therein applied to primaries other than the August and May.

It is at once apparent that petitioners do not come within the second class either in subdivision (a) or (b) thereof, inasmuch as they are not seeking nomination to a municipal office or to an office to which the direct primary law does not apply. They frankly concede this, and urge that by a process of liberal construction they can be regarded as candidates for an office for which nominations are made at the August primary. In support of this contention they point to section 3 of the Direct Primary Act (St. 1913, p. 1382), which provides that:

> "The August primary election shall be held * * * for the nomination of all candidates to be voted for at the ensuing November election."

If this provision were to be regarded as controlling and to be construed literally, it would have the effect of excluding all independent nominations and limit the voting at the November election to those candidates alone who are nominated at the August primary. When other provisions of the primary law are referred to, it is at once apparent that such was not the purpose or intent of this provision. Petitioners argue that presidential electors are in effect "nominated at the August primary," even though indirectly through the subagency of a state convention. The acceptance of this contention would necessitate the ignoring of various other provisions in the Direct Primary Law. That law is defined in its title as "An act to provide for and regulate primary elections, and providing a method for choosing the delegates for political parties to state conventions and for nominating electors of President and Vice President of the United States." (Italics added.) The August primary election is therein defined (section 1, subd. 2) as "the primary election held in August to nominate candidates to be voted for at the ensuing November election or to elect members of a party central committee or delegates to a party convention." (Italics added.) Section 2 provides:

> "All candidates nominated at a primary election for elective public offices shall be nominated by direct vote at such election held in accordance with the provisions of this act; provided, that electors of President and Vice President of the United States shall be nominated as provided in subdivision two of section twenty-four of this act."

Subdivision 2 of section 24 provides for the holding of a state party convention of each political party, the delegates to which are composed in part of the candidates of such party for legislative offices who were nominated as such at the August primary, in part of delegates who were elected as such at the August primary, and in part of "hold-over senators" who were neither elected nor nominated at such primary. The functions of such convention are to formulate the state platform of the party, to elect a state central committee, and in presidential years to nominate the candidates of such party for electors of President and Vice President. The candidates for presidential electors so nominated cannot be justly said to have been nominated at the August primary. The most that can be said is that some (though not all) of the persons who afterwards engage in the selection of such candidates are nominated at the August primary, while others of such persons are elected at such primary, and others of them were involved in the primary in no manner at all. Those of the delegates to the state convention who are in fact either nominated or elected at the primary are in no wise committed to the candidacies of any particular persons for presidential electors. Until the state convention has been held in September no one can know who are to be the nominees for presidential elector, and, if such convention should not be held, there would be no such nominees.

[1] The question then arises whether, viewing section 1188 as a whole and applying to it a broad and liberal construction, we can arrive at the conclusion that the Legislature intended to provide thereby a means for the independent nomination by petition of candidates for presidential elector. This question is to be resolved by a consideration of the language of the section in the light of its legislative history and in comparison with the other provisions of our statutes relating to the subject-matter thereof. If the first sentence stood alone, it might be concluded that the Legislature intended it to apply to the office of presidential elector (assuming that to be a public office). But in that case we should also have to conclude that the legislative intent to provide a means for the independent nomination of candidates by petition had failed, being rendered nugatory by its uncertainty and ambiguity. This by reason of the provision thereof that the signing of nomination papers therein provided for is made "subject to the restrictions contained in said Direct Primary Law." Turning to that law we find therein three different sets of restrictions as to the manner of the appointment of verification deputies, the form of nomination papers, the securing of signatures thereto, and the filing and certification thereof. Each of these three sets of restrictions differs from each of the others in material respects. One set of restrictions applies to what may be termed partisan offices, the nominations for which are made at the August primary. The second applies to what may be termed nonpartisan offices, the nominations for which are made at the August primary, and the third applies to offices for which nominations are made otherwise than at the August or May presidential primary. If, therefore, the first sentence of section 1188 stood alone, the candidates, their supporters, and the public officers having to do with the matter of such nominations would be left entirely in the dark as to which set of restrictions should be referred to for the purpose of determining whether or not a would-be candidate had complied with the requirements of the law. When we refer to the second sentence of section 1188, however, we find that all these doubts and uncertainties are there resolved and cleared away as to the procedure for the nomination of candidates for all offices other than presidential elector. It is there prescribed that certain specified restrictions contained in the Direct Primary Law shall govern as to candidates for all offices for which nominations are made at the August primary, and that certain other specified restrictions shall govern as to municipal offices and all others to which the Direct Primary Law does not apply. These two classes include all public offices of the state of California or any governmental subdivision thereof, with the sole exception of presidential elector (assuming that to be a public office). The remaining provisions of section 1188 cast no light at all upon the question here under consideration. The conclusion thus seems inevitable when we read the first and second sentences, each in the light of the other, that the Legislature did not intend to provide thereby a means for the independent nomination of presidential electors.

A consideration of the legislative history of section 1188 and of the Direct Primary Law tends to confirm this conclusion. Certainly those two statutes must be considered together and construed together as in pari materia, each referring to and supplementing the other. Prior to the enactment of the Direct Primary Law section 1188 contained within itself all of the necessary procedural provisions for the independent nomination of candidates for the offices within its purview. Stats. 1907, p. 657. Upon the enactment of the Direct Primary Law in 1911, section 1188 was at the same time amended by eliminating the procedural provisions therefrom and substituting a provision for the appointment of verification deputies "under the provisions of section 5 of the Primary Law." Stats. 1911, p. 897. In 1913 the Direct Primary Law was amended, and at the same time section 1188 was amended so as to provide:

> "For the purposes of this section the provisions of said Direct Primary Law, as said sections apply to the nominees for judicial, school, county, and township officers, shall substantially govern as to the manner of the appointment of verification deputies, * * *" etc. Stats. 1913, p. 1168.

In 1917 both statutes were again amended (St. 1917, p. 1341) concurrently to read as at present. It is reasonable to suppose that, if the Legislature had intended to provide in section 1188 for the independent nomination of presidential electors and to prescribe the procedural provisions therefor in the Direct Primary Law, there would be found in the latter some provision for the group nomination of candidates. But no such provision can be found therein. On the contrary, every phrase and expression contained in that entire statute which throws any light upon this question tends to indicate the legislative intent that separate nomination papers must be signed and filed in behalf of each candidate seeking to avail himself of its provisions. The words and expressions indicating such intent are too numerous for quotation here. They are found in nearly every line of the first three subdivisions of section 5 of the Direct Primary Law and in numerous places in the succeeding portions thereof. There is every reason, however, why candidates for presidential electors should be nominated in groups. The law expressly prescribes that their names shall be placed upon the ballot in groups so arranged that a single vote may be cast for all the candidates within such group. Pol. Code, § 1197. That the Legislature was not unaware of the wisdom of providing for group nomination of candidates in cases where such procedure is desirable is evidenced by the provisions of the presidential primary act which, while providing that the procedure to be followed shall be "substantially as provided in the Direct Primary Law," contains also an express provision for the grouping of candidates upon a single set of nomination papers. The omission of any similar provision from section 1188 strongly indicates that presidential electors were not within the contemplation of the Legislature in framing that section.

The decision of this court in Wheeler v. Hall, 188 Cal. 49, 204 Pac. 231, seems, at first blush, to be in conflict with this conclusion, but I think that upon analysis it will be found not to conflict therewith. The question there concerned the right of a group of candidates for a board of freeholders to be nominated as a group by a single set of nomination papers, and this court disposed of that question by the terse statement that "there is no provision in the law that forbids several candidates for such an office, not exceeding the whole number to be elected, from having their names inserted in a single nomination paper and circulating it in that form." The question there arose under the provisions of section 7½ of article 11 of the Constitution, which provides that "candidates for election as members of said board of freeholders shall be nominated by petition, substantially in the same manner as may be provided by general law for the nomination, by petition of electors, of candidates for county offices, to be voted for at general elections." The court was therefore constrained to make some practicable application of the procedural provisions of the Direct Primary Law, regardless of whether or not the Legislature had intended those provisions to apply thereto. In fact, the Legislature did not so intend, as it expressly provided in the Direct Primary Law that "this act shall not apply to * * * the nomination of freeholders to be elected for the purpose of framing a charter." Direct Primary Law, § 2; Stats. 1913, p. 1382; Stats. 1917, p. 1344. The question before the court in the Wheeler Case, therefore, was not a question of the legislative intent as to whether the procedural provisions of the Direct Primary Law should be applied to the nomination of freeholders, because the Legislature had unequivocally declared its intent that they should not. It was a question of giving practical effect to the mandate of the people as embodied in the Constitution and of necessarily overriding the legislative intent in so doing. In the instant case, however, we are solely concerned with ascertaining and giving effect to the legislative intent.

[2] A resort to the ordinary rules of statutory construction leads to the same conclusion. The rule which requires us to construe the co-ordinate provisions of a legislative enactment so as to give some effect to each, if reasonably possible so to do, leads to the conclusion that the phrase "any public office" in the first sentence was not intended to apply to presidential electors, as to hold otherwise would be to conclude that the Legislature had failed to effectuate its intent. The same result obtains if we apply the rule that several co-ordinate provisions of a statute shall be so construed, if reasonably possible, that they shall harmonize rather than conflict with one another. If, on the other hand, it should be concluded that there is here an irreconcilable conflict, the rule would apply that the provision last in point of time or place should prevail, and the same result would be reached.

I think it not at all unreasonable to suppose that the Legislature in framing and adopting this section did not consider that the office, or position, or duty, or charge, or trust, of a presidential elector is a public office of this state. The question whether it does constitute such an office is at best not free from doubt. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the cases of In re Green, 134 U. S. 377, 10 Sup. Ct. 586, 33 L. Ed. 951, and McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U. S. 35, 13 Sup. Ct. 3, 36 L. Ed. 869, did not hold that a presidential elector is a state officer, nor even that he is a public officer. They hold merely that he is not a federal officer. The janitor of a city hall is not a federal officer, but it does not follow that he is a state officer. The Supreme Court of Kentucky has held that presidential electors are public officers of that state within the meaning of certain of its statutes. Hodge v. Bryan, 149 Ky. 110, 148 S. W. 21. That case was decided upon the authority of an earlier decision of the same court by a divided court, in which the dissenting opinion is to my mind the better and more soundly reasoned. Todd v. Johnson, 99 Ky. 548, 36 S. W. 987. The Supreme Court of Idaho has held in a well-reasoned opinion that presidential electors are not state officers. State v. Gifford, 22 Idaho, 613, 126 Pac. 1060. The definitions of office and officer vary widely in the different states and even in the several decisions of the same court. One of the broadest of the definitions which have found support in the authorities is "an employment on behalf of the government, in any station or public trust, not merely transient, occasional, or incidental." 29 Cyc. 1363, note 16. See, also, 7 Words and Phrases, First Series, pp. 6635–6638. A conclusion generally accepted by the later authorities, including the courts of this state, is that a public office involves a delegation to the individual of some of the sovereign functions of government to be exercised by him for the benefit of the public. 29 Cyc. 1363, note 18; 6 Words and Phrases, First Series, p. 4925. This court in its earlier decisions approved definitions which it later found necessary to discard as too broad. In Vaughn v. English, 8 Cal. 39, it was said that—

> "The term officer, in its common acceptation, is sufficiently comprehensive to include all persons in any public station or employment conferred by government."

That definition would, of course, include presidential electors as well as the city hall janitor. The case of Palmer v. Woodbury, 14 Cal. 43, involved the question whether or not a pilot appointed by the board of pilot commissioners was a public officer, and the court said:

> "It is difficult to conceive of a definition of a public office which would not embrace this appointment. The pilots are appointed by virtue of an act of the Legislature; have a fixed term to their employments; have definite duties prescribed; fixed rates of compensation; are required to give bond, and are entitled to do all the business of pilots for the harbor of San Francisco. They are subject to penalties for misfeasance and malfeasance, and are protected by law in the enjoyment of their offices and emoluments."

Later, in the leading case of Patton v. Board of Health, 127 Cal. 388, 59 Pac. 702, 78 Am. St. Rep. 66, this court entered into a careful consideration of the question what constitutes a public office in this state, and arrived at the following conclusion:

> "It seems to be reasonably well settled that where the Legislature creates the position, prescribes the duties, and fixes the compensation, and these duties pertain to the public and are continuing and permanent, not occasional or temporary, such position or employment is an office and he who occupies it is an officer. In such a case, there is an unmistakable declaration by the Legislature that some portion, great or small, of the sovereign functions of government are to be exercised for the benefit of the public, and the Legislature has decided for itself that the employment is of sufficient dignity and importance to be deemed to be an office." (Italics added.)

The point was also emphasized in that case that the duties of the office there under consideration "cannot be said to be unimportant or purely ministerial, or lacking in the requirements of judgment and discretion." In the recent case of Coulter v. Pool, 187 Cal. 181, 201 Pac. 120, this court entered upon a careful and thorough reconsideration of the questions involved in the use of the phrases "public office" and "public officer," and arrived at the following conclusions:

> "A public office is ordinarily and generally defined to be the right, authority, and duty, created and conferred by law, the tenure of which is not transient, occasional, or incidental, by which for a given period an individual is invested with power to perform a public function for the benefit of the public. State v. Jennings, 57 Ohio St. 415 (63 Am. St. Rep. 723, 49 N. E. 404). A public officer is a public agent, and as such acts only on behalf of his principal, the public, whose sanction is generally considered as necessary to give the act performed by the officer the authority and power of a public act or law. The most general characteristic of a public officer, which distinguishes him from a mere employee, is that a public duty is delegated and intrusted to him, as agent, the performance of which is an exercise of a part of the governmental functions of the particular political unit for which he, as agent, is acting. There are other incidents which ordinarily distinguish a public officer, such, for instance, as a fixed tenure of position, the exaction of a public oath of office and, perhaps, an official bond, the liability to be called to account as a public offender for misfeasance or nonfeasance in office and the payment of his salary from the general county treasury." (Italics added.)

The conclusions there reached have been followed in Foucht v. Hirni, 57 Cal. App. 685, 208 Pac. 362, and Curtin v. State of California, 61 Cal. App. 377, 390, 214 Pac. 1030. It is difficult, perhaps impossible, to frame a definition of public office or public officer which will be sufficiently accurate, both as to its inclusion and its exclusion, to meet the requirements of all cases. But two elements now seem to be almost universally regarded as essential thereto. First, a tenure of office "which is not transient, occasional, or incidental," but is of such a nature that the office itself is an entity in which incumbents succeed one another and which does not cease to exist with the termination of incumbency, and, second, the delegation to the officer of some portion of the sovereign functions of government, eitther legislative, executive, or judicial. If these elements are essential to a public office, it follows that presidential electors are not public officers, and are therefore wholly without the purview of section 1188. But I am not prepared to go the length of holding that presidential electors are not public officers. There are approved definitions sufficiently broad to include them as such. A definition sufficiently accurate to meet the requirements of one case may be found inadequate to another. The real question herein is, not whether presidential electors are public officers, but whether the Legislature in using the phrase "a candidate for any public office" in section 1188 intended thereby to make the provisions of that section applicable to presidential electors. It may be conceded that they are public officers, and still it is not unreasonable to suppose that the Legislature in framing that section did not so regard them. They have no tenure of office other than transient; they have no duties to perform which involve the exercise of judgment or discretion in the slightest degree, and neither are they vested with any portion of the governmental powers of sovereignty, either legislative, executive, or judicial. Their office, if it be an office, has no real existence except for a few hours on the second Monday in January following the presidential election. Their sole function is to perform a service which has come to be nothing more than clerical—to cast, certify, and transmit a vote already predetermined. It was originally supposed by the framers of our national Constitution that the electors would exercise an independent choice, based upon their individual judgment. But, in practice so long established as to be recognized as part of our unwritten law, they have been "selected under a moral restraint to vote for some particular person who represented the preferences of the appointing power" (Miller, Const. U. S. p. 149), "simply to register the will of the appointing power in respect of a particular candidate" (McPherson v. Blacker, supra). They are in effect no more than messengers whose sole duty it is to certify and transmit the election returns. In this respect their powers, duties, and functions seem not greatly different from those of the messenger provided for in Political Code, § 1310, and, like him, they are entitled to compensation for the services rendered upon presentation of an account therefor, certified by the secretary of state, audited by the controller, and paid out of the general fund in the state treasury. Pol. Code, §§ 1312, 1322. What is here said is not intended to reflect in any wise upon the character, qualities, or standing of the petitioners or of those persons who have been selected by the several state conventions as candidates for presidential electors. It is well known that such candidates are commonly chosen with a view to their high qualities of character and reputation, but the fact remains that the sole public duty to be performed by them after election involves no exercise of judgment or discretion and no portion of the "sovereign powers of government." It was probably out of consideration for the circumstance that by the unwritten law the sole function of presidential electors is to "represent the preferences of the appointing power" that the Legislature in abolishing the convention system and substituting therefor the direct primary for the nomination of candidates for all state offices has always excepted presidential electors from the operation of the substituted system. It seems evident that the Legislature in framing and adopting section 1188 did not regard presidential electors as public officers, and had no intention of providing therein for their nomination. The plainly indicated legislative policy is that candidates for presidential electors shall be nominated only at a state convention of a party or political organization, at which a party platform shall be formulated, candidates for President and Vice President indorsed, and a group of electors selected who shall be identified as representing the policies expressed in such platform and as committed to the candidacies so indorsed. The platform so formulated may not accord with the national platform of such party, and the candidates for President and for Vice President so indorsed may not be those who were nominated at the national convention of such party. Sbarboro v. Jordan, 164 Cal. 51, 127 Pac. 170. But, in any event, the presidential electors so nominated are understood to represent and to be committed to the party policies and the presidential and vice presidential candidacies so indorsed at such state convention. Upon this understanding the voters predicate their choice for presidential electors at the November election. Some significance is no doubt to be attached to the circumstance that in section 1197 it is provided that "the names of candidates for the office of electors for President and Vice President shall be arranged in groups. * * *" Even if the Legislature in using the word "office" in that connection had used it with the particular intent of thus creating a public office, it would not ex proprio vigore have had such effect. Coulter v. Pool, supra. There is no reason for supposing that by using the word "office" as it was used in section 1197 the Legislature intended to create thereby a public office. That section is wholly concerned with provisions designating the form of the ballot and the order in which the names shall appear thereon, and it is apparent that the word "office" was there used merely as a convenient means of expressing the legislative intent as to the manner in which the names of candidates for presidential electors should be printed upon the ballot, and for no other purpose. The suggestion has been made that by a process of liberal construction it can be concluded that candidates for presidential electors may be nominated according to the form and in the manner specified in section 5, subdivision 3, of the Direct Primary Law. I am unable by any process of reasoning to arrive at this conclusion, but, assuming it to be correct, we must also conclude, I think, that the petitioners herein have not brought themselves within the terms of that section and subdivision. It provides:

> "Verification deputies appointed as provided in subdivision 2 of this section * * * may * * * obtain signatures to such nomination paper of such candidate for such office. * * *"

Subdivision 2 provides that the five electors who join in proposing a candidate for nomination must be registered as intending to affiliate with the same political party, and that they must make affidavit to this effect, which was not done in the instant case. Subdivision 3 provides that "only qualified electors of such county or city and county, registered as intending to affiliate with the political party by which the nomination is to be made shall be competent to sign such section," and that the signer shall make affidavit that he has registered as intending to affiliate with such party, which has not been done herein. The only exception to the universal application of these requirements is "when the office for which the candidate is proposed is a judicial, school, county, township, or municipal office. * * *" And plainly the office of presidential elector, if it be an office, does not come within this exception.

[3] It has been suggested that the conclusion here reached operates to limit unjustifiably the right of suffrage. In my opinion it does not so operate. It operates to limit, not the right of suffrage, but the privilege accorded to candidates of having their names printed upon the ballot. If that privilege be not accorded to these petitioners, every qualified elector of the state will nevertheless have the right and the opportunity to cast his vote for them at the general election by writing their names upon the ballot in the spaces which will be provided thereon for that purpose. I agree, of course, that the exercise of the right of suffrage in this manner is less easy and convenient than it would be if the voter were enabled by stamping a single cross in a square to cast his ballot in favor of thirteen candidates, and that the right to pursue the easier and more convenient method, if it were accorded by the provisions of the law, would be in the nature of a substantial right, to be secured, if necessary, by action of the courts. But the Legislature has seen fit, indeed of necessity has been required, to prescribe certain conditions and restrictions as a condition precedent to the exercise of such right, with which conditions and restrictions petitioners herein have failed to comply. In subdivision 9 (b) of section 1 of the Direct Primary Law (St. 1917, p. 1343) is prescribed a mode of procedure by which could have been accomplished the nomination of a group of candidates for presidential electors other than as candidates for one of the existing political parties, and as a result of which the names of such candidates would have been printed in a group upon the ballot at the November election. In prescribing such conditions the Legislature acted well within its constitutional powers. Const. art. 2, § 2½; Socialist Party v. Uhl, 155 Cal. 776, 103 Pac. 181; Hart v. Jordan, 168 Cal. 321, 143 Pac. 537; Don v. Pfister, 172 Cal. 25, 155 Pac. 60; Heney v. Jordan, 179 Cal. 24, 175 Pac. 402. The case of People v. Smith, 206 N. Y. 231, 99 N. E. 568, which was governed by the provisions of the New York Constitution, and the cases of Eaton v. Brown, 96 Cal. 371, 31 Pac. 250, 17 L. R. A. 697, 31 Am. St. Rep. 225, and Murphy v. Curry, 137 Cal. 479, 70 Pac. 461, 59 L. R. A. 97, which were decided prior to the adoption of article 2, section 2½, of our Constitution, cannot be regarded as authority to the contrary.

I agree that for the purpose of ascertaining the meaning and effect of section 1188 it is our duty to give a liberal construction to its terms and provisions. But the legislative mandate commands no more liberal construction of this section than of every other section to be found in any of the Codes. Pol. Code, § 4; Civ. Code, § 4; Pen. Code, § 4; Code of Civ. Proc. § 4. The command for a liberal construction found in the Direct Primary Law is limited in its application by its own terms to that statute, and the legislative solicitude there expressd is in behalf of "the real will of the electors," not in behalf of candidates or would-be candidates. That act contains numerous and detailed provisions and restrictions prescribing the things which must be done and which must not be done by one who would become a candidate at an election. Notwithstanding the mandate for liberality contained in that act, it is manifest that one who would avail himself thereof to procure the placing of his name upon the ballot at an election must comply, at least substantially, with those provisions, requirements, and restrictions. To hold otherwise would be to nullify those provisions and thus defeat the main purpose of the act. I believe that it would be our duty, in the absence of any legislative mandate, to apply a liberal construction to such provisions as are here under consideration, but I am of the opinion that to construe section 1188 as providing for the nomination of presidential electors would "require an unwarranted reading into the law of language not put there by the Legislature and not necessitated either by reason of ambiguity or obvious error." Street v. Bertolone (Cal. Sup.) 226 Pac. 913. As we said in another recent case:

> "Courts are not clothed with legislative power. * * * We are not at liberty to extend the application of the law to subjects not included within it either by express language or by fair implication." In re Okahara (Cal. Sup.) 216 Pac. 614.

There may be good reasons for concluding that the best interests of the people of the state would be served by making provision for the independent nomination of candidates for presidential electors, but, if the Legislature in its wisdom has not seen fit to so provide, this court has no right to supply the omission.

The petition is denied, and the alternative writ discharged.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; SHENK, J.; WASTE, J.

LENNON, J. I dissent. The writ, in my opinion, should issue. Independent candidates seeking independent nominations, whether they be standing for the highest or for the lowest of our public offices, should be accorded the same consideration that is accorded to candidates who are pledged to the policies of a party.

The question involved in this cause is undeniably of great importance to the people. Their right of suffrage is involved, and the right of suffrage, in a democracy, is, or ought to be, inviolable. The only conclusion to be drawn from the prevailing opinion is that section 1188 of the Political Code, under which independent nominations for "any public office" may be made, applies to every office within the gift of the people, save and except the highest office, and that, where the highest is concerned, the people are wholly without right to make independent nominations. With this conclusion I cannot agree.

In California independent nominations for public office are made pursuant to the provisions of section 1188 of the Political Code, this section being specifically referred to by the Direct Primary Law. So desirous were the makers of the Direct Primary Law to protect independent candidacies, and to facilitate independent nominations, they wrote into it this clause:

> "Nothing herein shall be construed as prohibiting the independent nomination of candidates as provided by section 1188 of the Political Code." Section 5, subd. 9, Direct Primary Law. (Italics added.)

What is here to be considered is whether or not section 1188 of the Political Code permits and adequately provides for the independent nomination of candidates for the office of presidential elector—this office being a state office and not a federal office. Pol. Code, § 1197; Donelan v. Bird, 118 Ky. 178, 80 S. W. 796; Hodge v. Bryan, 149 Ky. 110, 148 S. W. 21; Todd v. Johnson, 99 Ky. 548, 36 S. W. 987, 33 L. R. A. 399; In re Green, 134 U. S. 377, 10 Sup. Ct. 586, 33 L. Ed. 951; McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U. S. 1, 35, 13 Sup. Ct. 3, 36 L. Ed. 869.

An analysis of section 1188 of the Political Code will reveal that it is made up of four sentences, each of which makes provision for certain very definite things.

The first sentence provides for the independent nomination of a candidate for any public office for which no nonpartisan candidate has been nominated at any primary election. It reads as follows:

> "A candidate for any public office for which no nonpartisan candidate has been nominated at any primary election may be nominated subsequent to said primary election, or in lieu of any primary election, in the manner following: A nomination paper containing the name of the candidate to be nominated, with other information required to be given in the nomination papers provided for in the Direct Primary Law then governing primary elections, shall be signed by electors residing within the district or political subdivision for which the candidate is to be presented, equal in number to at least one per cent. of the entire vote cast at the last preceding general election in the state, district or political subdivision for which the nomination is to be made subject to the restrictions contained in said Direct Primary Law." (Italics added.)

The second sentence specifies two things: First, the law that shall govern the appointment of verification deputies, and other routine matters, when the independent nomination is made for an office for which nominations are made at the August primary election, in which case those portions of the Direct Primary Law which apply to nonpartisan offices shall govern as to the routine matters set forth in the body of the sentence; and, secondly, the law that shall govern the appointment of verification deputies and other routine matters when the independent nomination is for a municipal office or for an office to which the Direct Primary Law does not apply, in which case those provisions of the Direct Primary Law which apply to primaries other than the August primary election and the May presidential primary election shall govern as to the routine matters set forth in the body of the sentence.

The third and fourth sentences specify matters that must be included in the independent candidate's nomination paper in addition to the matter specified in the first sentence, and the manner in which the candidate's name shall go upon the ballot when his nomination paper has been properly filed.

Certainly the office of presidential elector is a partisan office. Certainly, therefore, no nonpartisan candidate or group of candidates has been nominated for this office at a primary election. Our August primaries do not bring about the nomination of candidates for the office of presidential elector. Our August primaries do not indicate, in their results, the identity of the candidates who are to go upon the ballot in the November election, in so far as the office of presidential elector is concerned. The manner of the nomination of presidential electors, aside from independent nominations under section 1188, Political Code, is described in the Direct Primary Law (section 2 and subdivision 2 of section 24), wherein party conventions are made necessary, and wherein the fashion of the functioning of those conventions is set forth.

All that our August primaries do is to select the delegates who are to attend those conventions, and none of the delegates so selected is pledged to any candidate for the office of presidential elector, nor is any delegate bound to vote in those conventions for any candidate save the candidate of his personal preference; and therefore no man may know, after the August primaries and until the decisions of the conventions, who the presidential electors of his party are to be. If the convention did not ever convene, no presidential electors would be nominated, and the mere fact that the August primaries set those conventions in motion by giving them a personnel cannot rightly be made the premise for a conclusion that the electors are nominated in August, or at any other time before the conventions meet.

The second sentence of the section has no bearing upon the independent nomination of candidates for the office of presidential elector, since this office is not one, as has been seen, for which nominations are made at the August primary election, neither is it a municipal office nor an office to which the Direct Primary Law does not apply, and those portions of the Direct Primary Law governing the appointment of verification deputies and other procedural phases of a nomination referred to in this sentence do not apply to this sort of a nomination.

It is obvious that the office of presidential elector is not a municipal office, and, since the Direct Primary Law itself makes provision for the nomination of presidential electors by means of the convention system, it is also obvious that it is not an office to which the Direct Primary Law does not apply.

The Direct Primary Law of the state of California is a liberal enactment. Its purpose is to give wide scope to the right of suffrage. By its own definite pronouncements it is to be liberally construed "so that the real will of the electors shall not be defeated." Direct Primary Law, § 1, subd. 9.

Liberally to construe legislation requires that its language shall be given a fair and a reasonable meaning in the light of the object of the legislation. Lawrence v. McCalmont, 2 How. 426, 11 L. Ed. 326. This court has heretofore declared in unmistakable terms that "the purpose of the statutory provision [sec. 1188, Pol. Code] concerning nominations by certificate is * * * to permit absolutely independent nominations of persons as candidates who have no political affiliations with any party, and who do not intend to form a party, but who become candidates for reasons personal to themselves or to those who sign the certificates." Partridge v. Devoto, 148 Cal. 167, 170, 82 Pac. 775, 777. Let it be noted that the petitioners here are seeking independent nominations without regard to political party affiliations.

The liberal construction of a statute negatives any strict, narrow, ungenerous, or literal interpretation. And a liberal construction of section 1188 leads to the conclusion that the Legislature did not intend to exclude the office of presidential elector from the list of those offices to which independent nominations may be made. This section of the Political Code is inseparably bound up and interwoven with the Direct Primary Law; the Direct Primary Law refers to it as providing the manner and the means whereby independent nominations shall be made, and by this reference incorporates the section within itself.

A reading of this section in its entirety, always giving it the liberal interpretation to which, by the provisions of the Direct Primary Law, it is entitled, "so that the real will of the electors shall not be defeated," and always bearing in mind that the Direct Primary Law commands, without equivocation, that "nothing herein shall be construed as prohibiting the independent nomination of candidates as provided by section 1188 of the Political Code," compels the conclusion that provision for the independent nomination of candidates for the office of presidential elector, in the manner in which that nomination is sought to be made by the petitioners, is found in the first sentence of the section.

According to that sentence "a candidate for any public office" (that is to say, a candidate for the public office of presidential elector) "for which no nonpartisan candidate has been nominated at any primary election (which is the situation here exactly), "may be nominated subsequent to said primary election, or in lieu of any primary election" (that is to say, in place of a primary election, or in the absence of a primary election, which is what the petitioners seek to do), "in the manner following * * *" (and then follows a description of the mechanics of the nomination).

These views are rightfully taken of the section as a whole or as it has been analyzed, if it be remembered that the section is to be liberally construed and that its purpose is not to restrict the right of independent nominations but to foster that right. To take the view that the section contains a bar to the independent nomination of presidential electors is to read into that section that which is not there; indeed, it is to defeat the very purpose of the section, which was and is to make possible the independent nomination of candidates for any office for which no nonpartisan candidate has been nominated at a primary. In order that the real will of the voters shall not be defeated the intent of the section should be carried out, and that intent is made plain by the words "in lieu of any primary election" in the opening sentence of the section. There has not been in this state any primary election for the office of presidential elector.

The provision of section 5, subdivision 9, of the Direct Primary Law, which declares, "Nothing herein shall be construed as prohibiting the independent nomination of candidates as provided by section 1188 of the Political Code, as said section reads at the time of said nomination," has been held to have reference to attempted nominations under section 1188 of the Political Code, "subsequent" to or "in lieu of any primary election." It means "that a candidate for a party nomination who was defeated at the primary [election] may not have his name placed on the general election ballot as a candidate for the office under the provisions of said section 1188. In other words, the provision as a whole is simply a declaration that nothing in the act shall be construed as prohibiting the independent nomination of candidates subsequent to or in lieu of any primary election, as provided in said section 1188, except that no candidate defeated for a party nomination for such office at the primary may be so nominated." Narver v. Jordan, 173 Cal. 424, 160 Pac. 245. It would seem, therefore, that "in lieu of any primary election," that is, in place of a primary election, independent candidates without party affiliations for the office of presidential elector, which obviously is included in the phrase "any office" found in section 1188 of the Political Code, may be nominated as that section liberally construed provides, by a substantial compliance—as far as it is possible for independent candidates without party affiliations—with the procedure provided in section 5, subdivision 3, of the Direct Primary Law.

To hold that it is not possible to make independent nominations for the office of presidential elector because this office is not mentioned by name in section 1188 would be to limit unjustifiably the right of suffrage. The right of suffrage, which is a constitutional guaranty not lightly to be disregarded, involves and is bound up with the right to make nominations. A legislature, indeed, has not the power to impose unreasonable, unnecessary, or impossible restrictions which may tend to deprive independent bodies of voters of equality of opportunity in the making of nominations. People v. Smith, 206 N. Y. 231, 99 N. E. 568, 571. Our Legislature, it should be noted, not only has not attempted to restrict the right of suffrage, but has sought to give to the citizenry the greatest possible freedom in the matter of making both party nominations and nominations independent of parties. And it should be the policy of courts to protect that freedom and even to encourage it by a liberal construction of our election laws in favor of the right of the voter. This court itself has given approval to the decision of one of our appellate courts wherein it is said:

> "The right of qualified citizens to vote at all elections is the fundamental right upon which our government is founded. To justify a court in holding that the people of the state have surrendered or abridged that right, their intent to do so must appear with great certainty and clearness." People ex rel., etc., v. Elkus, 59 Cal. App. 396, 404, 211 Pac. 34, 38.

Obviously, a restriction upon the right to make nominations is a restriction upon the right to vote. Certainly our election laws were intended to accord equal consideration to all candidates. If this was not the intention of our law, section 1188, Political Code, would never have become legislation, and would now be meaningless. Since the petitioners should be afforded the opportunity which the law provides to make nominations for presidential electors, it follows that the voters should be afforded the opportunity to cast their ballots, if they desire to do so, for the petitioners' nominees as a group. Section

1197 of the Political Code, indeed, makes provision for group voting for presidential electors, and it has been held by this court that—

> "There is no force in the objection that the nomination paper filed in behalf of said candidates is faulty because separate nomination papers were not circulated and signed for each of the candidates, and that a single nomination paper containing all their names should not have been circulated and signed by the voters. There is no provision in the law that forbids several condidates for such an office, not exceeding the whole number to be elected, from having their names inserted in a single nomination paper and circulating it in that form. We therefore hold that it does not render the nomination paper defective." Wheeler v. Hall, 188 Cal. 49, 51, 204 Pac. 231, 232.

The question presented in the case last cited, as the prevailing opinion declares, "concerns the right of a group of candidates of a board of freeholders to be nominated as a group by a single set of nomination papers," and, save for the fact that the petitioners, in the instant case, are seeking to be nominated to the office of presidential elector and not for the office of freeholders, there is no possible distinction, it seems to me, between the point presented in the cited case and the proposition presented for decision in the instant case. While it is true, as the prevailing opinion declares, the question was disposed of by this court in a "terse statement," nevertheless it was adequately and correctly disposed of, and the terseness of the statement cannot detract from the correctness of the decision. And that the question of the right of a group of candidates to be nominated as a group by a single set of nomination papers was definitely decided in the case last cited is evidenced by the concluding clause of the decision, wherein it is said, "we therefore hold" that the circulation or signing of single nomination papers containing the names of a group of candidates "does not render the nomination papers defective." If Wheeler v. Hall was good law when it was decided, it is good law now. If it is not good law now it should be directly and definitely overruled.

In so far as the question as to whether or not incumbent presidential electors occupy a public office is concerned (which the prevailing opinion ultimately concedes is not the question here), let it be said that the case of Coulter v. Poole, 187 Cal. 181, 201 Pac. 120, is not at all inconsistent with the views herein expressed to the effect that a presidential elector is a state office. Coulter v. Poole gives expression to a general rule to which there are well-recognized exceptions founded upon other respectable authority which hold that a public office need not have continuance, and that whether or not an office is public is not determined by the fact that an incumbent performs but one act or a series of acts.

Thus it was said in State ex rel. Clark v. Stanley, 66 N. C. 59, 8 Am. Rep. 488:

> "A public office is an agency for the state, and the person whose duty it is to perform this agency is a public officer. This, we consider to be the true definition of a public officer in its original broad sense. The essence of it is, the duty of performing an agency, that is, of doing some act or acts, or series of acts for the state." (Italics added.) "Public officers are usually required to take an oath, and usually a salary or fees are annexed to the office, in which case it is an office 'coupled with an interest.' But the oath and the salary or fees, are mere incidents, and constitute no part of the office: Where no salary or fees are annexed to the office, it is a naked office—honorary—and is supposed to be accepted, merely for the public good. This definition also excludes the idea, that a public office must have continuance. It can make no difference, whether there be but one act, or a series of acts to be done—whether the office expires as soon as the one act is done, or is to be held for years or during good behavior." (Italics added.)

It has been held in effect in this jurisdiction that freeholders, elected by voters of a political subdivision, whose sole duty is to frame a county government charter, are public officers, even though their tenure of office is transitory, during which they function but once. Wheeler v. Hall, supra.

A liberal construction of the statute in question would, it seems to me, compel the conclusion that the word "office," as used in section 1197 of the Political Code and in section 2 of the Direct Primary Law with reference to presidential electors was employed by the Legislature and intended to be understood as meaning an office within the liberal and broad definition of that term. The prevailing opinion declares that "it may be conceded that they [presidential electors] are public officers, and still it is not unreasonable to suppose that the Legislature in framing that section did not so regard them." In view of the further concession in the prevailing opinion that "there are approved definitions sufficiently broad to include them [presidential electors] as such," I am unable to appreciate the reasoning which leads to the conclusion of the prevailing opinion that it is "not unreasonable to suppose that the Legislature * * * did not so regard them." If presidential electors come within any approved definition of public officers, then it seems to me it must necessarily be presumed that the Legislature had that definition in mind. The Legislature has decided for itself that the position of presidential elector is of sufficient dignity and importance to be deemed an office. The designation of a legislative enactment is generally conceded to be indicative of the legislative intent and ordinarily of strong persuasive force in determining whether or not any given position is to be deemed an office, and in a case of this character, where a liberal interpretation is required, it ought to be conclusive of the legislative intent to employ the term "office" in its broad and liberal meaning.

Section 1197 of the Political Code designates the position of presidential elector as office as does section 2 of the Direct Primary Law, and to say, as the prevailing opinion says, that the word "office" as employed in those sections and the phrase "any office" as employed in section 1188 of the Political Code does not mean office, but means something else which is not defined, is the acme of strict construction.

The fact that the form of ballot prescribed and printed in the Political Code, specifically makes, under the head of presidential electors, reservation therein for a blank column in which the names of thirteen independent candidates for presidential elector may be written in, is strongly indicative of the legislative intent to provide for the independent nomination of presidential electors, and tends most strongly to confirm the conclusion that when they referred in other portions of the Direct Primary Law to the "office" of presidential electors they had in mind the broad and liberal definition of the term "office." The prevailing opinion concedes that independent nominations for presidential electors may be made by the "write-in" process. And if this be so, then it seems to me to be inconsistent to say, as does the prevailing opinion, that "the plainly indicated legislative policy is that candidates for presidential electors shall be nominated only at a state convention of a party or a political organization."

But it is idle to pursue this particular phase of the case further. The prevailing opinion does not go so far as to say that a presidential elector does not occupy a public office. The prevailing opinion holds neither one way nor the other on this point. And it would seem that, if the prevailing opinion were forced to a conclusion on this point, the holding would be that the office of presidential elector is a public state office within the liberal and broad meaning of the term.

The assertion of the prevailing opinion that by no process of reasoning may section 5, subdivision 3, of the Direct Primary Law, be applied to the office of presidential elector is, in my opinion, answered by the holding in Partridge v. Devoto, supra, that section 1188 of the Political Code was designed to permit absolutely independent nomination of persons as candidates who have no political affiliations with any party and by the Direct Primary Law itself wherein it is said that no "failure to comply with all the provisions of this law shall defeat its purpose." If this mandate of the Direct Primary Law is to be given a reasonable meaning, that meaning is that independent candidates for independent nomination who have no political affiliations with any party are not to be stayed where they have done all that they can do to comply with the law and that, when they have done that, they have done enough to entitle them to go before the people at the polls.

Moreover, this court should now do that which the prevailing opinion concedes this court was "constrained" to do in the case of Wheeler v. Hall, supra, that is, "make some practicable application of the procedural provisions of the Direct Primary Law" to the end, as the Direct Primary Law itself declares, "that the real will of the electors shall not be defeated." This, it seems to me, could readily and rightfully be done in the instant case, even though the provisions of the Direct Primary Law and the provisions of section 1188 of the Political Code concerning the independent nominations of candidates for "any office" be clumsily and unskillfully drawn. The difficulties presented by the lack of perspicuity in the law under consideration are not insurmountable. The general intent of the law concerning the independent nomination of candidates for "any office" should be carried out, and, if the procedure provided by the statute for the nomination of independent candidates for "any office" be doubtful or defective, because of looseness or ambiguity of expression, appropriate procedure for the preparation and presentation of certificates of nomination for such independent candidates may justly be determined and permitted by analogy from other procedural provisions of the law. There is no just way in such a situation other than that of analogy. Matter of Fagan, 21 Misc. Rep. 403, 47 N. Y. Supp. 288. And this is so because to the right of suffrage, as constitutionally guaranteed, the right to make nominations is essential, and the Legislature may not, intentionally or unintentionally, impose unreasonable, unnecessary, and impossible restrictions which will deprive independent bodies of voters of equality of opportunity in the making nominations. People v. Smith, 206 N. Y. 231, 99 N. E. 568; Eaton v. Brown, 96 Cal. 371, 31 Pac. 250, 17 L. R. A. 697, 31 Am. St. Rep. 225; Murphy v. Curry, 137 Cal. 479, 70 Pac. 461, 59 L. R. A. 97. See, also, concurring opinion of former Chief Justice Angellotti in Socialist Party v. Uhl, 155 Cal. at page 794, 103 Pac. 181.

With reference to the "write-in" process the prevailing opinion concedes "that the exercise of the right of suffrage is less easy and convenient than it would be if the voter were enabled by stamping a single cross in a square to cast his ballot in favor of 13 candidates and that the right to pursue the easier and more convenient method, if it were accorded by the provisions of the law, would be in the nature of a substantial right to be secured, if necessary, by the action of the courts." (Italics added.) If it be less easy, that is to say, more difficult, for the voter to exercise his right of suffrage by the "write-in" process than it would be by permitting independent nominations to go upon the ballot, then it seems to me there is no escape from the conclusion that the Legislature has discriminated against the independent voter by the imposition of a restriction which places him at a decided disadvantage, and here again we are confronted with the fundamental proposition that the Legislature may not impose restrictions upon the right of suffrage which will deprive independent bodies of voters who have no party affiliations of equality of opportunity in the making of nominations.

Plainly, it is the purpose of the prevailing opinion to hold that the office of presidential elector is not an office which the Legislature had in mind when it enacted section 1188 of the Political Code. This, of course, is a purely negative view. And it is a recognized principle of law that courts, in interpreting statutes, should endeavor always to so construe them as to give them an affirmative rather than a negative meaning. When a statute has been enacted, courts should seek to give it vigor, courts should endeavor to give it life rather than to kill it by technical refinements of reasoning which approximate mere negation and are far from liberal. This especially should be the policy of courts in interpreting statutes which declare themselves to be written in a liberal spirit, and which assert that they are to be liberally construed. Indeed, to construe statutes strictly, when the statutes demand a liberal construction, is, in cases of this character, to defeat not only the will of the Legislature but the "real will of the electors" as well.

LAWLOR, J. I dissent. Plainly put, the effect of the decision is that only parties organized at the time of the preceding general election or one coming within paragraph (b), subdivision 9, section 1, of the Direct Primary Law, are entitled to have placed on the general ballot in the November election candidates for electors for President and Vice President, and that, since petitioners did not organize under said paragraph (b), they cannot nominate such electors. In other words, such independent voters not having affiliated with a party could have no voice either in the May or August primaries except as to nonpartisan candidates at the August primary or in nominating electors for the general election. Hence, if they have not organized under said paragraph (b) their only alternative is to enroll under the banner of one of the other parties with whose principles they may not be in sympathy. The right to form a party under said paragraph (b) cannot avail here, for the reason that no such organization was attempted by petitioners.

In a general sense a primary election is a contest within the particular party and a general election a contest between parties. The Direct Primary Law provides:

"Section 1. Words and phrases where used in this act shall, unless such construction be inconsistent with the context, be construed as follows:

"Primary Election.

"1. The words 'primary election,' any and every primary nominating election provided for by this act.

"August Primary Election.

"2. The words 'August primary election,' the primary election held in August to nominate candidates to be voted for at the ensuing November election or to elect members of a party central committee or delegates to a party convention.

"May Primary Election.

"3. The words 'May presidential primary election,' any such primary election, held in May of each year of the general November election at which electors of President and Vive President of the United States are to be chosen, as shall provide for the indication of preference in the several political parties for party candidates for president of the United States through the election of delegates to national party conventions.

"Definition of the Word Election.

"4. The word 'election,' a general state, county, city or city and county election as distinguished from a primary election, recall election, or special election.

"November Election.

"5. The words 'November election,' either the presidential election, or the general state, county, or city and county election held in November of each even numbered year. * * *

"Definition of 'Political Party,' 'Party,' 'Political Organization.'

"9. The word or words 'political party,' 'party,' 'political organization,' or 'organization,' a political party or organization of electors which has qualified, as hereinafter provided, for participation in any primary election; and such party or organization shall be deemed to have so qualified when one or both of the following conditions have been complied with:

"Qualification as Political Party.

"(a) If at the last preceding November election there was polled for any one of its candidates who was the candidate of such party only for any office voted on throughout the state, at least three per cent. of the entire vote of the state, or for any one of its candidates who was the joint candidate of such party and any other party for any office voted on throughout the state, at least six per cent. of the entire vote of the state; or

"(b) If on or before a date which shall be the seventy-fifth day before any primary election, there shall be filed with the secretary of state a petition signed by registered qualified electors of the state, equal in number to at least three per cent. of the entire vote of the state at the last preceding November election, declaring that they represent a political party or organization the name of which shall be stated therein, which party said electors desire to have participate in such primary election. * * *

According to the majority opinion, therefore, only voters affiliated with parties can vote at a primary election except for nonpartisan candidates, and a body of independent voters who conceivably in given situations might constitute a majority of the electorate can have no voice in having candidates placed on the ballot at the general election if they did not proceed under said paragraph (b). The circumstance that such voters are accorded the privilege of voting at the general election for or against the candidates nominated by the parties with which they are not affiliated, or that they may write in the names of candidates of their own, can have no weight in deciding whether electors for President and Vice President may be placed on the November ballot other than as the representatives of a party. Such a discrimination among bodies of citizens should not be accepted unless it is demonstrably clear the Legislature so intended.

It is not questioned that section 1188 and any amendment thereof is made a part of the Direct Primary Law—and that it is confined to independent nominations. It has no purpose other than to effectuate the primary law as to independent nominations. The language employed in that section, "a candidate for any public office," to designate the class entitled to independent nominations, could hardly be broader. But the prevailing opinion holds that when the Legislature used the phrase it did not regard candidates for presidential electors as officers, although the term is not in any manner qualified in the section or in the primary law. It is reasoned that, if the Legislature regarded such electors as officers, it would have provided a suitable procedure for independent electors for President and Vice President, and that, even giving a liberal construction to the provisions of section 1188 and the Primary Law, no such mode can be discovered. In other words, from this asserted omission it is held that the Legislature intended that electors for President and Vice President could only be nominated by parties; with the result that as the statute stands the words "for any public office" in section 1188 does not connote all candidates for public office, but only some of them. It is upon the reasoning that the Legislature did not regard such electors as officers that the prevailing opinion does not deem it necessary to determine whether a presidential elector is an officer—a question I deem necessary to a determination of the case.

I regard as unfortunate the conclusion that the Legislature in using the comprehensive term—any candidate for public office—meant to exclude electors for President and Vice President, especially where the effect is to disfranchise a body of citizens. In my opinion the conclusion could be avoided in view of the fact that nominations by parties were eliminated from section 1188 by the amendment thereof and because of the liberal rule of construction prescribed by the Primary Law itself in these words: "This statute shall be liberally construed, so that the real will of the electors shall not be defeated by any informality or failure to comply with all the provisions of the law," and that "Nothing herein shall be construed as prohibiting the independent nomination of candidates as provided by section one thousand one hundred eighty-eight of the Political Code, as said section reads at the time of said nomination." The general rule is thus expressed in 10 Cal. Jur. § 3, p. 20:

> "Sections 1041 to 1292, inclusive, of the Political Code deal with the subject of elections in a general and comprehensive manner, and there are a number of statutes dealing with the subject of elections in particular cases. The former and the latter are in pari materia, and in accordance with the general rules of statutory construction should be construed together. When, therefore, it does not clearly appear that the Legislature intended by a statute relating to a special election to prescribe all the rules that should govern such election, and where it does appear that the language of the general statute is so comprehensive that it literally embraces the subject-matter of the special statute, the latter will not exclude the general statute from the field it occupies, unless there is a necessary repugnancy between the acts. * * * In construing election laws, a construction that will permit the virtual disfranchisement of any qualified voter will never be adopted if the statute be fairly susceptible of any other meaning."

In my view section 1188 was intended to include independent candidates for any public office, and it is therefore necessary to first determine whether a presidential elector is an officer of the state. The weight of authority is opposed to State v. Gifford, 22 Idaho, 613, 126 Pac. 1060, which arose in 1912, when the Progressive party organized and selected presidential electors. The case holds that a presidential elector is not a public officer. I cannot conceive why a presidential elector is not a state officer. Todd v. Johnson, 99 Ky. 548, 555, 36 S. W. 987, 33 L. R. A. 399. It is not shown that the Idaho statute is the same as our own. From the time of his election to the casting of the vote in the electoral college the elector is under an obligation to perform a duty, a duty that pertains to the public—not as a representative of a party or an employee, but as an officer of the state for which he acts. The duty is not transient, occasional, or incidental, but remains unrelieved until it is finally and completely performed. It is a public trust in the best sense of that term. He is invested with one of the functions pertinent to sovereignty in the executive department of the government. The definition of what is and what is not an office is contained in the elaborate note to Shelby v. Alcorn, 72 Am. Dec. 169, 179, and a presidential elector meets every test of a public officer discussed in the note. Hall v. Wisconsin, 103 U. S. 5, 26 L. Ed. 302, referred to in said note, thus distinguishes between an office and a contract (page 9):

> "The question to be considered was before us in United States v. Hartwell, 6 Wall. 385. It was there said that 'an office is a public station or employment conferred by the appointment of government. The term embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties. * * * A government office is different from a government contract. The latter, from its nature, is necessarily limited in its duration and specific in its objects. The terms agreed upon define the rights and obligations of both parties, and neither may depart from them without the assent of the other.'"

It is not in keeping with the great responsibility involved to declare that such electors merely undertake a public employment. They are chosen by the electorate, and it would be altogether unusual to submit to the voters the selection of persons as electors for President and Vice President if they were merely to perform a ministerial act. No matter what custom has been followed since the present mode of selection was first provided, electors for President and Vice President are vested with authority to elect a President and Vice President, and their action is final. I cannot escape the conviction that, if the Legislature had not regarded presidential electors as public officers, they would have provided a scheme for their selection by popular vote.

I am satisfied with Mr. Justice Lennon's conclusions as to the scope and meaning of section 1188 when read into the Direct Primary Law, and that when considered, in the way he points out, a mode is available to place candidates for such electors on the November ballot without having resorted to said paragraph (b). The rule of liberal construction prescribed by the Primary Act places the duty upon courts to interpret the law so that, if possible, such a mode may be evolved that one group of citizens may not be denied rights enjoyed by other citizens.

The writ should issue.

SEAWELL, J. I dissent. I am unable to persuade myself that it was the intention of the Legislature by the enactment of our present election laws to promote and protect party welfare by preparing a scheme of legislation which would compel partisan voting, and which practically, in a legislative sense, would outlaw independent suffrage and candidacies. Whatever may be found in the law which applies to partisan voting was enacted for the convenience of the old party organizations, and the law was not enacted for the purpose of preventing the electorate from voting for independent candidates for any office for which an election is held. Any serious inequalities that are placed in the way of an equal opportunity to declare one's preference in the selection of men who execute, interpret, or make the laws or in voting for the adoption of constitutional or legislative enactments ought, in my judgment, be declared invalid. To unequally obstruct the independent electorate from exercising its will is contrary to the principles and precepts of a republican form of government, and we cannot assume that the Legislature intended such a result. But in this case it is not necessary to declare any portion of the law invalid. Existing provisions of the act may be applied to the case before us without doing violence to legislative intent. Section 1188, Political Code, provides that "a candidate for any public office for which no nonpartisan candidate has been nominated at any primary election may be nominated subsequent to said primary election, or in lieu of any primary election" in a manner there defined.

That presidential electors are public officers and perform a public function of the highest responsibility that can be conferred upon citizenship, I entertain no doubt. By the express language of the law providing for their nomination the office of elector is referred to as a public office. By the law of this state their election is provided for and the time and place is fixed at which the presidential electors must assemble, and the method by which a President and Vice President shall be voted for by them is prescribed. The compensation and mileage which they are to receive for their official services are fixed by law. Their official services are required quadrennially, and are just as certain and fixed in point of time as is the presidential election itself. The duties they perform are as much official in character as were the official duties which were formerly cast upon members of the Legislature in voting for the election of a United States senator. No one would presume to say that a member of the Legislature, under our former system, in voting for a United States senator was not acting in an official capacity, performing an official duty. There is nothing indefinite, uncertain, or occasional, as I see it, in the duties which are to be performed by a presidential elector. Neither are his duties ministerial merely. From the formative periods of our government to the present time electors have been clothed with wide discretion. In the exercise of such discretion they may vote for any person for the office of President or Vice President whom they may choose to elect. No court would assume to control the discretion reposed in them by law. The death or incapacity of a President or Vice President after his election on the first Tuesday in November and prior to the second Monday in January following may compel partisan electors to vote for a different person for President or Vice President than the person nominated at a national convention. Indeed, a political crisis may arise of such a character as to make it the patriotic duty of the electors, in their judgment and in the judgment of a majority of their partisan supporters, to vote for a person for President who had not been nominated by any convention or in any manner whatsoever. While it has been the rule that electors have cast their electoral vote in obedience to party obligations, which is, under ordinary circumstances, a moral obligation, there is nothing in the law which requires them to do so, and no law changing or amending the system has ever been passed. To my mind there exists no sound argument in favor of the claim that they are not public officials performing high and grave public duties. To hold that they belong to a sort of hybrid class in official nomenclature, or, if in fact public officers, they were not within the contemplation of the framers of the election laws, is to construe the statute against what seems to me to be the spirit of the law.

The statute provides the machinery by which independent candidates may have a place upon the ballot, and I am of the opinion that such existing provisions as would solve the difficulty should be resorted to and can be applied to the situation before us without doing violence to the rules of statutory construction. To do so would not be going beyond the sanction of legal precedent.

I think the writ should issue.

SAN GABRIEL COUNTY WATER DIST. v. RICHARDSON. (Civ. 4713.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Aug. 1, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court September 29, 1924.)

1. Constitutional law 🔑278(2)—Waters and water courses 🔑216—Statute providing for annexation to water district held valid.

Section 25, Act June 10, 1913 (St. 1913, p. 1062), as amended, providing for annexation of portions of a county or municipality, to county water district, "upon petition presented in the manner herein provided," in view of provision for notice to property owners and hearing of objections in section 3, does not deny due process by omitting such hearings, since a statute must be construed as a whole.

2. Constitutional law 🔑48—Construed in favor of constitutionality, if possible.

A particular construction making an act, or any part, unconstitutional, must be avoided when it can be fairly done, for the legal presumption is that the Legislature could not have so intended.

3. Constitutional law 🔑48—Statute susceptible of constitutional and unconstitutional construction must be given former.

A statute susceptible of two constructions, one consistent, and one inconsistent, with constitutional restrictions, must be construed to harmonize with the Constitution.

Application for mandamus, by San Gabriel County Water District, directed to F. R. Richardson, as President of the District. Writ granted.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and Norman S. Sterry, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

H. S. Farrell, of Alhambra, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. This is an original proceeding wherein the petitioner seeks a writ of mandate requiring respondent as president of the San Gabriel county water district to execute certain bonds voted by electors of the district.

[1] Petitioner is a county water district, regularly incorporated under the provisions of the act of June 10, 1913 (St. 1913, p. 1049), as amended, providing for the incorporation, organization, and management of county water districts, and the respondent is its president. On December 19, 1922, an election was held, at which time the electors of said district and those residing within a certain described area voted to annex the territory last mentioned; and on April 17, 1923, an election was held wherein all the qualified electors of said consolidated district and those of an additional area also voted for annexation of the latter territory. It is conceded that in each instance the provisions of sections 3 and 25 of said act were complied with; the former section provides for the original incorporation of such districts, and the latter for annexation. Section 25 reads as follows, with our italics:

> "25. Any portion of a county or any municipality, or both, may be added to any county water district organized under the provisions of this act, at any time, upon petition presented in the manner herein provided for the organization of such water district, which petition may be granted by ordinance of the board of directors of such water district. Such ordinance shall be submitted for adoption or rejection to the vote of the electors in such water district and in the proposed addition, at a general or special election held as herein provided, within seventy days after the adoption of such ordinance."

The bond election here in controversy was held December 11, 1923, and there is no contention as to the validity of any step of the proceedings therefor; but respondent contends that section 25 does not "either directly or indirectly provide for any hearing by the board of directors or for any opportunity to any property owner to object to the annexation." And it is argued that this section is therefore unconstitutional, in that it provides no "due process" for the taking of property by levying taxes required by such bond issue; that the statute fails to properly provide for annexation; and that the attempted annexations were illegal, the bond election was participated in by voters residing outside the boundaries of the original water district, and that the bonds were void and of no effect as an indebtedness against the property sought to be taxed.

Petitioner avers that section 3 of said act provides for notice to interested property owners, for objection to original organization, at a hearing publicly held, and for publication of such notice; that inasmuch as section 25 is silent upon this subject, except that it provides for a petition to be "presented in the manner herein provided," the Legislature intended thereby to require the same method of notice, public hearing, and protest, as that pursued under section 3, for all the purposes of section 25.

In re Extension Boundaries of Crow Creek Irr. Dist., 63 Mont. 293, 207 Pac. 121, cited by petitioner, presented a similar question, and it was there held under the general rule of construction that the section attacked was not unconstitutional; the court saying:

> "A statute is passed as a whole and not in parts or sections, and the division into sections is merely a matter of convenient reference. 25 R. C. L. 1009. It is true that section 7169 appears early in the statute and relates primarily to the organization of a district, but it declares the general policy of the law. * * *
> "There are not any words of restriction or limitation employed. Provision is made for the hearing in the most general terms, and any objections which would be valid as against the inclusion of particular lands in the district upon its creation are equally valid as against their inclusion upon an extension of the boundaries of the district. This is the reasonable interpretation of the language and avoids the conclusion that the legislative assembly provided for a hearing but did not intend that any relief might be obtained thereby."

[2] To sustain the respondent's theory in the case at bar would be to say that the Legislature authorized annexation of new territory to a water district by petition "in the manner herein provided," but intentionally enacted an invalid statute in this respect, since there is in section 25 no notice "herein provided." But "the courts will never, if it can be avoided, impute to the Legislature an intent to enact a law that is contrary to the Constitution. If a particular construction has the effect to declare the act or any part of it unconstitutional, such construction must be avoided, when it can be fairly done, for the legal presumption is that the Legislature could not have so intended." Estate of Potter, 188 Cal. 55, 204 Pac. 826.

The following examples illustrate the latitude allowed in construing the word under consideration in the instant case as well as the word "hereunder." Estate of Pearsons, 98 Cal. 603, 33 Pac. 451, involved a will wherein the testator in the first clause devised certain lands to two aunts, and in the second clause he devised to them also all lands held by him jointly with them, and directed that in the event of one aunt dying during his lifetime, all property of whatever nature "herein bequeathed" should vest in the survivor; but should both die before his death, "the aforesaid property otherwise bequeathed to them shall be sold at public auction to the highest cash bidder." "Thus clearly indicating," said the Supreme Court, "that he intended the right of survivorship to extend to other property than that which in the previous portion of the same clause he had devised to his aunts; nor does his use in this clause of the word 'herein' limit the right of survivorship to the property which he had in that clause devised to them. 'Herein,' as used in legal phraseology, is a locative adverb, and its meaning is to be determined by the context. 'It may refer to the section, the chapter, or the entire enactment in which it is used' (Anderson's Law Dict.), and this rule is applicable to the construction of a document, as well as of a statute." Pringle v. Wilson, 156 Cal. 313, 104 Pac. 316, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1090, presented for construction a lease, and it was there said:

> "Appellant seeks to limit the meaning of this provision by construing its last word 'hereunder' as referring only to liability under the particular clause (13). The word 'hereunder' may, it is true, refer to an entire instrument, or to only a particular part of the instrument in which it appears. In re Pearsons, 98 Cal. 603, 33 Pac. 451. As here used, however, the word would seem necessarily to refer to the entire lease. The clause releases both parties from all liability. But no liability was cast upon either party by clause 13 itself in the event of a total destruction. The only liabilities mentioned were those existing in the case of a partial destruction, which is not covered by the latter part of the clause. To read the word 'hereunder' as contended for by appellant would therefore make it meaningless."

In Williams v. Iron Belt B. & L. Assn., 131 N. C. 267, 42 S. E. 607, it was said:

> "'The time herein limited' means, and must mean, the time prescribed elsewhere in the Code, or in statutes amending or passed as substitutes therefor. The plain intent of the statute is to put nonresidents on the same footing as residents, and not to protect them from an action unless they have been for two years exposed to service of summons."

In re Berkowitz, 143 Fed. 598, presented for construction a provision of the Bankruptcy Law, and a United States district judge of Pennsylvania there said:

> "My own inclination is to think that 'herein' refers to the whole statute, including general order 12 (89 Fed. vii; 18 Sup. Ct. vi) by force of the authority given by section 30, and therefore that clauses 3 and 4 of section 4, and section 3 of the general order, should be construed together."

Likewise, in Welch v. O'Meara, 195 Mass. 541, 81 N. E. 264, where it was sought to nullify a section of a statute for the same reason here presented, the court said:

> "The argument of the petitioner is founded largely upon an assumption that the word 'herein,' in this section, means in section 10, and not in the statute generally. * * * This is an error. * * * In this section, as in section 10, the word 'herein' refers to the chapter and not to the section."

May v. Simmons (C. C.) 4 Fed. 498, 501, and Ex parte Helton, 117 Mo. App. 609, 93 S. W. 913, also place the same construction upon the word "herein," in cases involving the question of validity of isolated sections which would require the incorporation of other sections of the same statute in order to render them effective.

[3] Section 3 of the County Water District Act requires a petition signed by at least 10 per cent. of the number of votes cast at the last general election for Governor, setting forth the boundaries of the district, due publication of notice, and notice of the time set for hearing, in order that all persons interested may appear. It is very apparent that the Legislature did not deem it necessary to repeat this language in order to make the same mode of procedure applicable to section 25, and therefore provided in the last-named section that additional territory might be added to an existing district at any time, "upon petition presented in the manner herein provided for the organization of such water district."

> "If a statute is susceptible of two constructions, one of which is consistent and the other inconsistent with the restrictions of the Constitution, it is the plain duty of the court to give it that construction, which will make it harmonize with the Constitution, and comport with the legitimate powers of the Legislature." People v. Frisbie, 26 Cal. 135, 139.

For the reasons herein stated, we are of opinion that the annexations to San Gabriel county water district were legally effected, and that the subsequent bond issue constitutes a valid lien upon said district.

It is ordered that the writ of mandate issue as prayed.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; WORKS, J.

Person who comes into court admitting that he has only life estate, or who is proved to have only such estate, may not compel determination of claims of remaindermen or conflicting claims of remaindermen as between themselves, for their interests are not hostile.

2. Quieting title 🔑52—Judgment for plaintiff construed.

Where grantee brought suit to quiet title, in fee according to deed to him, and defendants asserted that his grantor only had life estate and that was all he had, and set up their own claim to remainders and asked court to have it established, judgment for plaintiff could mean nothing else than that there was no remainder.

3. Quieting title 🔑6—Claim of remainder contingent or otherwise by defendant is adverse to plaintiff.

When defendant in action to quiet title sets up remainder, contingent or otherwise, in himself, he thereby claims an interest adverse to plaintiff within meaning of Civ. Code, § 779.

4. Quieting title 🔑6—Contention that children of life tenant whose heirs designated as remaindermen could not claim as heirs during his life, and therefore could not base adverse claim thereon, held without merit.

Contention that children of alleged life tenant who had conveyed land to one suing to quiet title to fee were not "heirs" of such life tenant, within meaning of deed to father designating his legal heirs as remaindermen because he was alive at time they filed their answer in such suit, and therefore they could not make any adverse claim to property in suit, held without merit, in view of Civ. Code § 779.

5. Judgment 🔑681—Rule stated as to when contingent interest in real estate bound by judgment.

Contingent interest in real estate is bound by decree quieting title when court has before it all parties that can be brought before it and it acts upon property according to rights that appear; there being no fraud or collusion.

6. Quieting title 🔑19—Remedy created by statute is equitable and governed by equitable principles.

Action to quiet title is equitable and is governed by equitable principles, and remedy created by Code Civ. Proc. § 738, is equitable where defendant is not in possession of land.

7. Quieting title 🔑21—"Claims estate or interest," in statute, defined.

Words "claims an estate or interest," in Code Civ. Proc. § 738, were intended to embrace every species of adverse claim set up by party out of possession, whereby plaintiff's enjoyment may be interfered with and therefore authorizes action to quiet title against remainder, contingent or otherwise.

8. Judgment 🔑576(1)—Decree quieting title res judicata, though based on erroneous construction of deed.

Judgment quieting title to land was res judicata, though based upon erroneous construction of deed.

9. Judgment 🔑576(1)—That judgment erroneous does not preclude setting it up as bar to second action.

In passing upon plea of res judicata, question is, not whether court decided point rightly or wrongly, but whether it did decide point and decision was final.

10. Trial 🔑404(1)—Findings must be construed together and to support judgment.

Findings must not only be construed together, but must be so construed, if possible, as to support judgment rather than destroy it.

11. Appeal and error 🔑996—Facts inferred from those found to support judgment.

Whenever from facts found one fact may be inferred which will support judgment, such inference will be deemed to have been made by trial court, and reviewing court will not draw from those facts any inference of fact contrary to that which may have been drawn by trial court for purpose of rendering judgment.

12. Equity 🔑72(1)—Finding of laches held also finding of prejudice.

Finding of laches held to be construed as finding of prejudice to defendants.

13. Quieting title 🔑29—Laches bars action where adverse claimant makes outlays, pays taxes, etc.

Doctrine of laches bars action where party remains passive while adverse claimant incurs risks, enters into obligations, or makes outlays in improving property, paying taxes thereon, or otherwise in reliance on his own right.

14. Equity 🔑72(1)—Rule stated that doctrine of laches bars action where changes in subject-matter have occurred.

Doctrine of laches ordinarily bars action where changes have occurred in subject-matter, or in position of parties, relative thereto, resulting in impossibility of placing them in statu quo, or marked appreciation has occurred in value of property, when rights might have been asserted before such change and granting of relief would work inequity.

15. Partition 🔑44 — Quieting title 🔑29 — Plaintiffs held guilty of laches.

In action for partition, to quiet title, and for accounting, plaintiffs who delayed many years in suing held guilty of laches, though rents received by defendants exceeded expenditures for improvements and taxes.

16. Life estates 🔑8—Evidence held to show acquisition of prescriptive title as against remaindermen.

Evidence held to support finding that possession of grantee of life tenant was, after termination of such estate, of such adverse character as to bar asserted rights as remaindermen.

17. Courts 🔑91(1)—Declaration of law by Supreme Court governs District Court of Appeals.

Declaration of law by Supreme Court is binding upon District Court of Appeals and every other inferior court in state until reversed or overruled by Supreme Court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by Josephine M. Akley and others against Charles N. Bassett and another. From the judgment, certain plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 209 Pac. 576.

Leon R. Yankwich, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Millard Patterson, Donald Barker, and Wheaton A. Gray, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HEWITT, Judge pro tem. Plaintiffs brought this action for a partition of certain real property, to quiet title to the several undivided interests therein claimed by them, and for an accounting. They are the surviving children of Joseph M. Workman and Josephine Workman, his wife. The defendant Ida L. Kelso, now the wife of Fred Kelso, was formerly the wife of George Workman. a deceased son of Joseph M. Workman, who died in 1914. The defendant Charles N. Bassett is the son and sole heir at law of O. T. Bassett, deceased. As originally instituted, the action involved a tract of land in Los Angeles county, comprising about 814 acres in the Rancho La Puente known as the Workman ranch. Besides the said Charles N. Bassett and Ida L. Kelso, a number of other persons, purchasers or the successors in interest of the purchasers from the defendant Bassett or his father, O. T. Bassett, of small parcels of the entire tract, were also made parties defendant. The plaintiffs, at the trial in the court below, abandoned the action as against all defendants other than Charles N. Bassett and Ida L. Kelso, and stipulated judgments in their favor were made and entered, thus reducing the area in controversy to 265 acres. Amended pleadings were filed and the cause was tried on the issues made by the amended complaint, hereinafter referred to as the complaint, and the answers thereto of the defendants Bassett and Kelso. The latter, though claiming an interest in the property of the same character as the plaintiffs, by virtue of her succession to the interest of her former husband, George Workman, did not join in bringing the action.

The plaintiffs allege that they are each seized of a two-eighteenths interest in the property and that the defendants Bassett and Kelso are the owners respectively of a seven-eighteenths and a one-eighteenth interest. They also allege that defendant Bassett has collected and kept large sums of money arising from the rents, issues, and profits of the property, amounting to more than $1,000,000, and has not accounted therefor; wherefore they pray that the respective interests of the parties be ascertained and determined and that an accounting be had. In her answer the defendant Kelso asks for like affirmative relief. Defendant Bassett denies the allegations of the plaintiffs and of the defendant Kelso, and avers that he is the sole owner of the property, except such portions as have been conveyed to others. He admits that he has received the rents, issues, and profits of the property, the exact amount of which he states he does not know, but that they "are not in excess of $1,000,000," and that he will ascertain and disclose the true amount thereof in the event the court determines that he shall account therefor. He alleges that he had expended large sums of money in improving and cultivating the property, and in the payment of taxes, etc. In addition to adverse possession of the property by his father and himself from 1895 to 1918, defendant Bassett also sets up several special defenses in bar of the action, the most material of which are the statute of limitations and a certain judgment in the case of Bassett v. Thornton et al., rendered by the superior court of Los Angeles county in 1895, pleaded as res adjudicata. Upon the issues as thus made up, judgment was rendered November 22, 1920, and entered November 30, 1920, in favor of the defendant Bassett, adjudging that he is the owner of the property in fee, and that neither the plaintiffs nor the defendant Kelso had any right, title, or interest therein.

Following the entry of this judgment, the plaintiff Josephine M. Akley moved the court to vacate the judgment and to enter another and different judgment as to her. The other plaintiffs also made a similar motion on their own behalf. The explanation for the making of two motions is that the trial court found that jurisdiction over Mrs. Akley had not been obtained in the case of Bassett v. Thornton, owing to defective service of summons upon her, from which the court concluded that she was not bound by the judgment therein, notwithstanding which the decision was adverse to her on other grounds, erroneously as she contended. No such question was or could be raised by the other plaintiffs. These motions were heard by a different judge than the one who had tried the cause. An order was made granting the motion of the plaintiff Akley, and denying the motion of the other plaintiffs; whereupon amended and corrected conclusions of law were signed and filed and a second judgment was entered therein, adjudging that the plaintiff Josephine M. Akley and the defendant Charles N. Bassett were the owners of one-ninth and eight-ninths interests respectively in the property, and that the other plaintiffs and defendant Ida L. Kelso had no interest therein. A partition of the property was decreed, and judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff Akley and against the defendant Bassett in the sum of $109,302.

The defendant Bassett appealed from that part of the order above mentioned granting the plaintiff Akley's said motion, and from the said second judgment. The other plaintiffs took a separate appeal from that part of the aforesaid order which denied their motion, and also from both the first and second judgments. Upon the appeal of the defendant Bassett, which we will refer to herein as the Akley Case, it was held that the lower court was in error in ordering and substituting another and different judgment in the cause. See report of the case of Akley v. Bassett, 189 Cal. p. 625, 209 Pac. 576. The order vacating the original judgment and directing amended conclusions of law was reversed, as was also the second judgment entered in pursuance thereof, and the original conclusions of law and judgment were thus left in force. The same case on a more complete record now comes before us on the aforementioned separate appeal of the other plaintiffs, Lucille C. Buehler, Agnes Workman Stoll, Mary C. Knight, and William J. Workman. The appeal in the Akley Case was taken on a bill of exceptions containing only the judgment roll, while here there is a bill of exceptions which contains the evidence and the record relating to the first judgment, the motion referred to, and the order denying the same. The appellants ask for a reversal of both judgments on the ground that the evidence does not sustain certain of the findings, which are also claimed to be contrary to law. While in the Akley Case the findings only were before the court, an examination of the evidence satisfies us that the probative facts upon which the court made findings—the court made findings upon certain probative facts—were correctly found by the court. The attack here is mainly directed to the construction which the trial court placed upon the probative facts. The findings are full and comprehensive, and set forth in detail the history of the title to the property and the acts of the parties with relation thereto. The particular findings objected to are those which find that this action is barred by the judgment in Bassett v. Thornton, and that the same is res adjudicata; that the agreement for the dismissal of their appeal in that case worked an estoppel upon appellants; that the defendant and respondent Bassett has acquired prescriptive title to the property by adverse possession; and that the action herein is barred by laches. The further general objection is made to the series of findings which deal with the deraignment of defendant Bassett's title in that they show Joseph M. Workman only to have had a life estate in the property, which was therefore the only estate he conveyed to O. T. Bassett, notwithstanding which the court found that defendant Bassett, as the successor in interest of O. T. Bassett, is the owner in fee of the property, thus implying, contrary to law, so it is claimed, that defendant Bassett could base a claim of title in fee on such a foundation.

As found by the trial court and as shown by the evidence, by a deed dated October 11, 1870, William Workman and wife conveyed the property described in the complaint herein to their son Joseph M. Workman "to have and to hold * * * to and for his use and benefit for and during the term of his natural life; and upon the decease of him * * * unto his legal heirs according to the laws of California relating to descents and distribution, and their heirs and assigns, to and for their sole and only use, benefit and behoof, in fee absolute forever; but not to the testamentary heirs and devisees" of the said Joseph M. Workman. This deed was recorded March 27, 1873. About 25 years afterward the grantee in this deed and his wife, the parents of the plaintiffs, conveyed the property to O. T. Bassett, apparently in fee, by a grant deed dated March 1, 1895. O. T. Bassett immediately made entry and took possession. Within a few weeks thereafter O. T. Bassett brought an action in the superior court of Los Angeles county to quiet his title to the property against the children of Joseph M. Workman, the same persons who are the plaintiffs here, and George Workman, now deceased, whose former wife is the defendant Ida L. Kelso. This is the case referred to in the pleadings and findings as Bassett v. Thornton et al. All of the defendants therein appeared and answered, and three of them being minors, including Josephine M. Workman, now Josephine M. Akley, did so by their guardian ad litem. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff and entered June 25, 1895. An appeal from this judgment was subsequently dismissed. O. T. Bassett died January 1, 1898, leaving his son, defendant and respondent Charles N. Bassett, as his sole heir at law. Administration was had upon O. T. Bassett's estate, and the property in question was by decree dated October 20, 1900, distributed to the son. The latter being then a minor, a guardianship of his estate ensued, and upon attaining his majority in 1902, he came into full possession and occupancy of the property in succession to his father, and under the same title, fortified by the decree in Bassett v. Thornton.

Joseph M. Workman died March 13, 1901. Appellants took no steps to assert or recover any interest in the property in question until June 24, 1918, when they instituted this action. The foundation of their claim is that their father only had a life estate in the property, that the same was the only interest which he did or could convey to O. T. Bassett, and that upon their father's death they, as his legal heirs, succeeded as remaindermen to the fee as tenants in common, except as to a six-eighteenths interest, which, presumably, was the interest of their mother which had passed to the Bassetts, father and son.

The decision of the superior court in the Akley Case was against the respondent therein, Mrs. Akley, and in favor of the appellant there (respondent here), on the grounds that the latter had been in the adverse possession of the property for more than the statutory period before the commencement of this action, which had ripened into a prescriptive title, and that the long delay of Mrs. Akley in bringing this action constituted prejudicial laches, which consequently was a bar thereto. From the above outline of that case and the appeal now before us, it is at once apparent that in all respects save only as to the defective service upon Mrs. Akley of summons in Bassett v. Thornton, and the issue of res adjudicata which was thereby eliminated from that case, the facts in the Akley Case are necessarily identical with the facts here; the difference being that the questions now to be decided and arising thereon are directed to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings and the conclusions which the trial court drew therefrom.

The decision herein by the trial court in favor of the respondent and against the appellants, as indicated by the aforesaid findings to which they object, was rendered on three grounds: First, that the judgment in Bassett v. Thornton was res adjudicata, and a bar to this action; second, that the respondent had acquired a title by prescription to the property under adverse possession for more than five years prior to the commencement of the action, and that appellants could not recover because they were not seized or possessed of the property within five years prior thereto; and, third, that the action was barred by the prejudicial laches of the appellants. Therefore, it is obvious, in order to prevail on this appeal here, the appellants must show that all of these conclusions of the trial court were erroneous; whereas, it is only incumbent upon the respondent to establish the validity of any one of them. If any one of these grounds is well founded, the judgment must be affirmed.

Since the effect of the judgment in Bassett v. Thornton upon the asserted rights of these appellants was not determined in the Akley Case, we will first address ourselves to the consideration of that question.

The respondent, in his answer, after reciting the identity of the parties defendant to that action with the appellants here, his own privity with the plaintiff therein, the issues made by the pleadings, and the character of the judgment rendered, pleaded such judgment as res adjudicata and a bar to this action as follows:

> "That the matters and things and issues relating to the title of said land, the subject of this action, were fully and completely adjudicated in the said action heretofore mentioned between the plaintiff herein and the ancestor and predecessor in interest of this answering defendant, and said judgment is pleaded herein as res adjudicata."

The trial court found these allegations to be true, "except that the said Josephine M. Akley was not bound by the judgment in any respect." The grounds upon which this finding is attacked may be resolved into the general statement that the nature of the action to quiet title and of contingent remainders in real property is such that the rights of the holders of such remainders cannot be adjudicated in that form of action, and that therefore the judgment in Bassett v. Thornton was void in that the court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter.

When the action of Bassett v. Thornton et al. was brought in 1895, the father of the appellants was still living, and he did not die until about six years after the judgment therein was rendered. A short time prior thereto Joseph M. Workman and his wife had executed the deed which purported on its face to convey the property in fee to O. T. Bassett. It appears from the evidence here that there was "some neighborhood talk about something being wrong with the title"; but however that may be, the elder Bassett, evidently realizing the necessity of having any question concerning his title set at rest, and assuming to act under authority of section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure, made the five children of his grantor the parties defendant to his action. The complaint was in the ordinary form used in an action to quiet title, it alleged that he was the owner of the property and that it was "the same as described in the deed from William Workman to Joseph M. Workman, dated October 11, 1870," and made reference to the deed for further particulars. In their answer the defendants denied that the plaintiff was the owner in fee simple of the property "or any estate therein except an estate for the life of one Joseph M. Workman"; that subject to such life estate "the heirs of said Joseph M. Workman are the owners in fee of said property, and these defendants are the children of said Joseph M. Workman, and those of them surviving at his death will be the owners of said property in fee." Their prayer was for a determination that they were the owners of the property subject to the life estate. The court found that the deed to Joseph M. Workman had been made, executed, and delivered prior to January 1, 1873; that Joseph M. Workman and his wife executed the deed dated February 25, 1895, conveying to the plaintiff all their right, title, and interest in the property in fee simple; and that the defendants were the children of Joseph M. Workman. The conclusion was that the plaintiff was the owner of the property in fee simple, and that the defendants had no right, title, or interest therein. Judgment was rendered accordingly and entered June 26, 1895, barring the defendants from asserting any claim whatever to the property adverse to plaintiff. It thus appears that these appellants had full knowledge, at the time of the condition of the title to this property, of the extent and basis of O. T. Bassett's claim, and of the character of their own. The issues in the case were clear, and the decision turned entirely upon the construction of the deed from William Workman to their father. The court having found that the deed was delivered prior to January 1, 1873, obviously concluded that it fell within the rule in Shelley's Case, which was in force in this state until January 1, 1873, when it was abolished by section 779 of the Civil Code. Gordon v. Cadwalader, 164 Cal. 509, 130 Pac. 18, and cases therein cited.

In the Akley Case, in response to the contention of the appellant there (respondent here) that the judgment in Bassett v. Thornton was correct, occasion was taken to construe the deed in question. It was there said:

> "We are satisfied that the terms of the instrument remove it from the application of the rule in Shelley's Case, even though it had been delivered prior to January 1, 1873. Its language clearly indicates an intention on the part of the grantor to limit a life estate in Joseph M. Workman, and to vest a full estate in his legal heirs according to the laws of the state of California respecting descents and distribution (Montgomery v. Sturdivant, 41 Cal. 290, 298; Gordon v. Cadwalader [164 Cal. 509, 513, 130 Pac. 18]). O. T. Bassett took no greater interest in the property than his grantor, Joseph M. Workman, had. It follows, therefore, that the deed from Joseph M. Workman to appellant's immediate predecessor [O. T. Bassett] did not serve to divest respondent of her future interest in the property, which vested upon the death of her father, on March 13, 1901."

It was thus finally determined some 27 years after the judgment in Bassett v. Thornton was rendered that the case was wrongly decided on both the law and the facts, and that the appellants were in fact just what they then claimed to be, namely, remaindermen, and that O. T. Bassett had nothing more than a life estate in the property. Pivoted upon this as a foundation, appellants contend that said judgment is void because the court had no jurisdiction to pass upon their claims as the holders of contingent remainders in the property, and that as such they had no present or vested interest therein that could be adjudicated in a quiet title suit at the instance of a life tenant, or even claimed therein.

[1, 2] Prior to the death of their father, the appellants had some sort of an interest in the property, even though it was contingent. They were members, at that time, of a designated class of persons who would take the property in fee upon the falling in of the life estate. It should also be observed that O. T. Bassett did not bring the action of Bassett v. Thornton in the attitude of a life tenant, and it only confuses the issue to treat that case in any such light. It is true that a person who comes into court admitting that he has only a life estate or who is proven to have only such an estate may not compel the determination of the claims of remaindermen nor the conflicting claims of remaindermen as between themselves, for the interests of such person and the remaindermen are not hostile. A life tenant is not concerned with the validity or extent of the claims of those who may, upon his death, and after his estate is terminated, succeed to the fee. Onderdonk v. Mott, 34 Barb. (N. Y.) 106; Collins v. Collins, 19 Ohio St. 468. Cases so holding are not in point here because Bassett v. Thornton was not that sort of a case. Relying upon the fee title apparently conveyed to him by his grantor, O. T. Bassett brought his action for the very purpose of having his title confirmed. The defendants therein disputed plaintiff's claim of title in fee, asserted that he held only a life estate, set up their own claim to the remainder, and specifically asked the court to have their claim thereto established. The judgment for plaintiff could and did mean nothing else than that there was no remainder.

[3] But, aside from that, we are of the opinion that when a defendant in a quiet title action sets up a remainder, contingent or otherwise, in himself, he thereby claims an interest in the property adverse to the plaintiff, within the meaning of the law. In Barnett v. Barnett, 104 Cal. 298, 37 Pac. 1049, a case somewhat analogous to Bassett v. Thornton, section 779 of the Civil Code was construed, and it was said that a remainder to the "heirs" of a life tenant, although not capable of immediate enjoyment, is nevertheless "an estate in the property capable of being transferred in the same manner as a present interest." It was said in County of Los Angeles v. Winans, 13 Cal. App. 234, 109 Pac. 640, that where property is conveyed to a mother for life, with remainder "to the heirs of her body," though the remainder is contingent the "interests of unborn grandchildren" are not mere possibilities, such as the expectancy of an heir apparent. In the next succeeding case of the same title, reported in 13 Cal. App. at page 257, 109 Pac. 650, the court held that the rights of the children to such a contingent remainder were "not mere possibilities, such as are covered by the provisions of section 700 [of the Civil Code], but estates in fee to vest in the future." In that case it appeared that in a previous quiet title action to which the life tenant and her children had been made parties defendant, a judgment had been rendered against them which they sought to avoid therein. The court, however, in referring to such action, observed that "the contention of appellants that the action cannot be maintained against the children because [of] their contingent remainder * * * finds full answer in Barnett v. Barnett, 104 Cal. 298, 301, 37 Pac. 1049," and that the defendants were concluded by the findings therein against them. Again, in Gray v. Union Trust Company, 171 Cal. 637, 154 Pac. 306, the court said that a trust providing that in the absence of a will the property should go to and vest in the heirs at law of the trustor according to the laws of succession, created an alienable estate and interest in the remainder, and it was immaterial whether they be regarded as contingent or vested. Upon the authority of these cases, we conclude that the claim pleaded by the defendants in Bassett v. Thornton was an interest in the property.

[4] But it is argued, further, that the appellants were not "the heirs" of Joseph M. Workman, who was alive when they filed their answer in that case, since no one can be the heir of a person living; therefore, not being such heirs at the time, they neither had nor could make any adverse claim to the property. This proposition also is utterly unsound, and if accepted would defeat one of the very purposes for which the action to quiet title was devised. Of course, their father might have survived them all. Upon his death others might have been his legal heirs, or the law of descent and distribution might have been changed before he died; but the possible happening of any such contingencies is immaterial. The remainder here was thus specified in the grant: "and upon the decease of him (i. e., Joseph M. Workman) * * * unto his legal heirs," etc. There was thus no uncertainty as to the class of persons who held the remainder and would succeed to the title in fee upon the death of the life tenant. The uncertainty as to the members of this class, or as to the particular individuals who would compose the class of persons thus designated as heirs, is no sufficient reason for holding that the court could not adjudicate upon the claim of those who alleged that they did fall within that class and pleaded their claims as such. Section 779 of the Civil Code, so far as material here, provides that—

> "When a remainder is limited to the heirs of * * * a person to whom a life estate in the same property is given, the persons who, on the termination of the life estate, are the successors * * * of the owner for life, are entitled to take by virtue of the remainder so limited to them, and not as mere successors of the owner for life."

In Barnett v. Barnett, supra, it was said that—

> "By section 779 of the Civil Code the term 'heirs' is changed from a word of limitation to one of purchase, and becomes a specific designation of a class which will have the right to the property upon the termination of the life estate. Upon that event they take the property, not by descent or as successors of the plaintiff [i. e. the grantee], but by virtue of the remainder which was created for them at the execution of the deed to him."

In County of Los Angeles v. Winans, 13 Cal. App. 257, 109 Pac. 650, supra, the court also held as follows:

> "To construe the words 'heirs of her body' to mean 'in the capacity of heirs' would be to restore the rule in Shelley's Case and repeal by construction the express provisions of section 779," and that "these words will be considered as words of description and identity, and not of capacity, such being the effect of the section."

It is not suggested that there are or ever were any persons interested in this remainder other than the children of Joseph M. Workman, appellants here, and the defendant Mrs. Kelso who is in privity with a deceased child, and they and Mrs. Kelso's predecessor are the same persons whose claim to the property in remainder was based upon the express ground that upon the life tenant's death they would be his heirs.

[5, 6] We think that Bassett v. Thornton, in so far as the parties defendant thereto are concerned, falls within the scope of the well-established principle in equity that a contingent interest in real estate is bound when the court has before it all the parties that can be brought before it, and it acts upon the property according to the rights that appear, there being no fraud or collusion. Miller v. Railway Company, 132 U. S. 662, 10 Sup. Ct. 206, 33 L. Ed. 487. The action to quiet title is equitable and is governed by equitable principles (Polack v. Gurnee, 66 Cal. 267, 5 Pac. 229, 610; Benson v. Shotwell, 87 Cal. 49, 25 Pac. 249, 681, and the remedy created by section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure is equitable where the defendant is not in possession of the land. (Pom. Eq. Jur. [2d Ed.] vol. 5, § 2158). In Mathews v. Lightner, 85 Minn. 333, 88 N. W. 992, 89 Am. St. Rep. 558, there existed a situation very similar to the one here presented. It was urged therein that a previous judgment in an inferior court in a quiet title action brought before the life tenant died was not binding on remaindermen who were parties thereto, because the remainder was contingent, and hence until the death of the life tenant it would be uncertain who would be entitled to the remainder. (Precisely the same contention is made here with regard to the judgment in Bassett v. Thornton.) The point was thus disposed of:

> "Conceding * * * that the deed * * * created a contingent remainder * * * still the district court had power to acquire jurisdiction over all parties interested in the contingent remainder, and by its decree determine their rights. This conclusion necessarily follows from the equity doctrine that the general rule that only those who are parties to a suit are affected by the decree is subject to the exception that, where the subject-matter of the action is the determination of the title to real estate, if all parties are brought before the court that can be brought before it, and it acts on the property according to the rights that appear, there being no fraud or collusion, its decision is conclusive as to the state of the title, and binds all contingent interests in the real estate. * * * The rule is based upon necessity, for it would be intolerable injustice if the owner of real estate could not have his title quieted where there was a claim of an outstanding contingent remainder which might possibly vest in persons not then in being."

Under the decisions cited, it is clear that the claim made by the defendants in Bassett v. Thornton was a claim to an actual interest in the property, that they were all the parties that could be brought before the court, and that their claim was adverse to the plaintiff therein. A determination having been made thereon, which long since became final, it follows that the judgment there rendered is binding upon the appellants unless there is merit otherwise in their further contention that our action to quiet title is so limited in scope as to preclude adjudication upon remainders of the character asserted in that case.

[7] We think the complete answer to such a contention is found in the language of section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the construction that has been repeatedly placed thereon. So far as material here, the section referred to reads as follows:

> "An action may be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real * * * property adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim."

This is identical with section 264 of the Practice Act, which preceded the Code. We quote from Peterson v. Gibbs, 147 Cal. 1, 5, 81 Pac. 121, 122 (109 Am. St. Rep. 107), as follows:

> "Such an action is brought, as authorized by the statute, 'for the purpose of determining' any adverse claim that may be asserted therein by defendant to the land in controversy, and this does not mean that the court is simply to ascertain, as against the plaintiff shown to have a legal interest, whether * * * such defendant has some interest, but also that the court shall declare and define the interest held by the defendant, if any, so that the plaintiff may have a decree finally adjudicating the extent of his own interest in the property in controversy. The object of the action is to finally settle and determine, as between the parties, all conflicting claims * * * in controversy, and to decree to each such interest * * * therein as he may be entitled to."

The nature and object of the action to quiet title have been often defined in most comprehensive terms. The statement has been made that it embraces every sort of a claim whereby the plaintiff might be deprived of his property or his title clouded or its value depreciated. Withers v. Jacks, 79 Cal. 297, 21 Pac. 824, 12 Am. St. Rep. 143. And the rule has been even more broadly stated, viz., that the action may be maintained by the owner of property to determine any adverse claim whatever. Castro v. Barry, 79 Cal. 443, 21 Pac. 946. The action may be brought against any person claiming an adverse interest of whatever kind. Pom. Eq. Juris., vol. 5 (2d Ed.) § 2161. It is unnecessary to multiply citations upon this subject, for while they serve to illustrate the application of the rule to various sorts of claims, they are all to the same effect. Stoddart v. Burge, 53 Cal. 394; People v. Center, 66 Cal. 551, 5 Pac. 263, 6 Pac. 481; Pennie v. Hildreth, 81 Cal. 127, 22 Pac. 398; Bulwer C. S. M. Co. v. Standard S. M. Co., 83 Cal. 589, 23 Pac. 1102; Landregan v. Peppin, 94 Cal. 465, 29 Pac. 771.

As was said by the Supreme Court of Utah:

> "The words 'claims on estate or interest' are used in a broad sense, and are not technical in their meaning, and were evidently intended to embrace every species of adverse claim set up by a party out of possession whereby the plaintiff's enjoyment of his property may be interfered with." Goldberg v. Taylor, 2 Utah, 491.

If the employment of the action to quiet title against remainders, contingent or otherwise, is not directly or by reasonable implication authorized by these very comprehensive definitions of its scope, we think such use is specifically upheld in two early cases in this state. In Head v. Fordyce, 17 Cal. 149, it was said:

> "The statute giving this right of action to the party in possession, does not confine the remedy to the case of an adverse claimant setting up a legal title, or even an equitable title; but the act intended to embrace every description of claim whereby the plaintiff might be deprived of the property, or its title clouded, or its value depreciated, or whereby the plaintiff might be incommoded or damnified by the assertion of an outstanding title already held or to grow out of the adverse pretension. The plaintiff has a right to be quieted in his title whenever any claim is made to real estate of which he is in possession, the effect of which claim might be litigation or a loss to him of the property."

Again, in Joyce v. McAvoy, 31 Cal. 273, 89 Am. Dec. 172, we find a situation not unlike the case before us. There it was claimed that a prior judgment in a quiet title action was void as to the plaintiff and not binding upon her for the reason that at the time a former proceeding was had the plaintiff (then a minor), though a party thereto, had no vested right, title, or interest in the premises; that her right accrued subsequent to the judgment rendered therein, when she obtained her majority, and was not affected thereby. "It is claimed, however, that the plaintiff had no interest at the date of the judgment in Lake v. Joyce; that her title subsequently vested, and was, therefore, not affected by the judgment in said action. * * * In short, it is claimed that she had an interest under the deed, and at the same time that she had not; that the instrument gave her rights which could not be defeated, provided she should attain majority; but as she might never attain majority, there was no interest vested which she could then set up, or be called upon to defend. But there is clearly no force in this position. If the deed gave her any rights whatever, whether inchoate, contingent or otherwise, which might ultimately be perfected, it served as the basis of a claim which might cloud the title to the real estate, and become the subject of judicial investigation under section 254 of the Practice Act." It was held that the prior judgment was res adjudicata.

We see no escape from the conclusion that this holding in Joyce v. McAvoy is determinative of the point that interests or rights such as these appellants pleaded as parties defendant in Bassett v. Thornton can be inquired into and passed upon in a quiet title action, and that that case disposes of appellant's contention.

[8, 9] The finding of the trial court that the judgment in Bassett v. Thornton is res adjudicata, and therefore a bar to this action, was correct, even though the judgment in the quiet title action was based upon an erroneous construction of the deed to O. T. Bassett. A judgment, though erroneous, is none the less a bar to a second action between the same parties or their privies with respect to the same subject-matter. A declaration now that the judgment in the case referred to is void because it was wrong would be in violation of established principles of law. In passing upon the plea of res adjudicata, the question is not whether the court decided the point rightly or wrongly, but the question is: Did the court decide the point, and is the decision final? Lamb v. Wahlenmaier, 144 Cal. 91, 77 Pac. 765, 103 Am. St. Rep. 66. As was also said in Joyce v. McAvoy, supra, it is one thing to attack a judgment on appeal, or by some direct proceeding known to the law to vacate it, and quite another thing to attack it collaterally when it comes up in evidence, as is sought to be done in this case. Under the issues in Bassett v. Thornton, the question was whether there was a remainder outstanding, and the jurisdiction of the court was not affected by its nature. The plaintiff therein had a right to an adjudication upon his title, and of necessity the court could not make it without determining whether the asserted remainder existed, and that is precisely what occurred. Any mistake then made cannot be corrected here indirectly by this collateral attack, and the judgment must stand. It would indeed be a strange paradox if now, after having submitted their claims to adjudication before a tribunal empowered to hear and determine them, the very same parties can be heard to say that because the claims pleaded were those of contingent remaindermen, the court was thereby ousted of jurisdiction. Jurisdiction did not depend upon the nature of the claim made by them, for if they could make any claim whatever, the court had power to determine whether it was well founded. The practical result of appellants' contention that the judgment against them in Bassett v. Thornton is not res adjudicata, because the remainder which they there pleaded was a contingent remainder and therefore not such an interest as could be adjudicated in an action to quiet title would lead to the absurdity that no person apparently vested with title to real property, who believes or claims that he owns in fee, can have his title quieted against others who pretend or assert that he is only a life tenant and that they have a contingent reminder therein, because, forsooth, on the face of their pleadings they show they have no present claim or interest upon which any adjudication can be had. The law does not permit the holder of a presumptively good title to remain thus helpless in the presence of such claims by others.

[10-12] With regard to the laches of the appellants, as a bar to this action, they seek to differentiate this case and the Akley Case on the ground that the trial court found the laches of plaintiff Josephine M. Akley to be prejudicial, but did not so find with regard to the other plaintiffs; that the evidence does not show prejudicial laches, and hence that these appellants are not barred thereby. The finding, so far as relevant, reads as follows:

> "XXXII. The court further finds that there was no justification whatsoever for the long delay of Josephine M. Akley in bringing this action; that such delay was prejudicial to the defendant Charles N. Bassett, and that said Josephine M. Akley and the defendant Ida L. Kelso also, were guilty of laches in so far as the doctrine of laches may be applied, if at all, to the facts in evidence."

The action was brought by several parties of whom Josephine M. Akley was only one, and if there was long and prejudicial delay in "bringing this action" they all participated therein equally with her. If the first clause of this finding had been so framed as to read that there was no justification whatever for the long delay of Josephine M. Akley "and the other plaintiffs" in bringing this action, we apprehend no possible question could arise as to its import. Conceivably the first clause of this finding taken by itself apart from the context, and divorced from other findings, might be open to the objection that it failed to find that the laches of the plaintiffs other than Josephine M. Akley was also prejudicial. But we think such construction, even as the finding reads, is strained. Assuming that it is subject to the meaning appellants give to it, under well-established rules there is no proper basis for saying that the trial court failed to find that appellants' laches was prejudicial. Elsewhere the findings fully cover the facts upon which prejudice to the respondent arose from the long delay of all the plaintiffs in bringing this action. Findings II and XIV are to the effect that paragraphs IV and XIV of the answer are true, which allege the improvement of the property by the respondent by planting the same to walnut trees, the development of water for irrigation by pumping plants and wells, and the distribution thereof by the construction of ditches and flumes, the care and cultivation of the property, and the expenditure in and about these things by the respondent of large sums of money, all of which was done openly and notoriously, more than 10 years before the commencement of this action, with the constructive knowledge of the plaintiffs, and without any assertion of ownership by them, or any objections thereto. Finding No. XVI is that the allegations of paragraph XVII of the answer are true, relative to the sale by the respondent of lots and blocks aggregating over 300 acres out of the original tract; and finding IV states that it is true that the amount of the rents, issues, and profits received by the respondent was not "in excess of $1,000,000." "It is elementary that if findings of fact are reasonably susceptible of such a construction as will support a judgment, they must receive that construction rather than one that will not so support it." People v. McCue, 150 Cal. 195, 88 Pac. 899. Findings must not only be construed together, but must be so construed, if possible, as to support the judgment rather than destroy it; they are to be liberally construed, and their language should not be so strained by the courts as to make out a case of conflict; they cannot be altogether detached from each other and considered piecemeal, and if they be doubtful or obscure reference may be had to the context for the purpose of ascertaining the meaning. Barthel v. Bd. of Ed., 153 Cal. 376, 95 Pac. 892; Zihn v. Zihn, 153 Cal. 405, 95 Pac. 868; Corea v. Higuera, 153 Cal. 451, 95 Pac. 882, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1018; Murray v. Tulare Irr. Co., 120 Cal.

311, 49 Pac. 563, 52 Pac. 586; Ames v. San Diego, 101 Cal. 390, 35 Pac. 1005; Paine v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 143 Cal. 654, 77 Pac. 659; Alhambra Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 598, 14 Pac. 379; Heaton, etc., v. Arper, 145 Cal. 282, 78 Pac. 721; Mitchell v. Hutchinson, 142 Cal. 404, 76 Pac. 55; Haight v. Haight, 151 Cal. 90, 90 Pac. 197. Furthermore, it has been held that—

> "Whenever, from the facts found * * * other facts may be inferred which will support the judgment, such inference will be deemed to have been made by the trial court, and upon an appeal from that judgment, this court will not draw from those facts any inference of fact contrary to that which may have been drawn by the trial court for the purpose of rendering such judgment." Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 72, 31 Pac. 742, 22 L. R. A. 257; Warren v. Hopkins, 110 Cal. 506, 42 Pac. 986; Krasky v. Wolpert, 134 Cal. 338, 66 Pac. 309; People, etc., Bank v. Rickard, 139 Cal. 285, 73 Pac. 858; Ripperdan v. Weldy, 149 Cal. 667, 87 Pac. 276.

Fairly construed, the finding in question is itself necessarily a finding that the laches of these appellants as well as Mrs. Akley was prejudicial, and particularly when taken in connection with other findings.

[13-15] Let it be conceded that laches in legal significance is not mere delay, but delay that works to the disadvantage of another. Bell v. Hudson, 73 Cal. 285, 14 Pac. 791, 2 Am. St. Rep. 791; Ex-Mission L. & W. Co. v. Flash, 97 Cal. 610, 32 Pac. 600; 21 Corp. Jur. 221; 10 R. C. L., p. 396. Prejudicial laches depends upon certain well-recognized elements, among which are expenditures and changes in the subject-matter. The doctrine of laches bars an action where a party remains passive while an adverse claimant incurs risks, enters into obligations, or makes outlays in improving property, paying taxes thereon, or otherwise in reliance on his own right. Cor. Jur. 21, p. 232. Changes occurring in the subject-matter, or in the position of the parties relative thereto, resulting in the impossibility of placing them in statu quo, or a marked appreciation in the value of the property, when rights might have been asserted before such change and the granting of relief would in consequence thereof work inequity, are ordinarily fatal to a plaintiff's case. Cor. Jur. 21, p. 232; Chapman v. State Bank, 97 Cal. 155, 31 Pac. 896; Stevenson v. Boyd, 153 Cal. 630, 96 Pac. 284, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 525; Andreson v. Regenold, 166 Cal. 44, 134 Pac. 999. The evidence shows that the property in question was dry, unimproved land when respondent's father entered upon it in 1895. He set it out in part to young walnut trees in 1898, which were kept up and the area there planted so enlarged by respondent that it finally consisted of a walnut grove of about 237 acres. About 28 acres of the land has been placed under irrigation and was and has continued to be used by respondent for the growing of annual crops. The walnut trees came into bearing 8 or 10 years after they were originally planted. In addition to the farm houses, pumping plant, and irrigation system placed upon the property by the elder Bassett, the respondent, first by his guardian, and then by himself personally or through his superintendent or manager, constructed other farm buildings on the property, installed additional pumping plants with the necessary appliances for irrigation, cared for, kept up, and maintained the property, and has thus expended upwards of $50,000 for those purposes. During his lifetime the elder Bassett, having caused the land to be surveyed and subdivided into acreage lots, and a map thereof to be prepared and recorded, sold parcels from the original tract, aggregating about 128 acres; and respondent continued so to do, until his total sales, aggregating something more than 300 acres, reduced his holdings from the original 814 acres to approximately 265 acres, comprising the walnut grove and "grain patch." The rents, issues, and profits that have accrued to him from such sales, and from the operation of the property in question, are, under the findings, based on the admission contained in respondent's answer, "not more than $1,000,000," which the respondent has applied to his own use and benefit. In all of the period of seventeen years from 1901 to 1918 while these changes were being effected in the property itself, the appellants said nothing and did nothing. In these circumstances, the granting of the relief here sought would be inequitable.

But it is contended, even though it is generally the rule that laches bars the enforcement of rights where a party remains passive while an adverse claimant makes expenditures in improving the property, paying taxes, etc., his inaction does not bar relief where the rents received exceed the expenditures. The trial court found in finding IV:

> "That the amount of rents, issues, and profits of the said real estate collected since March 13, 1901, * * * was sufficient to pay all taxes upon said real property and the expenses of the care, management, up-keep and cultivation thereof, and of the making of improvements thereon * * * during said period."

Our attention is called to cases from other jurisdictions which hold that where rents exceed the expenditures, the relief sought, though long delayed, will not be denied on that account. Black v. Baskins, 75 Ark. 382, 87 S. W. 647; Peabody v. Burri, 255 Ill. 592, 99 N. E. 690; Hinds v. Surbeck, 260 Ill. 606, 103 N. E. 599. And by so much the more, it is suggested, ought the rule not operate to bar this action because of the further finding that the property was highly profitable to respondent. It appeared in these cases that where there were any improvements they were either of a temporary character or of little worth, and apparently there was no appreciable change in the condition of the properties or their value. Thus, there being no other equitable consideration in which prejudice could be predicated, it was held that the laches was not prejudicial. Conceding that where such a situation obtains, a person cannot justly be deprived of his rights because of his mere delay in asserting them, it does not follow that we can generalize therefrom and adopt the rule applied in these cases as the governing principle here. In Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 245, 81 Pac. 516, it was said that—

> "There is no artificial rule as to the lapse of time or circumstances which will justify the application of the doctrine. Each case as it arises must necessarily be determined by its own circumstances, or as said by this court in Bell v. Hudson, 73 Cal. 285, 288, 14 Pac. 791: 'In other words, the question is addressed to the sound discretion of the chancellor in each case.'"

Here, in the course of unexplained and inexcusable delay of the appellants for a period of 17 years, expenditures running into many many thousands of dollars were made by respondent for improvements of a substantial and costly nature, materially improving and changing the character of the property itself, and necessarily greatly increasing its value and availability, and resulting in its transformation from non-productive property into a highly improved and profitable walnut grove, and by reason of energy and business ability of the respondent therein, he has effected the sale of adjoining lands comprising more than half of the property to which he fell heir, obtaining therefrom rents, issues, and profits which may amount to $1,000,000. We are of the opinion that it would be impossible now to place the parties in statu quo; that the laches of the appellants, as found by the trial court and as established by the evidence, is prejudicial and is a bar to this action.

[16] It was held in the Akley Case that the possession of respondent's father as a life tenant was not adverse and did not start the statute of limitations running against Mrs. Akley during the life estate, "but after such estate terminated the possession, unless in some way qualified, did become adverse, the statute of limitations did begin to run at that time." See, also, Pryor v. Winter, 147 Cal. 554, 82 Pac. 202, 109 Am. St. Rep. 162. If the evidence sustains the finding that the possession of the property was adverse after the life estate terminated, the same conclusion should obtain here against these appellants. We think the evidence does support such finding. There was no interval of time from March 13, 1901, to the day when this action was commenced, on June 24, 1918, when the respondent himself, or by his guardian, or his manager and agent, who was his business associate, was not in the actual possession and occupancy of this property. His occupancy and possession were open, exclusive, hostile, and notorious, under a claim of right, and accompanied by the payment of all taxes. In addition to the facts already stated in our discussion of the question of laches, a foreman or superintendent was constantly in immediate charge of the property, and he and the farm hands or laborers under him were continuously on the ground doing the work of irrigating, cultivating and otherwise attending to the property. The contention that owing to the status of the parties as cotenants the possession of respondent was not of such a character as to be adverse to appellants as his cotenants was, in view of the evidence here, definitely settled in the Akley Case adversely to such claim.

[17] We are asked to reconsider the determination of the Supreme Court in the Akley Case, to the effect that the doctrine of laches is applicable to an action in partition where conflicting claims to the property are involved and an accounting is sought. We may not do so. A declaration of the law by the Supreme Court is the law of this jurisdiction, binding upon every inferior court in the state unless and until it be reversed or overruled by the Supreme Court. Likewise, with regard to two other contentions: First, that the finding of respondent's adverse possession of the property, notwithstanding his personal nonresidence in this state on March 13, 1901, and during any consecutive period of five years thereafter until the suit was brought, is contrary to law; and, second, that the finding that this action was not barred by sections 318 or 319 of the Code of Civil Procedure is in conflict with the finding that a recovery could not be had because the respondent had acquired a prescriptive title to the property under section 1007 of the Civil Code, thereby rendering the one or the other contrary to law. Both of these questions, under identical circumstances, except as to the parties concerned, were passed upon in the Akley Case, and decided adversely to appellants' contentions. Although the parties are different, the rule of law is thereby established.

The order vacating the original judgment and directing the entry of the substituted judgment, and the judgment entered in pursuance thereof, have heretofore been reversed in the Akley Case. As the result thereof the one originally entered was left in force and is the judgment in the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE of the state of California, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. John COURTNEY, Defendant and Appellant. (Cr. 1178.) (District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 12, 1924.) Appeal by defendant from a judgment of conviction of rape in the Superior Court of Alameda County; Fred V. Wood, Judge. Affirmed. H. D. Perry, of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. The defendant was charged with rape, accomplished by force and violence. The evidence introduced to support the charge leaves no possible doubt of defendant's guilt. This evidence stands unchallenged, as no testimony was offered by the defendant. The points raised by appellant are trivial, and devoid of any merit whatsoever, and not worthy of discussion here. Under the circumstances, no useful purpose could be served by setting forth a statement of the facts and thereby spreading the filth of this record over the pages of the Appellate Reports. The judgment is affirmed.

Laurel V. WEST, an Infant, by Perry C. West, His Guardian ad litem, Plaintiff and Appellant, v. Lena May WEST, Defendant and Respondent. (Civ. 4045.) (District Court of Appeal; Second District, Division 2, California. July 28, 1924. Appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in an action for annulment of marriage in the Superior Court of San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge. Reversed. Daley & Byrne, of San Bernardino, for appellant. Chas. L. Allison, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The opinion in the above-entitled cause, reported at 62 Cal. App. 541, 217 Pac. 567, and dated June 16, 1923, is hereby amended, so that the concluding sentences thereof shall read as follows: "The authority of the parents in the matter of giving consent to the marriage of their infant child is conferred, and also is limited, by the statute. This marriage became voidable immediately upon solemnization, and could become binding only in case the plaintiff had freely cohabited with the defendant after attaining the age of consent." Otherwise said opinion is to remain as originally reported.
